That night all the country side was alive with riding hurrying men. They came down t he rivernide galloping softly. They flitted ghostlike along the country road,they sauntered lazily through the dimstreets. It was past midnight when Harrison Coles left the Negro school house where a group of black men had been whispering their fears to him.

"Remember" he said "I am acting for t he good of the state. I did not believe in Negro suffrage but now that it is a fact I want those of you who are men to stand up and support decent government. It will cost you something. They mean mischief,even brute force and murder." He walked slowly out the door a nd almost into the arms of a crouching figure. The man slunk sullenly away.

"Beg your pardon,sir,no harm meant -just resting - just resting."

Harrison Coles made no answer but unsheathed his p istol and cocking it,rode boldly out into the street. Passing horsemen peered at him,and as he came to the edge of town,shadows flashed quickly by him;and once one rode close to him and whispered some word.but Coles made no reply and the horsem muttering rode into the night.

The hours drew heavily on. It w s a hot dry September night. The earth was dusty,parched and brown,and sullen winds swept lazily over from the warm river. A little blue flame curled sullenly upward from the wooden porch that flanked Miss Silena's new school. It curled and dwindled,flared and sputtered. Then it crept hesitatingly along the rafters, licked the pa paint of the columns and tasting new fuel glowed red with impatience, leapt and cracked. Silena slept, her thin hard face, careworn and unlovely, resting on a guant bended arm, and to her ears the cracking of the little flame came like the war away voice of her mother, whispering from eternity. A girl slept beside her , a beautiful dark faced girl with soft clinging hair. But she too heard nothing but the mail of a prince on horse-back, clicking his golden spurs. Down in the Negro quarter Tom Calhoun paced the floor anxiously in strange unrest. There was deviltry afoot in the night , aye, he felt it, he had seend the shadows flitting, hurrying. Was it sun-up already? it could not be! but why was the east so strangely red: it was not the east, it was the west that was red with a wierd ghostlike glow.

"Fire" he cried "come Rob" and he rushed out with beating heart. A black swathed horseman dashed by him but he avoided him. Up the street, he rand and down the hill, up again and the great red curling flames burst on his sight.

41-S-245

"It's the school" he gasped "I knew it" and he stretched every muscle. A crowd of black folk stood crushed in the square, and in their midst the crimson funeral pyre roared angrily toward heaven. Out in the fields beyond huddled the childre, all but the two whose souls on piling smoke were mounting upward to God. Out in the seared fields they stood around the slight form of one little woman, whose thin face shone white in the golden glow of the flames.

Meantime John Reynolds was waiting. That night he saw the red glow of the flames uneasily, for he knew that sooner or later the summons was coming. Violence and muder were spreading and every night the dark riders filled the fields. Frightened Negroes were hurrying to the towns, unrest and apprehension sat on men's faces everywhere and tonight when he went out late to look after his horses he was not surprised to find suddenly two black cloaked figures at his side.

"Well?" he asked coolly, looking at the two masked men.

"You will come with us, Mr. Reynolds."

"Where?"

"Never mind, the horse is saddled.!

They all mounted and rode slowly down the deserted streets and out toward the woods that bordered the city. It was a damp misty night and the stars glimmered but drowsily in the grey sky. On and on they rode saying no word but ever Reynolds caught the gleam of the pistols and felt the watchful eyes of the masked men beside him. They drew into the wood and passed far into the deeper forest and then they halted and listened to the hooting of owls until the black motionless wood livened into dark fantastic riders. All of them grouped themselves about the prisoner in a wide circle and one said in muffled tones:

"Mr.Reynolds do you understand that southerners propose to rule the sa south."

"I do and as a southerners I propose to help them."

"Dr you know whit it means to be a southerner?"

"I think I do."

"Let us see:-it means first an unalterable determination to keep Negroes in their places- do you agree."

41-S-246

"Yes."

"And their place is not to vote but to work under white men."

"I belive that too;I did not believe it for a while,but I have been convinced."

"You are ready then to cast in your lot with us?"

"Yes."

"Swear our oaths and obey our orders?"

"I think so,so far as I understand them."

"Very well - let us see:we want Tom Calhoun tonight. He is a dangerous Nigger. What are your relations to him?"

"We have been political allies."

"And by that alliance you have thwarted our plans repaetedly."

"I did what I though was to my interest."

"Very good where are your interests now?"

"With you."

"Very well! Tom Calhoun is organizing a league of Negroes."

"I've heard so!"

"They meet tonight?"

"Possibly."

"They meet tonight!"

"Yes."

"You will lead us to the meeting."

5"Why did you not follow them?"

"Never mind, you know why- will you lead us?" A cold sweat broke over John Reynolds. He knew that these Negroes had outwitted the Ku Klux several times. ~~He~~ knew Too of their usual meeting place. Yet he hesitated. It was an awful thing to be a bare faced traitor.

"Do you intend to harm the Negroes?"

"We intend to give them their deserts."

"But do you intend to kill them?"

"No" Still he hesitated. Then he thought of his son, his wife and his plans - he glanced at the pistols - "Well - come" he said.

Slowly they rode out under the dull grey sky, their hoof beats echoing softly as they cantered along the roads toward the sea. At last they turned and listened. A wind sighed in the trees and from afar a night hawk schreeched. Suddenly some one cried "Halt" Reynolds peered around carefully - lead them further into the woods and then pointed silently ahead. A low dark cabin stood there. They knocked. No one answered. They knocked louder and Tom Calhoun opened the door and stood in the glare of a lighted pine knot. He held a rifle in his hand.

"Who's there?" he cried.

"Mr. Reynolds" answered some one.

Tom stepped out, then started, back as he saw the masked cavalcade. Then he smiled quietly.

"A wild goose chase" he said. "We knew Reynolds was a traitor - there is no meeting here, gentlemen."

A haunting sense of shame crept over Reynolds' limbs. He turned his head away and as he did a sharp report rang out - another and another, the cabin was ablaze and three saddles were empty. There was a rush and a struggle in the night.

"Kill him" somebody hissed and quickly he felt himself borne round by the horsemen.

"Take this" cried one and he seized the dangling end of a rope.

"Ride, ride like hell" cried his neighbor.

Four of them rode into the teeth of the rising wind and the rope stretched and strained behind them. The shadowy trees flew screaming by and the paleness of the dawn sat upon the ~~waters~~ tree tops. Reynolds was faint and weary - why did the rope pull and thump and strain so - he turned to look back, but a sudden horror gripped him; on he rode hatless, dishevelled, gasping; he turned again but the black horsemen wheeled abruptly to the right and he caught only a dim cloud of dark dust; then as they thundered out of the forest he turned again and saw at the end of the rope a great black dog all blood and grime and dust; and he reeled and shrieked, and saw no more.

Chapter XIX.

~~Ideals~~. The Changelings

Roland Reynolds was working with feverish energy. The new railroad to Savannah and northward was building rapidly and he was selecting a ~~sight~~ site for his factories and branch roads. Manifestly this tract of land not far from the seat at Wilton Point was the most eligible but a stubborn old black woman would not sell one bit of land right in the centre. There was nothing to do but to worry her out by persecution and law suits. This was at last accomplished, and this afternoon the deeds for the whole tract lay before him. Wealth & success was ~~his~~ in his grasp & yet he was not happy. Indeed today he was particularly unhappy, for the

41-5-47

~~The~~ wedding invitations to the Jones-Coles nuptials were out and he was not remembered. It was bad enough to lose the girl but to be snubbed in the bargain was too much. He knew that his father had been regarded as a carpet-bagger, and nevere received by the local aristocracy even when, as a result of the visit of proud Mrs. Irma Lloyd Jones, he had turned traitor to his former associatie and helped lynch Tom Calhoun. It was a rather stiff price to pay, and the Reynolds family had looked for the doors of society to fly open to them after such a settlement. But they did not. Young Lloyd Jones went into politics listlessly for a living, and painted pictures assiduously for the loving of it; Mrs. Jones recognized Mrs. Reynolds on the street and Colonel Jones called. But that was all. And the rising young Roland Reynolds was bitterly disappointed.

41-S-248

He sat at his desk ~~in the~~ till twilight. The clerks had gone and he was about to go. And yet something held him. Twice he started and twice bitter thoughts held him back. But the third time he bent forward to rise it was a singular chanting that caught his ear-half chant- half murmur:

"Dark midnight Was the hour
"Dark midnight was the hour,
"Hear me, Jesus."

He wheeled toward the door and started involuntarily as it noiselessly opened and the forbidding face of an ancient black man peered in. He gave no greeting but tottered in with his rythmic murmuring song till he peered close into the young man's face, with his black and red eyes.

"Marse Reynolds, Marse Reynolds" he wheezed "you done turn poor old Juno into the cold. But Caesar lives. Caesar takes him. Marse Reynolds take care - look sharp Marse Reynolds - the curse is a dropping - a-dropping!nothing can't hold it. I saw her when she made it and it's a coming."

Reynolds had recovered from his momentary surprise and was listening to the old man in half amused tolerance.

"Are wexx all acursed Uncle Caesar?"he said.

"ALL- all you white folks- you can't never amount to nothing,,you can't never die peaceful- for its a coming. Today just today-"he lowered his voice mysteriously "I done see the Shadow ship and the old dark eyed White Man acoming slow like on the water."

The old fellow with his twisted face looked uncanny in the dying sunlight and Reynolds moved as if to go - but the old man motioned with his claw-like hands-"It done begin to drop" he continued" the curse done begin to drop the night of the white and black twins."

Henry rose impatiently,for it was rapidly darkening and moved toward the door,the old man hobbling after mumbling-"the black and white twins -one was black and hes twenty-five today and nursing his old ~~mammy mother~~ and the curse is not for he;and one is white and he's twenty five today nursing old Colonel Jones - take care old Colonel - take care."

Henry Reynolds stopped shortly on the stair. He was twenty-five today himself he remembered.

"What's that you said"he asked sharply.

"Oh there's many white black folks and many black white folks and the Joneses aint the first nor the last to have 'em and there's the curse - there's the curse" and before Reynolds could speak again the old man had glided away mumbling and chanting.

All night the talk of the white and black twins ran in Reynolds' head for he remembered something his father had told long ago of trouble in the Jones home soon after his son's birth. Early in the morning he sat straight up in bed with a bitter thought in his head.

"Suppose - suppose there was something crooked in Lloyd Jones' birth-by God"and he leaped out of bed All the week he nosed about,asking hinting until from a dozenqueer bits of gossip and fact he was sure he was on the track of some mystery;and on Saturday night he sat down in his silent office and wrote on a bit of white paper

"Are you sure Lloyd Jones is a white man?" and

His he sealed it in a plain envelope and directed it.

Harrison Coles received it with his Monday morning mail.

"What's that,papa? asked Editi,curiously. But he answered evasively and went to his study. There he looked at it. Was the shadow of the old curse of the land about to fall on him again? Of course it was but a miserable bit of anonymous gossip and yet - and yet - the servants old tales had not entirely escaped him before this,and if the thing was going to ve bruited abroad -absurdly untrue,as it of course was,yet the very lie might bring awful misery to him and his. He hesitated a moment and then dropped the paper into the fireplace and watched the flame.

41-S-249

(Read 200A here]

Chapter 20

~~Consummation~~. The End.

Martha Reynolds sat in Mrs.Harrison Coles' parlor. She had ona a very tight silk dress and shoes that pinched fearfully and she felt like an animate gasp.

41-5-251

"Colonel Jones' sudden death was very sad"said Mrs.Coles.

"Yes indeed- he was a true southerner"said Mrs.Higby.

"Yes"Mrs.Coles admitted "but not of course of our best blood."

Whereat Mrs.Higby was made slightly uncomfortable.

"You were not at the picnic"she said turning to Mrs.Reynolds.

"No,I was making bread -"

"Making bread?asked Mrs.Coles in surprise.

"Yes the sponge was just ready."

"You don't mean to say - where were your maids?"

"Maids,oh,the girl - why - I , I always make my own bread -mother always did."

Mrs.Coles merely said "Oh!"but she contrived to put several remarks into that monosyllable.

"Besides"said Mrs.Reynolds "our girl- such a good,neat and obliging girl she was - had a terrible accident - fell out the window that very day and broke her hip."

"How careless"said Mrs.Coles. "but we shall all be glad to call on Mrs.Grimes and her daughter"she said as Mrs.Reynolds arose "I have heard my husband speak of the late Mr.Grimes frequently."

So all the city aristocracy called on the rich widow and her slim shy daughter and learned with interest of the engagement of the young lady to Henry Reynolds.

"They'll be the richest family in Carolina"said Colonel Higby to Mrs.Jones.

"Yes"she answered listlessly.

"Reynolds himself is a millionaire"said another "and the Grimes' are even richer."

"It will be a great thing for the section-how did Reynolds make his Meantime Roland Reynolds walked thoughtfully home, with wrinkled forehead and whispering lips. Either Harrison Coles would heed that note or - ignore it. If he ignored it, what then? There were the newspapers. But for that he would need some tangible proof- some documentary evidence. H'm. He sat silently through supper abstractly eating under his mother's anxious gaze. Afterward out on the porch he cautiously sought to open the subject with his father, but his father seemed unwilling. A suspicion shot through Roland's head. Perhaps his father knew more than he wanted to tell him. What harm would it do to glance through some of the old papers in the safe? He smoked silently for a while and then went off to bed. When all was still he came down again and rummaged in the safe. There were certificates of stock on the Glennworth Mackay plantations, agreements with Galesburg and Grimes, business letters from Colonel Henry Jones; he looked them through eagerly but there was nothing - yes there was one soiled and crumpled note. He unfolded it and read it. Slowly he walked up stairs and sat down before his mirror and stared at his face. The nose and lips were large, the skin white and freckled, the hair red, crisp and curly.

41-5-250

The note said:

"Mr. Henry Reynolds:-

People that steal Nigger babies from the south had better not adopt them. Look at your brat's hair and nose.

A Friend."

Slowly Reynolds read the note again and then he slowly tore it up.

[Back to page 200]

41-5-252

money?"

"By stealing and lying and slavery,"said Mrs.Jones and the others were silent.

"He had had the contract for convicts during many years"said Colonel Higby at last.

"Happy man"sighed a youngster "that is better than a gold mine."

All this time the happy man was walking down by the sea.

Yes he was rich at last,very rich. See there were his land disappearing on the horizon. This was his check book and here the balance. But he was restless. He had just quarrelled with Martha.

"Silena? Silena the Nigger teacher,to Hesry's wedding? Of course not - what would the Joneses say - what would Mrs.Coles say? Nonsense. You must drop Silena forget her. We're up in the world now!"

And he turned fretfully from the old dumb suffering in Martha's eyes and walked down town.

His son rode by and stopped:

"Where's the bride?said the father forcing wild gayety into his tones.

"I left her up there - she's got no sense and she's homely as a bit."

"Sh! she's rich as Croesus you fool."

"Yes but God! father just think of her beside Harrison Coles' daughter,whom Lloyd Jones has married."

"The penniless fools."

"Yes pennniless - but I'd give more for a breath of that girl's nostrils than for -

"Hush -hush for God's sake boy - don't you see your future!this land will yet be one of the richest on earth and you can be the richest in it - you can -

"What?"

"Well what more do you want?"

"O nothing I reckon -- good night."

John Reynolds turned and followed the rider afar with bowed head, stumbling as though drunk,drunk with pale wine of the world. Something was wrong - every thing was wrong. He saw his son ride into the back gate, but he himself went groping along the path through the old field in the gray dusk of day,thinking. Dreaming of Canaan,of Crimes, of Jones of - he shuddered and tried to forget - yes of Tom,of great black Tom,until slowly at his very side Tom rose and stood. He saw his great black bulk against the west;he saw the glittering gun barrell just as on that night - he strove to speak whispering,,pleading,"Tom,tom!" and then in great flash and roar he fell headlong in the path.

How long he lay there he never knew. But when he tottered to his feet in the black night he was an old man,very,very old.a And always,ever after there were shadows creeping about him- great waving shadows:shadows that shut out his vision,shadows that slipped across his speech and made him forget in mid-sentence,shadows,and nets and twines and when for a space the shadows lifted his brain blazed with piling struggling thoughts.' He saw everything,knew everything,lived agtin the turmoil of the day, the week,the lengthning years. Then the shadows would ~~rise~~ gather again and drift and fall -always everywhere shadows even on that night when he looked at Martha across the murdered body of their son.

41-5-253

Tonight a neighbor passed him as he staggered onward toward the roaring of the sea.

"Good night,Mr.Reynolds."

Good night - good night - all nights were good like this and all were hateful. See there sat an old woman on the porch - as old as he was and older,who was she? he seemed to know her but the shadows - ah well. Her face was bitter and hard and white and she saw something yonder beynd the dark tossing sea. Was it the something x the great intangible Something that all his life he had missed? True he had not searched for it as he might but now and then he had searched when the quest of Gold gave time, but he had never found it - should never find it,for it had fled afar. What was it? Involuntarily he found himself stretching his hands, his old worn hands,doubtingly against the setting sun. A couple passed him with twined arms walking toward the sounding sea,and behind them a great song arose and swelled across the tossing waters and echoed back again. He stopped and listened,the staggered upward from the sea and toward the setting sun and all was red and dark and black save yonder where, gleamed a woman's bitter eyes staring white-faced at the white-faced sea.

The Omen.

On the great cape that beetles with black brows above the northern waters sat an old man with twined arms and head between his knees. Great windswept snows lay on the land,and green and glistening ice told of the bitter cold that slept in those cold waters. Bleak and bare lay all the world,andthe pale rays of the rising sun glittered and froze in the tall thin throated pines.

Yet on the Indian came whirling has frail canoe inward from the west and gathering his blanket closely about him,and onward crept a thin and scarred half-frozen hound upward from the east. The old man looked upon them both with dull unhappy eyes. The hound whined and whimpered at his feet searching, searching in the ice,and the Indian threw himself prone upon the ice covered ground and lay there staring at the sky. The old man said sorrowfully:

"So soon,so soon,my son? The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong." In the brown face of the prostrate man a blue pallor struggled and fought. He spoke thickly and with pain:

"Life is a lie"he said.

"Calling for truth"murmured the old man and slowly he hid his face again between his knees,while ever the blond and limping beast walked between the two,in and out,up and down,forward and back with his nose in the ice,his red eyes glazed,searching,searching.

"The world is ugly"continued the Indian.

"Wanting beauty"returned the old man.

"Men's deeds are evil."

"Seaching for good."

The young man was silent but the old man continued solemnly:

"For truth that speaks no,Beauty that will not see,for idle Goodness, there was in that world,is in this,and will be in the world to be,no goal but Death."

And suddenly the rigor of death shook the dark frame of the prostrate freezing man. Great white flakes of driven snow filled the heavens swirling,circling and gathering themselves into one great fleecy cloud;then they dropped gently like a vast unwoven pall above the bier.

41-S-254

Book 3 pp. 204-304

41-5-255

Book III.

The Seat of the Scornful.

The Seat of the Scornful.

Chapter I.

~~The Coming of~~ Freedom.

All the dark lowlands were sleeping. The solemn oaks dipped to the gloomy waters and a wild bird frightened from her nest rose and shrieked in the darkness circled in the air then settled to her sleep again. But the boy whom her shrill cry had wakened, started from his dreams sat upright in his bed and turned fear struck eyes toward the sea. Within the cabin all was dark and still save a dying gleam in the fireplace and a sound of breathing. The little boy hearkened - how the sea roared like a great Voice! What was it saying? What were those little answering whispers and whence that glowing in the outer blackness? A slow dim terror crept and trembled in his limbs; his dry lips could not speak but he strained with his eyes out the great dark door. See a flaming sat upon the midnight waters, and round it- yes, round it- rode the dark shadow of a shadowy ship, sailing swinging hurrying; and above it swirled a face, a great dark awful - "Mammy", wailed the child Mammy-mammy- mammy! he shrieked is an ecstacy of terror till two great soft arms came out of the night and held him and a voice crooned:

"There, honey, there; it's all a drema, nothing shall hurt mammy's child."

When the child awoke again the sun was streaming across the waters. He wakened his older sister and whispered to her and together in their scanty night gowns which scarce covered their smooth dark flesh, they stepped to the kitchen where the mother was durrying to and fro and singing softly:

"Mammy" said the boy "I dreamed Momm Dett got me, last night".

Ever and again such dreams come through long long years. But one mother Juno had paused in the doorway with a great white cloud of clothes from the Big House. They were big children then, the girl 14 and the boy 11.

"Hush" cried the mother "Hark!"

It was the Christmas of 1862 the week of the Christ Child. Up throught the chill of war on the last night of the old year and the first of the new had risen a new strang Peace and far away along the waters and down from the rolling hills came a new song, a song of freedom. It came down through the streets of the crowded cities and all the city rushed into the streets; it echoed in the great hills and the men of the mountain hushed their voices and looked thoughtfully into the valleys below. Far down the valleys, down where the blue sea was talking and telling its world old tale, there by a thousand twinkling camp fires came tie new Song and two thousand black men rose and yelled cheered again and agaian and cheered the echo. All through the land rang that wild cheer and the soul of a black nation awoke. Had a black man dreamed a dream of happiness? That night that dream came true. Had a black woman dreamed of a child that was hers and hers alone? that night it leaped in her breast. Had a father dared to hope toown his chlidren? that night they were his. The girl who yesternight owned not even her body, tonight slept mistress of both body and soul. O it was a glad night, the gladdest night four millions ever saw, and ever they shouted and cired and prayed and sang and the sound of the ir sing ng was as the sounding singing of the four voiced winds.

41-S-256

41-5-257

This was the sound that Juno and her children heard that early morning of the New Year and they paused and poised themselves agog:

A man rushed running by -

"What's the matter" asked Juno.

"We'se free" crind the man.

"We'se free" shouted the surging crowd of women and girls, and an old woman hobbling painfully seaward turned toward her with streaming eyes: "We'se free."

Juno sat still and the children looked up into her face. "No" she thoaght "this was not the freedom she had dreamed of. Once she too would have welcomed freedom with songs and tears but now why should she be free since He was far away. With him would come freedom, without him, the chains hung thick and close about her soul. The day flew wildly by and at nightfall the children hung about the mother:

"Mammy who's Tom?" said ~~xxx~~ Mary, the girl - Juno looked at her.

"Who told you of - Tom?" she asked.

"You just said "Tom, my Toc" and at night you prays for him and in your dreams he comes and talks to you."

She looked at them thoughtfully, then gathered them close in her arms.

"Tom's your pappy" she said.

The children paused. The mrther hummed an old strange tune. Then Robert said timidly:

"Mammy, where's pappy?"

Juno sang slower and more slowly-then the taers came creeping.

She rose quickly and went back to the ironing paused over it a moment, then grasped the irons sturdily and they flew over the white linen.

"Pappy"s gone"she said. "Pappy's gone and left us - but he'll come again some time,some long time. My God done promised me and oh - he must come."

"Why did he go mammy?"

"Shall we know him- did he look like me mammy?"

"O,he was high and great and pretty. Smooth and black and stronger than everybody. When first I saw him standing in the young cotton field with his great arms and sweet eyes,my lesh went all a tremble for I knew my man had come,my own man. Yet Celia wanted him and Celia was yellow and witching. I saw her tempting him once as he took her across the great lagoon under the tortuous shadows of the trees;she leaned toward him and put the spell of her eyes across im and he looked at her puzzled-like. O I was mad with jealousy I was crouching in the slimy underbrush and they glided almost within my touch and then disappeared. I was but a girl and I ran home in wild tears and Momm Bett saw me. (She fell silent and the hot irons raced acrss the cloth.)

41-S-258

"She didn't beat me that night."

"Did Momm Bett used to beat you,Mammy?"

"Yes"(with a shudder.)

"Were you a naughty girl?"

"I expect so - I ex ect so - but this night she looked at me with curious eyes and said abruptly'Do you want him?' You see she was a Wonder Woman andknew everything."

"Yes - yes,Mammy,we knows."

"So I crept on my knees before her and told her I wanted nothing on earth like I wanted him. That without him I would die - that I would creep to the slimy lagoon and drink death. She smiled her awful smile and then (the irnos moved slowly over the clothes and beads of sweat rose on the yellow forehaed)then she worked the witchery."

"How did she do it mammy?"

"How did she?"

"Hush boy"cried the woman with a frightened glance. "Hush -this night he came and sang a song before the door with his banjo. Momm Bett brought him in and married us then by the ways of her fathers with blood and salt and song. The next day we went up to the Big House and he asked Master Lloyd for me and Master Lloyd laughed and said "S "Sometime,sometime" for he did not like to have his folk marry off the place. But Momm Bett came and whispered to him then the wedding was set for the next week. It was the month of blossoms and oh,the world was beautiful. Colonel Jones had just come back from Mexico and with him - with him - Evil came,and pappy Tom beat me and ran away."

"Was you naughty mammy-"

"Yes - your mammy sinned -but she didn't mean to God knows she didn't and then Celia witched Tom and the witchery's still a working."

"Asd if you ask God to forgive you -"

"Didn't I ask - O Jesus - haven't I begged you but you won't hear -but there then. Your pappy went awy but sometime he'll come again- he must come for till he comes I can't die."

Then she and the children fell a weeping and the wind sighed in the trees and the shadows lengthened across the billowy rice fields. A wildness creeps into the mother's eyes and her fingers twitch."

"It's bed time-"she says hurriedly.

"O mammy'tt's hardly dark. Let us stay up and talk more about papy." But the mother hurried them off to bed and seizing her irons again worked swiftly almost fiercely far into the night.

41-5-259

Chapter II.

Momm Bett.

A little boy sat on Colonel Jones' fence swinging his legs. He was perhaps seven years old and looked a symphony in brown - yellowish brown of face,with flying light brown hair,dirty dark brown trousers hitched up with dingy strings - a ragged neutral tinted shirt and muddy red brown feet and legs. All this coloring he was engaged in heightening with bright orang persimmon juice - devouring the luscious little golden bulbs greedily and whistling lustily between.

"Get out of there you little scamp"yelled an angry voice "I'll break your neck if I catch you in those persimoons again." The boy measured the distance of the oncoming owner warily,grabbed another handful of the fruit and dove with incredible swiftness into the underbrush,wriggling,screwing,slipping flying across the fields until with a whoop and a swing of his old felt hat he landed in the limbs of a great black oak at the edge of the cotton field. Finding that the pursuit was not pressed,he finished the persimmons,licked his hands and looked about for further adventure. Beneath this long accumulated layers of dirt his face was almost beautiful but it was spoiled by a precocious sharpness slyness and restlessness. It seemed as if the little body was tingling with pent up energy and the keen mind quivering and sparkning every minute- and over all hung a furtive watching for blows and yells,a preparedness for missiles and oaths and a mocking,mischievous sense of ability to triumph over and laught at a hrstile world. No sooner had he finished his persimmons and spied the land out with his great shining black eyes,than he shook out his tangled hair and dove again to the ground and in a moment he was moving stealthily among the big green striped waterme lons that lay in the field beyond the cotton. He tapped the melons carefully,cocking his head aside and had just chose a big ripe melon ~~xxxxxxx~~ when he heard a furious barking and saw a big brown dog Hashing across the fields. It was a long pull to the nearest tree and he measured the distance carefully. Then with the melon under one arm and a big stone in either hand he fairly flew acrss the field. It was a race that made the angry planter stare in astonished amusement. The dog skimmed silently with head down and in great skipping curves. The boy ran like a deer clasping the melon. Once when the dog was almost on him he turned and sent a stone straight at the brute's eyes and the dog leaped aside and started again,but before he had dodged the second stone. the boy, melon and all had wriggled like a cat up the tree and squatted on a branch. The dog rushed boldly up and the boy bent over and waited. Just as the dog was directly under him he suddenly threw the big melon straigt at his head. It hit him squarely in the eyes and the astonished animal turning with a fild yelp of surprise and pain turned and flew back across the field like a streak. The boy watched and rested a bit. Then climbing cautiously down he gathered up the fragments of watermelon ate tde juicy meat carefully and threw the rinds at the birds that hovered near.

41-5-260

Then he started carelessly across the fields tramping on the young cotton and whistling merrily.

"You better get out of that cotton boy"cried a girl across thefield.

"If you don't Momm Bett'l get you"added the boy.

The urchin stopped whistling and stared at Juno's two children.

"Who Momm Bett?"he asked.

"She gets bad children" answered Mary.

"Iumph"naid the boy"I ain't afraid of no -- "

"What's that?"said a gruff voice :they all turned and saw Uncle Caesar behind them. He was a curious bent black man,his hair white as snow and bushy,his beard scanty and scraggly. Sharp snappy black eyes twinkled in his head and his face was folded and seamed, wrinkled and forbidding. He glided along slowly bent half double with great brass rings in his ears and mumbling always some unintelligible jargon. The children always half feard him and shrunk from him,yet he had a fascination and could hold them spellbound with his black eyes when he would. Today he seemed so minded. He looked at them sharply till they began to slide off. And even the wild urchin shrunk. Then he chuckled and searched in his great polkets until he brought out a grimy paper and in it a great piece of striped candy. The children's eyes grew big but they hesitated.

"Is you good children?"he asked.

"Yes,sir."

He turned suddenly to the urchin:

"No you ain't -you name Hal -you runs away and steals and lies and if you don't watch out Momm Bett'll get you."

Hal looked uncomfortable but he asked stumdily:

"Who Momm Bett?"

And the other children.

The older children looked at each other. The idea of anyone's not knowing Momm Bett. They had heard the talk from their cardle and yet it was ever wonderful - ever new.

"Tell us about Momm Bett,Uncle Caesar."

The old man eyed them.

"What you know arout Momm Bett?"he asked. He always said that.

"Mammy tell us things sometimes."

"Go way- your mammy don't know nothing about Momm Beet - I knows- I knows all about her but I won't tell all,nobody could tell all. She was a Wonder Woman."

The children crept neaer. "Tell us something,"they pleaded.

41-5-261

He crouched in the cotton patch and swayed and mumbled and this was the tale he told,only he used curious language which the writer has straightened:

"Momm Bett,Greatest of Wonder Women,came in the year of the great Comingywhen the doors were open and Africa, he Black Land poured suddenly -like upon us and Charleston harbor was black with slaves. This was the way she come. It was red night,hot red night when lights was a-flashing in the north. Just after the hot sunset come a great hailing out at sea - a sudden madfull wind went a-sweeping by with black clouds and lights flew up and down up and down in the east. Then at last the big crowds on the wharf heard a whistling and a great dark ship old,older than anything staggered around the bar from the south with torn sails aflapping,rushing like a devil fiend,and crunching and tearing as she hove up. There was a strange creeking and tearing of ropes;black coated and goopher-looking men walked about." Then Uncle Caesar rose and gesticulated and told how their master had hailed the crowd in some strange tongue that none understood. At last an old hermit from the mountain,he that was half haft and wandered about silently,heard and answered the jargon. It seems the strange folk had been making for a far off land around some goodly cape. There long beat back by eastward storms they had struck a sudden east wind which threw them violently westward till starving and thristy they had made with difficulty this harborp All this men doubted for they had seen no storms; still when they offersd a slave cheap for food food and water men hurried forward to bargain. An old white bearded man with cavernous eyes brought her ashore. And Uncle Caesar said in low rapt tones:"No sooner does I see her than I knows her. She was a queen and one of the Wonder Women. I creeps upon my face. But they white folks they only saw a black woman,six feet high,willow like and straight as a pine with a mess of puffed bushed hair. A white man started toward her but she looked at him and he crept away. Another grapped her arm but she seized him quick and threw him ten feet along the docks and the crowd roared. Then her eye falls on old Master Lloyd- He was young then,scented gay and pretty,and she beckoned him. He came over luaghing and offered the old man a thousand dollars for the Wrnder Woman. The grey-head looked strangexx at Lloyd and took the money. The black woman smiled right into his big black eyes,waved her hand at the shadow of the ship and followed old Master into the darkness.

41-5-262

"Ha,ha (the old man chuckled)she was a wise woman very wise. But there were some things I knew and everybody knew and she didn't. She was so wise about big things,she didn't know nothing about lots of little things. She thought she was going to be DeCoursey Lloyd's chief wife and queen- slave of course as all wives are slaves,but chief slave and ruler by her cunning and her conjure. And indeed for a time - you better believe - she was. Far off beyond the rice fields in yonder half dead cabin,she sat and queened over the young fooland he seemed love-mad with her. It was a pretty yellowish brown child- your mammy that came to them there and they sat aside each other and sang to it and to the sea. Then men began to talk - leastways women.

" 'It's shameful' " they said.

" !A Lloyd of Carolina.' "

" 'He's no account and fast. ' "

" 'We must save him.'"

"Xx xxxx xxx " 'He must be married to some big white woman.'"

"So they talked and whispered until at last ~~weary of this toy and~~ when he was tired a-playing and a-feared and shameful of his life he took a pale doll from the country and made a proud wedding.

"And then ah,then,rose the real Wonder Woman. She turned on him sudden-like as a snake creeps to a toad. They says the sea that night was red and the whistling wind echode on it. She struck him across his face - do you mind the scar of his right forehead -no,no you'd all too young - well only his dodging save him that hot night. And then she sent for me.. I was his man then and had dared raise eyes to her

the Queen thinking to come by her as I came by his cast of clothes. Bah!she slapped me to the earth and ~~spurned~~ spit on me and ~~there~~ always after I was her dog and she the Qu en. It was midnight,midnight,no moon,no star when we two went out together on the shore. One of the mad storms as a muttering in the southeast and the wind was chill. We lighted a circle of fire on the black beach,till it covered her high form and waved a d fanned about her. Then she led the witchery and at her feet I begun to learn the secrets of the earth - the voice of spirits,the charm of snakes,the conjure of herbs -not all then,O no, but beginning then and after bit by bit in years and years. Then I learned but first bits and lay flat on the earth ~~in~~ scared, still ~~silence~~ while in the circling flame she cursed DeCoursey Lloyd and his doll and their children forever and aday. Then she cursed the land and the sea. God!it was ~~xx~~ awful - I sweats and I trembles when I remember the muttering hunder and muttering woman,the air aflashing with lightning, and hate,the darkness and the flame and the mist-ful bending woman. This land? these white folks? They can't never be nothing,they can't never prosper,they are accursed and I heard the curse. Hasn't it come true?"~~x~~he said lowering his voice mysteriously "Didn't old Master live scared all his life and die of a ntrange thing,didn't his proud-faced daughter run away and marry a scamp,didn't their child"he stopped cuddenly "Listen (he said as the children's eyes widened and their breath came quicker) "Listen:the day old Lloyd deied ashrieking and ascreaming for HommBett -that night Colonel Jones went across the rice fields to whip Homm Bett for her conjuring. He even dared to raise the snaky thing against her but beforeit touchied her monstruos form there came awhistling tearing wind from the south and round the bar shot a big old black ship all flaming. And from it before it touched the shore a white-bearded man,old,older than the sea itself beckoned and Homm Bett was gone and she left only a red ~~glowing~~ shining on the sea."

41-S-203

The old man stopped and sat staring rapt. They watched him breathless,catching his meaning only here and there yet dreaming confused things of ships and wonderful women.

Suddenly Uncle Caesar rose and said as he always did "What you all adoing heah?"~~X~~ It's most noon - your mammy wants you - go."

They rushed away fearfully,running across the low black land until they were out of Uncle Caesar's sight. Then Hal halted:"I don't belive nothing about no Homm Bett and shadow ships"he declared studily But the other children drew back from the blasphemer in horror and left him standing thereywhile they hurried from him talking rapidly,pointing gesticulating;for their world differed from his:Robert,brown and sturdy lived ever in a world of dreams,worshipping the deeds of HMomm Bett,and Mary, his elder sister a frailer and more delicate,lived in a wierder web of mystery striving inh her half-grown way at the curious heart of things. Ever the two children hovered over the tale of the witch woman,till it was their play and their dream,their solemn thought and the inspiration of their work,as the sea swept harder over the grey and twinkling islands and the winter mists gloomed the air.

41-5-264

Chapter III.

The Incantation.

Juno was waiting. As the night advanced she listened,going often to the door and peering out. At last she dropped her irons wearily and paced to and from wringing her hands until she heard the shuffle of footsteps before the door and a low knocking.

"Uncle Caesar"she said looking at him in suppressed excitement. He growled gruffly and crouching by the fire relapsed into silence watching the flame. She hovered about him clasping and unclasping her dark hands.

"He's alive" he said. She gave a great sob and sank into a chair. The children turned uneasily in their sleep. The old man started. Then raising quickly he stepped to the bed and raising the sleeping boy lifted him high and held him up where the north star blazed through the little window. He ppered darkly into the ark ness but the mrther singing to her knees cried"The chlid,O God,the child"and the half awakened boy whimpered to the night. The old man shook his head.

"Nothing,nothing"he mumbled and he laid the child slowly in his cot again.

"Can't you bring him back?"wailed the woman.

"He's with Celia"he said.

"Kill her" she cried fiercely starting up. "Kill her,conjure her,he's mine"and her voice wailed away into tears. He said nothing but crouched again on the hearth. She bent fearfully over him and saw before him a little waxen figure,black and misshapen. He threw an evil glance over his shoulder.

"She is sick"he said.

"Kill her"came the bitter answer.

He drew a long sharp needle from his coat and heated it in the flame. Then he began to murmur - a faint low mumbling noise - like the crooning of some vast and wandering soul far far away - wierdly and mysteriously chanting its ancient mysteries.

He stuck the needle into the wax and drew it out poising his head and listening.

"Did you hear it?"he asked.

"No she whispered. "Again,again,deep!"

He muttered long and waved his arms and then again he plunged the needle deed into the wax and whirled it.

41-S-265

41-5-266

A low moan seemed to drift down the wide fireplace. She laughed low and wildly and urged him on.

"Hurt her "she panted "Hurt her to death."

He leaped to his feet and bared his withered black arm.

"Her blood's on you and over you" he growled and bending raised the red hot needle, plunged it way through the wax, twisted it and turned it. The woman danced and quivered. He paused again.

"Kill her" she cried with a half stifled scream that started the children in their dreaming. Muttering low and waving his hands he kept plunging the hot needle into the softened wax and whirling it and working it till the black mass quivered and settled and spread into a dark splotch on the stone hearth and as it flattened and frose the door flew suddenly open and there drifted in a faint sharp cry as from afar.

Whence came the cry? Surely from the northward. Perhaps from up yonder where the pink curlews were circling on the dim coast; perhaps it echoed further from the rolling highlands of the north state or from the high walled valleys or even drifted with the silences of the night far down Virginian vales, perhaps. But the strange old man whispered in after years that the death cry came from a thousand miles away, far up there where a great dark city slept in its great thick walls.

Up where the walls were thickest and darkest ~~and there~~ in a dark cellar-like basement, Celia Jones lay sleeping. The night was hot and close and the brown body of the woman lay half covered as she tossed and murmured uneasily and the threw out her arms. The damp fetid breath of the slums came lazily down the area way heavy with the midnight footsteps of passing men. Suddenly her body stiffened: the tense muscles and quickened breath showed the hold of some fearful dream. Her lips parted and a little fluttering moan trembled forth. Then she moved and for a moment sank into more natural sleep, only again to be seized by the horror of the nightmare. She groaned in terror. Without came a faint low ~~murmuring~~ rumbling ~~as of a great voice chant~~ like the crooning of some vast & wandering soul ~~its~~ far far away, weirdly & mysteriously chanting its mysteries, it grew ~~into the sound of many voices and the rushing~~ it swelled & roared, shattering itself into a frenzy of yells a babel of voices & the rushing ~~and shouting~~ of men. Torches flashed, windows crashed and women screamed. Still Celia lay asleep held viselike ~~with~~ by the dreamed terror; her hands gripped the flesh, the sweat bubbled on her forehead until with a low tremulous scream of horror she leapt to her feet wide-waking, and peered with dazed eyes upon the surging street.

Tom Calhoun was hurrying home late at night. He had been helping Mary and Silena dismantle the house preparatory for sailing south early in the morning. He walked warily for already earlier in the day the draft riots had broken out and were sweeping the city when a thunder storm cleared the streets of its human vermin. Tom felt a little uneasy for Celia ~~down there to the Negro quarter and the more so for the ominous noises that the night brought to him.~~ down there in the Negro quarter, and the more so for the ominous noises that the night brought to him. The tumult increased. Faster and faster he walked then ran, but just as he reached the corner of his alley he saw the flare and heard the roar of the rioters. Houses were burning and the black inmates were running and screaming. Evidently he could not reach home this way. He ran back and hurried through another way. Again he met the mob crying.

"There's a Nigger - catch him, killhhim."

All night he dodged and doubled, hid and strove to get to his home. It was in vain, until the pale sun whitened the great dark walls of the city, and the drunken crowd crept home. Then Tom hastened home, but there where then basement room was, lay now only a dark hole, a heap of ashes and a few white bones.

Sick at heart and weary to staggering, Tom set out to get his dray, for it was already time to see to the starting of Martha and Silena. He found his head bleeding, why he did not remember, but hastily binding it up, he hurried to the stable.

41-5-267

What happened then he never knew clearly. He remembered vaguely her dark dead face, the prancing horses and the dray. He remembered the ride with Martha and Silena to the wharves, the whirling through the streets; he remembered the glancing and gleaming of the sunlight on the great glass windows; the hoarse roar of voices, the swinging of great doors and then

What had happened? A great drowsiness, a half misty consciousness lay on him and the bed where he lay seemed rising and falling. The room how strange it was, so small so - then he fell to dreaming. He awoke again in the darkness and the words of Celia were ringing in his ears. O if she could have seen his riven soul. He had loved Juno in all the wild untrained strength of his young manhood. He had worshipped her from afar, watching her twirling feet and her proud young curled crowned head. When she passed by, his heart was still. And then in his diffidence and despair came her wierd strange mother, saying: "Go to her, she loves you." Ay, for one short year the world grew rich and glorious, wanton in flower and fruit. He remembered afterward that sometimes in their mad happiness her eyes grew fear-struck and she clung ao him terrified - the shadow of wanton weakness, he had said in his awful bitterness. The child was born, the bonnie nut brown girl that cooed and called to him. And then - then what was it? How the rooms rolls and that - why that was like ahe breath of the sea.- Yes they sent him away on the far off sea islands with a gang of men. He could not take his wife and baby. They were not his, they belonged to Colonel Jones. But they promised to buy their freedom while he was away and then they could live together on one plantation. Blithely he had rushed back from the sea. It was long after midnight but he ran across fields to his wife and baby and hurrying on he had met Celia and her devil's tale. He had thrown her from him with a curse and rushed blindly on. He had burst in to the cabin. Juno rushed to him with a glad cry and a new-born child in her arms, a dark brown boy but he cursed her and she shrank crouching, trembling before his awful face. The words were drowned in his blazing anger and she, what had she said cowering there is ashen trembling - "I -I couldn't help it - I didn't know - He was my master." No!no! Celia had told the truth, it must have been the truth. God, how he struck her till the babies shrieked and the woman had sat dumb and speechless. The overseer rushed on him but Tom, he remembered how he had thrown out his hand and with a sickening crackle of bones the slave driver went to his long home. Then blindly he turned toward the fields and ran whither - he knew not, cared not. The fresh dew of morning fell like gentle balm on his parched and glowing skin. He sped across the fields in a great circle bending low and running easily in great long strides with his head thrust forward like a hound's . And the cry of hounds rose behind him faintly, surely nearer and nearer, his breath came in great gasps. No he could run no further. Beyond him swayed a woman and two little children. He would call her - no it looked like Juno - was it she or her spirit? An old bridge sat beneath the oaks and above a silent black stream, he dodged under it, ran up the waters a bit to throw the scent and then quickly with al last spurt doubled back on the Beaufort road. In vain a white horseman sat on the road and with a crash he fell headlong in the under brush. and lay panting as the hounds and horse men swept by.

41-5-268

41-5-269

The sea air - the wild sweet air, how sweet it was and how plain t at face, the face of the silent staring horseman in the road. It was an interesting face - a sharp face - a vacillating face but not a good face.. But there was a good face beside it in after years - a face of sorrow and timide dread of goodness, pure goodness, sweet like the great fair hills where it was born. He turned uneasily and felt the twinge in his side and looked dreamily into Martha's face. Strange that she should be here and where was Here - was he dreaming - why.-

"There, Tom, you're better now don't rty to move lie quietly."

"Where am I" he asked vaguely "I'se been dreaming of the South and the sea and the days, the black days of long ago - I - I smell the sea- surely I smell the sea."

"Yes, Tom we're on the water."

"On the water, on ship board - how did?"

"You were hurt in the riot Tom."

"O yes, yes, I remember now - I remember , poor Celia."

"O heavens Tom, is she left behind?"

"No, she went first, she's dead - where are we going?"

"To South Carolina, Tom, to Wilton Point."

"Wilton Point -Beaufort - He half rose in excitement then fell back and closed his eyes with a sigh. "Wilton Point" he murmured. Wilton Point."

41-S-270

Chapter IV.

War ~~Fort Wagner.~~

"We want no green recruits" said the captain.

"I know the manual" answered Tom. "I drilled with a squad in New York ~~at Yonkers~~

"Fall in" came the command and Tom Calhoun joined the black regiment on James Island where the boat first hove to . It was the morning of the sixteenth of July, 1863 and the black soldiers were already stirring as the new recruits marched into camp.

An eager spirit of expectation and unrest lay on the camp. Already they had waited years and days for this opportunity. Last night they had stepped forward with their pickets peering in the gloom and then fell slowly backward. But today, this very night the movement was to begin. Charleston lies by a cluster of islands and waters forme by the great harbor and by the old ~~the~~ Stone river where Cato of Stono, the first black rebel, lived. Here Carolina like a great mouth bites the eastern seas. On the tip of her ~~the~~ tongue lies ~~is~~ Charleston itself. In her ~~its~~ great upper jaw is Fort Moultrie, ~~and~~ between its teeth is fateful Sumter, while its heavy lower jaw makes James Island. Over the jaw like lips slip Folly and Morris Islands. On Morris Island lay a fort, a low black heavy fort, Fort Wagner, and thither waved the black mass waiting on James Island ~~was to go in force~~ looked on grim longing. The night was drifting slowly out to sea when six thousand shadows moved across the ugly marshes of James Island; great sloughs of mud yawned before them, sullen dark waters rushing swollen streams and broken dykes. Thick sombre trees watched them silently and dipped their moss swept limbs deep into the mysterious black water. Serpents hissed and twined beneath their feet and wild birds screamed: yet all the long night, voiceless, breathless they slipped and struggled toward the sea. Just as the faint grey dawn tinged the lowering hurrying clouds, they stepped on Morris Island. Afar lay the grey dull walls of Fort Wagner sleeping silently.

41-S-271

As the soldiers halted suddenly the air grew thin and chill, the far off muttering of thunder shook the morning hush and the sea flashed and roared and foamed. It was as if nature hesitated to let these black men go even as their leaders hesitated and whispered and glanced. The storm started from the face of the sea like passion sweeping a soul, screamed and panted, yelled and roared, while the black rain streamed and beat upon the sea and land. The soldiers crouched in the misery and hunger of wet waiting six endless hours and then above the voice of the dying story rose the thunder of mighty guns. East, west, and south they flashed and the iron and lead pounded into the stone and sand of Fort Wagner. Far out at sea the gunboats hissed and crashed and the air was thick with the whirring of death from noon till shadowy night. No sooner had the death lulled than again the storm clouds boiled over sea and land, the lightning flashed the purple clouds and the low tense chiding and chasing of the thunder knelled on the ears of the crouching, dripping soldiery. It was dinner time but there was no dinner; it was suppertime but there was no time to eat. Five thousand white men swung suddenly into line facing the fort, but in front and ahead of them stood a thousand black men. They paused. A young white man rose and stood before them. He was pale and thin. His high cheek bones stood out beneath the burning beauty of his eyes. His tones swelled like a benediction over the dark faced men and they took one word - "The eyes of the world are on you black men this day." They made no answer but when the order came moved like a tidal wave against the gloomy fortress that peered dimly above the lengthening shadows ~~of the falling night.~~ From Sumter, from Wagner, from Cummings Point the roar of artillery pouring into the massed ranks of the black men shook the very sands beneath them. Yet the machine like fall of their feet oozed and splashed across the black island. Up tore the murderous rattle and crash of rifles. The dark ~~mass~~ shivered but rolled on. Across the trenches they leaped, up the side of the angry frantic fort. For a moment the coiling flag waved from the very parapet- a moment, then the black mass wavered, staggered, parted, recoiled, Again they rushed forward; again they fell slowly back. The very fires of h ll were bursting in their vitals. but they gathered themselves for a last desperate assault.

41-S-272

Tom pushed steadily forward until he had won his way to the pale young leader. His head was whirling and the world dancing in his eyes. "Forward!!" They swept like a great black whirlwind. They knew not what they did. Up rose black wraiths of men , men all blood who grinned grimaced and chattered in mad horror. Click! -that was a breaking bone- -crrr! hear how it bites and crushes up soft flesh. Ah! the shivering scream of Heath and the fear of death. Now great red eyes burst out from twisted imp-like faces Curse hushes groan and groan chokes sigh. O mad hell of it all - the grinning godless whirl of Death that men call War.

Above them sings the chorus of the shot - now a sharp staccato now low wailing, now a hissing screaming death dance - whiz- ping- whiz, birthing and dying, yelling with fright. The Glory of it, the wide wild glory of looking death straight in the eyes and laughing and damning his impotent horror! The nastiness of it - the sickening slimy stench, the soft hot mist, the grime and smoke and dirt, the clamoring reverberating deafening rattle and roar! The dead mock the dying, the dying envy the dead, the living strike machine-like and dream of rippling waters, silent green fields and the trembling kisses of women-dream as they yell and sweat and kill and kill, and the bright red blood spatters and trickles. Suddenly to Tom the whole writhing twisting mass of men seemed to rear itself in to one vast pyramid. On the apex gleamed the white oat face of the leader, ashen and death struck in the pale bluish twilight. A moment the pyramid wavered and then - the very heavens opened in a great crimson blaze of sound. Tom Calhoun saw the face of Col. Henry Jones above the fiery parapet - he struck at it madly, fiercely and as he struck he heard the death cry of the his ~~little young~~ Colonel - a wild piercing cry that shivered from mouth to mouth down the pyramid- till the pyramid staggered swayed tottered and crumpled, the apex waved curled in upon itself and as it crashed bleeding ~~xxxxx~~ crackling, crumbling to the earth, Tom saw the young white face of his Colonel- flash shoot downward to its death and doom, heard the mocking voice of Colonel Henry Jones as he cried "We've buried him under his Niggers."

220½

Dead- dead, he must be dead. Yet he must find him; and Tom crawled on beneath the piled corpses dragging the bloody stump of his riven arm, till groping and twisting he came to the pale dead face and leaned panting over it. He brushed the dust and grime away and kissed the smooth and blue veined forehead, then with a sigh lay himself protectingly across the cold body; all softly the silent wrappings of the night fell round them, there where that last great shriek of pain flamed on the mighty waters.

41-5-273

The glory-land must be like this - peace and a moist sweet silvery flood of rippling sunshine. Far-off whiffs of dead sweet magnolia, and gliding about the voice of a little angel girl singing. Tom lay and listened. His little girl must be as old as that and his boy the size of yonder lad sturdily splitting wood and then he turned and his eyes met the eyes of the woman bending over him. It was Juno. And his heart leaped and was still.

Long days he lay there nursing the remains of his stricken arm, calling back the strength of his sorely strained body. The children hovered about him singing and whispering. And ever sleeping or waking the woman's great sad eyes were bent upon him but she said no word, only lingered there serving him with her soft hands and quick thought. Ten days he lay there and then one day in the noontide silence, when the children were afar, he turned and looked into her eyes. "Juno" he faltered. She dropped on her knees and groped toward him.

"Tom" she sobbed "Tom for God's sake listen to me, listen Tom while I tells you." Silently he stretched out his one whole hand but he turned his face to the wall. She covered the hand with tears and kisses and stroking it softly knelt beside the bed and spoke.

"I never had no one to teach, me Tom, I came up wild-like as a weed. The other children was afraid of me for my mammy was a witch and I wandered half dressed in the bushes and stared at folks. My mammy didn't love me-she almost hated me and beat me frightfully, spat on me and drove me out to wander under the trees late of nights. What could I know - what could I learn? Once when people was sick in the cabins, Mistress Irma came down to help. I worked for her and wondered at her paleness and her clothes till she noticed me and took me with her up to the Big House to wait on her. I was waiting on her when I first saw you, honey, a-standing in the cotton field the day of the hunt. And that was the first day I saw Colonel Jones but not, O God, the last.

"While I was aloving you Miss Irma got sudden an gered at me and Old Master sold me to Colonel Jones. He gave me a new cabin and rode down there the very day I came and looked at me till I shrank before him for his eye was evil and I was glad when he went suddenly to war. All of us black folk then came back to Master Lloyd ;we were married, you and me, Tom and then came my year of happiness, my one sweet wonderful year. Perhaps I was so happy God took it hard. You were living over on Master Coles place when Colonel Jones came home.

"One day I met him riding. His face was red and black with liquor and he flung me a wicked look; bending to, he seized and fingered me by the arm. 'Where do you live?' he asked. I told him faltingly and he leered and laughed. That very afternoon he rode by our door but you were there. I noted the dark ~~[illegible]~~ of his face but you saw nothing. The very next day you were sent for a month way down on the sea islands in charge of a gang of slaves from Master Coles plantation and from ours.

"Yet I dreamed of no harm, I thought only of my little cabin and my baby and my husband. You were far away but I knew you'd come soon and O, I was so happy when I lay down that night to sleep. I was dreaming of great green fields and singing trees of birds and dark red flowers, when suddenly I heard a knocking, a low strange knocking in the night. I started up in terror "Who's there?" I cried then I thought of you "Tom- Tom" I whispered. "Is it you honey?' I flew to the door and as I laid my hand upon it, a great fear came upon me all alone in the grim black of the night . Again camethe strange knocking ~~in the~~ . 'O God,who is it - go away,go away." I half scr screamed and then came his voice, the voice of Colonel Jsnes ' Don't be afraid,Juno,it's I, I've got a message for you." I quickly threw a blanket about me and without thought or fear opened the door. And then - O God,Tom,don't judge me harshly. I did not struggle - I did not refuse - I did not dare refuse - I did not know I could resist. He was my master. All my lafe I had drunk bowing from the air - no one had taught me different,no one had whispered fight. I crouched before him in dumb helplessness and when he slunk away I lay on the floor like the bruised stolen thing that I was sobbing and trembling in utter misery. And when I woke to morning - what could I do - what could I say - who could I tell - you? I was afeared with shameful fear. My mammy? She would have beaten me or laughed in my face or killed me. For long months you could not come to me - do you remember? O I was weak in yielding, Tom,I know it now, I know it but I did not know then. ~~I ought to have died afighting the great red brute,but I thought even then that I had no right to that God and the law commanded me to obey my master~~ - Tom,O Tom is there no forgiveness for the poor woman who sins? Can everything hope for heaven but me? O,it is wrong Tom, it is damnable,it is of devil's judgment and not of God's -but I have not told all yet,Tom,do not turn from me Tom,my Tom,listen. I found myself going to have a child - whose I admit know not:yours or his. You came back once then went away again nor six months to the dark sea islands. I felt it was our last parting and I clung to you and kissed you and went wildly on your neck,do you remembery Tom? Then in fear and despair resignation I went to my mother's cabin and told her all. She kept me there smiling strangely and waving her hands above as I slept and when once Henry Jones came she sneered in his face and whispered and he went sullenly away. Then the birth-night came: It was brown, dark sweet brown,a man child and I went aloud for joy,but even then the birth pains seized me again and,may Christ be my witness,a white faced twin leapt from my dead heart to join its dark brother. Tom,Tom, for God's sake believe, I am telling the truth,by my soul's salvation: a child tr you and to him were both born that red night. How the ~~unholy~~ awful thing happened God only knows but it is true. Perhaps it was the accursed witchery of my mother, perhaps it was the damning of God, perhaps a wild ~~freak~~ caugh of nature, but I looked into the faces of the mis~~begotten~~ born twins and groaned and faitned.

41-S-274

41-5-275

"When I came to the children lay beside me - the darker one I seized. The other I hated - I could have killed it but I dare not; yet I said nothing - I was glad when Mom Bett seized it, rolled it in a blanket and took it away. Three days I watched her furtively and knew what she meant - she meant blood sacrifice. It was the Great witchery of her dark religion, the killing of a manchild of the dated race in the full moon. On the night of the full moon she pointed her face and looking at me long and strangel started away and I heard her swift steps running. Then I thought and thought - why di she take this child - it was not full white? Why did she go from and not toward the sea? Then of a flash I knew. Miss Irma's child had come the same night with mine and Momm Bett was bent on mischinf- unholy mischief The devil tempted me but I left my baby, leant and ran after her in the night weak and tottering from childbirth and hearing the wail of my own ~~babies~~ child in the deserted cabin behind. I saw her slipping on ahead between the ghostly trees. I saw her enter the house and I crept after her.——

41-S-276

~~wash?~~ Forgive, forgive me, Tom, take me back to you - take my babies, you r babies - O Tom, Tom forgive me or kill me, kill me or forgive me."

All the while he had lain still his face toward the wall, but now slowly he lifted his hand, his one thin hand and laid it reverently on her bowed head. The children crept out of the glooming day and knelt beside her; and a great silence fell.

Chapter V

~~The~~ Murder.

Little Val was just creeping home with the twilight. It was down in one of the oldest and dreariest cabins of the Jones plantation - a dirty cheerless place. No one was there and hunting about for a piece of musty corn-bread, he curled himself in the corner and fell fast asleep. It was ten oclock at night before anyone came. Then the door opened and a little ragged girl came in. Her face was sweet and innocent and of strange and unusual beauty - the same wonderful symphony of brown as in the boy but softennd and with the sharpness and restlessness absent. She was tired but first she looked about for her brother. "Buddy, buddy?" she cried, then listened and heard his breathing and lying down beside him, she slept. Some time later in the night a man came in. It was the father Jim Quarles a yellow man with crisp hair and a sullen expression. He did not go to bed but sat quietly in the corner watching. At last he started forward. The were steps and whisperings without as a beautiful weak-faced colored woman, slouched around the house in her ragged clothes talking to a white man, the brown man crept out. There was a moment's silence, a wild scream, the sound of swift steps and silence. Slowly the man returned to the cabin and throwing himself carelessly in the corner slept heavily. Just before day-break he stretched himself and called "Hilda -Hilda- breakfast." Hilda rose and hurried about - cooked a bit of bacon and made corn bread and black coffee. He stood and ate it ravenously and ran out putting on his coat and Hilda leaving the dishes on the dirty table took a needle and tried to pull together the widest rents in her little brother's trousers as he lay in them; but he slept on. It was a curious sight without lay the dead body of the mother, unknown to the children, surrounded by a silent curious groip of black folk; within was the dingy dirty room, the sleeping boy, the brown girl bending over him in her rags and softly curling hair. si Silena Smith looking in at the door caught her breath and stood there till the girl turned her head and started up in mute apology, yet with something of reserve in her childish air despite her squalid surroundings.

41-S-277

Silena sat down, striving not to scare the children, yet listening to the noises without as they raised the body and bore it away. Then she turned toward the children.

"I'm a school teacher"! she said "and I'm looking for pupils."

Something eager lighted in the girl's eyes and the boy awaking suddenly sat up and stared.

"Have you ever been to school?" asked Silena.

"No, Missus."

"Would you like to go?"

"O yes, Missus."

"I wouldn't " sang the boy "Id ruther drive mules" and he dove toward the table.

Silena rose and pulled the little girl gently to her.

"How old are you?"

"I was born the second crop after the storm, mammy says."

"That makes you about seven, I guess - and what did -does mammy do?"

"She's nursing for the white folks up at Colonel Blakesley's and I helps in the kitchen and pappy is coachman."

"And who takes care of little brother?"

"I takes care of mys lf" volunteered the boy as he gathered up the last of the breakfast crumbs.

Silena said slowly:

"Children your nanny has gone away - forever and your nanny for - a long time and you're both coming to live with me and work and learn and be good children."

The girl's face lighted but the boy frowned.

41-S-228

Chapter VI~~I~~.

~~The Arrest.~~ The Hunted

On Tom Calhoun, who had bought a little farm with his bounty money the sun still shone. As he looked across his forty acres and saw the neat cabin and the nodding crops, heard the happy song of the mother working and half listened to the talk of his daughter, he suddenly realized that never before had he lived. At last he was a freeman - free, free as the air which filled his great lungs. He was his own master and his own man; no one had the right to command him, to drive him, to order him about as one with his cattle and his dogs. His wife was his and his alone, his were his children. He raised the stricken stump of his arm aloft - God! was it not worth a right arm - a body a life to be free! The boy came racing toward him across the field -"supper's ready" and the three hurried home, the girl singing, the boy romping round them and the dog leaping and barking. Once home, the mother came to kiss all three, chiding them for being late and spoiling the biscuit They sat down in the kitchen and ate - crisp fried hin, biscuit, white flake rice, golden molasses - ah, it was good! Then came the twilight. The mother sang over the clinking dishes; and the father and the children - first they played games, then they sang the old folk songs and then came a story of Brer Rabbit - the African hero of the weak against the strong.

The next day was Sunday. They slept late and rising from a hurried breakfast they dressed and went to church, riding in a wagon drawn by two fat mules -Juno in a blue gown that reddened her brown face, Mary in a wonderful red calico and the man and boy in smoothe dusted black. Other wagons and buggies and wayfarers met them along the road and they greeted them all joyfully.

"Howdy, Good mawnin."

"How's all" "How you all?"

"Tolerable. "All up?"

And gay laughter and frolic filled the air, along with rough banter and noise. Sometimes great carriages filled with white folk passed them casting the dust on the walkers and the humble wagons; some laughed at the gay costumes and some cursed at the dark faces. At the cross roads sat the church - a greatsquare board house, rough and plain. There were benches within and the sound of singing and without rows of mules and crowds of wagons and throngs of girls and boys and knots of men and women. All the colors of man had met there: there were a few pink and golden haired girls, many black and white haired old men, young bronzen giants and soft brown cheeked mai ds; there were olive hued men and women, girls golden faced and freckled brown and every hue and shade of the wondrous changing human color from pole to circle but all set and shaded in a great background of unshaed black and brown. Next their color, strangers would have seen their hair; with a few it flowed in yellow brown and black; most of it curled and crumped and twisted itself some so minutely and crisply that it lay in hard grey black masses, immobile and thick. On others it bushed itself to a dark mass of piling cloud or was tied stiffly in spreading spikelets and then again it curled and waned and wantoned in tiny kissing ringlets or great midnight curls touched with gold. They were not beautiful as the white world counts beauty, but they had faces of interest and strength and lovableness that could easily grow in one's ideals and dreams, and then too a certain untrained and unfathomed depth of thought and doing-"a new world peasantry with the dirt and roughness and ignorance of primitive man and the promise and aspiration and hidden beauty of all humanity. An old man was preaching when Tom and his family entered the church. He was unlettered, unattractive and slovenly. And yet the burning earnestness of his talk, the half barbaric splendor of his native imagery and the wonder of subject held his hearers in breathless strained attention. They were a primitive folk and their feelings sat naked and unashamed upon their faces clothed in streaming tears, incensed with groans low rant wails and deep Amens. And why not? Was he not talking of freedom. Of how God let his children toil in the black mud of Egypt and then in his good time let them go?

The sermon was a great chorus and the preacher was chorister. He intoned the strophe and the swaying chorus beneath him, standing, sitting bowing and on bended knee sang the wild anti-strophe, in moan and cry and praise and loud "Amens."

"O my brethren and my little sisters, dark was that day -m'm'm'm'" sighed the people). The sun was hot in the cotton fields, the waters boiled in the seas. (The seas boiled, O Lord" answered the people.) Way over in the Egypt land, the children of God lost faith, my brothers, just as in the dark days of yesterday you lost faith. (Preach it, Father" sobbed the women.) They sinned and cursed God, my sisters and hung over Hell on a single thread. And then my God was pitiful - O he's a pityful God, my sisters (Hallelujah" shrieked a soul) and the hot tears of his children dropped on his heart and melted it. And he lifted up his voice (Glory to God" they chorused) and stretched out his great black arm. Let them go Pharoah-I say! Oh, Pharoah, O let them children go. (Let them go, Let my children go" came the great full voiced echo.) But ole Pharoah, the old slave driver shook his head like a mule and said No, keep them slaves, work them, kill them, (m'm'm'm sighed the men) hoe that cotton Nigger - but the Lord rose up and shook himself, (Rise up Lord" cried the old men) and he screamed again till the mountain trembled and the sea goa afeared and he say, says he - " A quick swaying and whispering, the crashing of falling benches and the sound of an oath broke abruptly upon the worshippers and the old man was suddenly silent.

41-5-280

The audience rose tumultuously in fear. Tom turned and saw the white sheriff advancing up the aisle: the folks behind rising quickly had overturned the benches and were whispering angrily, the forward sat in sullen silence half, fear, for they were but a step from slavery and the spell of the white face was heavy upon them, but as the officer strode up the aisle he pushed a black soldier's wife roughly aside and in a moment a hundred men had leaped to their feet amid the crash of overturning benches and the screaming of children Tom pushed quickly forward and quickly put his great form between the sheriff and the surging crowd. "Quiet brothers, quiet" he said "this is an officer of the law and we are peaceful citizens". The sheriff had his pistol in his hands and handcuffs. He turned quickly toward Tom.

"I'm after Jim Quarles - you know him, he used to be Colonel Jones body servant and then was sold to the Quarleses."

"What's he wanted for?"

"For killing his wife and he came in this church this morning - 'there he is;" the sheriff started toward the brown man in the corner and Tom nodded reassuringly. "It's all right boys, I'll straighten this out" he said. "Let us go by." They slowly fell back and the sheriff got bolder. "I've half a notion to take a dozen of you Niggers along for resisting an -" he did not finish for somehow, somewhere a great black arm shot out from the crowd and when the sheriff came too he was lying alone beside the road and the church was empty.

Afar across the fields next night in the darkness a boy went slipping with a bundle in his arms. It was Tom's son Robert and he was hurrying toward the swamp. On his way he passed a long lean white man, yellowish and haggard. He knew it was Boggs, the Sheriff and without a word the boy dropped into the shadows of the hedge. The sheriff was mad and was not noticing shadows; he stamped down the road and into the hardware.

"I want a gun" he said.

Now a sheriff without a "gun" being unheard of, the proprietor and his loafers expressed very great surprise and by degrees elicited the following story. The sheriff after his unsuccessful attempt to arrest Quarles at the church had returned home. Martha his wife was up-country for the day but had left his supper prepared. When the tired and hungry Mr. Boggs arrived about sundown, what did he find but the door ajar, and a bright light. He peeped in astonished.

41-5-281

"And damned if there wasn't the very Nigger I was looking for, that big yellow kinky-haired Quarles a -setting there finishing off that there ham bone and all of them bones."

Naturally Mr. Boggs was both irritated and elated. He reached for his pistol -but lo! it was gone, having probably been left near the church where as Mr. Boggs explained he "taken a nap!" Nevertheless Mr. Boggs rushed forward especially as the ham was rapidly disappearing. In fact as he expressed it:

"I was so damn mad I could hardly talk. Get out of there" says I "you" and Mr. Boggs used a stock of expletives which was rich and varied. The Negro continued to sit there eating quietly and eyeing Mr. Boggs, until that gentleman's patience gave quite way and he rushed madly at the colored man.

Being excited at the time Mr. Boggs' testimony cannot be absolutely relied upon at this point to the inch, but be that as it may, he solemnly avers that the Negro reached down into his hindermost pockets and produced a gun at least 4 feet in length and big proportionately. It stands to reason that Mr. Boggs stopped. It is also reasonable to suppose that he did not at first comprehend the simple remark, which the Negro thereupon made:

"Dance!"

"Dance? what, me?"

"Dance and damn quick."

Now Mr. Boggs was not particularly graceful nor did he feel unusually agile or hilarious. Nevertheless he danced, and danced considerably - as he figured it he danced 30 minutes.

"But what did he want you to dance for?asked a bystander.

Mr.Boggs snorted. "After a man has capered on one foot an hour or so he aint liable to go chasing a Nigger across a swamp is he? Specially if he's got no gun. I fell over on the bed and he just naturally walked off" And continuing his remarks he said:

"I want a pocket gun - I want the damndest biggest pocket gun there is in this whole plantation and if I ever catch that nigger,"-

41-5-282

He went out and looked over a crowd of blacks loafing near and finding no one that he recognized kicked an unoffending pickaninny for luck,and walked off again toward the swamp fingering his revolver. He was gone all night and his wife was worried,but late the next afternoon one might have seen Mr.Boggs making his way out of the swamp with a satisfied smile on his face. Every few rods he raised a large bottle to his lips chuckled audibly and hurried on taking a well-known path homeward.

The full moon rose in the east and the red sun dropped lazily westward. Mr.Boggs took a long and loving hull at the green bottle,and looked about him. There was the familiar long shadow of himself cast by his friend the sun,stretching down to the right. He knew its length well and often told time by it. And by it now it was full time for supper. So he started along the path. Then he espied something:on the left was another fainter but -well defined shadow which Mr.Boggs could not rightly understand. He balanced himself and eyed it suspiciously until his ear caught a faint rustle of the leaves -ha! he comprehended - he was followed. The sweat started on his brow. He glanced about carelessly and stepped firmly along the road. It was as he had suspected - the strange shaddw followed almost noiselessly. Mr.Boggs walked swiftly. So did the shadow. He broke into a gentle trot and with a perceptible rattle of the leaves the shadow trotted too. Mr.Boggs accelerated his pace,he ran and ran faster-in fact he came ~~down~~ up the gentle incline to his cabin at a rate which few sprinters have equalled and none perhaps surpassed;and yet as he fell panting against the house it was with full presence of mind. He straightened himself up,whistled carelessly and would not look round but kept the shadow in the tail of his eye as he called carelessly:

"Marthy,Marthy!"

"What?why is that you Nash? What on-"said Mrs.Boggs aloud but he added "sh"with his eyes and remarked"It's a damn fine night "and then under his breath:

~~"Up, up," said Marthy, rush it along the floor with your feet and~~ don't get scared" and He whistled vociferously -whispering between strains" now come here - do you see anything behind me in the bushes?"

"No."

Mr. Boggs turned warily "that shadow" he whispered.

"What shadow?"

"That there."

"That's your shadow."

"No - on the right."

"Course - aint the moon up? Nash Boggs, you drunken loafer, do you mean to say-"

"Marthy, go to hell - git me some supper." And seating himself in the doorway Mr. Boggs rested from his labors.

Down in the swamp by the red radiance of pine knots sat a dozen black men talking- and the boy Robert with his humble food.

"I killed her because she was bothering with that white man - and I'm going to kill him too." Charles was saying.

"I knowed it" said Tom "and that's why I knocked him down to let you get away. I'm sorry you did it, Jim, I'm sorry you killed the poor weak woman; she didn't know no better, poor thing." Then his face hardened. "And I'm sorry you didn't kill him then and there. But it's too late now, Jim -no more killing now for it will hurt us all. Where's the sheriff?"

"~~Xwhrexsxthexsherifix~~

"Gone home" said Robert. - he's been scouring the swamp up east ~~where Boggs led him~~ Charles ate ravenously: -Well good bye boys-I'm off . Take care of yourselves" and the fugitive slipped away into the dark forest.

Chapter VIII.

Hilda.

Hal and Hilda were not Miss Silena's first boarding pupils for she had early found that her school must be a home as well as a school and her friend had sent her money for a large brick building where they were housed. Hal was not happy. He was not a bad boy- indeed there was a peculiar cleanness of soul and honesty beneath his sharpness and restlessness and mischief. Under Miss Silena's care he grew a shade cleaner and tamer. than before but not tamed. On the whole he despised the school life and longed for the freedom of fields and waters and trees. Some things to be sure, were fairly interesting - singing, errands, sweeping the big halls in clouds of dust, and driving old Jim the mule; the fire too had been glorious and he had romped and yelled and worked and enjoyed himself hugely. But books and lessons and long hours of squirming and gigling and frowning which were called "study hours" these things he hated with perfect hatred and the sharp restless look grew beneath his tangled hair and lay plainly in sight this morning. He wheeled round the corner in his usual half-run, half skip, and met a white boy somewhat larger than himself stiffly dressed and feeling important. The boys' eyes met each other "Get ou of my way" demanded the white one; "I won't" retorted the yellow one and then before Miss Silena could realize it the boys were rolling in the dirt, fighting and ~~clawing~~ clawing like animals. A fight between two small boys in most lands is a thing for laughing, chiding and waining - it is the same in the south if the boys are both white ~~and~~ or both black but when one is of one color and the other of another, and when the darker boy bids fair to give the lighter one a good drubbing, then there as food for mobs and riots. A crowd of white men and boys gathered suddenly and seized Val Quarles and while another crowd of colored people edged near. A policeman hurried up, the crowd vegan to jostle and curse and Val saw his danger. His eyes danced with mingled anger and merriment and diving suddenly he unset his cantor, slipped between the legs of the policeman, wriggled twisted and dodged and was soon running like a deer with a long string of halloing cursing men after him.

41-5-22-3

41-5-284

Of course they did not catch the boy he was fleet as a hare and knew every nook of the city and country. But where would he go and where could Miss Silena find him? That was the problem. All next day she had Robert Calhoun over her lap ~~public men~~ searching and all night. There was no record of him at the police station and ~~she~~ was in despair as ~~she~~ he started out the second morning when to ~~her~~ his absolute amazement there sat Val on the fence not two hundred yards from the school swinging his legs and peering narrowly down the street. ~~She~~ He stopped and leande against the fence in the sheer weakness of her surprise.

"Val" ~~she~~ he gasped "What in heaven's name are you doing here?"

"Waiting" said the boy grimly "I'm going to finish lickin' that kid he comes by here every morning." Without another word Robert seized the struggling protesting boy and slipping round the back way carried him to Miss Silena's college. A little committee was held ~~Miss Silena's cottage. A little council was held and~~ to Hal's great delight it was decided to send him out in the country nearby to work on a farm, near enough for his sister to visit him regularly & see after him.

To Hilda the new life was a veritable opening of the heavens. She was in her every instinct a lady born to caste and rags -some ancestor whether Zulu chieftain or Virginian aristocrat had bequeathed to her a poise and delicacy, a pride and beauty which made her rise to her new life with a naturalness and lack of affectation that seemed wonderful when Miss Silena remembered that morning in the dirty cabin. Then too she blossomed like a rose - in a certain tropical magnificence mingled with a great innocence and simplicity of soul and a yearning for life and the beautiful things of life. She grew ashamed of her squalid past - yet it was a good solid shame - a shame that was an incentive and not a temptation- a source of loving and striving and doing and not of hating and repining and waiting. By such shames the world rises and rises upward from cloud to cloud. She was religious by nature but had a certain fine pagan ism, a Greek love of form and fitness, an African sense of song and color, an Italian longing for pure beauty. Having known poverty and squalor and dirt and hunger in childhood she leapt from the old dark chrysalis ~~gay~~-winged and gorgeous in spirit, sensing a new world, looking for daily miracles and knowing few notes and sounds. The things she had suffered she thought due wholly to her position and not to anything in herself- she had been a servant and therefore took the slights that rained on servants but now she was to be a lady, why not? Was not the face that looked out upon her from a little mirror bewilderingly beautiful and framed in pride and sensitiveness, she sent out toward the great sky- all she touched grew beautiful- the plain print frocks took to frills and touches of color, the hats flashed with bits of ribbon and the flowers of the field came willingly to garnish her toilets. Yet with all this there was nothing sordid and selfish. The beauty of her new world was a beauty for ~~xxxx~~-all- not just for herself; her joyousness and song lightened every one it touched and Miss Silena loved the girl as a strange new flower of the deep forest- strange because so utterly different from herself.

The new world soon had its touches of tragedy and sorrow. The memory of the half-known mother came now and then with her weak face and faltering words and then Hilda's eyes would fill with sudden tears- why, she hardly knew and she would stroke Miss Silena's hand and kiss her timidly for Hilda had known but little kissing in her babyhood. Then gradually as she grew out from ~~xx~~ the blue cloud-kissed roof of her new world dipped the shadow of her race. It startled and bewildered her on stree,in newspapers and in talk and thought. Why should there be these curious saddening distinctions whene there was neither ignorance nor dirt nor slavery to base them on? And sitting one day in a cabin,looking on the setting sun she suddenly said to Miss Silena:

41-5-285

"Isn't God queer?"

"Why - I - that is -" n one of these thoughts seemed to fit,so Miss Silena compromised:

"Why Hilda!"

But Hilda shook her head and laughed and then started ~~out into the~~ on her weekly visit to the country to clean Hal's cabin as was her wont. Yet the ~~visit~~ visit always saaddened her- everything was so sordid and dirty. Could she ever have lived like this in narrowness and dirt and discomfort?could a cabin like this have been home - this sordid mass of ill-smelling discomfort? A sense of utter misery overwhelmed her. Why?Why?why? she wailed must this be in so beautiful a world and then rolling up her sleeves and girding up her skirt she began -sweeping,dreaming,working on until a gruff voice called in at the door.

41-5-286

"Is Hal Quarles here?"

She looked up at the sheriff in surprise.

"No,sir" hen her heart jumped"what do you want him for?" but ~~the~~ Doggett ~~officer~~ stood staring frankly and boldly at her rumpled beauty and her cheeks burned as she raised her head haughtily and said "Search if you want to," she walked out.listened and then ran swiftly up toward the great wood,looking over her shoulder as he ran,and calling softly "Hal-Hal?"

Chapter IX. 8

~~Two Girls.~~ Edith & Hilda

Robert Calhoun was waking in the great woods that run from Wilton Point back toward the rolling inland. The world was very bright to Robert that morning and he hurride along in pleased pride dreaming.Up into the deep woods he went listening to the birds and whistling and singing: perhaps he would be a representative some day and then a senator;he would stand like this and throw his hands and the men would gape at him. He'd have a fine house painted green like Colonel Jones' and then he dropped his dreaming fith a laught and throwing back his head sang a merry rollicking work song such as he had heard the wharf hands sing on the Charleston docks

In the midst of his song a faint "Hallo" struck his ears. He stopped abrupt ly and listened till he heard the voice again. Breaking through the under brush he approached the river and came into an opening. A tall white girl stood there. Her dress was frayed with clamoring through the wood, and in her arms were an easel and sketch book. She had evidently lost her way but she started back when she saw the black boy. Then catching herself she drew herself up and said imperiously "Show me the way to the road." He smiled at her ~~xxxxx~~ haughty air for she was not over 15 and he said cheerily:

"Which road?"

His air and smile reassured her and there was unspoken apology in her tones as she answered:

"The road to Wilton Point- I wandered away sketching and lost my bearings."

He turned without a word and she followed. Then he noticed that the path was hard to follow with the easel and he quietly took it and went on ahead. As they proceeded she felt more and more uncomfortable at her manner and she walked a little faster.

"Do you live at Wilton Point" she asked.

"Yes" he answered and then, as his dreams returned "but I'm going to Columbia."

"So am I" she said "My father is in the legislature."

"So is mine, and I'm a page."

She looked at him in surprise for she knew another page up there only he was different- so different that she found herself saying suddenly:

"Are you sorry to be black?" She had not meant to say this but her thought spoke itself before she could stay it, and then beside she had longed to talk of this frankly to someone.

"Sorry, lo! Why?" he answered looking at her in amusement. They were walking side by side and the river was rippling near.

"It must be - awful-"

"It isn't a bit - I laugh and talk and eat and drink just as you do" with a perplexed wrinkling of his forehead.

"But - black people are no - pretty."

"Neither are white people always, and beside looks are not all."

"No, but they're lots."

"That's so and I like good looking black folk; they can be fine in form

41-5-287

and face to my thinking."

"Ye -es- but their hair and they,well they can't blush"she said blushing frankly.

"No," he said feeling a flush in his own dark face and feeling too a sort of unreasoning anger in his heart -they can't and then disdainfully "what's the use of it - as for hair I don't like straight hair- I think brown curly haired people prettier than dead white folks with strings flying."

41-S-288

"But - but most black people seem so dirty and - "

"That's because they've been slaves and haven't had time to be clean like white people."

"And now that they're free do they expect to become like white people?"

"No but they expect to be people in their way just as you are in yours."

She looked at him -"but white folks can go with such people as they like and visit them and- and marry them."

"Yest but I suppose that means you go with yourselves and visit yourselves and marry yourselves - all right we'll do the same, go with ourselve, visit ourselves and marry ourselves" she could repeatedly a phrase she had often heard

"But there'll have to be laws always to keep the two races apart,"

"Why" he asked defiantly.

"Why because you or some of you would want to go with white folks- and we are proud of our blood and have a right to be."

"And do you think we want your old blood"he said. "Do you think I'd want a friend or an acquaintance or a -wife who didn't want me?"

"Why no,I suppose not."

"Well then,if we didn't want each other we shouldn't need laws to keep us apart."

She looked puzzled. "But if some did want each other?"

"Then laws would be no good."

"But they've got no business to want each othe ," she cried and then suddenly she caught sight of the road and the little town before her. She started and a sense of indiscretion,of vague wrong came over her. She had been talking almost familiarly with a Negro,not as she talked to the servants but with a new feeling of human fellowshi. She took her things from him quickly. "Thank you" she said coldly and strated away,and then she turned back quickly and searching in her tittle knit purse found a last bright silver quarter -"Thnak you" she said again and with a smile "I am Edith Coles,Harrison'Soles' daughter -here". But the young man had turned his back suddenly and was walking back into the woods. She stood in surprise and looked after him thoughtfully,holding the money in her hand. Then she turned slowly away but looked back. He was gone. She felt a vague discomfort,a feeling of anger, disappointment,curiosity and regret all mingled and softened into something disquieting and wavering.

41-5-289

Robert walked on with a new thoughtfulness a new wonder in his heart, for the girl's questions had awakened new thoughts and questionings. He had hitherto received the differing colors of men in something the same way as the differing colors of earth and sky and sea - as interesting facts, differing orders,but not warring,jealous unadjustable things. To be sure, he had instinctively felt differences and gaps and limits,but he had viewed them curiously as from afar,or looked upon them as in the course of nature or thought of them as relics of slavery. Himself he never found strange to himself nor realized that others did. He held out his hands;they were dark brown,the color of the good brown earth,deep rich and warm; such was the color of primal man. So was Adam hued when his dark body trudged doubtingly together at the bidding of his soul. So once peered all mankind, till they were paled with hiding from the sun and their sharp faces bleached with haunting midnights of sin. To the awakening man this color of his hands seemed far more natural than any other;there was to him a sharp hard gleam about a white skin that struck him coldly,while darker hues seemed warmer,homelier,nearer,and then the other things,the hair differing kinds of comeliness,the mingling and marrying - he had never thought of these things definitely or lingeringly as he could remember. He groped in his mind for his past thoughts - but found none. When in his dreams he had married,it had always been of course some brown maiden like his sister Mary:It seemed strange and unreal to think of any one else or feel any affection for them, or any fellowship or nearness;then it suddenly occurred to him that they of the uncolored world perhaps felt the same but he laughed at the discovery and thought it natural. So it was that Robert Calhoun entered the portals of a new world.

It was a vast world - a puzzling world; a world half-hateful,half-alluring At times a fiery joy surged in his veins,and the lust of battle burned in his eyes,and then a low dull unreasoning anger glowed sullenly- an anger at that proud white-faced girl who despised him. What was she? And he beat the shy little violets cruelly with his switch,and pushed through the white clouds of dogwood and entered the portals of a new world.

~~Four~~ Two years past by- years of strife and turmoil,of intrigue and bloodshed that made the boy more sober and thoughtful as he gazed upon the world. Again he walked in that same great glowing wood and he remembered the scene vividly. A bitterness crept into his heart as he neared the place of the meeting. He remembered the faint "Hallo"! that had greeted his ~~xxxx~~ whistlingand half laughing he whistled again the wild merry tune that seemed so beautiful then - so trivial ~~then~~ now,and -harkla low hallo! greeted him and then the vision burst again.

A girl stood before him but she was not white:a girl just there where the thick wood cleaning formed a great glorious frame of green and ~~gold~~ blood - a girl just bursting to womanhood - a girl- was it a girl or was it some vision glorious standing startled there in the evening sun, some woman wonderful; her face was burnished gold and her hair the wavering brilliant changing brown of bronze. All her soul seemed to stream and quicken and quiver thru her lith limbs. Her eyes were little pools,dark liquid pools that stand of a summer's day in forests' fastness,no rather they were fires that leap in dark mountains - they were depths of mighty night all starry and meteored with threading light,and now they were lightning gleams,shuddering on the eternal hills. Her hands were blue and red beneath the gold. Her hair did not string lankly to the ground but curled and hesitated,coiling in a thousand shivering ringlets,soft and glistening like a summer sea. Her head was poised proudly on a slender neck,and her little bosom burst above a waist that was all rythm and movement. She did not blush but went red gold from cheek to ear and glowed darkly like a summer sunset ~~kind~~ soft and silent,on a brown and silent sea. Ah,she was woman wonderful.

He stood before the vision rapt and silent,till her voice,the tenor and pleading of heo voice startled him out of dreamland.

"Hal" she cried "I -I thought you were Hal- Have you seen Hal - the sheriff is ~~police are~~ coming - Can't you help me find Hal?"

Then he came to himself again . It was little Hilda Charles - he had not seen her these ~~four~~ 2 years - he had never noticed her before,what had happened in ~~four~~ 2 years - ~~four~~ 2 little years - then he hastened toward her half reverently and said softly:

"Don't you know me Hilda? Don't worry,we'll find him."

41-5-290

Hand in hand they hastened back through the forest seeking, calling until at last they came upon him - a fawn-colored boy of 16, with brown tangled hair, laughing mouth and dare-devil eye.

"Oh Hal," she cohekd "what did you do? the sheriff came to the cabin after you" and I'verun every step." What have you been doing, Hal?" she wailed.

"Nothing" said Hal laughing sardonically and balancing himself on an old stump.

"Come Hal, tell us, how was it?" asked Robert.

"Well I've been working on Col. Jones plan now for a year and he hasn't paid me. So this morning I walked over and helped myself to a bag of cotton on account - just exactly 108 pounds-52 weeks at 25¢ a week."

Robert laughed. "You oughtn't to have done that Hal and you must take it back."

"He didn't intend to pay me."

"Well sue him then."

"We sue a white man? Well! what with?"

"Well at any rate Hal there's just one thing for you to do and that is to carry this cotton back."

41-S-291

Hal was sulky but the determination of Robert and the tears of Hilda prevailed. Sending Hilda on ahead they took the cotton back to the Jones plantation, but the overseer said not a word to Robert's explanation, only slammed the door in their faces and Hal went back to Miss Silena's. The next day the sheriff appeared at the school as Robert had half expected and arrested Hal for stealing.

"It will be all right". Robert assured Miss Silena, but Hilda insisted on going to the court room with them. And so they went down the village street Hal swinging freely along hand cuffed to the gruff sheriff and Robert and Hilda behind.

A moment on the threshold of the dirty court room she wavered- a hundred eyes were on her, a dozen loafers discussed half audibly her hair, her face, her limbs. The blood rose dimily to her head but she walked in and sat down and slipped her arm about her brother's shoulders. The judge was a coarse heavy faced man smeared with tobacco juice and the air was heavy with smoke and odors of liquor. She did not dare turn round but sat staring blindly at the desk and the lawyers until she realized that one big red faced man was staring persistently at her. She turned and looking out the dirty windows and hot blinding tears welled in her eyes. She scarcely heard what was said until her brother rose and his study defiant voice rang out. The answer stunned her and it stunned Robert -12 months? 12 months?her own brother to live a year among the depraved and manacled like a slave. O God,a osbbing shook her and stifled her;she tried to speak - to plead but what she said she knew not. Some one came up and said pleasantly "Come to my office and we'll try to get him out"-she thanked him hysterically and took his card and then it seemed so natural to look up and find Robert's parve face to put her little hands in his and let him lead her silently away.

41-S-292

Robert had seen the lawyer speak to her and a fear shot through his heart:it was Poland Reynolds,formerly page with him in the legislature;they did not speak but when Hilda was out on the sidewalk she told Robert what he said. He was skeptical and tried to dissuade her from going but she plead so hard that at last he went with her to the railway offices where Reynolds had his headquarters and was directing his father's interests. As they entered Poland looked up.

"Hello Bob"he said carelessly.

"Good morning,Mr.Reynolds."

"What can I do for you?"

"I came with Miss Ourales - to see about her brother.-"

He waited and fumbled his pen but Calhoun sat down quietly and the girl waited.

"What's your name?" he asked.

"Hilda Ouarles.!

Still he fidgeted and Calhoun waited.

"You can go Calhoun-"at last said Poland. "I'll transact this business with - wi th Hilda."

Calhoun rose. ""ave you anything to say to her that I cannot hear?he said.

"Well- suppose I have?" said Reynolds irritably looking him full in the face.

"Then" said Calhoun quietly" she cannot hear it."and he lead her out.

she thought Robert resented his calling her Hilda — but unhappy thought

But she did not understand - it seemed like giving up the last chance to save her brother for a mere name. She must go back.

"Robert" she said pleadingly "just - a moment- I must-" and she turned and flew back up the stairs. A sickening suspicion rose in Robert's heart - how could he help it - he knew what a pretty colored girl faced in the south, and he did not know how innocent her heart was. One-two-five-ten minutes he waited and then he heard her step on the stair. A slow faltering step. Her face was ashen, they did not speak to each other, they did not look — but within their worlds were whirling-her faith in God and his universe was trembling - his faith in Love and Truth was tottering.

Silently they hurried to the jail. It was twilight when they bade little Hal good-bye. He choked a bit but kept his old defiant look.

"O I'll get on all right, Sis-I'll -O yes, I'll try and be good - You ought to have some one to protect you, Sis I - I saw them fellows st the staring at you - but you just tie to Bob -he's the best fellow I know and he loves you" and then he was gone. She stood bent forward her hands upon her breasts, her head turned away from Robert, startled, mystified, self-revealed. The message had rung on her heart like summer thunders, new yet old, so old, so natural. It was as though ~~xxx xxxx kk~~ upon some ashen waste had struck a sudden sunlight and a bloom. She turned slowly and looked at him in deepening wonder-wide-eyed as thought her soul new born unclothed itself to him alone and then as the prison doors closed about Hal she lifted her little arms as if to Roberts ~~xxx~~ stretched then lovingly toward ~~his~~ great shoulders. He looked into her eyes- her great dark eyes and therewithin saw black and endless depths -upon those depths slept other depths as deep and dark again - deep calling unto deep. Beneath the deep flowed flame and in the flame burned Love. But he did not see it. He could not see it. A chill had frozen his heart. The face of Roland Reynolds swam in her eyes and he stepped slowly back. She saw the movement - she faintly devined the cause and with a ~~cry like a hurt animal~~ stifled sob she turned and disappeared.

A wave of revulsion shook his soul. He started to run after her- but just then a messenger boy stuck a telegram in his hand, and it said:

"Come immediately and prepare for the 'election.'

"Mary."

He hurried to the depot.

41-5-293

41-S-294

Chapter IX.

The Lynching.

The critical election of 1876 was approaching and Tom Calhoun was working eagerly to unite his followers with the best elements of the Southern whites. The demagogue Sands, while secretly playing the spy and informing the radical southerners was openly espousing the cause of the old ring whose thefts were ruining the state.

As the election approached Tom took the stump against the old ring which was supporting Sands. A great mass meeting was held at Beaufort and Sands spoke. He was an imposing man and his argument was shrewd.

"Gentlemen" he said in conclusion "these men are the ones that first recognized you as men and voters; they organized a government of and by the people. They have made mistakes, perhaps been extravagant and not done much that they might have but I tell you they never held you in slavery or sold your children or drove you with a lash through the cotton fields." Loud applause greeted the speech and Tom went valiantly to the attach. A great black and brown mass of humanity filled the hall. The air was stifling with smoke and sweat. The wind sang without and a murmur and roll of voices rose and fell within. Yet Tom talked the calm direct speech of the folk: "I tell you, men," he said "it pays to be honest and Joe Sands is not honest. I've worked for a year to get land for us poor people and he stole and gave it away for an office. Ever since you put him in the state house by your votes he has been bartering away your rights. He has flattered and lied and deceived on the theory that the only way to win in this world is to fool somebody. Today men, we face two roads: by the one we must stand up independently and honestly for our rights, uniting in self-defence and for self-protection and voting for honest men and honest measures. The other road is pointed out to you by Sands and it leads to slavery, trickery, stealing and bowing-down. I don't know what you are going to do about it but I'm going to vote against Sands and everything he stands for." The effect of the speech was tremendous both from its simplicity, its well-known truth and the honesty of Tom. Sands was furious.

"You promised to support me and I can prove it" he yelled.

"I did promise to support you,if you'd do one honest deed"retorted Tom. "and you did it but it turned out to be the biggest piece of thieving of the lot - the land steal. For that reason,I didn't keep my promise and I won't -would you?"he cried turning to the people. The answering yell shookxm the sea:

"No!"they cried,and Sands turned to the door.

As the time of the election approached evidence of organized effort to intimidate the Negroes and break their power was daily manifest,and Tom Calhoun set his teeth grimly. "Fight the devil with fire"he cried and he called meetings secretly of the leading black men. But Sands was watching him and what Sands found out came quickly to the ears of Colonel Jones.

41-5-295

It was a bright balmy night. In the sombre home at the head of High stood two women. One was tall and erect-he face pale and finely cut,touched with age and wreathed with whitening hair. She stood with her hand on the door knob of the front door - she was just opening it- it was already partly ajar when she heard her name called and threw her head back to catch the meaning of the sudden call. Without the great partially opened front door in the arched corridor stood another woman,-rather a girl,slender and lithe,with smooth dark brown face, thick clinging hair and ~~two~~ a full lovable mouth. She seemed very happy standing there,her head half turned backward toward the scented magnolias,and a faint love light in her eyes like moon-rise. She had rung the bell and stood with a little note in her hand from her father Tom Calhoun to Col. Jones; and she had not noticed that the door had begun to open. As she stood she crooned half consciously a melody- a song without words in deep low tones of infinite sweetness,that seemed every about to escape into wondrous melody yet ever fell away into some tearful minor cadence - the woman within, the tall old woman with her hand lingering on the door knob heard two sounds - a sound of singing - low sweet singing,distant beautiful, and from behind a sudden quick whisper-"Irma-my cloak and mask we're after that Calhoun Nigger tonight."

The song in the heart of the girl choked in her throat;the note fell to the floor,she saw the door half ajar,she heard the words, she whirled and swayed and fled like a fawn. Past street and lamp she flew,silent swift as a cat;past the pale half lighted stores of Broad Street, through the dim alley of Sixth down Sixth. A horseman reined up just to see her flit across his mare's forelegs; a dog snapped furiously after her, a watchman hailed her gruffly, but ere he turned she was gone. Slowly a dull red light spread above and about her. A murmur of voices and crackle of flames rose clearer and clearer down where the First African Church used to stand, but she heeded nothing until the roar of the fire and the shout of the mob flared full upon her as she turned into Cedar. Pausing suddenly she stood like a bronzen statue, slight aed still. The flaring builing threw a crimson glory on the rising street and behind loosed the great city dark and dead. Against this awful shadow the slight figure of the lone black girl stood for a moment glorified and the mob swept straight toward her, grim and hoarsely shouting -masked men red-shirted or black cloaked, with long glistening ropes: tall lank mountaineers with shot guns and pistols, slight youths in fantastic headdresses, drunk and blasphemous.

A second the girl looked on the the horsemen with widened eyes, then turning darted like a deer back through the alley to the left.

"Stop the wench" cried a voice.

"Stop Hell! March on!" came a low stern command.

41-5-296

At the edge of the city where the city street, free at last bounds into the smooth land country side, where straggling dim-lighted cabins sit lonesome here and there, a panting girl still fled to the west. On the low knoll she flew past a tree cabin, until all sweat and mud, she had left the last house of the red city behind, and there rose before her Faith's wood's and the dark oak sentinel spreading its black limbs.

With dizzy eyes she peered into the gloom as she dashed along, until at last she seemed to see a tall dark form silently rise beneath the swaying tree. An awful gladness clutched her heart. The earth rose, reeled, and staggered beneath her feet - the hot blood pounded in her ears.

Then a terror crept slowly on her. She slipped and stumbled, rose and wavered on. Why did he stand so still? Why did he look so strangely tall? His hands seemed - my God! his feet were swinging in the air!

She bounded toward him "Father!" she shrieked. The tree moaned softly the black & moaning forest.

and the red light of the city fell full upon the dull ~~hillside~~ forest—

"Danny!"she wailed and shivering crept beneath the swinging body,stretched her frail form upon the dank,red earth and writhed.

Chapter XI.

The Mourning.

Robert stepped hurriedly from the train "Hellolsis"he cried "Is any thing wrong-are the chances of beating the good?"

"Yes."

He brightened. "Has anything happened to you."

"Nothing."

"My,but your message scared me -how's ma?"

"I don't know."

"Don't know -why?"

"I haven't been home."

He looked up at her with a start and a great lump hardened in his throat.

"Sister - sister?"he cried.

She put her arms about him and in the depths of her clear eyes stood neither tear nor fear,but the shadow sf-supreme sacrifice and she pulled his head down gently and whispered in his ear and whispered again and said "Vengeance is mine,I will repay,saith the Lord."

When they came forth into the stree,sister and brother hand in hand the shadows were streaming upward from the moaning river, and in the boy's face God had carven two straight lines,downward through the cheeks to make the begining of the hours of the days of his manhood.

As they came to the home he put her gently back and behind the shelter of the gate she kneeled and waited.

Juno saw him from the door-F"Where's sister" she cried "she did not come home last night."

"She's safe - mother-safe -I kept her helping me."

She looked at him.

He came and stood silent within the lintels of the door and she went all a-tremble.

4-1-5-207

"Will it - rain,honey,"she said.

"No mother the sun is all ashining."

"The cow -"she said "the cow hasn't - isn't "

"The cow,dear mother,is in the stable yonder."

The trembling crept into her voice-"is the place at old Milton then they've taken the house and lot -yes,yes."

"No ,mother."

"Yes,O God,it is -it is the place,tell me it's the house, Oh, it must be -Rob- O God -Rob? Is he dead?"

"Dead -dead- long dead."

Of a sudden the trembling ceased. She put out her hand vaguely and spread another garment of the week's ironing on the board, dampened it carefully and ironed it,swiftly,steadily. Another and another followed. Into the back door four men staggered with an awful burden. Still the woman ironed moving neither fast now slow but evenly. The girl came silently in and replenished the fire. "Mother will you not rest?she asked. Juno looked at her with strange eyes. "No,I must work or die"and all night the girl sat feeding the fire and the mother stood ironing and re,ironing the clothes.

Then in the great blue morning,she turned slowly,wearily away and donned her black dress. She stepped to the dark kitchen door. The boy and girl made as if to follow;but she motioned them away and entering closed the door.

The murder of Tom Calhoun fell like a northern blast upon the Negroes of Milton Point. They bent and bowed before it as before the cruel storm,that swept their low lying islands in December. Not that murder was a new thing to them. Human life was ever cheap in Carolina and the lives of black men cheapest of the cheap. But this death was the End of Something and the Beginning. The end of the vast dream of Freedom toward which they stretched in sudden and sweet awakening,January 1,1863. The beginning of that second nightmare of slavery that holds them bound and crushed this day. They came then to bury a Dream - to weep over an Ideal for which their dark and bleeding hearts had striven piteously,if blindly,earnestly if in vain. The burial had been quick secret and at night but the funeral was preached a month later,according to slave custom.

41-5-298

They came in droves to the crossroads church,Siloam,and satx before the preacher in great rows of silence and the voice of the preacher faltered and broke in the midst of his sermon;then gathering strength swept onward and upward in hope and faitd and wild exultation and the audience crept after him but faltered by the wayside. There came a hush and a thousand eyes were strained towardxxx the silent bended figure that sat between the tall son and slight daughter.

Then Juno rose and turnind toward the upturned faces stretched her arms and moaned before the Lord,even as her mother had moaned and her mother's fathers had moaned in the presence of their dead a hundred and a thousand years agone:stark and staright she stood with closed eye and swaying body waving her arms rythmically,chanting wierdly in tones that rose,fell,wavered and almost sang:and all the host bowed, bent,and slipped to their knees murmuring in one low minor monotone" Hear her,Lord,Hold up her hands,O weeping Jesus - Amen and Amen." And these were the words of her death song:"O Tom,Tom, where is you Tom,my Tom"she muttered and then -fuull-voiced,"God has taken my man and reached him up on high;why did you to it,God?- didn't you know I loved iam,Jesus,-didn't you feel my heatr apullings when you called him in the night,the dark cruel night. I love you God- yes- but O God your ways are hard and dark to poor old Juno. Reach out and smooth cy soul. You give him to me God,and now you's took again,blessed be you God and blessed be your son Jesus' O Tom was a marvel man, so strong and high and pretty when fi st these old eyes lighted on him. I loved him with my life even when I sinned against him. I had rather adied than sinned against my Tom. I did die,long years I was dead and then dear God you brought him to me again and I woke." She opened her eyes streaming with tears and stretched her hands straight upward while the hosa sank lower and wept and wailed "Blessed be God, the God of black folk who brught again my husband from the dead. Forgive his enemies,Great God but when they come to the dark ricer show them my twisted murdered man. There's no more moaning now Tom,no more mourning"and she sank quivering against the altar in one dark bowed mass -"I'm just awa ting,Tom, just awaiting." The sobbing of the bowed multitude fell to moaning and the moaning to murmuring and the murmuring spread like a great wide wave and the wave swept into song. Far down the coast and across the islands and across the waters of the purple sea men stopped and listened to thes thousand voices raised in death-song:

"Were you there when they crucified my Lord?"

41-5-209

Chapter XI.

The Temptaioning

Hilda was wandering down near the gates of despair. Where was the use of trying, what was the use of striving. All her love of the world beautiful was slipping from her. She saw her own wonderful face now with growing terror, for since that ten minutes alone before the face of Roland Reynolds the scales had dropped from her eyes. She was alone and helpless-a chartiy burden on the slender purse of poor busy worried Miss Silena. What could she do - what could she do -that faced any colored woman in the South: shame, drudgery, or xxx teaching. She could not teach - she did not know enough - o yes, there were scores of black teachers who knew less but was that excuse for her, who was ignorant and knew she was ignorant? Drudgery? All her little body quivered and shrunk from the coarse hard toil of field and kitchen and besides with its taunts and insults and oppression how did it differ from open shame? Shame- the glances of the stree no longer warmed her merry innocent heart. She saw in them all now the glance of Roland Reynolds. She saw too that she could not escape them - there was no protection. Any insult of look, whisper, or note, ~~pitiful~~ any insult could be offered her in public and there was no escape no redress. In the strong arms of one man she might have found refuge, but he had dared to distrust her in her childish innocency and she hated him for it. She had no one to tell- no one to confide in. Poor Miss Silena knew nothing of the world thus shadowing her and had for such things but a few weak New England wisesaws, fathered in ice and snow and mothered in law and plenty. Then two shadows haunted the growing girl whithersoever she turned. On the street, in the yard even in the school, it was the shadow of Roland Reynolds- he always met her, spoke lowly when no one was near, came on errands to the school and spoke softly to Miss Silena, sent notes innocent yet meaningful. She could not escape him- he was everywhere silent resourceful and with money, money, money. She ran from him, flew at him in white anger, ignored him, listened in dumb helplessness. And then then she escaped him and stood alone in her narrow room then came the other shadow- the shadow of herself. She began to doubt herself, to question, to wonder. She had heard the tales of heo weak mother, her shame and her awful death. Had her mother's spirit leapt to her- was it this that made her prayers empty mockery- was it this that sapped her faith in all good - was it this that kept whispering, whispering -"No use- no use- give up the struggle yield and be comfortable-shame? What is shame but the unconventional deed? Then as these thoughts strove to form themselves she would fly from herself, loose herself in a frenzy of passionate weeping, stretch her arms toward God and cry to the dumb heavens. So she lived until the awful day when she rose and found poor Miss Silena cold and white and dead. The creditors lounged in the halls, the children cried. At last Hilda stood naked to the world unprotected and penniless. The door-bell knelled solemnly and she went desitatingly, and opened the door Roland Reynolds stood facing her.

41-5-300

Chapter XII — The chain-gang.

A few days earlier than this then miles away lay a long low row of filthy huts surrounded by a great stubborn fence. Two or three fat lazy looking white men with rifles, guarded the palisade and drank and laughed and talked. At last one arose looking at his watch. "Well I guess I'll take a last look at the niggers" he said and he strode to the huts. Kicking up the doors of the first he entered uncerimoniously It was a dark illsmelling place with one smoky lanters. A couple of dozen half-dressed women were strewn about the floor. Some were sleeping heavily on dirty straw with bits of bagging or mats over them or lying hin half naked abandon, the great dark limbs stretched out or their half naked breasts showing. Others were disrobing - some hastily concealing their nakedness as the guard entered and others stood in brutish impudent abandon and leared. "Well girls, all here" said the guard good naturedly and he walked carelessly among them, stepping over their limbs, slapping one woman's flesh familiarly and chatting and joking. "Where's Susie" he said at last peering around. A dark half dressed girl, comely and sullen stood up. He crossed over to her and took her by the arm and she crouched trembling as he whispered something to her. A half-dozen others laughed loudly. Passing he caught at the foot of another woman and she struck at him fiercely. He scowled. "We'll train you ye, Sadie" he said and "Well get to bed" and blowing out the light he left locking the door securely on the female section of the Beaufort city chain gang. The men's huts were even filthier and the black bodes lay packed together closely save in the last section where a crowd were massed together and cries and curses rang. Some were on their knees around a circle while others bent and crowded over them.

41-5-301

"Seven come 'leven" cried a voice. "Ha!" - it was a peculiar half fierce explosion of breath that accompanied the wave of his hand and he dashed them down.

"Camblin' again, you black rascals" laughed the guard and he came and stood over them. "Come it's time to quit". "Just a minute, just a minute captaintill I skin this nigger" cried one of the gamblers. The other one seized the dirty yellowy dice. It was Hal Quarles with drawn face, and blood shot eyes and clothed in rags; the shackles clanked on his ankles as he threw the dice three times. He was pale with excitement.

"Six come seven -ha!"

"Seven come twelve-ha?"

"Two come eleven-ha! Hell! -take it and be damned!"and he threw the last grea y coin to the other and the crowd yelled and jeered.

"How much did he lose?"asked the guard.

"Five dollars!"

"God!his lady is keeping him rich!"

"Yep-he gets a fiver every week or so."

"Huh-and Hed gits it nex' day."

The lights flickered and went ou .the harsh voice of the guard yelled "Get to bed" and quiet settled on the quarters. Hal turned restlessly. "Sam any more of that whiskey?"he whispered. A bottle was passed and he drank silently,greedily,and then lay there burning and tossing

Some one touched him "Come on Hal."

"Where?"

"Over cross the way."

"Another game?will you loan me a quarter?"

41-5-302

The fellow chuckled and Hal followed eagerly. Out through a hole in the rotten cabin three of them wriggled,across a dark space to another building. One of them rapped and listened while Hal took another drink of the raw whiskey till his brain flamed and whirled. Soon a bit of plank was pushed aside and they crept in. It was pitch dark. "How can we see here?"growled Hal fiercely. The other men laughed and crept away - he put out his hand and touched warmed flesh and heard a woman's low bold laugh and the lad sank down in wild confusion and half shame.

Chapter XIII

Vengeance

Robert Calhoun was fighting the battle of his life and within his mother lay wasting away. He tried to listen to Mary as she hovered over him:

"Don't think of it Robert - it won't do - it isn't right."

"An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"he muuuered.

"But it is useless fighting against the strong,the powerful and the rich."

"Honest resistance is never useless."

"But it may be impolitic, and certainly is today when the times are so fearful."

"For just that reason perhaps a blow in revenge would be heeded."

"But why meet lawlessness with lawlessness."

"Because it can be met no other way."

"Let God meet - let God do his own work in his own time."

"Well why don't he do it - haven't we waited 200 years?"

"Think of ~~your~~ the work you could do for your people if you but put away these bloody thoughts."

"Nothing I could do could be greater than a deed teaching white folk to keep violent hands off of innocent black men."

"Yes,yes Robert one thing we black folk may do greater than any deed of retaliation:forgive our enemies, do good - "

He rose in anger -"Will that sort of stuff impress brute beasts- will you try gentle sermons and sweet deeds on hounds and murderers? No kill them."

"Who are you Robert,to judge God and his plans. Let us humbly bow-"

"We have bowed humbly too long now,sister-

"But Robert will you leave me and mother alone and unprotected

"No,Mary,No - and that thought alone holds me back - is it that or am I a coward!" and he rose and paced moodily before the door.

Then, more coldly & bitterly

A stranger passed and stopping leaned over the fence.

"Who owns this place"he asked looking over the land.

"My mother does"answered Robert.

"Is she in?"

"She is sick and can see no one but I do all her business for her."

"Got about 30 acres here haven't you?"

"Forty."

The stranger looked at it critically and turned as if to saunter away.

"Mighty poor land" he said "I'd been thinking of buying up some land here but - "

Robert said nothing.

"What would you sell this place for?"

"We don't want to sell."

"Pshaw!anybody wants to sell if they can get their price." And the stranger moved off. At the gate he paused again. "I'll give you $2100 for the whole thing" he said but Robert shook his head and he went on.

But Robert sat long in the night and dreamed and in the dream was blood but behind it hovered a girl's sweet face,the wonderful witching beauty of one dark golden face.

"Did you sell the place,Bob?Tasked his neighor over the fence next morning.

41-5-303

"No" said Robert.

"I did - got $150."

"What's he buying for?"

"I hear they're putting cotton mills and a railroad through here."

"Well, I won't sell my father's place"said Robert.

"You'd better- they'll buy you out or cheat you out."

"O, I reckon not."

He turned back to the house and met the land agent again.

"I want to buy this place" he asid and W"I'll give you $150 which is about twice as much as it is wor h."

"I won't sell"said Robert shortly. Two or three times during the next week the agent importuned him until he had offered $200. But Robert was obdurate and the agent went angrily away. Robert thought little of the matter for gradually his calmer self was returning and he was beginning to plan his life. Where was Hilda, he wondered, poor little Hilda and a pany shot through his heart and then a pain for toward him came Roland Reynolds riding and beside him the land agent. Robert could not meet them for his heart was suffocating and he turned aside into the thick forest. They did not see him but rode nlosed to where he sat talking loudly:

"Do you suppone it's spite against your father for lynching old Tom?" the a gent was saying.

"O no, he's been in my office since that - these Niggers haven't much family affection - no it is stubbornness and the only thing to do as I told you is to attach-"and they rode on out of ear shot.

The blood was roaring Robert's ears and the thrill for bitter vengeance for his father"s brutal murder rose as wild and insistent as on that awful night when Mary whispered in his ears. He hurried to town and straight to the home of John Epps, an old colored friend of his father. "Uncle John"he said "what did John Reynolds have to do with killing my father?"

"Well, buddy, he was in the mob you know and they say that it was him that lead them to Frazier's woods."

"A traitor and a murderer"said Robert.

"And a white man"added John Epps. "Now see here buddy, don't be a fool. This is a hard world and God knows hardest for black people- so hard t hat you can't afford to make it harder. If a whit man comes at you buddy, kill him if it takes your last drop of blood. But don't go calling up old quarrels and rightsing all the wrong that's head and gone -there's too many - your pappy's only one in a thousand. Let God

41-5-304

tend to that -you know what the good book says about revenging -how isit?

And Robert repeated at mechanically "Vengeance is mine,I will repay saith the Lord."

"That's it - that's it."

"Yes," said Robert wearily "that's it - the refuge of cowards since the world began."

But the old man put his hands on his shoulder "There's braver things than dying in this world,son,and one of them is living". Robert walked away in silence.

But once out in the air,like the whirling of hell came wild fierce bitter anger rushing tumultuously over the little whisperings,the calm warning,the old excuses - the "damned dirty cowardice" he hissed and muttered.

41-5-305

"O I am a coward, a cringing pityful coward. I have bent and called it Sacrifice,bowed and named it Duty - I have shuffled and sweated and let men kick me like a dog because I was afraid - afraid - a miserable rabbit - by - " He set his teeth and glided,ran,rushed down the road, kindling the fires of hate and vengeance as he ran,stifling the little whisterpings,the little visions - the vision and the whisper. "Vengeance is mine,I will repay." In a half hour he had it - the long shining rifle of his father. "Yes - no - a fox, I think! he muttered at the house, and his aunt Mary looked at him curiously as he ran leaping toward the dark and giant oaks to the westward. For a moment he wavered as the shadows closed on him,and the long low plaint of the owl went shivering through the darkness; the whispering of his heart ~~climbed~~ rose and clambered,but he forced them back furiously and strained his eyes till slowly,doggedly he fetched it up from the ~~gravel~~ sandy - up till it shone red among the trees,the great black twisted face,the lived neck stretched sideways - the nasty dark crimson gash that wound up into the clotted hair - the oozing dri ping brains. Ah - he screamed lowly fiercely with the horror of his own dream,seized the gun and panting,sweating,weeping,crept stealthily onward - across the lagoon,up the creek,over the cotton fields and behind the rrws of shadowy houses:raising himself he peered into one - a dining room softly lighted - a woman sewing,a cat dozing and supper laid. Yes,Join Reynolds had come down from Columbia and was living in his new house,but he was not hose now,he had not come in yet,so Robert crept and writhed back beside the field path and lying prone with the gleaming rifle cocked,waited waited - waited. A rabbit leaped over him and fled in terror;a toad croaked in his ear. There came footsteps and he grew tense and fingered the trigger -no, it was young Poland Reynolds riding back. The father had not come yet, ~~still~~ he lay and waited - waited,with fhirling brain and poudding heart but grim set puriose - waited minutes,hours -long

Why not kill the cub too! no no, the Murderer only, and awful years with the wraith of the fearful - hist! He came walking along the road bowed bent with hanging head and listless hands, his gray hair gleamed in the star light; as he came opponite the black man rose with levelled gun. John Reynolds saw him, dim ind indistinct "Tom ,Tom" he crie -the rifle flashed in one keen crash of sound and John Reynold fell prone in the path.

On, on the boy ran, silently warily holding the rifle well forward and cocked, glancing keenly right and left. Down that same path his fath had run red-handed 30 years before - down the same path under the same dark bridge and singing water and crept fainting into the same underbrus Long hours he lay there - till Orion girded his sword from far east to far west. It was done - the deed was done and he was glad. There sat a fearful peace upon his s oul as one by one the pale stars slept befor the sun and the crimson and gold of a new day played in the darkened eas As the day brightened he rose aed sat upon an old stump. A red fox walkled past. He shot him, watched him writhe to death; then reloading and throwing the carcass across his shoulder stepped bodly out into the highway and walked carelessly homeward. A murderer - he shuddered but became suddenly cold and alert as he saw two horsemen approaching. He chose his path carefully and measured his step so as to meet them by the great oak. They greeted him pleasantly "a fine brush." And rode on. He leaned against the tree. They had not heard yet - they had not heard they did not know that he was a murderer. He turned to enter the wood a cut across toward home, when a sudden trembling seized him. He looked at his hands in horror - they were red, dripping red and all down his back crept slimy blood. He gave a low cry of fear then remembered that it was only the blood of the fox. Yet and yet - he was a murderer - he had taken human life and his soul was red as his hands - O it was awful - awful - why had God planned it so, why -why? and the shadows danced and the birds screamed as he stepped into the wood and wandered, and wandered.

The wood was Horror. Dark slimy ooze swished about his feet. A long black snake slipped hissing by and the cold trembling shook all his limbs. He was a hunted beast - an outlaw, a red-handed Cain. Before his feverish gaze the trees shaped themselves as like black gallowses and dark noosed vines looped themselves and swung above him. He could not stay longer in the wood - he dared not. A shriek struggled and fought in his throat and hurling the ~~the~~ gun and the bloody carcass of the fox from him he turned and dashed out into the highway. It was already late afternoon. A black coach with prancing horses swept slowly by just as he peered wildly from the forest. And in the polished seat - he looked-he statrted - he stared - great God! in the polished seat sitting alone and bent forward gazing wearily at the world was John Reynolds- John Reynolds-~~dead~~ alive, alive and well. Silently Robert slipped back into the wood- lurched, swayed and fell prone into the black mud.

41-5-306

"Why Robert-Robert- a twenty four hour hunt and only one poor little fox? Why Bob how bad you look. Have you hurt yourself -didn't you get any other shot?"

Robert caressed his sister's eager face. and turned hisaway muttering carelessly:

"I - shot - at - an old wolf -but missed him -thank God!"

"It's a shame to kill them isn't it?but a wolf?a wolf? How strange I never heard of wolves about here."

But Robert was stumbling, crawling, groping up the dark little attic stair and as he went he still murmured -"Thank God-O thank God?" And then barring the door he shook his bloody hands, hurled the stained coat across the floor, weeping laughing, trembling and singing.

41-5-307

Chapter XIVI.

The ~~Death of Carol~~ Changeling

It was a day of death and marriage. Up in Harrison Coles' country home, Lloyd Jones was marrying his daughter Edith and all the aristocratic clans of Carolina were celebrating the Revolution of 1876. Down by the restless sea that way ever calling, Juno Calhoun was dying and calling for Henry Jones. Robert hesitated at this whim of his mother, but Mary donned her cloak -he stopped her "I will go" he said and turning seized his dhat and went rushing up the street. Colonel Jones was not at home -"Didn't you know this was his son's wedding night?"they asked him in surprise.

Mary waited sorrowfully for her brother sitting in the hovering presence of death;now she bent to moisten her mother's lips or listen to her muttering; now she stood by the door peering out. She saw the old man wandering back & forth by the sea and recognized the bent form of John Reynolds. He seemed a lonely half distraught figure and she felt a certain pity for him despite al all she knew of his life and its intertwining with hers.

She was not surprised when he came slowly toward her;several times in the last weeks he had spoken to her hesitatingly and vaguely as though trying to recall something. She had always answered kindly for she knew that people said he was losing his mind and failing physically. Tonight he spoke quickly and firmly in his old voice and manner,although glancing behind him now and then,fearing as Mary knew the return of Robert.

"Mary" he said "I fear I have wronged your people -God knows I did not mean to,but the currents swept me on- I want to do something to atone. Can I help you - can I help your mother?"

41-5-308

"No" she answered "you can do nothing - I do not need help and she is beyond it."

"But your brother" he urged

She looked at him quickly.

"My son is trustee" he continued " I could get him to give Robert the colored school at a good salary-"

"No" she said " give it to me - get the school for me and then he could go to college- " She continued rapidly and he nodded.

"Yes,yes,I will"he said - then he started. There were foot steps approaching and John Reynolds stepped back quickly into the shadow of the door, as Robert and Colonel Jones passed into the dying woman.

Juno was muttering as they entered but she seemed to divine the presence of Henry Jones and she rose straight up in the bed,a guant brown death stricken figure. She wavedthe children away and they stepped backward into the kitchen. Then she turned her great black blackcircled eyes on the white man. He steadied himself with a chair and the night wind blowing from the shadows that wrapped John Reynolds sent the white wisps of hair floating about the trembling jaws of Henry Jones.

Her eyes spoke with her lips:

"I lost something that night"she said hoarsely.

He did not ask what night;he knew.

"I lost something"she repeated

"What was it?"he asked slowly,as if afraid.

"Your child" she cried.

He trembled from face to foot.

"You lie!"he whispered with beseeching harshness,clenching his hands.

She laughed joylessly and raised her voice more sharply:

"I tells God's truth. Twins came- black and white twins. The Witch Mother took the white twin and mixed it with Miss Irma's child.-"

He bent over her and sweat trickled from his tossing hair-but she went on catching her breath.

"You took one - I took t'other. Celia Jones found it but I lost mine and you wouldn't let me get it again that - that night!"

41-5-309

"But which - which did I take?"he whispered grasping her bony shoulders

She looked at him dully,muttering and moaning.

"Which,my God,woman,which?"he almost sobbed.

Her eyes blazed on him in sudden fury.

"Which? yes which, God knows!" she screamed and then slowly,convulsively she stiffened under his hands and sank backward on the creaking bed stark and dead.

Henry Jones turned and looked into the eyes of John Reynolds. He forgot to think it strange to find him there and only shook his head slowly when John Reynolds cried: "Celia Jones – Celia Jones! – pshaw! —"It's a lie - the hag's crazy-who'd believe such a devil's tale - I - I -" and then the mists began to rise and he lifted his hands vaguely.

But Henry Jones said:

"Celia Jones- do you know Celia Jones ? She took -"

"She brought - why she brought Roland -"answered Reynolds.

Henry Jones seized Reynolds and hurried him out on the long black beach,whirled him about and looked into his eyes.

"Ha- ha- ha!" he laughed harshly almost wildly"Roland -R oland Reynolds -ha! ha!ha! Reynolds you fool there's a nigger in my family or in yours and God knows which!" But the mists had risen in John Reynold's mind and he could not understand.

He only heard the mirthless laugh echoing, as from hardened masses of tears:

"Ha! ha!ha!

41-S-310

The morning dawned grey and cold and the clouds lingered low above the leaden waters. Within upon a bed white-shrouded was stretched the form of Juno Calhoun -thin,haggard and dead. Beside her stood her childre

"It's no use no use"said Robert "the hand of God is against us."

But Mary lifted her eyes up to him and said "Shame on you,Robert shame! here in the morning of life,in health and strength with the memory ou our dear old mammy before us,to falter and hesitate because God has no made our way roses or our paths peace. Shame on you Robert" - and then slowly they fell upon their knees and with bowed heads and trembling words searched for God in the great misty morning and stretched doubtful hands up to the shining armposts of His throne,and without the dog crept in the [illegible]y and weeds and howled to the sea. Then she continued:

"Robert,I have a plan."

"What is it,sister?"

"We will sell this house, we might as well or they'll cheat us out of it. I will go and live with Uncle Caesar and teach school."

"Teach school?"

"It does sound queer Robert. I know so little but I ~~went to the school commission.~~ have been promised the Colored school"

"Who ~~[illegible]~~ promised it

"Harrison Coles, ~~and he gave me the school of this district and~~ for one, and — others, 9 months $40 a month."

"Splendid."

"After we pay our debts we'll have $100 left. You will take that and go up to Columbia and take the college course, and I can keep you there with my savings."

His heart beat faster at this spoken echo of an unspoken almost unconscious dream.

"Nonsense" he said shortly. But she was in deadly earnest. "Robert" she said "you must. It is'nt merely land or money or even knowledge that our people need, Robert, it is Vsion and Sacrifice. We must know what the world was and in and what men have thought. I have gotten in my years at Miss Cilena's as it seems to me a faint gleam of the meaning of life. I have stood on the foot hills and glimpsed the peaks of the world. And yet you see I know so little - so little."

"But you know, Sis, I wanted you to study more."

"Yes - ,es-but I know that but one of us could affort that and it would far better be you because you will have larger and better opportunity to use the things you will see and know. And so for four years you must go up into the hills of God, and sait before the vision and then come down and lead us to the Promised Land" and she smiled into his eyes through her tears.

41-5-311

Chapter XV.

The School.

The day of parting came. Mary stood at the depot and smiled brightly and joyously into Robert's face as he boarded the train for Columbia;she waved her handkerchief cheerily as far as he could see but as the train faded away,her eyes grew misty and when at last it was gone and the sense of utter loneliness sank on the brave girl,the great hot tears came rolling unheeded down her face. She was ever a girl older than her years;sensitive as a flower and deeply sympathetic she felt the sorrows and troubles of others almost before they came and her perfect wonderful usselfishness brought her,so quickly to aid that people came easily to expect it of her. Her spirit of sacrifice was perfectly simple and sincere and attracted no notice to herself. Indeed she was at first glance to all,and ever to the ordinary eye and unattractive girl,scarcely noticeable alone,quite unnoticed in a throng She was slight almost frail in build,dark brown in color with short greying crinkled hair,which was always neatly piled in rounded motionless cones,deftly inbraided and twisted. To those whose eyes were trained only to the more glaring flashes of light and shade on white faces,the softer shadowings of her sensitive countenance were all unheeded and unknown,and her soul looked out from the liquid depths of her eyes dead and unmoved. But those who came to know Mary Calhoun better knew the depths of passionful striving,the long tense yearning for goodness,th great brave feeling that for the good of others no giving of herself was toog great - too exhausting. All the mystic and wierd wanderings of her mother's and grandmother's souls,had in her,through the strong barlare and sense of her father become transmitted into a great vivid passion for spiritual purity. She wanted to be good and true,she wanted the world to be good and true and she wanted this with a fervor so intense and burning that all else paled before this flaming zeal for souls. Long years before when she was but a child she had sat very still in that great reeling revival and then suddenly had risen and stretched her little arms toward God and said clearly,calmly "I am free!" They called this her conversion and on its testimony took her into the church although some who believed in visions shook theio heads The freedom into which she had stepped that day she never left. Ever after she was free - free from ~~xxxxx~~ all the littleness of life,all its baser passion,all its jealousy,envy and strife,and into her clear eyes came and grew the spirit of endless sacrifice,the sweet lovableness and tender pity - all this,but veiled and unknown to most men because it was shrouded in a dark skin.

41-5-312

Perhaps her greatest physical gift was her voice - a low wonderful contralty that came ~~x~~mmulously welling upward as from h ills of tears and fell upon her auditor in sudden over-powering sweetnes. Today she hurried quickly from the depot and wandered homeward under the great oaks and sang as she walked the wierd old songs of the far off motherland:

"You may bury me in the east,
You may bury me in the west
But I'll hear the turmpet sound
In that morning."

41-5-313

The low winds crooned with her and at last she found herself weeping again with that sense of perfect loneliness that comes with song. All had gone - her dear old mother,her new found father and now,today, Robert. Tomorrow she must face life and face it alone and if life be hard and puzzling to men,how much harder,narrower,bewildering to a woman? And if bewildering to a woman,what is it not to a black woman in a land that despises them and leaves them naked to their enemies? She felt with sudden dismay all that she must face:they would call her by her first name as they called their slaves and servants;they would couple her with strumpets by refusing to call her "Miss". They would leer at her in secret,take open liberties with her sense of modesty and decency and regard her ruin by force or wile as the lawful pastime of a gentleman. And in anywhere,at any time she protested or rebelled,they would laugh at her anger,sneer at her airs,mock at her chastity or slap her face- O God- could she stand this,could she go through it? She lifetd her eyes toward the grey sky and stretched her hands,then dropped them in sudden shame and contrition,sank upon her knees by the great gnarled roots of a black ivy oak;the birds sang above her and when she rose it was with the old sweet look of gladness and sympathy and sacrifice.

The school was to be held in the church for there was no school house and the committee refused to build one. Which church then should be chosen. To Mary the new board Methodist church just built seemed cosiest and better sheltered than the great hulk of old Siloam at the crossroads. But no sooner was her choice known than the whole black community was rent in twain. "What?"said the Baptists "in a Methodist church?" "What?"screamed the old pastor of Siloam "going to that new darky's shanty with his stuck up wayn,No,Sir!" Mary hesitated in dismay and went to consult the Superintendent. He was too busy to look at her. "Who?"he asked "Mary Calhoun? O yes,well Mary,you Niggers settle that yourselves,if you can't get50 scholars why give the thing up. Now Johnson " and he plunged into his figures. Mary took her usual direct and simple way out of the difficulty. She called a meeting of the patrons and conquering her timidity told them in a straightforward way the situation:"If you want a good school you must have it in the best place:Siloam church is big,the benches have no backs and it leaks; the Zion church is new,tight and small and has good benches. I'm ready to teach in either place - which will you have?" Theyc chose Siloam church but they fixed her some new benches and patched the roof. On the opening day of the first regular free school in the community,125 children of all ages,sizes and conditions crowded in. Mary was thoroughly frightened at the row upon row of solemn faces and prospects of teaching them single-handed. The first few days they were interesting,they sang with vigor,looked at the pictures in the books and wrote on the limited black boards. But the books werefew in number-one to every three or four .- the sitting still became irksome and then the mischief makes began to appear. Paper wads flew,bent pins brought agonized yelps and the whispering made reciting difficult. But the big boys mistook their mild faced little teacher. She stood the hut-but and disorder several days pleading with them and warning them. And then suddenly one morning she sent a troublesome girl home and whipped a half dozen little boys so vigorously that they alarmed the neighborhood. The next morning as she approached the school house she found a great fat yellow woman with towselled hair and angry mien planted squarely in the door way with one of her victims of yesterday. Affairs certainly looked warlike and Mary felt a chill down her back;but she came straight on.

41-5-314

"I'm so glad you came Mrs. Johnson"she said sweetly - "I wanted to talk to you about Jimmie - come right in and sit down- and here's Aunt Jane too,move right in,there we've quite a family party. Now children we've got two visitors this morning Jimmie's mother and Willie and Tom and Sarah's,who've come to see if this school can't behave just as well as any." The visitors who had not been able to get in a word as yet,straightened up now with sense of importance and the school dam began. Four children,it is needless to say outdid themselves in studiousness and exemplary conduit. One small incorrigible in a far corner strated in with a paper wad ~~xxx~~ while the second reader class was reading a story that astonished Aunt Jemima very much,about a gentleman named Alladin. The ensuing snicker disturbed Tunt Jemima and she spoke right out.

"You Jim Banks over thar - if you throws another one of them, I just goin'to wear you to a frazzle - you know your mammy don't allow no such cuttin'up." And James Banks subsided for the day.

It took but a few experiences of this sort to make Mary full mistress of her school, while her never faling courtesy and kindness with the ignorant but well-meaning patrons disarmed most of their hostility. Still even that did not make the children come to school regularly or continuously. The ~~xxxxxx~~ school dwindled to 100,75,50,25 and the school committee promptly warned the little teacher that she must close unless the average was kept up to fifty. She was very tired nights after school but she started now regular visiting and it opened her eyes. She found that she had had no idea of the difficulties, the sorrows, the slovenly habits of her community. Here in filthy rags and vermin infected hut lay a sick mother with a new baby "Sarah has to stay and tend me and Josie gets the meals." Here was a father struggling in a fearful battle with debt. "I needs the boys to help me right now, Miss Mary - I'se mighty sorry, but we must live". Yonder she met sloven indifference "O they can go if th y want to - but what's the use - white folks got every thing and going to keep it, I 'spect-no use no Nigger trying to be anybody." Into this slough the little woman threw herself with sympathy, kindliness and unwavering determination. She helped curse the sick, strove to systematize work and accounts, spoke a word of cheer and encouragement, made the girls mend their clothes, hunted jobs for the boys until the school became a centre of love as well as learning, of work and play, of striving and sacrifice.

4-5-315

Another year started in and it brought new troubles. This time it came from the white planters and employers round about. They had at first looked on Negro schools as non-sensical experiments bound to fail on account of the sheer stupidity of the children. Then when they prospered they begrudged them the public monies. At last there came a new and more sinister plaint - the scarcity of labor. It was a new thing - unknown in its present form in slavery times and the planters attributed it to the deviltry and laziness of the freedmen.

"There are a dozen good cotton hands down at that Nigger school" said Doggo the sheriff ~~Mr. John son~~ to the loafers in his store "and a couple of dozen half-hands -it's bad enough to keep these Niggers idle without teaching them all to shun work or making them impudent. By God they'll think they're good as white folks in a year or so." Thus the white community grumbled Now was the black world altogether satisfied.

"Miss Mary's a good teacher but she's had her share of the school money now and she ought to let somebody else have a little now" suggested Sands cautiously.

"She don't pay any attention to my children,it's only the smart ones she cares for"growled another.

And so the leaven of criticism and discontent grew about the unconscious hard working girl,until the day of the new election came and Harrison Coles was replaced on the board by Roland Reynolds.

He saw the name of Mary Calhoun on the pay roll and remembered something.

"Is this Bob Calhoun's sister"he asked.

"Yes,sir"said the colored porter.

"Where's Bob -"

"He's up to Columbia at school."

"And she's supporting him,I suppose."

"Yes,sir,I guess so."

Johnson dismiss her. We'll give that school to Sands'daughter. He's a good Nigger."

41-5-316

Chaptor XVI.
The Servant.

She went into her little room in the cabin and lay down on the bed and thought it all out. Next year was Robert's last year in college-it would be awful to have him stop now,he must not stop. He had worked in Columbia last year and in the long summer months had saved $75. His scholarship had added $50 to this and she had sent $150 from her salary. This year would cost him a little more and then too he might not be able to make much in the summer. The wave of misery overwhelmed her and she went and wept and sobbed until the shadows rose from the sea and Uncle Caesar's querulous voice called her to make supper ready. She rose and smoothed her dress and washed her face and came out to him with her old sweet way- cooked a pone of corn bread,made him some coffee asd sent him mumbling off to bed. Then she went to her room again and took down her little bank book. She had taught three years,six months in each year at $40 a month -let's see that was $720. Of this $475 had gone to Robert -$200 the first year, $125 the second and $150 the third. That left $250. It had cost her and Uncle Caesar but little to live and they raised their own vegetables and chickens and had a bale or so of cotton each year;still she had only $75 left in the bank and it looked very,very small. She wrote a cheerful letter to Robert saying nothing of the school but urging him not to come home in vacation - "stay and work in Columbia and perhaps I'll run up and see you,if I'm lucky. Unll Caesar is well and so am I. How sweet it is to and work,Dear Robert - Lovinly,your sister Mary" and carefully blotting off the tear,she sealed it. Then she sat down to contrive and think -a county school? it was too late this summer and they did not run in winter and she could not wait for next summer - and even then would have to be very near for how could she leave Uncle Caesar alone? She thought of sewing - now there was a chance - she had often in summer done fine needlework - but O,it paid so little; she thought of private lessons but so few,so very few of the colored people could afford to pay. Then she turned and faced it -faced that which was over there but from which she shrank in nameless repulsion - house-service. Why not? Why not?she said bravely and resolutely and yet she knew why not;because it was the sign of the slavery out of which she and her people were creeping - because it was wasting her talent in doing what a thousand others less fortunate than she could do as well and often better. And yet that was not all - the chief and greatest reason was that it held the raw sore of her sensitiveness at slights,jibes and discrimination open to the careless,the scornful and the harsh. Her very soul revolted against the semblance of bondage. Her mother and father had shielded her from it and although she was ready to do almost any honest work her whole being recoiled at this step and yet,and yet ,her soul whispered perhaps this last sacrifice is what God asks - perhaps this is that darkvalley of Humiliation through which all true souls travel. Was it the drudgery she feared,was it mere pride that bound her? She hesitated,walked to the wall and threw back the wooden shutterand drank in the night air. A silent figure passed along the road and sudden fear shot through her. She remembered a remark of Robert's about colored women's work:"Drudgery and shame and perhaps both." Suppose she should go into some home and fall into wanton treacherous hands - what was there to protect colored girls: Tradition? God save the mark! Chivalry?there is no chivalry for helpless black women. Christianity?was not the Christian south mottled with the bastards of white fathers? Her hands gripped the flesh till it bled and fiery hot anger rose in her throat - but she turned- shut the window and slipped to her knees beside the little bed and strove with her wavering soul to think how 2000 years before another heart,upon which lay the sin and burden of a hunted people, bowed alone in a great shadowy garden and prayed "Let this cup pass from me."

41-5-317

She had scarcely finished the breakfast dishes next morning and tidied the cabin when she saw the shadow of a woman at the door. She went forward and greeted her pleasantly,trying in vain to remember where she had seen her before.

"It's getting real warm"she said "won't you come in and sit here in this chair. It just catches the breeze from door and window and Uncle Caesar says it's the coolest spot on the coast."

The lady seated herself thankfully. She was a short fat woman, with smooth brown hair parted in the middle,and a worried kindly face

"I thought I'd come and see you"she said "John told me that - is, O I meant to say I am Martha Reynolds,John Reynolds wife. I was so sorry when you lost the school and I told Roland and her said well,at any rate I do wish I could get you to come and work for us. I've heard of your school and I heard you sing once and my heart sort of went out to you. I never had any children myself- that is, except Roland -and he,you know -- . And I thought that you'd like a good home. There are only three of us and my husband is not well but there won't be much to do,although just now we are expecting company from the north,Mrs.Grimes and - but of course you don't know her-they're in Columbia now. These girls I've been having are so trifling and dirty and somehow I can't get hold of the decent tidy-looking colored girls !- I don't see why: I'm sure I try to treat them right and pay them good wages.- won't you come?"

41-S-318

Mary's heart rose to her mouth and she stammered. She meant to say "No,no"I can't "but she said vaguely?

"How much do you pay?"

"We've been paying $6 a month but I'd give you ten gladly if you'd come - only of course you mustn't mention it - John is so close."

Mary sat with her arms in her lap staring out doors and almost forgetting her visitor - $10 a month and that included board. She could work 11 months before John's graduation -$ 110. This with the $75 in the bank would make the $175 for him and $10 over. Could she live on $1 a month outside her board? What would the colored people say who had known her as teacher,and with this thought came trooping tumultuously all the throng of doubts and fears and pains -but she thrust them aside with one great sweep and rose. "I'll come"she said "tomorrow."

And Martha Reynolds rose and took her hand. The two women looked into each other's eyes and saw something of each other reflected there,each in each,something deeper and nearer than money and color and years. And Martha's voice faltered "We'll be good friends,Mary."

"We'll be good friends Mrs.Reynolds"said Mary in quick understanding and then speeding her guest,she went slowly into her little room and shut the door.

It was busy times at the Reynolds' for the wedding day o f Roland Reynolds and Alicia Grimes was coming soon. "I don't see what I ever should do without you Mary"said Martha plunging her arms into the white dough. Mary had just slipped a cake into the oven door and she was humming to herself for Robert's last letter was blithe and hopeful. "I am glad I came"she said as she cleaned up the dishes and hung up the clothes. "There now,my part of the baking is done - what next?"

"I guess that's all" said Martha "and you'd better go home and see to Uncle Caesar and take him something good to eat. Now tomrrow you'll only have the windows to wash. and then all will be ready. John and I start for Columbia tonight and Roland will come tomorrow. Why you haven't seen him have you? He hasn't been back since you came -well he's a good boy. He'll find his clothes all laid out" And away Martha hurried up stairs.

41-5-319

The house was empty when Mary came next morning. She went blithely about her work for she liked it. Withall its drudgery and long hours and endless repetition,there was something fascinating in the keeping of a home. It grew to feel like some old quiet friend,lovingly sympathetic with its great broad bosom,its moods and tempers,its many sided character - it was very pleasant to move in a great rich cozy place like this and care for it tenderly and know that one's duty lay here - safeguarded from the cold hard hurrying world without. She put the bread carefully in the oven and then took Robert's letter from her bosom and sitting on the stairs with duster,pail and wash cloths,read it again and laughed and cried a little. Hilda was there - little Hilda - how strange -she must have grown into a nice big girl and Robert seemed to mention her often. She wondered-but she laughed at the thought and starte up the stairs. She had not told Robert yet of her new work. He thought her still teaching. It was hard to write it and make him ill at ease. She went to Roland Reynold's room first and dusted it and put it in order and washed the window. Then she went into Mrs.Reynolds room. She looked out of the window - a bed of great white lillies grew beneath and she bent far out to catch the fragrance and felt for a moment like plunging down into them. A man with a satche came rapidly up the street - a tall broad shouldered red faced young fellow and turned quickly in at the gate,glancing up toward her. She saw that it was Roland Reynolds and drawing back went rapidly on with her work. She made the bed,swept and dusted,hearing him stamping up the stairs whistling and banging the doors. She had started to the window and had begun to wash it,sniffing the lillies. Suddenly she heard the door behind her open quickly and Roland Reynolds looked in. He was dressing and he dneither coat,vest nor collar and his hair was rumpled. He always liked to joke and skylark with the domestics and this one to his mind seemed unusually clean and comely for a black girl.

"Hello"he said cheerily.

"Good morning"she answered in a low voice quickly gathering up her utensils.

He looked at her curiously. She certainly was a well built thing "Can't you talk?"he said -"what's your name? You'd better get on with me,or he will fire you" and he laughed pleasantly and reached out his hand. She shrunk back to the window in sudden fear. He jeered at her.

"Stuck up are you?"he said suddenly bolting the door. She staggered backward with a scared look,as she saw the gathering sneer on his red face and the swing of his great bare white arms. Her hands shook and she falthered twisting her apron and whispering to herself "He will not - of course he will not - he is a gentleman -he would -then he tossed the towel away and stepped confidently carelessly toward her,she raised herself erect in sudden hot fury that battled with the whelming sense of utter helplessness God would not leave her thus alone and unprotected in this great dark empty house - God -Oh! and then she caught suddenly the scent of lillies and the rush of the wind. Like a flash she wheeled,never faltering,never doubting, with one light bound she was on the window - the man cried out in horror -but she leaned upon the air,the trees and house whirled upward, the skies flew,she felt her body wheeling twisting downward;up roared the good sweet air and the great fragrance of lillies - nearer,nearer- falling,falling - and she closed her eyes and slept.

41-5-320

Chapter XVII.

Hilda & Hal

L Like some full plumaged bird that flutters before the nest of the tempter until wounded and broken winged it drops and looks at him helples in dumb and terrified submisson,so Hilda stood silently staring at Roland Reynolds. He hesitated and flushed and behind him she saw a shadow. It was a little thing. She remembered that shadow long ago when poor little mischievous Hal would creep along the inside of the fence - she thought of Hal,she thought of his home-coming-she must be here to help him- she was all he had,she - and then in swift horrible revulsion of feeling she leant forward toward the tempter. The shadow moved again and she knew it:

"Hal"she cried "Hal,my Hal"and she threw herself into the arms of the returned convict,while Reynolds vaulted the fence and disappeared. Hal hung his head - he had not dreamed of so loving a greeting and it shamed him-

"Don't sis,"he said "don't - I aint fit."

But she would not let him speak. "Hal" she cried "Have you any money?" He drew out a five dollar bill. "Come"she said "Let's go -anywhere,anywhere".

And early next morning they landed in Columbia with a satchel and a tiny trunk. The sudden responsibility and the tale which his sister had poured into his ears strengthened all the good in Hal . He sent her straight over to the Negro College.

"But what shall I say,Hal?"

"Never mind,I'll arrange"he said. "Just say that I'll be up this afternoon." And then once she was gone and he slipping about had seen the great doors close on her,he stood and stared at himself in dismay:

A boy of 19 just out of jail,with little edulation,no skill,no friends, not a cent of money,and a sister to save from starvation and shame,not to mention his own needs,for he was dungry,dirty and in rags -what could he do?

He whistled.

41-S-321

Then he came rapidly to a conclusion. There was just one way out of it.nobody would give him money he couldn't borrow it;no matter how hard he worked he could not expect pay for a week or more:therefore he must steal. He simply must steal for a start and then afterward he would work and be honest,for he intended to be honest. After experience he thought thatthe best policy. Now however he must steal,and whit? It was so easy that he was surprissd. Two ladies descended from a carriage as he looked by.

One was an elderly lady,the other evidently her daughter.

"Why Mrs.Glennworth"said a gentleman rushing up.

"That was"said the lady smiling Mrs.Grimes now -my daughter Alicia" and the pale thin girl bowed and fingered her silver mounted purse. "We are on our way to Charleston - they passed in but the pale girl lingered. It was then that Hal laid his thin hand gently on that silver mounted purse and disappeared down the alley.

Five new ten dollar bills lay in his hand. He bought a ten dollar suit of clothes. Hired a room and washed and dressed. It was nearly five o'clock and he almost ran to the school. Hilda was sitting uncomfortably in the parlor and she rose joyfully to greet him. He did not say much. But paid two months' board in advance,gave Hilda $10 and started to go.

"Have you got work so soon Hal?"

"Yes - and you've to stay here in school."

"Will you come and see me often?"

"Well -once a week,perhaps -Good bye."

And he was gone.

And so Hal started staggered out into the world. The burning throb for alcohol raged in his blood but he fought it grimly;the old wild wander lust called him but he remembered Hilda and his home. Beneath the slight and curses and petty discriminations of a despised class he writhed in dumb fury -striving to hold hand and tongue and stay the impetuous fury of his blood;the lure of the gambler tempted him at every corner when he heard the half-hissed "Ha "Ha" of the dice thrower,or saw the urchins filthy pennies,or the horse racing;and then in the still nights when he wandered wearily home from fruitless searching for work- he heard the voices of sirens and saw their beckoning hands,but he cried"Hilda,Hilda!" and ran home sweating in the darkness.

But it was hard -bitter hard. What could he find to do? He went to work in a restaurant but they served liquors and the smell was maddening so he left;he became porter in a store,but the headclerk cursed dim for his slowness and called him a "Damned Nigger". Nor ever knew how near he was to murder and death that day. He got a dray to drive,but he cursed at the white children who were stealing a ride and lashed them and a policeman arrested him. His employer bailed him out after a few hours detention but he gave up the job. Then he found a place in a private family as butler. It was quiet and they seemed kind honest people. "God help me to stay - if I fail here" but the woman looked at him narrowly and suddenly asked him "Were you ever in jail?and he answered boldly -"Yes, 12 months"and she discharged him immediately. The frenzy of that night! he had hardly earned $10 in two months of his ~~regularity~~ lying;he knew that Hilda's board was due and he had nothing. The physical and mental strain was telling on him and the thirst for relaxation,company,carousal wan driving him to frenzy. Why should he try to work?stealing was far easier. That night he slipped out noiselessly at midnight. Hark!

"Seven come Eleven.-Ha"

He stopped. He had $5 - a week's wages in his pocket. He rushed into the dark alley and into the house. The gamblers leapt up but he growled at them and flourished his money. Long into the night they gambled. "Whiskey" he kept crying as he threw his dice.

"Ha!"and the fiery hell burned through his body. It took but a few hours. At ten he had sixteen dollars and his brain was blazing an his laughter and curses filled the room and the alley;at 11 o'clock he had not a single cent and neither coat nor hat,and his brain was mad with liquor and poison. Up the alley,up the street,up the broad cool avenue he lurched. A gentleman and lady were coming toward him and he staggered sullenly to the right. This however was the inner side of the broad side walk and the white man determined to make him take the curb. "Turn out there, Nigger" he commanded holding the lady closely and reaching quickly to his right hip pocket. But Hal raised his blood shot eyes and with a fearful oath leapt straight at the man's throat. There was a pistol shot, the flash and crunch of steal against the bone and the pale-faced man sank bleeding to the ground

41-5-322

Chapter 18

41-5-323

Robert and Wilda.

When Robert Calhoun went up to Columbia this time it was like some strong swimmer rising to breath on the curving sea, like the intaking of a great sweet new breath of a morning, like a new baptism of faith and love for the good old world. He was but twenty five and felt himself an old young man, for his life had swept the vast limits of human feeling - joy and sorrow, hope and despair, life and death, birth and burial. The blood bounced too bounteously in his veins to let him even sicken of the joy of living and yet just now he needed inspiration and breath and vision - new dimensions of his narrow and narrowing world, new sources of joy, new and greater ideals. Born to the common lot of men, he could have lived a little life and made much of it, but crowded to a life narrower than his soul he needed new and large dimensions - a breadth of vision and upward lifting of ideal which should compensate in greater ways the loss and theft of the common goodness of living.

And so he came to college not as his paler brothers northward, in budding half green manhood, serious in little and realizing only a bit of the riches round them before they pass quickly beyond the college green. Robert came on the contrary to know, serious beyond his years, eager with all the halfused eagerness of youth to explore and sound and measure the meaning of life. He brought with him too his measuring rod- his grim hard experience at making a living and meeting men and doing things. He grasped his new books curiously, read and re-read them. Pored over them with a thoughtfulness that delighted the older teachers and worried the younger ones. His was a quick bright mind that leapt and flew where others walked, that saw at times with faerful clearness straight across the world and at other times was dull from very over-richness.

41-5-324

Yet in all and about all his new world of wonder, his passion for knowing and understanding dwelt a deep strange loss. The shadow of some far-off dream of wonderful happiness that had fled. He remembered ever one face and always when he remembered, the day how dark so ever, glowed; the drizzling rain sang, the blasing noonday whispered and ran. He had never forgotten little Hilda - he had never ceased to chide himself for losing her, yet when the tragedy of his life had let him seek her she was gone and no one knew whither. The awful suspicion returned to him but he was ashamed of it now. So day then he walked into the long dining room and saw its host of faces - its wonderful rainbow of faces somehow it seemed as though her face must be there because he wanted it there. Then he smiled and laughed at so ~~xxxxxx~~ foolish a thought and drank in the scene before him in half embarrassed wonder - a little startled at the white faces of teachers sitting here and there among the darker students, a little troubled at his table manners and yet always conscious that he was waiting for a vision that had not yet come and perhaps would never come again. A bell tinkled faintly and a quick silence came. A neighbor nudged him to stop eating and he put down his knife and fork and raised his head and then his heart leaped and the blood sang in his ears - he heard faintly and from afar the voice of the white haired little woman reading of the blessed feet of Him that bringeth good tidings that publisheth peace - he joined in the prayer that asked and gave forgiveness but all this was faint and from afar, for in front of him and at the table beyond sat Hilda Quarles.

In the days that followed he saw little of her and if she had noticed him at all, she gave no sign of it. Yet this seemed now unnatural to him. He knew he had forfeited all right to her and yet as he saw this tall grave beautiful young woman moving among the others so gently and gracefully a bitterness and a determination seized him and he asked leave to call on her. She came to him in the parlor without delay or excuse and went to him with extended hand looking him frankly in the eyes.

"I am glad to see you, Mr. Calhoun" she said "I never have had a chance to thank you for your kindness to my brother."

He could have met anything but this frank openness

"It-a- was nothing" he stammered. "I thought" but she went on.

"Hal is working now steadily and keeping me in school."

"I am very glad."

"How is your sister?"

"She is doing the same" he said with a certain sense of shame" "working and keeping me in school."

"How good-I only wish Hal would study. I would work my hands off for him."

"Hilda" he burst out " I hope you have forgiven me?"

But she rose "Forgiven you? Why I had nothing to forgive. I shall always be thankful for your goodness."

"And if you need me will you call on me - freely?" he said.

She hesitated and then she thought of Hal.

"Yes, certinly" she said "good bye."

She went to her room -swiftly up the first flight then slowly, pausing in the reading room to turn the leaves of the paper - a line caught her eyes "Murder- Mr. Roland Reynolds who married Miss Alicia Grines a few months ago and was spending his honeymoon ~~xx~~ * in the capital was stabbed last night on the streets by a Negro and died within an hour. He described his assailant and a posse of citizens are hot on his trail."

A fierce gladness struggled in her heart and then a sense of shame. Slowly she went up to her room. A letter lay under her door- a ~~dull~~ grimy scrawled letter. She opened it, ~~a bank book~~ and a scrap of paper fell out - She read it - read it again and turning threw herself across the bed and shook with sobs. stared blankly out of the window at last

Then she rose quickly bathed her face and ran down stairs. Robert was still standing by the parlor window and he turned to her eager-faced as she stretched the crumpled note toward him; he read:

41-5-325

41-S-326

"Dear Sis:-

~~Here's your bank-roll with enough left over to go to school on.~~ I've kwlled a white man - Roland Reynolds. It wasn't my fault except that I was drunk but I'm no good no how. Good bye, you'll never see me again. Be a good girl.

Hal.

Robert read the letter and looked up. She stood leaning against the wall, pale shrunken together, with glowing tangled hair and shadows beneath her eyes. He stretched his arms, she shrank back, and said "I must find him - I must go to his room and search for him - I must -" she looked at him.

"Wait" he said. He went up stairs and got his pistols put them in a satchel and came down and after a short talk with the matron together they hurried through the streets.

The room down in the squalid Negroquarter was dark. They oried open the door: it was empty but in the fire place lay a half burned bundle of dark stained clothes. They were still smoking, when -

"Hark;"cried Hilda.

There was the sound of hurrying men, clattering footsteps of horses and the low roar of mingled shoutin. Robert sprang to the window and opened it. The old cabin fronted a narrow alley and up the alley the mob was making straight toward the house. Quickly Robert barred the door and half closed the rickety shutter of the one window; then opening the satchel gave her one of the pistols, and took the other. She understood and stood tall and lithe, with her bronzen hair half shaken about her face, like some great golden madonna. On came the mob - she looked at him with the old sweet smile and he bending kissed her forehead as she murmured "At last, O Death."

Then they listened. They've got h m - they've got the Nigger" yelled the boys along the street and Robert and Hilda started in dismay. Then quickly he rose pushed back the shutter and leaned out:

"I will kill h im as he passes" he whispered. She ~~kneeled~~ crouched beside him on her knees. "And then?" she cried fingering the cold fatal steel -"and then! he answered with set face - click! click! went the revolvers. On came the crowd - the dirty grimy crowd - the policeman dragging a bound man, the hatless, coatless followers, the wild-eyed men - the pistols, rifles and oaths they swept on - but they did not stop. They did not stop at the little home, they did not even look - on they went like a mad whirlpool.

"Burn him! burn him" they yelled and the eyes of the prisoner turned for a moment toward Robert and Hilda screamed and Robert dropped the pistol and gasped. It was not Hal. Quarles whom they saw.

The roar of the mob passed into silence. She stood against the wall with outstretched hands like a crucifix,with hunted eyes. He stood with folded hands looking at the bloody bundle.

"I (- " she faltered and stopped.

"We - " he hesitated.

She dropped her arms wearily. "Yes - we must - save him,even - even if it it means Hal's - O it's cruel Robert,cruel."

"But just " he said slowly "perhaps - perhaps Hal has escaped - at any rate we must save this innocent man."

She roused herself - "yes - go!" she cried.

A moment he paused before her swimming eyes - a moment,an eternity- then he turned and his footsteps rang on the pavement. He flew

~~to get swiftly~~ through the streets and winding and turning came breathless to the police station. Only one officer was there.

"Is the prisoner here?"

"What prisoner?"

"The negro charged with Mr. Reynolds' murder."

The man smiled grimly "I reckon he's in hell by this time"he said.

"But they've got the wrong man"panted Robert. The officer looked at him.

"At any rate he's a prisoner he said "and I reckon he'll do."

Robert rushed out with his bundle and hurried down the street.

"Which way did the mob go?"he asked of an old black man;the man pointed silently and Robert ran. He ran silently,swiftly,in great sweeping strides bending his head forward like a hound with widened panting nostrils. As he rose to a hilltop he saw them in the full noon day glare,heard the hoarse ravenous grating of their shouting and snifting the bundle he ran till it seemed his heart would break - before him he saw the column of smoke and flame and heard the yelling of men and then as his feet struck the bridge that spanned the Congaree,the crowd broke and stampeded toward him;bleaving the ~~xxxxx~~ thin curling smoke and the ashes. He leaned sick and weary against the bridge and his heart hammered pitifully.

"Too late,too late"he muttered. The crowd came on straggle by him - the older men silent with set faces,the younger flushed with liquor. Robert raised his bundle silently and balanced it on the rail. A half grown boy rushed by -"This is his finger,Jigger" he yelled truculently and thrust a little scorched bone before Robert's sweaty boiling face. Robert made no answer but he pushed the little bundle. It fell with a splash into the water and went bobbing and whirling down the swift current.

"An innocent man has died a shameful death" he whispered "and I have hidden the guilt of the guilty." And he turned wearily back

41-5-327

Chapter XVIII.
The Pain .

Mary Calhoun lay before a wide window gazing dreamily out upon the sky - great clouds, grey and silver and white sailed silently, majestically by as if on long and mighty missions to some blue and unknown land afar-thrones and kings rolled on in gleaming splendor and changed and grew and altered as they rolled. She turned away; why was it - ah- ah- God, the Pain, the dull deep massive pain,- the grinding pressing sickening pain! the beads of sweat bubbled on her forehead and she sank back with a sigh as Martha bent over her.

"Poor dear, poor dear!" she murmured "there don't move - you mustn't move - is it easier now?"

"Yes - yes - I - I want to write - I must write."

"To your brother - I'm writing now, dear - "

"You must not write I - no - no - yes I am strong enough quite (ah the Pain the deep tingling bitter pain - ah, ah - there) yes, yes get me a pencil and I'll tell him all - thank you - yes, I'm quite easy now - quite - ah - well."

She seized the pen and wrote:

"Dearest Robert:-

Is no this sweet weather? this glorious (oh, the pain, the pain. the bitter pain) summer time? The sun is tender to us here and sends us (ah, dear God!) kissing cooing winds. I am sitting, no lying -(ac I not lazy Bob) here and watching the great white clouds fly- they seem like God's great waving banners marching always marching so silently and swiftly on. I am as well as can be - I hope you're in good health. Work and study hard next year - I shall send you $150 for the year - it won't pinch me at all. My (the pain, the awful whirring pulsing pain- I cannot bear it, dear God - ah) love to Wilda and all your friends (ad it co es again dagger-like and strikes my hand I how careless - my finger slipped. Goodbye, dear Boo, Good bye,

Mary."

"There - there" she whispered faintly "now the envelope no, no I'll back it - there then now you won't write, you won't -" nd she fainted away.

Long days she lay there watching the sky. Now in deep peace now wracked with paroxisms of pain.

"What, what is broken" she asked once.

"Your hip is crushed dear."

"Will it ever get well?"

"O, it will get much better?"

"So I can work - so I -" she began eagerly.

41-5-328

"You are working now and here are your first month's wages"said Martha. Mary took the little envelope and opened it and there was a hundred dollar bill.

"O no" she said quickly " no I"

But Martha was kneeling by the bed sobbing. "You were hurt working for me and this is my own money,my own savings,if you do not take it I shall never forgive myself."

Mary looked at her and lay back with a sigh -

"Thank you" she said "thank you veryvery much .-"

But Martha still knelt.

"Mary" she said and her voice came dry and harsh -"Mary did you - fall out the window?"

For a moment their eyes met but Mary closed hers quickly.

"Yes,Mrs.Reynolds"she said.

"O thank God - thank God "murmured the woman "O no,no.I don't mean that Mary - I - "but Mary put out her hands and slipped them about the woman's neck and kissed her.

41-S-329

"Can you not give me some needle and cloth. I think I will try to embroider a bit" said Mary one day,and lying there she wove a figured mat with flaming border and waving lillies strewn without and Martha took it out and sold it for her. Many of these she made (yet the pain, the low grinding pain,lived ever with her) and then at last obedient to her begging they moved her to Uncle Caesars cabin and put her in her little neat room where half sitting,half lying,she sewed and wrought and sang. (The pain the cruel pain,it wrought and sang there too.) One day a child came in for help on its lesson. She eagerly turned to her books and helped it and in after days others came and others and though they wondered to see her pause now and then,and closing eyes and teeth,drip silent sweat,yet the class grew and the black parents came in and hovered over her and paid her little sums as they could. Thus so that soon she found herself earning $3 and $4 a week with her sewing and teaching and she was glad and brave and happy. One day a letter came and she opened it. There was a long blue check and a card. The blue check said $500 - the card said "Henry Reynolds "Roland Reynolds - Real Estate." She sat and held it. Wild anger,cold contempt,calm resignation strove in her heart. Would it not be right to use this for Robert's training,for the poor about her,for the school? Then she sighed. No it was the price of shame,and the next day Henry Reynolds received back his check and card.

She wrote long letters to Robert filled with cheer and cautioned all the neighbors lest they worry him with gossip.

"He knows all he needs to know"she said sweetly. "He's hard at work, dear boy,and does not need to be troubled with little things. Yet it was hard as commencement approached. "When are you coming?"he kept writing and she hobbling about on her crutches and knowing that the Limp and the Pain had married her body for all this life kept putting him off and at last said:"Dear Brother - I have met with a little loss and I cannot come to see you graduate. God only knows how I am disappointed at this." The next mail xxxx brought money but she sent it back saying "When you come,I will tell you all dear Robert - I cannot come." There came no answer. She knew how deep was his disappointment and hers? Ah - the bitter,bitter Pain then slow hot pain. She put away her crutches and hobbled to her little chair before the door and waited. In a few hours he would come. She draped her skirts so as to hide the sick bones and glanced at her face in the little mirror poor little thin,lined mask of deep brown. She sat back with a sigh and waited - waited .

The days flew until the Day of days came!

41-5-330

Chapter ~~XIV~~. XX

~~The Lovers~~. Illumination

Never again did Hilda see her brother. Whither he went and what his final fate was she never knew,and the story of his crime lay locked in hers and Roberts heart. And in their hearts too lay something else. She shrank from it. All these years of her imagined hating stood now revealed to her as the deep and lower tides of love. Yet she kept saying "No , no." She seemedto herself twice to have thrown herself at him in unmaidenly abandon. She was ashamed and shut herself in her room -would not come when he sent for her and rehearsed ~~refuxxx~~ again and again the words she must say when they met again:Robert you surely will not misinterpret my excitement - no I do not love you; or Robert yes I love you but we can never be more to each - Robert - " and then he came ~~in the flesh~~.

He met her on the great front path just beyond the shadow of the trees. He said nothing and she started to falter the set words - then remembered that he had not yet spoken.

He hesitated,then bent forward toward her and she swayed to his, as two wild flowers curl together on a windy moor- his lips found hers and all the world went singing,her eyes found his and all the sky blushed crimson to the sun. And then at last she knew. Then at last the great aching void of her life was full. The sense of loneliness flew,the fear at lack of protection - a strength and joy crept through her limbs and she sobbed and laughed and whispered in his arms,until she woke to life with the great clear ringing of the night bell.

He turned and parted lingeringly glancing back to where the maiden marvellous stood darkly silhouetted in silvery golden light,with outstretched arms;then he walked on again face forward and there were the once giant gateposts stood stalwart and stone,stood now white satined heralds and they cried to the thousand ears of Night "The King -long live the King", while unseen silent hands brushed back the curtains of the night that hang before the stars. And Hilda above inthe arched doorway standing still in the radiant fulness of her dawning womanhood watched him swaying onward and saw him last turn backward at the gate. She kissed her hands to him- kissed all ten tiny finger tips and stretched them toward him benedictionwise till he was gone. Then turning with a great joy upon her heart,she mounted the broad stair case,walking as on piling cloud or thick green meadows - up,up, bounding up,slipping through bright clear air; she laughed lowwand shook out the silky curling of her hair till it haloed her dark beauty splendidly.she heard the tinkling music of little far off bells,the eager gaes of paradise flew back and lo!her room,her room-mate and her little bed.

Wither walk the feet of them that newly love? In green and flowered ways,in paths all sweet and golden with sunny shadows and shadowy shine. Up far up the great and glowing mountains to the gates of Revelation - ha happy the man to whom those gates lie open and the woman who finds them wide unbarred- she is of maidens thrice time blessed,the film fledged fairy of God's one wonder world. To Robert and Hilda,these dark children of a darkened world,veil-swept before the burningglory of the sun,came insomuch the larger fuller and more splendid Love new from untainted untouched herats,great from all-believing souls, wide with the width of all the world, ahey knew. Within the gates of Revelation they walked reverently with bowed heads,and half veiled eyes with midnight prayer,orisons and madrigols,little silent tremblings timid touchings of hands and great flashes of utter whelming happiness such as men may not taste often on earth lest earth be heaven.

They did not talk of Love - they lived it and talked of Life- of the wonderful world of tree and sky and cloud and creeping thing and how God made them,of men and the thoughts of men,of the glory of doing and the duty of deeds. Together they sat in humid twilights with light clasped timorous hands and wandering misty eyes and sang, sang the sorrow songs,the old sweet heart songs of their fathers and set what thoughts they could to the little words and winding music.

Then gradually subtly the new note came. The sudden revelation of life to them was so wonderful why could it not be more wonderful- independent, freer broader better? They talked of Hal and the world's injustice toward him and a bitterness and complaint grew in her tones and talk. Again and again she whispered to Robert:

"I cannot breathe the air here in the south it burns me "-

11-5-32

Read 277A here

Since Hal's disappearance Hilda had been living on the charity of the school, for the authorities begged her to stay. yet the thought of dependence galled her & hers.

Her love grew and changed and wavered; at first it flashed and waned terror-wise, now to madness now to night. Then it sat a single point of light infinitesimal afar, but so fiercely brilliant that all else in the world was stygian darkness. Now it blazed larger till it was red conflagration - world divouring, throwing all life into streaming shaking shadows. And then at last came calm. Love was a still white flame dim unflickering, pure holy. It was all penetrating, all suffusing. It did not light everything but it lighted the world. What it did not light was not the world. There was no world without it - what world there was was Love and Love was all in all.

41-S-331

As love to her was light so to him it was sound .- a certain singing in the wilderness, a strange obligato above the dust and deed of life - a great and solemn chorus of inspiration that turned the heavy prose of the world into hot flowing poetry. The music of Love did not with him replace the world - it rather interpreted and sang its very roughness into harmony.

Herein lay the subtle difference between their two souls. The soft white light of her great love suffusing enveloping threw into darker relief the hatefulness and evil about her which she felt was not of the world but some unlike excrescence, which must be gotten rid of, and the more she saw of the evils of caste, the more her life became one great gasp for joy and peace and love; on the other hand the great music of his loving made him love the real world and its work the more in a dream of greater broader harmony.

Thus imperceptibly subtly they began to grow apart. They did not realize it. They would have denied it stoutly. They loved and knew they loved and yet the very intensity of that love emphasized in both the stirrings of some deeper discord.

[Back to 277]

"I cannot live in this choked slavery haunted place-"

"You do not - you canno know what a colored girl must suffer- the heart hurting blows, the slurs upon her womanhood, the petty dirty insults which every white thing - loafer or gentleman considers it his right and duty to heap on us - O I should die a living death here- Robert could you marry a wife here knowing that you were powerless to protect her even with your life? Robert xx you never knew that that very Reynolds whom Hal xilled followed me after that awful day and persecuted and insulted me in every way possible and that I dare not tell and could not complain could not even have told you had you been there lest you stand where Hal stands or lie a heap of moldering ashes? O darling, darling, would we dare bring children into such a world, with such a destiny? Robert we must go nowth and loose ourselves from this hateful world."

At first he resisted the liberty cry even of his own heart.

"These white folk are but erring human beings dear - they do not realize the wrong they do us, they do not realize that we have hearts as sensitive as theirs -" he would say.

41-5-333

"They may not realize all that" she would answer "but they are not fools or babies and they know well enough that lying and stealing and cowardice are wrong even toward animals. And yet they lie about us, they steal our labor, attack us not man to man, but armed mob to helpless outcast."

"Yet Hilda, all the south is not thus, all of our neighboxss are not to blame."

"Robert they are, and that is the thing that sickens me of the south I could stand the sin riot and brutality of ignorance but I cannot stand that of intelligent men who know better and yet who do and wink at wrong."

"Many of them feel our wrongs keenly and have told me so."

"Yes, dear, whispered it to you alone, glancing furtively about, lest some ears hear themr confessing xxxxxyxxx "and yet persist in their oppression when the mob calls -"

"But they are also generous and kind in many ways."

"O they give us old clothes."

—"And their wrong actions are but a few among many good ones."

"Yes, yes - but a man continually guilty of one mean low kind of deed, stamps meanness so thoroughly on his soul that he becomes mean throughout and forever. I cannot picture their thought to myself Robert -I cannot realize their way of looking at injustice: how can grown strong intelligent beings look us in the face unblushing and know hat they are cheating, defrauding humiliating and crushing a human soul and then add to the wrong ind insult, the impudence of telling us our duty -

O Robert they are not men,they are devils."

"Even granted all this Hilda,paint the situation in the south as black as you will:doesn't it call all the more for intelligence and sacrifice to fight it - to you and me to work right here and now?"

"Why we? Why must we grind the soul out of life in heart sickening hurts and the rest of the world go free? Why is it any more our duty than the duty of a million of others white as well as black? Why we Robert who can be so happy - to whom life means so much - who have seen the vision of the Blessed?"

He laid his hands reverently on her hair and stroked it gently saying slowly:"Perhaps it is not simply duty,my little girl - perhaps it is a great privilege,the privilege of Life,perhaps Life is work and work sacrifice and sacrifice not simply the ~~sight~~ vision of the blessed but blessedness itself."

"Nay,Robert"she answered "Life is Love and Love is Joy and work is the lowly handmaid of greater and greater Joy. Sicrifice is evil- necessary perhaps at times but ever evil. And of all evils useless sacrifice is the worst,—it is foolishness and the sacrifice of blacke people ~~to~~ in the south to convert Southern white people to Christian decency is useless for it's fighting unreason."

"There is no Unreason Hilda,for the world is God and God is reason."

But Hilda stamped her little foot.

"What does God care for black people?"she cried as she clasped her arms about his neck.

Then Robert hushed the rebellious heart -and soothed her and whispered into her ears ahd kissed her dark and softening eyes. And so it ever ended.

And so too the battle of Love and Hate in Hilda's soul and the battle of Work and Love in Robert's found ever no abiding victory. The realness of their great new love was ever before them and the strange new happiness and yet - yet in his soul Robert sometimes wondered if deep as was her love for him,her hate for the south was not deeper: and then he would search his own heart and say was his case any better? Deep as was his love for her was not his love for his life-work greater? Was it? Was it not? He scarcely knew. It depended on the damythe sun,the place. A glance at two tear filled eyes made the world hold but one dear woman- nothing else. A walk through the alleys and hovels made the world all one great beckoning duty. And so in that last school year the battle surged now up,now down,till at last with him all-conquering love began to conquer and the more so because of Mary's strange behavior. He could not understand ~~her~~ his sister. She suddenly did not want him tocome home in vacation time. Her letters had a queer strained sound and she did not come to him- would not even come to his graduation - she was -"too busy",thinking only of herself and her school. Yet he hesitated -it was not easy to give up a life dream - a life duty even for love:even though the sister who was his inspiration has forgotten him,but gradually easily,eagerly, he slipped into new ways of thinking, and dr aming and a great hunger for f reedom possessed him and the love of one woman filled his life.

41-5-384

PP

Then came the curious change.

41-5-335

Hilda was standing by the gate of the girl's hall one afternoon, when a pretentious carriage whirled into the yard with coachman and footman and two white ladies. All the girls stared curiously for such folk seldom came to a colored school. The carriage rolled to the door and the elderly heavily powdered lady looked around imperiously.

"Where is the matron?" she asked sharply.

The New England woman who came out looked very plain and faded beside the silken and befrilled aristocrat who announced:

"I am Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes and -"

"I am glad to see -" began the matron tentatively, but Mrs. Glennworth visibly bridled and hastened to add

"I am looking for a good seamstress."

"Oh" said the matron disappointed "I am afraid we haven't any."

"But don't you teach sewing?"

"Yes but we hardly turn out trained seamstresses-" then she thought of Hilda. "There are one or two who might do such work but -"

"Send the best one here."

Hilda came wonderingly at the matron's call.

Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes bent forward.

"Did you make that dress?"

"Yes ma'am" said Hilda coldly.

"Well I want to hire you."

Hilda stiffened.

"-You must come" continued Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes, dropping something of her grand air and talking earnestly. "My daughter here greatly needs your help right off" she whispered in Hilda's ear and then continued "My daughter has met with a great misfortune recently. You'll come and talk with her won't you, like a good girl" and she held out a card. Hilda started to speak, glanced at the card and her dark face went white to the lips: "Mrs. Poland Reynolds" it said. She slowly glanced up at the thin young weak-mouthed woman, draped in black and great with dawning motherhood who sat beside Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes. This then was the poor thing whom her own brother had widowed.

"I will come" she said slowly.

Robert tried to dissuade her when he heard her decision but she looked into his eyes and said:

"Atonement."

"Then too," she argued " I have been dependent too long I am ashamed to live longer on charity; here is a chance to earn a good wage, and begin to support myself. I shall miss finishing my course - but ah well Robert, I have you!"

41-S-336

"But we shall be parted"he complained tenderly.

"But not long Robert- we are going to Beaufort,near your sister, in the new house which Roland Reynolds built. There I shall work until spring I'll come back and see you graduate dear,and then - then we'll plan and your sister - perhaps I can find out more about her and her strange behavior. You haven't told her - about us yet?"

41-5-337

"No -I've mentioned you several times but she never inquired. ~~Shall~~ I ~~—~~ Shall I?"

"No wait and let me see." and Hilda went to ~~Columbia~~ Beaufort

Through the Influence of Martha Reynolds,Mary Calhoun had left Wilton Point for a couple of weeks to sew for Mrs. ~~Glennworth's~~ Grimes' daughter. The pain had softened to an ache. She was deftly embroidering a bit of sheer muslin when Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes arrived home from her hurried trip to Columbia.

"That's beautiful,Mary,beautiful? she said fingering the tiny dress. "And what's more I've got somebody to help you at last -Hilda what-you-may call-it - I got her from the colored school up there - shall be here to-morrow"and Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes rustled out. Mary paused and thought,and the pain pricked. It was Hilad Quarles she was sure,for Robert had mentioned Hilda casually in several letters. He seemed to know her pretty well. If she came here and saw her she would go back and tell Robert of her lameness- of her working at service- then he would stop school and not graduate and all would be spoiled. No,no! it must not happen and her fingers trembled and the pain throbbed. But could Hilda know her? No of course not. She had not seen her for fifteen years or more and the lameness would disguise her further. Unless then she heard her name,she might never know. Mrs. ~~Glennworth~~ Grimes would'n mention the name - to Mrs.Glennworth shae was simply "Mary"unattached. The other servants? She saw little of them and Hilda would see little. She would speak to the old housekeeper and thus to Hilda she would be Mary-Smith? yes,Mary Smith -for John's sake and she bent guiltily over her sewing(The Pain the dull hard Pain.)

Hilda looked at her little dark misshapen companion in pity and curiosity;pity for her homeliness and loneliness,curiosity to know what life meant to her. Gradually she found herself strangely drawn to her- Her sunny disposition,her sweetevenness of temper and her unwavering cheer however so cloudy the day and time,and even when striving in the paroxisms of the ceaseless pain,was an inspiration and a light to Hilda's more passionate spirit. A deep affection sprang up between the two girls and the little sewing room became the pleasantest of places with its flowers and singing, its work and talk. Both at first were reticent about their own lives but graddally they began to exchange confidences.

That she was Roberts sister never occurred to her for Roberts sister was strong & well and teaching five miles away at Wilton Point

"You have a lover, Mary?" asked Hilda one day, half whimsically Mary looked up in surprise and then laughed "Yes- yes" she said "for a lover means some one you love, and who loves you and with whom you will live and work alway

"O it must be a man" laughed Hilda.

"I'm not sure it must be (the heavy, heavy Pain) - but it is" and Mary laughed lowly and then in sudden fulness of joy she poured out all her life hopes'- not quite all, she kept something of her secret but she told of an absent one whom she loved of how he was studying, of how he was coming to work with her and then of the work- the wonderful Work, the mighty joy of doing for the dark world she loved about her.

"We shall build a school" she said "and together we will teach and lead. Won't it be wonderful?-Ah" [the stab of the Pain!] Hilda marvelled, — first that a man should have had the sight to see the soul- the pure beautiful soul beneath this crooked homely body; marvelled more that this soul sweety and good as it was could see beneath the awful tragedy of this hateful south a wonderful and inspiring work. She dropped her sewing clasped her knees and ~~stared~~ looked into Mary's eyes.

41-5-338

"Mary I hate the south" she said.

"Hate? hate? "said Mary "then you don't love-"

Hilda's heart glowed in her eyes- "I do -love-" she said.

But Mary shook her head -"Hate and Love do not mix-if you truly love one human soul then in him is all the world transfigured."

Hilda laughed. "No because I love, therefore I hate -I love him and beauty and goodness- I hate them (and ~~then~~ she pointed to the white passersby) and ugliness and prejudice."

Mary rose and limped to Hilda and kissed her.

"I am going to leave you soon "she said "but I'll write often and sometime you'll come and see me and mine- and then you'll know ." (The bounding tingling Pain!)

The next Sunday was so lonely without Mary that Hilda bethought herself of her long deferred visit to Robert's sister. Inquiring the way to Wilton Point she found it rather long to walk and so hired a driver and buck-board and arrived about noon. Only Uncle Caesar was at the cabin where they said Robert's sister lived and Hilda sat down beside the strange and aged old man and talked of Momm Bett. Then he went out and Hilda sat waiting and musing. What kind of a girl was Robert's sister- how should she greet her, what-"

"Mary!"

"Hilda - dear, dear Hilda"

"Why - why".

"Will you forgive me Hilda?"

"Mary - are you Mary Calhoun, Robert's sister?"

"Yes, Hilda."

A wave of bewilderment encompassed Hilda Quarles. Robert's sister crooked and lame? Out at service, engaged to someone unknown to Robert-

But Mary did not notice. She sat down and taking Hilda's hand told all her simple story; of the school, of the service, of the bed of lillies, of the pain- yes of the little lies told to save Robert worrying and regret and as she told the scales dropped from Hilda's poor blind eyes.

But Mary seized her hand "All these days "she cried "I have been mad (Ah, the Pain!) to ask you of him - you know him for he's mentioned you several times-Is he well? Does he look worried - or thin? Is he working too hard?"

41-5-339

Then she told her great secret. The Episcopal Church was talking of taking Miss Silena's school and giving it to Robert when he graduated. Perhaps he would study for orders and some great day be priest in a little chapel. Then she got her crutches and showed Hilda the world -her world. The struggling suffering laughing masses of women and men- in and out the homes she crept with her crooked body and sunshine face and ever before and around and about her crept Love. Down, down, deep down fell Hhlda's heart. The vision of her own narrow selfishnes shamed her, a vision of the glory of work and the endless beauty of Sacrifice silenced her. Who was she her heart cried "that had dared to come between this woman and her dream!

A vague presentiment of impending doom came over her. Was there any place for her in this great vision ou work and sacrifice? Even if tramping on her heart and passions she fitted herself to the new work and thought, would she help them? Would she not-had she not already perverted Robert's ideals? and about all did Mary dream of - of any third helper? She broached it tentatively.

"W Rw "When Robert marries-"

"O Robert will not marry -that is for a long long time" said Mary hastily- then her face grew ashen and the pain leaped and flamed.

"Hilda- tell me -he - isn't caring for some silly girl up there?" Her face was piteous and Hilda gripped her soul.

"Ha -ha - ha" she laughed merrily clasping the lame girl tenderly and kissing the sorrow from her eyes

"Of course not - there was a girl he used to go with but I know he loves you and his work best of all".

"But he liked her - a little?"

"O she had a - a pretty face, and - "

"O it's wicked for women so to misuse God's beauty; and yet perhaps I'm unfair- was she good - true - unselfish?"

"No no she wasn't- she was selfish, selfish above women and narrow she tried to lure him to a life of aimless pleasure- but she couldn't-he was too large of soul."

"Robert, my Robert" murmured Mary (Oh the dull weary ache.)

"But enough of that - that is over. Now of myself. Mary would you mind letting me talk of myself?"

"Oh," cried Mary, hurt at her selfishness "of course, my Hilda forgive-"

"No no, itis nothing. Mary do you remember that once I told you that I thought I cared for a man?"

"Yes Hilda - you did not tell me -

"No-you do not know him- he lives far away from us." Well Mary I feel that for his own good I must give him up."

"Why Hilda you two together.- "

"No I do not have the right influence over him- I lead him all unconsciously not up but down. No, No I must - Mary you speak so often of God he seems so near, so real to you, to me he is a name, an empty form." She came close to Mary and ~~nestled~~ knelt beside her." "Mary does your God help a poor woman- a ~~poor~~ untaught woman who wants to do right and hardly knows how?"

"Yes Hilda."

"And Mary would God help me and strengthen me for a great sacrifice"

"Yes, Hilda."

"And Mary will you ask him- now."

Simply and reverently she bowed Hilda's head upon her knees and bowed her head above it so that h r lips kissed the coiling hair and the pain slept fitfully. Softly her clear voice rose in the cabin above the murmuring of the sea.

"O God, my God, who ~~are~~ art the defender of the weak and the strength of the strong look upon these thy two motherless daughters. Help us to be pure and true and help Hilda to do what she knows is good and right and finally save us both in His name, Amen."

And Hilda echoed solemnly "Amen."

41-5-340

Then she rose and they sat silently hand in hand:

"Do you see the shadow ship"asked Mary pointing to the dark clouds that rode the eastern waters,and ~~then~~ she told Hilda the old tale and told her of her childish wanderings and of Robert's,of their mother andof Robert-Robert Robert -and then the anxiety crept back into her voice.

"Hilda-Hilda,do you think he cares more for this girl than for God's work?

"No I am sure he does not. He was once attracted to her as men are so often."

"I think"said Mary,"that such unions are wicked. I think a man and woman who marry should marry some great work of God and be wife and husband to it. And what can be holier marriage than the soul bond of brother and sister working for their race?"

"Nothing,Mary,and listen sister,let me call you sister. I think - I am sure Robert is true to his work and to you" Mary was silent,then said:

"Do you know Hilda at first when you told me youw were in love I had such an absurd idea -I thought it might be -Robert."

Hilda laughed merrily"The idea!"

"And - and I was - jealous,I could not help it - it's wicked but he's all I've got, Hilda. But now that you tell me of this girl,of her selfishness- it's right to be jealous- isn't it Hilda? She's not worthy of him?"

"No,no she's not,a thousand times no- but never fear. He's yours,no one shall ever take him from you and your work." And clasping hands they sat again in long silence.

Hilda seemed to herself another woamn when she returned to Columbia. She had determined to accept a position ~~with Mrs. Glenworth at her orthern home~~ which Mrs Grimes knew of in New York and must leave just before the Commencement when Robert graduated. Just how to break her engagement with Robert she could not for a time decide. She thought of running away and writing but that seemed cowardly. She thought of telling him all,but that would be untrue to Mary. No she would return and let things go as they were only reassuring him of his sister's devotion without betraying Mary's secret. Then at last she would leave him. He would go to Mary. If he looked on that sacrifice and deserted Mary for her she would marry him but despise him. If he gave her up for the greater duty to Mary and his race,she would make the sacrifice willingly.

Meantime she watched Robert and the more she watched the more she was sure that her love had degraded him,lowered his ideals and made him selfish and self centred. One night in particular the truth of its struck her like a blow. He had come to the parlor to call and was just going. She held him back a moment -

41-S-341

"We want happine ss Robert"she said searching him with her eyes.

"Yes,"he said "happiness"looking at her shining hair.

"And freedom,the right to go and come unlet."

"Yes freedom - wide good freedom."

"And money to buy a tiny home,and books and papers and soft rolling chair and hangings and pictures,and - and "

"O such a home with you"he cried in ecstacy.

She panted between tears and laughter and put her hands on his shoulders.

"And Joy"he cried"the joy of life,the utter pleasure and joy of living."

The wildness of her mad beauty set all his nerves tremble.

He sank to his knees and seized her hands.

"Joy" he cried "O Hilda,joy"but she drew back slowly with a choking cry. He looked at her in wonder.

The great bell knelled and he turned,lingered,and went down the steps slowly.

41-5-342

"Joy"she cried to his going,standing li ke some mirth-mad maenad,with heaving breast.

"Joy"he echoed as he sped love-swept down the way.

"Joy!"she wailed and swayed like a wounded thing with the vision of crippled pain-wracked Mary in her eyes.

From that day her mind was made up.

They parted,standing where the great dark hall did slow and vast obeisance to the moon,while all about lay the soft sheen of velvet darkness. Lowly,slowly they spoke,nakedly,soul unclothed to soul. He took her face between his hands and whispered "O I have loved you so long- so unutterably long for the endless ages of hours and days and the minutes of endless years." And she answered creeping close to him:

"Before you came I did not live and when you go I shall die;—Not suddenl, and frantically but slowly-oh slowly in long weary- leaden years. O Robert,Robert,in after years remember always, I love you."

So he graduated alone. The dear old school sat back among magnolia trees,a little green oasis among the low close crowded cabins of the Negro quarter. The building itself was bare red brick but today trimmed withhumanity - a great dark cloud of mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers and he spoke to them clearly and confidently of "William Lloyd Garrison." Then he took his diploma,boarded the train and tsarted homeward after four years. How soon should he go north to Hilda? This summer!why not?he argued. Mary was satisfied alone- he had not seen her in years- nor she him and yet she was cheerful and busy-so "busy" he said impatiently. It was hard to work

Here and hopeless. There was no peace - no beauty no upper air. Every where was the mob or the making of the mob, harsh words, epithets, ugliness, ignorance. The world was tight, narrow, hemmed in. Above, below - he gasped for air as Hilda gasped. Hilda? She rose before his vision glorified-blautiful as some dark easters dream, touched with deep yearning sadness, he saw the changing gleaming bronze gold of her curly hari, he felt the soft fair heaving of ther breasts and saw the subtle half-hidden curve of her lithe limbs-he closed his eyes. Hilda, Hilda he murmured and out from her shadowy eyes stepped her soul - her silent striving soul, her panting wounded soul and her voice blew upon his waiting ears as the voice of sighing singing waters -

41-5-343

[288 A]

"Beaufort - Beaufort - all change cars!" He grabbed his valise and stepped into the street. Mary was not there. A fierce anger shot through him. Miss Sands simpered up - "Why Mr. Calhoun? So glad to see you, I er - I've been wanting to see you a long time and meant thought to see you in Columbia, but of writing but .- well you know we ladies must be so careful" and she gigled aimlessly "How's Mary?" sie said. "Very well" he answered coldly. "So glad, I hated it so after her awful accident." Robert stared in amazement but mMiss Sands did not notice "about her losing tie school." Robert dropped his umbrella and fumbled for it tremblingly and a great light crept through his darkened mind.- "I suppose" continued Miss Sands rapidly and confadently "that she thinks it was my doings but it wasn't, honest, I hate it - it was all Pa's work and I could a cried when I found I had to teach all those nasty little dirty children - "

41-5-344

She stopped breathlessly and picked her handkerchief "I wish I could come to see Mary - I know she can't walk" but Robert muttered something and hurried away.

"Accident - lost the school - cannot walk" was he dreaming? He hurried almost ran down the street to the ferry and out into the island country side. The shadows hung over the black disk of the sea, and the groaning of the waters struck wildly on the gathering twilight. Uncle Caesar's cabin gazed darkly out upon the road and swelling waters. Robert stepped and steadied himself, and then with hammering heart opened the gate and walked up the path. A little light shone within up the dim form of Mary where she sat awaiting. He rushed forward with glad cry, but just as he reached the threshold, she rose twisted misshapen and limped and hobbled forward, with greyish face and great dark burning eyes. He strode in and snatched her lightly tenderly in his arms and groaned:

"Sister, O my sister."

Chapter XVII

The MOmm Bett School.

Five years had passed.

The Rector was surprised. He was a slim precise man, clean shaven, in clerical dress and with that aggressive, all-judging face that seems its natural accompaniment. There stood the quaint beautiful old cabins, low long and wide built of fragrant yellow pine palmetto logs. All about fronded Palmettos were and was the mmmm odor of the oleanders arales and jessamine and all the front of the three dark cabins was riotous with color and perfume, while behind lay black green cotton and tossing corn, and to the side low billowy rice. A fence of crooked crinkled vines ran round the wold, two cows stood ~~munnnnnn~~ mincing ~~grrrrrrrr~~ gravely and above where a tiny gate stood gaping arched in crimson glory, dead sweet and languorous in the hot still morning was a legend in white shell and it read "The Gates called Peace." A gleaming white path of spotless sea stone lay up to the cabin and the rector entered. He wantered on, and then where a little bower, blue garlanded with flowers, guarded a simple bench he sat hown, half hidden, removing his hat., musing, wondering, knitting his brow in surprise as the voice of children came to him. He looked and saw that a colored woman twisted and limping was coming out the door and with a troop of little girls - dark vari-colored girls romping and laughing about her. They turned toward the little cabin to the right and ran and raced.

Then came from the other side the voices of shouting boys and a tall young brown man walked after them. The rector hesitated. He waited to ask about the school - to know more of this strangely attractice place; but somehow it was difficult to ask. He could have apologized politely and enquired had the persons been white as he had supposed they were of course when he entered the gate. If the place had been a dirty hovel of black folk he would have entered as some being from above and received homage and given advise and censure. But these folks - these surroundings? He rose half vexed at his hesitation, and then something occurred to him - of course he argued relieved, there must be white northerners at the head and these were under teachers or monitors; he did not like to even approach those officious Yankees but perhaps it was his duty - he stepped along the path raised his shoulders, looked about with his gold eyeglass and coughed slightly. Robert turned and seeing him came to him.

41-5-345

"Good morning, Sir, can I be of any service?"

"Ah, thank you, young man, I was looking for the - er - principal or head of this - er - establishment."

"I am he" said Robert.

"But who has charge, oversight?"

"No one beside myself."

"Who owns the property?"

"I do - that is I and my sister."

"How long has the school been here?"
"Five years"

The rector stared "But I never heard of the - "

"The Momm Bett School?"

"Oh, why - yes but I thought that was -" he stopped. He was about to say that he thought it was a Negro enterprise and to his mind

"Negro" meant oh,it meant so many things - first of all Negro was synonymous with dirt and this place was clean;"Negro" meant badly mananged or not managed at all while this looked orderly ("tho of course one could not tell") ; Negro meant silly,inconsequential childish imitative - everything low,laughable and wrong,while this - he spoke slowly

"I thought it was a more unpretentious affair-"

"This is very simple - let me show you."

They walked together over the little place. Peeped into the neat cottages,saw the school,saw the children at dinner. The rector kept alternately thawing and freezing. He liked the place but he could not rid himself of the uncomfortable feeling. He felt like xxxxxxx tipping his hat to Mary and then reddened at the memory of the impulse.

Yet as he walked slowly,toward the rectory his mind and heart were busy. He began to see a faint light in one dark corner of his soul where there had long lain an unwelcome heaviness. He did not read the passage often but when he di he felt ashamed:"Insomuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren,ye did it unto Me." and had he imagined it?wwas there not at such times an uncomfortable flutter in the well-bred pews of St. ~~Andrews~~ Lukes?

41-5-346

Chapter XXIII.
Mission Work.

It was Wednesday evening,the service had ended and there had been a very fair attendance. Mr. and Mrs.Harrison Coles were out - he a bent and feeble old man of seventy and she a fussy prim little lady of fifty-five,well-preserved and complacent. Her daughter was there too,Mrs.Lloyd-Coles-Jnoes,a talllfair goddess visiting from New York where her artist husband was ~~struggling~~ working on a great magazine: then there was the young widowed ~~Mrs.Reynolds~~ daughter-in-law of John & Martha Reynolds of Utica, the Misses Cox, the dowager Blakesley, Judge Boggs and one or two gentlemen. Yes and back,half hidden by a great shadowy pillar ~~sat~~ and ~~and~~ on either side of it sat two other persons- one was a tall and stately woman,her face rouged dead white,her thin white hair piled high and her dark eyes dreaming beyond the wa ls, beyond the sea. Mrs.Irma Lloyd Jones - one of the Abbeville Lloyds married the late Colonel Jones - you know the story"whispered Miss Adelle Cox,and her guest Miss Cobb of Savannah bent eagerly forward but shrank to find the haughty eyes blazing toward her.

"And does Miss Cobb approve of such attempts at educating Negroes? Mrs Jones was asking coldly. Miss Cobb recovered herself hastily and groped for the thread of the doings. The chest tones of the immaculate rector came to her rescue.

He had called a little after assembly

"Tor the purpose - ah- of considering two missionary enterprises. One was the matter of sending aid to a promising mission in Angola, West Africa. The mission had been very successful during the year. There had been twelve converts, a littl church had been built and it sorely needed a bell. With some desultory comment $200 of mission money had been devoted to bell a nd maintenance. Then it was that the rector had cleared his throat and said:"The other matter lies nearer"he ha thought to say "to our hearts" but thought better and said "to us. It concerns our own colored population"and then heaving a faint warning rattle, he hurried on talking rapidly"after all we owe these people aid and guidance. They are ours, their mistaken emancipation was not their fault but misfortune. If we do not take their training in hand how can we complain if they are mistrained and filled with absurd ambitions and thoughts. My friends the welfare of these dark brothers of ours - for they are our brothers - has long weighed heavily on my soul. Yesterday by accident or by divine guidance I visited the colored school kept by Robert and Mary Calhoun. I was favorably impressed by it and want to help it. I happened to be speaking to my young friend Miss ~~Coit~~ Cobb of Savannah and she was telling me of a similar enterprise in her city-"

41-5-347

"And does Miss Cobb approve of such attempts at educating Negroes?" asked the cold voice of Mrs. Jones.

The Rector scented danger and hastened to explain "Training - training. I should say, rather than education, my dear Mrs. Jones and perhaps I should explain my reference to Miss ~~Coit~~ Cobb. We all know how poorly trained our servants are since the paternal system has been broken. In Savannah as I understaod there is a school supported by the church which is supplying this need of training." Miss ~~Coit~~ Cobb nodded gently.

"And fho will see that the money is properly expended and the teachin properly done?"asked Judge Boggs, with rather labored formenes of speech.

"Well, eventually we should of course have a board of trustees and I had hoped that some of our ladies might help in the teaching at times. The b lk of the routine work would be done by colored teachers."

"Bht wouldn't that involve the training of colored teachers?"

The speaker was a stranger - an old white-bearded man bald with cavernous eyes, and he sat on the side of the pillar opposite Irma Jones. The rector ignored him and after some demur induced the mission society to give $10C to the school on condition that as soon as practical the school be turned over to a board of trustees who would conduct it.

Robert looked at the rector with a puzzled smile as he explaine next day: "I was disappointed when you did not take the Smith School", he said; "the ~~"But our~~ property here is worth at least $500"~~he said~~.

"Yes - I should say so."

we had talked of taking over the Smith School but the project failed. Our duty still awaits us.

"And it has cost us $500 a year to run it."

"$500!!! said the rector "why - why where did you get it?"

"The boarding children pay a dollar a month - all except a few - and the day children pay 25¢ - that amounts to about $300 - the other $200 come from the crops."

"That is better than I expected"said the rector.

"And of course" continued Esbert "I should hardly think it fair to transfer to others the title and control of my own property for the sake of small - pardon me - and not altogether certain support."

The rector was silent and half embarrassed but Robert continued:

"Could we not arrange it this way? Suppose you and two members constitute a committee for the expenditure of such sums as the church contributes and that I expend them as your agent reporting carefully to you and being at all times under your inspection so far as the spending of the money is concerned?"

41-S-348

The rector readily assented,and thus it was that the Rev.St.George Tucker and Robert Calhoun began their friendship. And when two men find each other,and walk together in the golden day and talk amid the shadows of evening,they come to know each other soul and soul despite all the piling barriers men place between. The church stipend gradually increased until it was $500 a year Robert read the Episcopal service in the school and graduallm by studying a few months in the year was raised to the diaconate and built a tiny log church at the edge of the oaks and near the song of the sea. Thus five more years passed by.

But there were those that watched all this jealousy and did not understand what when the Bishop dined with Mrs.Irma Lloyd Jones the subject came up:

"You do not mean to say that a Tucker can so far forget himelf as to receive a Negro as an equal! gasped the Bishop.

"He certinly is giving some ground for the suspicion"said the young Mrs.Reynolds.

The Bishop frowned. "I will speak to him"said he "how about the school?"

."I wisd you would go see the school"said Crs.Jones."my opinion is that much of their time is being given to book study and very little to the training of domestics."

"Suppose we go now"said the Bishop and in a half hour the horses were at the door.

There were seven in Yary's little Latin clas . Two were bright quick sutdents - "John they ought to - they must go up to Columbia to college"she had said that morning. Two others were fair students,earnest pleddders. The other three were poor and on of them - O he was stupid and Mary was in despair over him;he ought not to study more,nut it was hard to discourage him. So Mary sat that morning giving him more of the class time than he deserved and trying O so hard o make him understand,when the door behind opened authoritatively and Mary knew uby the widening eyes of the children that dignitaries were come. She rose with a limp (Oh,the dull grinding pain)and started to ask them to be seated when the Bishop waved his hand "What class is this?!he demanded.

"They are the Seniors- they are having six months of beginners' Latin."

"Latin!"

"Yes,sir."

41-5-349

Mrs.Lloyd Jones smiled "Let us hear this fellow recite"she said. If John's recitation had beenbad before,in his perturbation now it was simply awful. His Latin flew and his Englis took after it. Mary quickly called one of the brightest students,a bright eyed little black girl of 14 - ebut the great eyes of the bishop were too much for her and she stammered looked at Mary in tearful appeal and sat down. Mrs.Jones smiled again. "Is this what we're spending our money for,Robert"she said sharply "to spoil plow boys and serving girls with Latin?"

"I do not think you can judge the school fairly yet"he said quietly "let me call -"

"I want to see the industrial work"said the Bishop peremptorily. They found some girls sewing in the girls' cottage. "How much do you sew a day?"asked Irma.

"An hour Ma'am."

"And the rest of the day?"

"One hour helping in the dining room and kitchen and six hours on our lessons."

"The old lady glanced at the bishop -"Tow against six,"she said.

"It shall be six and two next year" he said decidedly and Robert herad

He found the rector gloomy and taciturn that night when he called and the usual cup of tea was not served.

"I'm afraid that Latin class of yours has played the mischief,Calhoun." It had grown to be "Mr." Calhoun for a year or more back,but now it changed again.

"I am sorry."

"You had better give it up."

"Why?"

"The bishop is determined upon it."

"But you advised it and you have seen the need of the training."

"O I am not criticising the work - only others do not know it as we do."

"Then let them study it and not judge it from a five minutes'look." The rector shrugged his shouldersand said Goodbye coldly when Robert left.

Chapter XXIII.

The ~~Trial.~~ Challenge.

It was the morning of Exhibition day, when the Momm Bett School was to close for the year. Robert was nervous, for this year there was to be a very distinguished audience. The bishop was to be there, and the white dignitaries of the town were to sit in reserved seats in front. Behind would be banked the darger patrons of the school. The graduating class of five sat on the platform of the vestry, but the rest of the school sat banked aloft in the back gallery, whence their clear young voices came rolling down in sweet song upon the audience.

41-5-350

"They will want to hear the slave songs, Mary pick out the best and wierdest."

"They?" answered Mary.

"I mean the white folks."

"Yes but our people want also a glimpse of something else, they yearn for music and they can hardly appreciate their own till they hear some of the world's harmony - I'll tell you what I want to do, Rob - at the end when all is through I want to sing Counod's Sanctus Spiritus with a small chorus of girls - surely no one lan complain of that and the children want to so."

"Well all right" said Robert doubtfully "but don't forget plenty of our own slave songs."

So it happened that all came - the white aristocracy of St. Luke's in half curious patronage led by the Bishop and Mrs. Jones and followed by John Reynolds and Martha. The black village in proud wonder, decked gorgeously, and happy; and the children dark fluttering with giggle and whisper and solemn stare. The graduates sat in one half frightened row below the reading stand and beside them to the left sat Robert in his new deacon's robes. Tears of great happiness were in Mary's eyes as she watched him from the thronged gallery opposite where she had marshaled her little host. On the platform sat the Bishop the rector and Judge Boggs and they whispered together glancing at the black faces.

First there was a slave song "Bright Sparkles." Then the rector prayed for "the least of these our brethren" and there came another slave song. Then a tacl boy, brown and slim arose and recited "The Slave that saved St. Mich aels": the black audience applauded lowly, the white scatteringly. A girl then read an essay on "Napoleon" which smalked of the encyclopedia and made the whites smile and the blacks look mystified. After a simple part song in which all applauded another girl read an essay on "The Faithful Slaves" which the whites applauded generously and the Negroes half-heartily. A boy talked on the "Value of Work" while the Bishop yawned and then came the valedictory. She was the little black girl of the Latin class, small bright eyed and intelligent and her shrinl clear tones roused

and

held the house. The blacks bent forward breathless,clutching the seats. The children back aloft sat silent and wide-eyed,and the whites roused themselves,grew tense rustled in their seats and whispered. The rector looged uncomfortable,the judge seemed amused,but the bishop was angry. It was an essay on "Ambition" - a school girl's effort with many of the usual platitudes and echoes of greater thought,but singularly clear and straight forward. In a white girl's mouth it would have been applauded and expected,but what did this audience think to be told that black boys and girls must "aspire to the highest"that "all things come to those who wait" that "labor conquers all things" that "they should never be content to be mere servants and menials but should aspire to the great things of earth in this land of freedom and opportunity."

"Let us then be up and doing
With a heart for any fate
Still achieving,still pursuing
Learn to labor and to wait"

The still clear little voice of the dark white-frocked girl ceased amid a thunder of applause from the black world and absolute silence from the white. Robert arose with the little bundle of diplomas ,but the Bishop strode forward. "I have wanted to say a word to you black people" he said in sharp forceful tones "and this seems just the place to say it. You have heard this girl"s talk and you have foolishly applauded it. Let me tell you plainly that such talk is silly,wrong and wicked. Yes I repeat it, Wicked. God made you people to occupy a fixed humble place in his universe. To strive to escape from your appointed destiny is impudent blasphemy against his holy unalterable laws. I do not wholly blame you for these foolish thoughts - your false northern friends put them into your heads when they thought by law to make you white. But it was impoooible - you will always be what you are and you must reconcile yourselves to it. Your ambition ought to be to become faithful oervants such as one of these girls spoke of,and humble labsrers. To this end we are going next year to change this school into a more thorougd industrial school. We are going to teach our children to work and not fill their heads with false notions and I want you older people who know that what I say is true,to support our efforts for your weal loyally." He paused. Robert has been sitting ~~down~~ on the platform below him half turned toward him listening with bowed head and trembling hands. What would he do - what could he do? The horrible temptation of cowardice was upon him - he felt a thousand eyes upon him - the wondering eyes of his patrons,the tearful eyes of his little children,the accusing eyes of the white world. If he could sink into the floor -

41-5-351

if he could fly into the outer air - if he could -but he could not. He must and would speak - he knew it,he felt it. He could scarce realize how he dared and yet he knew he did dare - he knew that before these rulers of the village,before these parents and children he was going to speak the faith that was in him if it killed him;that he was going to answer the Bishop. He wondered at his own voice when he heard it - it was so round and full and clear,no steady,when his whole soul was trembling and the audience was qiuvering with him:

"Revered father in God"he said "for t e thoughts this child of mine has spoken ,for the ambition knitting in these dark heart do not blame these people - blame me. I have taught I have sought io inspire them, I have tried to stir them from the sluggish depths of their lives up to the fullness of their o portunities. I have done so,and forgive me,Sir, but I shall continue to do so. so long as there is breath in this body I shall speak unto the children of Is ael that they go forward. A shall tell my people you are God's children - whatever men may aspire,you may aspire for you are men. Be ambitious,try to rise,try to be just as useful,wise and great as you God -given powers will let you. This I have taught my people and my children,reverend father,and this by God's grace,I will continue to teach them as long as he gives me life and strength."

41-5-352

He turned and stripping off his robe laid it silently at the prelatess feet and then clasping his hands priest-wise before him he walekd with bowed head silently toward the door. A husd fell on the people like the trembling of a mighty hand;the rector half arose -the bishop stepped back from the mute dead robe as from a stricken thing and the blood roared in his head,while the little valedictorian bowe d her head and wept.

And suddenly above the throng rose one clear voice and voices:"Sanctus Spiritus" it cried,and again higher ,clearer "Sanctus spiritus". The slowly moving figure of the unfrocked deacon raised his head and his eyes met the wild tear swept eyes of the singer as the third wail higher sweeter rolled aloft

"Sanctus spiritus."

And then in a great wave of music swelled and the thrilling majesty of Gounod's great prayer-song,swinging in the air as the black man walked out into the free sunshine and into Peace.

The people listened motionless-sighed and then the rector glancing toward the Bishop's vacant chair heistated forward and said with low voice and raised hands:

"The peace of God,which passeth all understanding keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." And the moving host murmured slowly "Amen."

The Judge Boggs ~~was~~ thought Bishop & he furious: "The damned impudent nigger"he hissed "he ought to be horse whipped and I've a notion to do it." Mrs. Baxter too was inexpressibly ~~mex~~ shocked "To insult the bishop too -he's a dangerous pestilential fellow and must ne gotten rid of - indeed,my dear Mrs.Jones,it's just such men that ruin the docility of our Negroes" but Mrs.Jones did not answer,and in her face sat a perplexed half-angry wonder - a creeping gnawing doubt.

The bishop had gone to the ante-room and greeted no one. He looked dreamily out the golde colored glass until slowly the people had gone and only the quivering dust motes danced in the vestry room. Then the bishop retureed thoughtfully pacing up and down. The rector watched him silently with twitching face and far back in the church the black janitor watched them both. Slowly the bishop turned and saw the rector He smiled; he said:

"I have had a vision."

The rector started to answer vaguely,but the bishop went to wdere the deacon's robe lay folded and picked it up and handed it to the rector. And then e placed his hands on the rectors' shoulders and said:

"St.Cesrge,I have seen a man!"

And the rector bowed his head and was silent.

41-5-353

Chapter XXV.

Bribery

Mrs.Grimes was obdurate and on the whole the board sympathized with her point of view,despite the pleading of a few staunch friends of the late Silena Smith. It was in Canaan amid the same old and ever young hills, where Mrs.Grimes,formerly Mrs.Clennworth ten years ago before. had made her luxurious summer home since her daughter married. Her gables and faultless lawns spread over Martha Reynold's father's acres and the well-preserved lady who acknowledged to a half century of life and might easily have claimed more was an assiduous and liberal member of the Mission Society in the Episcopal church. They had formerly given to Silena's school as a matter of course but when she died they had ceased. Now a new call for this school which was revived under a new principal,Robert Calhounhad come and Mrs.Grimes objected.

"What's the name of it?"she asked sharply,being quite unknown ts herself a little hard of hearing -"the Momm Bett School?" What an outlandish name - O yes,I've haerd of this school from my daughter- well I object. I do not expect personally to helf any further school or schemes to make the Negroes discontented. They nede to learn to wsrk and be clean and save. My ideas of Negroes have changed in the last years. I seriously doubt if they will ever reach a very high plane of civilization. They can hope possibly to make a good contented laboring class,if properly trained and guided. As it is we are educating murderers and rapists - " and then Mrs.Grimes with trembling voice told of the wanton murder of her son-in-law and added "Only the quick arrival of the police saved my daughter from a worse fate,and - it may be wicked but I am glad they burnt the brute." A murmur of sympathy was heard.

"But this school seems to be doing srme good," timidly suggested another woman. Mrs.Grimes shook her head emphatically.

41-S-354

"I know all about the school" she said "this Robert Calhoun is a dangerous type of Negro and one bound to give the country trouble. He is continually talking of his rights and trying to teach the pickaninnies to read the ten commandments in Hebrew before they can practice them in English."

"Moreover"said a bright little woman(she was Miss Mackay and her father had owned formerly half of the Clennworti-mackay Plantations)"the best class of white people in the place do not approve of this school and that to me is decisive. My brother has just gone they to xxxxx manage the mills and so I have reliable testimony. It is foolish for us to think all southerners are wrong if white,nd right if black. Here are good Christian people - as good as we are or better - who believe that this young man is doing positive harm with the school in its present condition. I think that settles the matter."

"I don't" said an old white bearded old man with burning eyes who had wandered into the meeting,apparently unaware that it was xxxxxxxxxx primarily a woman's meeting. "I don't" said he in a deep musical voice. "I know that the Grimes-Reynolds factories passed their last dividends" (Mrs.Grimes pursed her lips and raised her lorgnette)"and that Negro labor in the south is far from what it ought to be and yet - yet I am unwilling to vote away the aspirations of any man on the bare word of another without pretty thorough investigation. I believe Negroes are Men. I want them to have a man's chance. This they have never had. Why not send a disinterested person to investigate the situation preety thoroughly before deciding?"

But Mrs.Grimes was obdurate and the Misson Society turned to the consideration of the new Italian Colony near Canaan. Here again Mrs. Grimes as usual occupied the xxxxx floor.

"I do not approve" she announced "of the workers in this new-fangled settlement. Some of their teaching is distinctly dangerous and socialistic Last a Miss - Somebody - black Italian looking woman whom they call - what is it?"

"Sister [redacted]"supplied Miss Mackay.

"Yes - well she made a talk about the rights of laborers and the

And too at this moment a nurse arrived with Mrs. Grimes grandson and the whole club forgot the stranger and his words. The child was a boy black haired and foreign-looking.

"From his great-grandfather, y Alvarez, who was a Spanish grandee you know" explained Mrs. Glennworth, and the assembly cooed over the silent boy of nine like that was positively anarchistic."

Finally

"She was sent from some New York settlement because she could speak Italian and she's doing wonderful.work in teaching, nursing and sewing - I hope - "

But Mrs.Grimes interrupted "The best thing to do with these Italians is to get rid rf them. Now I will tell you confidientially that Judge Boggs who has charge of my property in the south and Mr.Mackay the brother of our secretary have a plan of importing Italian labor into South Carolina to replace the shiftless Negroes. Our plan is to transfer this troublesome Canaan colony to Wilton Point."

41-5-355

The Mission society was enthusiastic at this bit of news.

"I broached this matter to the settlement folks and this Sister What - you - may-call-her was most insulting in her remarks. But as the settlement depends very largely on my subscription I oather expect they'll come to my way of thinking" and Mrs.Grimes smiled complacently.

Chapter XXVI.
The Strike.

Robert Calhoun was facing the grimmest struggle of his life, in this the tenth year of his work. To his surprise the Bishop had not dismissed him from his deaconate, nor had the trustees of the church funds immediately dropped his school. Yet he had been informed that the $500 appropriation would be cut to $100 the next year,and he knew that after that his little school would be left to shift for itself. In the white community about the bitterness and prejudice toward him redoubled in intensity. White visitors no longer came to the school,store-keepers refused him credit and cheated him. The anger toward him was especially wreaked on his helpless constituents;some lost their employment because they sent their children to him,some were scolded and threatened some had their wages lowered;new "jim-crow" laws were broached and wholesale Negro disfranchisement was changed from practice to law just as soon as the fear of government intervention was removed. Worst of all Robert saw that secretly but irresistibly every chance every avenue by which black men were likely to get any sure economsc foothold or earn decent incomes were being shut off. Not only was this true at Wilton Point - he heard of it everywhere throughout the south. Was it the work of some dark secret agency? Some great organized propaganda working for the same ends that the White Camelia and the Golden Circle had worked in other days ? He had heard dark hints of those names and deeds from his father. He believed the Ku Klux Klan was the same movement in other guise and he felt that today new underground deviltry of the same kind had its unholy grip upon the fair throat of the south.

Wilton Point had long been prosperous. It was a railway & shipping centre. It had cotton mills and other manufactures. Yet none of this prosperity came to the Negro. Poor whites from the hills came trooping down ind filled the mills and Robert hated them for it. Only the lowest drudgery and menial work was left to the Negro and that was wretchedly underpaid. Even the profits on raising cotton and food supplies that belonged of right to the Negro went into the pockets of the merchants and middlemen who stood banded together for the one purpose of cheating Negroes as Robert bitterly complained.

41-5-350

Yet there were some faint gleams of promise. The high tide of prosperity had passed, and fages were falling. The women and children of the cills working 12 and 14 hours a day were grumbling audibly and emissaries from the northern trade unions were flitting among them. Rumors of strikes and disorders filled the air and only this very morning a slouching committee of poor whites had been to Judge Bogg's office and had a long talk.

After they were gone the Judge talked with John Reynolds and then called in the new young manager, Mr. Mackay.

"Mackay, if we aint damned careful we'll have a strike on our hands"

"It looks that way - and my northern stockholders are continually yelling for more dividends - Boggs, we can't afford to have a strike, I tell you."

"Well, that's my - who's this?"

Robert Calhoun entered the office. Mackay started to offer him a seat but Boggs scowled.

"Well?" he asked gruffly.

Robert plunged straight into his message.

"Gentlemen, your hands are threatening to strike right here in your busy season. Why not put Negroes in their places?"

Boggs stirred impatiently but Mackay bent forward. Robert continued:

"Now I'm not asking this on the ground of charity or philanthropy but for our mutual advantage. We want work. You want reliable labor Now if you will take the boys and girls trained in my school - not the ignorant rabble, but those intelligent young people, in a few months they can carry on the mills and in a few years they'll form the best skilled labor in the country."

The two white men looked at each other.

"Drop in again tomorrow,Calhoun,"said Boggs and closed the door after him.

"Fell?f asked Mackay.

"Won't do "said Boggs;first place we'd have a race riot and in the second place who'd raise the cotton and do the common labor? It would send wages of day labor from 50¢ to $1 a day in six months and ruin the Niggers. Ahey'll get uppish,want to get out of their places and be white folks. No it won't do yet,we may have to come to it sometime,but not yet - moreover I've got a better plan" and he drew Mrs.Grimes' letter from his pocket.

"My plan is this;yield to these fellows now;bring in the Italians gradually;they are docile,kind of Nigger anyway,when we get enough smack down the wages and tell those who want to quite to go to hell."

"Good"said Mackay and within a week the first load of Italians landed in Charleston enroute for Wilton Point.

Months rolled by and the Italian colony grew until fully half the factory hands were foreigners. Then suddenly came a 14% cut in wages. A wave of anger and amazement burst over the Italians. They showed their contracts,they recalled the promises made them.they jabbered and gesticulated but Mr.Mackay was dumb and Mr.Boggs shifted his cigar and said:

"O go to hell!"

John Reynolds went to Florida for his health.

Meetings were held and the Italians and poor whites met and talked together. For a week they talked and talked and then a last one morning Mary listened as she came out of the school house - "The mills"she said "Robert I do not hear the whirr (Ah!the whirr of the Pain,the grinding pain) of - of the mills?"

4-5-357

Robert listened too. The great mills lay quiet. Two thousand workers had struck.

Chapter XXVII

Sister Katharine ~~The Black Man's Chance.~~ [redacted]

"Who is she"cried Robert angrily " why,sister, it's the black man's chance. They have tried to get more Italians but the Italians won"t come The whites won't work. They've asked us. I can get 500 young people in a week. Think of it! the industries of Wilton Point will be ours. The school will be saved - supported willingly out of their earnings."

"I know it,Robert, it seems (the Pain,the low swift Pain) -ah- so clear until now and yet she says 'Are you who have just been slaves going to make slaves of your brother workmen? Are you going to be the clubs wherewith the organized exploiters of the south will beat their laborers into submission and starvation wages? Is this the spirit of Christ? Do you really think the southern black man will ever rise by tramping the poor white underfoot any more than the poor white can climb to glory on black men's bones?'"

"But who is she?"interrupted Robert "and what business has she to interfere."

"Sister - Sister Katharine -she signs herself - she had been a teacher and settlement worker among these Italians."

"Some foreign intermeddler who is afraid that these Italians won't get a chance to exploit the poor black man, just as other nations have - no sister, I am going to do it."

Slowly secretly he gathered his men.

"It's the chance of your lives"said Mackay "here are guns - now if you folks are not cowards you'll go to work and hold your places."and Robert shut his teeth grimly.

But the letters kept coming now from Canaan - then from New York at last from the Italian settlement at Beaufort. At first Robert answered brusquely, and irritably then the earnestness of the pleading, the culture and gentleness of the writer caught his attention. He grew to lingering over the letters, studying the hand writing and thinking of the woman. She was evidently an educated woman, well born and well read, trained in heart and soul - her touch was sure and quick and ever courteous suggesting things she did not say. So for two weeks they talked together by mail.

41-5-358

"We have a right to use our cheapness as a weapon to get bread and butter"wrote Robert hotly.

"Is it not a two-edged sword?"suggested Sister Katharine

"If it is, they forged it and will suffer with us" he replied.

"They?oh,no! Not these men not even their fathers -it was the master not the poor whites.-"

"But we need the aid of the capitalist"he insisted turning the argument.

"So do all poor workingmen, black and white."

"And now that organized capital is giving us our chance we can not refuse."

"You can refuse to join oppressors in oppression at any price."

"But these workers oppress and hate us as well."

"Is that excuse for hating in turn? Does hating pay?"

"Their unions bar us from work"insisted Robert doggedly.

"Then force your way up, - up not down."

"Good!that is what we are doing."

"But must you not be careful of the sort of force you use?"

"Work is war."

"Even in war, thought and justice count."

"If we do not force out these foreigners they will take ~~xxxxxx~~ the bread from our children.

On the contrary welcome the foreigner, he will transform the south with law and order and justice."

"Is it right to throw away the advantage we now have?"

"Yes for the sake of a larger advantage to come."

So they argued writing, until one day a letter came to Mary, saying "I have comn to Beaufort - there is much sickness here among the poor Italians and I am helping. Will you not come over tomorrow and see how things really are?"

It was afternoon when Robert and Mary sat out. Robert was thoughtful and Mary limped painfully. The great red mills still sat in grim silence but within Boggs was rubbing his hands.

"We expect 500 Niggers tonight at midnight; tomorrow the machinery starts - then see the dagoes and crackers run for their jobs."

Along the road that led up to town from the plantations lurked grim yellow faced men, hugging their rifles and watching for the black scabs. Just at the edge of town they halted Robert, but Mary showed Sister Katherine's ~~Hilda~~'s letter and they passed in. The town was bare and still. Coarse pale faces glanced here and there from the windows, and then a child ran toward them. It was white and Robert turned from it as he turned from all things ~~pale~~ white, but the child came nearer - pale, blue and scrawny, half clad, its great eyes were staring, and it cried: "Bread!"

41-S-359

Robert stopped and something choked in his throat

"Mary" he said slowly "go on I - I ' m going back. You must stay here all night if possible."

"But I wanted the lady to see you so Robert."

"Yes - yes, tell her I'm coming back - tonight.-"

Mary started -"with the workmen?"

"Yes" he said "but ~~without guns~~ with bread - not guns"

Up the crooked dirty street the black girl limped (ah, the Pain- the tired, tired pain) until at last she came to the house. she stood a moment panting by the door, then ~~turned -started in amazement gave a little joyous sob and cried:~~

~~"Hilda - O my Hilda."~~

~~Long hours they sat together.~~

~~"I knew the race would puzzle you - the Italians pronounced it so and it saved time when I worked with them to spell it that way - but~~ Mary hardly listened.

~~"Forgive me, Hilda, O forgive me - I did not know you loved him I did not dream it until long after when we had lost you."~~

"You must my friend,not in your hot zeal for your own life's problems forget or belittle the problems of humanity the world over or be willing to settle your own difficulties by increasing the difficulties of your fellow men. The Negro problem is simply the labor prob e m masked. What solves one solves the other."

He had seen suffering - he had looked into the eyes of death. He knew of hate and - ah,dear God!- of love. But here was something new. Here sat Hunger,naked and unashamed. The cry for food was in the air,it was stamped on the grim face of the men,and the shrunken breasts of the women,and it was written across the tiny pinched visages of the children.

"Robert came part way, Hilda, and he has returned. He will come again. You have converted him, Hilda."

The tears gathered in Hilda's eyes and Mary turned suddenly toward her.

"Hilda" she said "you must know Robert [redacted] - he is so noble, so good. I- I- oh, I wish Hilda you could like him—"

She paused in half confusion and Hilda, her face half-hidden in the curtains of the window cried:

"Hark!"

A man was running rapidly across the street. There came a low sharp whistle and another ran rapidly after him, his rifle gleaming in the moonlight- then another and another until the streets were full of flying armed men. The women hastened down to the ~~town~~ door.

41-5-30

"What is it" cried Hilda.

"The Niggers are coming" ~~he~~ one answered and rushed on.

A determined look came into Hilda's great eyes. She gathered up her skirts. "Mary stay here quietly-"

But Mary said "I cannot- I will not" and together they hastened after the crowd. At the far end of the town where the formless factories threw their mysterious shadows, kneeled motionless a thousand grim armed men. Far down the road rolled a dark object. Nearer and nearer, larger and larger it loomed.

"It's them " whispered somebody and a thousand rifles clicked.

The line of wagons drew slowly on.

"Halt!"

They stood and there was a flickering of white cloth in the foremost.

The men went forward. There were low voices, - a silence, a confused hoarse cheer - that rose gathered and swelled to a great cry:

"Bread, brothers, bread."

And the crowd swayed and trembled, the women sobbed and above the throng rose the wailing of hungry children. Through the town the laden wagons rolled and the black riders doled out food to the surging pushing mass. Hilda strained her eyes until she saw Robert in the foremost wagon. Then she silently fell back into the shadows. Mary saw him too, and she turned to Hilda and saw the look in Hilda's eyes, ~~she~~ spoke timidly "Hilda, is he not good and true?"

"The best and truest of men" said Hilda gently.

Mary started: "Hilda, somehow I always think of you and Robert together. He speaks of you so tenderly. He took my picture of you and put it in his study. And then the letters of Sister Katharine touched another side of him as I thought then but the same responsive soul as I see it now. O Hilda, I want you to like him."

"I do like him, Mary."

"Hilda" she continued hesitatingly yet eagerly, biting back the pain: "I am sick but Robert does not know it. Yet I know it. I know that the time hastens when I shall take a great journey to some fair painless land, and but for one thing I would go gladly, so gladly, for I am tired, Hilda. Yet I cannot bear to leave Robert alone. Robert needs love. There are silent chords in his life that I have never touched. You can, Hilda, I feel it, I know it. I know he would love you if he knew you as I do. Hilda have you ever thought you might sometime - love a man like Robert?

And Hilda answered very softly, very slowly.

"Yes, Mary, I have sometimes thought - I could."

And Mary went for joy, all the long night as they lay in each other's arms.

Over the great white sea struggled the day and the tired watchers in the mill saw surrender written in the dawn.

Boggs was lived with anger and he cursed with every oath he knew.

"Damn their black souls" he hissed "I'll never hire another Nigger as long as I live."

"Yes you will too" growled Mackay as he returned from a parley with the strikers.

"What?"

"Yes you will- the crackers have tacked another item on their demands: they want Niggers hired in the spinning room."

Boggs rushed out to the strike committee.

"Look here!" he yelled "do you know what you're doing? Haven't you got daughters working in the mills?"

"Yes, my Sal works there" drawled the spokesman.

"Well do you want your daughter to marry a Nigger?"

"Well n, I ain't a-hankering after that."

Then she left Hilda all the cold of the ten years - the struggle & strife, the trouble & discontent long hours they talked, and Hilda questioned eagerly and would not leave of the cold. At last Mary

41-5-361

"Well then what'll you do when these Niggers get to earning as much as you do and feeling themselves just as good as you?"

"Well"said the man reflectively "if one of them asks her I'll just tell Sal to say 'no'".

Chapter XVII.

The Beginning.

41-5-362

The deed was done. It had been full easy with the kindest hearted of all God's races to turn fighting into pity,saving into charity. But after all this,what? Robert was walking alone between midnight and dawn in the Valley of the Shadow. Yes,yes it was right,it was noble,it was Christ-like and yet he saw the looming wrong on the horizon,the ignoble struggle with poverty and want and the unchristian grinding down of those who hadthis day made themselves helpless. It was as it ever was in his hard hard life,

Again he had done his duty and again the grey hard bitter world stretched before him. What would his poor people live on next winter, now that they were giving their all away? In his pocket lay a summons to the last meeting of his trustee board. He knew what would happen - yes - yes - and then? What would happen? Would the school close

No! He clenched his fists. He would not give up. He would not yield -he would never cease fighting the red injustice of this awful world so long as there was a breath of life left in his body. And he lifted his face to the stars and swore to God in the great white midnight never to falter, never to yield.

All night he walked. He knew they would tempt him at that board meeting. He must not give in - he must think and plan; and all night he walked and planned until his head whirled and pulses. He did not go home best something should break his determination, but walked straight to the vestry room.

He found gathered there in the rectory, the Bishop and the rector, the principal of the white school and an old bald and grey bearded man, with great soft eyes whom he seemed dimly to remember. Robert entered bowed silently and stood a while until the rector bethought himself and offered a chair. The old man glanced about thoughtfully and spoke:

41-5-363

"As I have said, Bishop, I am willing to devote $10,000 a year to this work during my life and to endow it liberally when I die. My only condition is that the sum be equally divided between a white and Negro school"

The Bishop bowed ~~cautiously~~ "We are certainly indebted to your great generosity and will endeavor to use the trust for the advancement of God's work - Mr. Patterson can you tell us of your plans?" The white principal explained at length. There was a pause. The Bishop turned "Mr. Calhoun" he said "Will you now kindly tell us of any plans you have?"

Robert started but rose and said :"I thank you but I came here merely to say that I have decided to withdraw my school from your control and to try and support it by my own efforts."

The bishop frowned "And why?" he asked.

"Because" said Robert "my ideas of what a Negro school should be differ so much from your that I could not conscientiously carry out your ideas."

"Could you carry out your own?"

"I could try Sir, and I'm going to try."

The bishop rose and Robert with a sigh bent for his hat.

"Then sir" said the bishop "Try - I say frankly that I do not believe the Negro race is ready for your ideas or capable of rising to them. We may differ as to Negroes, my son, but we do not differ as to men and God forbid that I should ever place my ignorance of divine wlans in the way of the aspirations of any human soul. Mr. Brown, your other $500C will by our advice go to Mr. Calhoun's school." And then instead of warm words of thanks, instead of a courteous speech, instead even of a silent bow, Robert stood awkward and speechless and great tears gathered and rolled down his cheek.s

He rushed homn to tell Mary and then with swelling heart heard of the opening for black workmen in the mills. Reverently he kissed his sister and turning toward his little study entered and closed the door.

It was Sunday and the service was done. Robert had read the wonderful 53rd chapter of Isaiah and preached from the text "The Chariots of the Lord and the horsemen thereof."; he had greeted the people all save Irma Lloyd-Jones and her little golden haired grand-daughter. They had shrunk away before the sermon was done. One other stranger he had noted too, but she had gone. He turned to the little vestry of his chapel and stood a moment looking out: the long low ~~thrxxx~~ luring horizon that lined the west lay all lurid with the sun, he closed the door quickly and sat down alone. Yes he was happy - happy at last he said, staring vacantly across the narrow room ~~was he happy~~ till his eyes rested on Hilda's picture and then with a groan he bowed his head in his hands and ~~xxxxxx~~ moaned:

"Hilda!"

And as he called her ~~suddenly~~ softly the door flew ~~softly~~ open and again the flood of warm sunshine bathed his head. He raised his eyes slowly, wearily. The sun was drifting in in fading glory and, dyed in it crimsons rays lithe and glorious, stood a shadow. His heart stopped still. Yes it was Hilda - the vision of Hilda, and he sat motionless lest it fly. Then he caught his breath - no - no it was not Hilda - the witching roundness of her form was gone. - There were grey strands in these bronzen curls, there were lines in the golden face and shadows beneath the eyes. It was - it was not a vision of the past - It was Hilda - the real Hilda flesh and Blood, the Hilda of Ten living Years and he rose dizzily from his chair, stretched his arms and tried to speak - came swiftly to her and wound his arms about her - kissed the coiling curling of her hair, hungered into the misty depths of her dark eyes and whispered "The chariot -the chariots of the Lord and the Horsemen thereof!"

A great song arose. High above in the dim crimsoned chapel sat Mary her fingers straying idly - lovingly over the keys of the organ, her ears listening, her eyes wandering over the shadowy landscape toward the west and toward the east. Westward the sun was dying, eastward the nearer sea lay foaming white, but the sea beyond glowed with the echo of the sun. Suddenly

4-36-5-14

The world seemed rent with happiness - he could not bear it somehow and a great Peace came hovering over all her Pain - a foreshadowing of the great painles s Peace to c,me. The organ rose in fuller music and she sang gently,clearly,then in deeper,grnater tones,till the song rose and swept like some full plumaged bird:

"I know my mother will be there
"In that beautiful world on high."

Far down in the rice fields a weary laborer caugh the melody and oent the mighty singing onward with his great voiced lungs - far up in the cotton fields a weary mother clutched her dying child and singing,lifted her eyes up to the stars - and so voice on voice took the refrain until all a long the lowlands and above the wide dark waters,a great song arose.

41-S-365

Below the lovers listening clasped their hands,and together they walked down the world and toward the blazing sea. Above them hung the sound of the song of the sister's singing:within them thrilled the chords of endless Love and Work;Beyond them surged the mighty chorus of the sea - and all was peace and joy and hope - - save where an old way-weary man reeled onward to his death - save there where sat a woman's startled soul, starin white faced at the white faced sea.

41-5-366

The Prophecy.

In the world was silence. The cold earth glared upon the full red passion of the moon and the long seas that lipped the feet of Thunder Cape lay white as glass. Upon the topmost brow of land stood an old man his grey hair streaming toward his knees, his hands outstretched, his eyes searching the south, while at his feet an aged restless hound whimpered and whined. The first vigor of spring lay in the air and the last great fading snow drift was melting where the hound crept. Out of the south sailed a shadow ship. A great corpse lay in its bow shrouded with a black pall and over it a woman watche, staring white-faced at the white faced sea. In her eyes lay trouble and bitterness and fear- until she spied the mighty figure on Thunder Cape and then she rose and stretched her arms and cried -"Not by might nor by power but by my spioit saith the Lord."

The eyes of the old man softened. She looked at him fearfully. "Who - "Who are thou, Master" she said.

He answered. "I am the Wandering of the years, the Soul that makes Change changeless, Aspirition choked in Sin, yet striving, passion-otssed striving, toward Good. I am he that has faced Age and lived, and Life is Age." And then bending he whispered "Who art thou, child?"

She said "I am Love choked in Scorn."

He replied "No longer - Look!" and lo! the spirit of the Lord was moving upon the waters and the cold earth was softening to summer singing. It came as a wondrous glowing beneath the high curving of heaven's dome, and out of the glory moved a woman black-faced and splendid, clad in mighty garments, and her ~~xxxx~~ mien was the mien of the Mother of God but her face was the face of Mary.

The eyes of the white faced woman softened with reverence and love. She bowed before the Angel of the Lord, and bowing, bent and creeping kissed the hem of the passing garments, while at her feet the hound fell dead.

And a great song arose.

Finis

Book 1 pp. 1-6, 13-48

"Scorn" — A Romance

ENGLISH BOND

41-5-44

SCORN

A Romance

by

W.E.Burghardt DuBois

Author of "The Souls of Black Folk."

41-5-1

-E.H.-

41-5-2

"Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly,nor standeth in the way of sinners,nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful."

Psalms,I,1.

-E.S.-

The Portent.

On the long shadowed way beside the waters of the Great Lakes walked an old and weary man. He was thin, dark and wrinkled with long white curled hair/- homely and forbidding save for the wonderful gleaming of his deep set eyes. As he caught at last the blue sheen of Lake superior and its great guardian cape his eyes flashed, and waving his hand to the southward, he clamored painfully to the crest of Thunder Cape, and seated himself with a sigh, beholding the land. The sun dipped westward but the old man sat in silence, his white head between his knees, and only now and then did he stretch his great arms in half fierce weariness, crying: "What shall it mean, O God, what shall this land mean?"

41-5-3

There came a light crackling of twigs in the forest to his right, and turning quickly he spied a tall and powerful stranger: his hair was flaming red, his face waxen white, strained and nervous with inspent energy, and riotous strength.

"The power of him" mused the white haired man -"So walked Rameses among tie towers of Thebes; so I remember Hannibal on the hills round Rome", and then, aloud:

"A weary day, neighbor."

The stranger halted half suspiciously, l oked this way and that and then full in the face of the speaker.

"Have you come far?"

"Out of the North" the stranger answered sullenly, and the old man added:

"Over the iron ice and cold white land, through the spitting of winds, and the strength-"

The young giant whirled and stretched his mighty arms:

"See" he said "I am strong -was yours the voice that called me?"

"Yes - yes" said the old mna with a tremor. "I called for Might and Power - "

The man laughed and shook his arms.

"Here I am" he said.

The old man pointed silently westward, where a canoe came shooting over the waters. In its bow stood an Indian, tall graceful and brown,swaying with the paddle. Ever and again he whirled to watch the clouds,listen to the wild fowl or whistle to the fish. When at last his canoe like a circling bird leapt lightly on the rocky promontory,he sauntered slowly upward crying"Good evening" with singular courtesy,and a rare smile. that lighted his beautiful face.

"Peace be unto you and the blessing of the death of day"said the old man kindly,waving his hand toward his other guest. The two younger men stared at each other but coldly,the brofn man lowing slightly,the other not at all.

"Let us eat,father,"said the Indian,"see I have brought flesh and fish". The little fire curled and crackled and the three sat silently about it eating.

"A wierd waste yonder"said the old man looking southward.

"A marvel of beauty"returned the Indian,but the stranger muttered "Strength of the Strong."

41-5-4

"Here the drama of the world will play itself again"continued the elder.

"Why?"asked the Indian dreamily.

"How"echoed the stranger,quickly.

The old man bending forward waved his hands above the smoking embers,chanting slowly. They flashed and flared,and then suddenly out of the surrounding night a woman's form seemed to gather itself with a certain sinuous writhing. She stepped so suddenly and silently among them that the two younger men leapt to their feet with half - uttered salutations. She was a tall woman with eyes of pitiless beauty. Yet her face was too strong to be beautiful and her skin was of such steely whiteness that it glittered in the twilight. She neither writhed nor crept and yet the undulation of her walking suggested both as she stepped between the younger men and turning to the northerner said with quiet yet bitter scorn:

"Again,O mine enemy?"

He seemed surprised,bewildered,as if catching wainly at some fleeting mists of memory,but the old man said simply-

"You are weary,sister,sit and eat "

She sat silently at meat eating little her back to the north where the fiery west met the black east,like the warring of hate and ignorance,with her scornful face between.

A fascination had stolen over the Indian as the shadowy woman came,yet he did not look at her,but stood rigidly watching the old man's hands still waving over the blue and flickering flame. His quick ears caught the distant melody before the others'. And he peered wonderingly into the south. The far off singing echoed vaguely in the dying day,now here,now there. Then the echo seemed to sing nearer,nearer,clearer,higher until a burst of rich full melsdy trembled on the waters,and a slight white clad form swept like a mist up from the lake,singing. he seemed but a girl,thin and fragile and in the coiled white folding of her drapery,her face shone black. Then as she came nearer,her countenance grew darkly luminous,and soft like nightfall. She glided to the old man's feet and snestled there,while he stroked her dark close-curled head sorrowfully. The sun flaming about her lighted and haloed her garments,and her thin clasped hands.

41-5-5

The northern stranger rose impatiently shuddering with the chill of the night -

"When do we go?"he asked.

"At sunset"said the old man.

"And where?"

"Into the South"

"And why?"

"To see the passing of the Lord"said the old man solemnly. The other man gestured impatiently,the Indian startled,and the tall woman smiled and looked disdainfully at tie bowed head of the girl;but the old man raised his finger: "Here,here a hundred thousand years ago", he said "the Lord passed by:and a mighty wind shook loose the marvellous mantle of the ice till it slipped silently down and covered the face of the earth and the land lay white and dead;but the Lord was not in the wind; ten thousand years aog the Lord passed by and a great earthquake rent the bosom of the inland seas;Niagara leapt forth stormy and Missouri kissed the mountains and the gulf;but the Lord was not in the earthquake. Yonder a thousand years hence the fire of war and rapine shall shake the nation and madden mad men- but God is not in the scorn of battle. And then" he bent lovingly above the silent form of the girl"in years and years to come - a still,small voice- "and his tones died away.

"Hark"cried the Indian starting forward.

"Hark"cried the old mna struggling to his feet with blanched face.

"Hark" roared the great voice of the northern stranger as the full baying of the hound struch on the ears of all --"Hither Chrysus, good Chrysus"he cried again and again,until howling adn crashing through the underbrush a great hound shot out of the forest - a blond and grey-eyed hound,with great curved back,thin legs and shifty eyes. Eagerly restlessly he crept about the feet of the manrnosing the ground,whining,searching,searching. In the eyes of the old mna lay faer and loathing. Twice he raised his hand,twice let it fall, and then the hound sniffing the air shot downward toward the water. As he went baying the last rays of the sun shot up and they heard the grating of a keel. The ship was long and low and dark,with great dim sails. Silently the tall,steelfaced woman glided down and stood in the prow peering eagerly southward. The northern stranger followed stumpling over the whining leaping hound, watching the sinuous form of the woman. The dark faced girl crouched unnoticed by the tiller,while the Indian sauntered forward and backward watching the dying sun.

41-5-6

Above the old mna sat,his head between his knees. The waves waited in the north,the sea glowed red. Silently the ship strated southward and the wind sang in its sails.

The Council of the Ungodly

Chapter I

The Hunt

It was in 1815. Three horsemen were riding toward the sea along the lowlands of Carlin one fair October morning. The waters basked daidly in the sunlight and the tawny land lay dead and sombre all about until back of the riders it died toward the invaded north. Something had been said — something slightly unforward, as that conversation lagged there slipped away into silence. Straightway there thoughts drifted apart like three wayward streams, the one moving unmolested, the other strong, swift and powerful, and the last slipping in gentle silvery curves, now here, now there.

Her horse stepped nervously tossing his head but the lady sat staring coldly at the river; her sinuous form curved forward. Her hair was dark, her eyes grey, and her face was not beautiful, but severe and regular. Her eyes were full of scorn and a certain pitiless beauty and within her tightly compressed lips her teeth were squeezing the flesh steadily. On the yellow waters yonder she saw poverty brooding, poverty and a flat aimless hum-drum life; she was fighting the fate bitterly, yet helplessly, and she tossed her hands wearily and turned her head toward the right.

The man here had just joined them + was riding a little ahead and half-consciously was cutting

41-5-7

~~tore~~ the weeds cruelly with his riding whip and chewing his tobacco with a quick movement. His legs were long and thin but from his hips up he was massively built and his rough red face was carved in mighty lineaments of uncurbed power. He was peering keenly forward into the patches of yellok corn and white cotton, where the backs of black slaves swayed dimly in the distance, Niggers! yes, Nigggers! that was the secret, Niggers and more land, the stretching of great fields south and west and the driving of black brawn across its bosom - ah with slaves and land and a wife with blood in her veins, by God! he would be senator, governor - what not? Yes he must marry this girl, and he set his jaw squarely.

Then he looked round at her suddenly but she was looking at Harrison Coles riding on her left and in her eyes lay a kind of impatient curiosity. The young man was daintily built and his face darkly beautiful with curly black locks and waxen smoothness of skin. His eyes were dreaming afar, beyond the land beyond the sea - there where the gleaming white sky just kissed the ~~sinuous~~ waters. His hands hung idly and on his lips wavered faintly bit of song, a wierd Negro ditty. The n suddenly feeling her eyes upon h im he said:

"I wonder what lies there just beyond the shadow of the world."

The woman puckered her under lip carelessly. "My lot is cast this side" she said "among lazy Negroes and red mud."

"And yet Miss Lloyd," said Henry Jones the other rider, "a combination of these two things, mud and Niggers, will yet make us the richest and most powerful - "

"O B've heard that" she returned impatiently "I've heard that since

While a great hound lean and light wheeled about his horses forelegs

I was a mewling baby and yet every day the mud is thicker, the Negroes lazier and the people poorer."

"Only the sun and sea are true and beautiful" said Coles lightly.

"And they might be improved" said she as she adjusted her hat against the light and turned away from the flat monotony of the cotton fields.

"But the change is coming, is here" insisted Jones "Have you heard that Texas is annexed."

"No" she said thoughtfully.

"And that" he continued "means power, wealth, and -- "

"Trouble" interrupted Coles in low tones. "I beg your pardon, Mr. Jones, but are you not fearful of the consequences of this step? Somehow this news struck my ears like a knell, the End of Something - and the Beginning; and I lay awake last night and trembled at it."

A shad of contempt crept into Jones' tones.

"Trembled? by God I yelled with delight - why, man, at last the South has come to her own; an empire is opened before her ~~at last~~, stretching from the Mississippi to the equator. She will be the finest and richest nation on earth in half a century."

"And possibly the wickedest!"

"Yes, if strength and power be wicked".

The woman looked up with the shadow of a smile. "Strength and power, and dare devil courage" she said quickly "these are the traits that make men and nations - I - look!"

The faint baying of the hounds, till now quite distant had suddenly swept nearer, and then in a moment the brown bush of the fox, led by two little terror-struck eyes flashed by their horses forelegs. In an instant the lean light with a shriek had re-formed the pack & the three horses their horses were tearing across the fields. Up they went and down, across the white cotton fields, thiough the heavy corn, over the creek. Then wheeling away from the Dea~~river~~ they sped toward the great woods.

41-5-9

The wind of the morning that was a moment since so still ~~had~~ ~~hair~~ ~~his~~ now roared in their ears. Jones had bent his great form low and tense athwart his mighty stallion, which was snorting with the rage of the race. Then came the woman; sitting straight in the saddle, her hair flying in half abandon and her fiery young horse tugging nervously at the bit, half frightened at the pounding of hoofs and the flashing of shade and shine. Coles was riding easily and effortless. His bay mare skimming the ground in long swift strides. Every the woman sought to distance him but he hung on her flank following her carefully with his eyes. The implied distrust of her horsemanship angered her. She lashed her horse till he fled like a thought into the dark woods behind the thundering stallion. Back in the vale the shouts of other riders came to them faintly; ahead came the quick deep pant and bark of the dogs and right in front gleamed a silvery cotton field. The fok suddenly turned to the north and the hounds and cavalcade followed, but Jones knew the land better.

41-5-10

"Straight across the cotton," he cried "and we'll head him, the Creek ~~river~~ bends up there" he shouted to his two companions and the rode straight at the cotton. It was of unwonted height and beauty, great white bolls bi lowing on a sea of dark green foliage. The riders swept toward it. Irma Lloyd rose in her stirrup and shook her brown hair loose; her eyes were sparkling with excitement and her breath came in eager sharp pants. Suddenly there was a commotion in front. The black stallion leaped to one side and she heard the oath of the rider as he cut with his whip at a tall black form on the edge of the cotton field. The Negro stood his ground and again waved back the horses, shouting hoarsely

~~P. 10.~~

"You mustn't cross here, Master ~~Calhoun~~ forbids it - stop, Master, stop Mistress."

He was tall and powerful, dark chestnut in color and heavy voiced. Frightened, the woman's horse reared into the air with wide red nostrils and pawed frantically and then as ~~her~~ she was staggering back on his haunches the ~~girl~~ woman felt herself lifted gently to the ground just before the animal crashed into the underbrush pawing the air with his four hoofs. She turned to Harrison Coles and said simply

41-5-11

"Thank you!" Then looking at him thoughtfully she added "Was it pity for my horsemanship that made you lag, Sir?"

"No" he said pleasantly "O no, pity for the fox."

And the woman flushed darkly.

But Jones had stopped to speak—

Reining his stallion as quickly as he could ~~Jones~~ he wheeled and rode at the Negro, his face pale with anger. Without a word he raised himself in his saddle and whirled his riding whip. It hissed across the face and bare breast of the black laving a thin red streak. The Negro neither moved nor spoke and the rider seizing the lash of the whip whirled the heavy butt in the air.

"Stop that" the voice was not loud but penitrant. A tall man and thin had stepped qucikly along between the wood and the cotton. The voice Jones hardly heeded, but as he glanced at the man's eyes his hand fell slowly and the oath on his lips hesitated. The sallow face of the new comer was framed in a mass of black gray sprinkled hair; the lineaments were scarred and carven furiously and back behind the heavy brows sat two dark blue eyes that burned themselves into the very skull.

"Stop that" he said "Tom was acting under his master orders - I saw you coming and sent him ahead to stop you."

"And does he usually order his niggers to jeopardise the lives of ladies?" said Jones hotly.

"Ah - that was carless of mine - that was unpardonable - yet it was my perhaps fault, not his - go Tom."

Then the tall man approached the lady, hat in hand; "my humble apologies, my deep contrition - I trust you have suffered no injury. These old eyes are growing dim and I did not notice the lady - I only saw riders and my cotton - my beloved cotton, I call it mine because it is my experiment And this has cost me much thought and labor - but you must come to the house. Nay, nay, do not refuse" and his eyes became soft and pleading. "I fear I have spoiled your sport but you must come and rest and let me attone for seeming discourtesy - Pardon me - may I introduce myself? - my name is Calhoun - I am Senator for South Carolina."

41-5-12

The woman stepped forward with bright eyes, sweeping a low courtesy.

"John C. Calhoun" she cried. With hasty apology and disclaimer, the three riders and their host strated toward the house skirting the beautiful cotton field. "I fear I am childish over this cotton" continued the old man in soft tones. "Childish and miserly. but you see this is an experimen . Many years ago I secured some seed from India and I've had my cousin who owns this place been experimenting with it for several seasons - let's see: yes it is fully ten years since I planted the first was planted and this year we've just got this beautiful field. See how long and silky it is .- these little strands that bind the world to the South."

Jones walked nearer to him. "True sir, true, only give us land."

"Tut, tut - land enough, land enough, right here" answered Calhoun hastily.

"only the power to keep it - and rule it is wanted."

"And,dear Madame,"he continued turning to Miss Lloyd "when I saw these gay riders turning toward my cotton field I saw the fruit of many years in danger - you will forgive an old man his hobby?" and he stroked her hands.

"No,no"she returned "you must forgive three children their hot-headed carelessness."

"And especia ly"said Jones "am I ashamed of my anger but these Niggers somehow are usually so careles s and dumb that I seldom restrain myself."

"It must be a great relief and rest for you Senator to be back home again." Said Coles,who had been watching Calhoun in silent and respectful attention.

41-5-13

"No" said the woman quickly,"it must be fearful to leave the heat of strife and the glory of battle after such triumphs as yours and busy yourself— here."

He smiled at both a little wearily and naid "yes,yes" - yes to both of you. I am glad to be ~~at home~~ resting amid these peaceful green and growing things with the sense of air and light and freedom. And yet in the heat and dust of battle up yonder there are some things yet I would do s- some-things -" and his voice died away into a murmuring whisper. They walked along in silence. Their words forced themselves from Jones' lips.

"The gaining of Texas was a masterly triumph - an epoch in history - the beginning - " he hesitated and then added "the beginning of the Empire of the South"

The old man stopped and looked at him keenly. "I do not understand"he said in a manner that expressed hope rath r than conviction. Jones looked surprised,then looking him in the eyes said slowly :

"I mean the march of southern principles to the equator."

Calhoun interrupted h m excitedly "No,no,-that must not be - it must never be. We have empire enough here! Look at these broad empty acres. It would mean war, cruel war to push southward. It would mean the unrighteous spoliation of Mexico. A great free nation like this can set no such example to the world."

"But" asked Coles with surprise in his voice "do not people,that is most people usuallm think this was your program?

"They dare not,they hare not accuse me of that" he flashed back and his eyes burned again. No,no, I only meant to round out the nation and to secure our political safety - not empire,not conquest."

"Aye,but whatever it leads to,"cried Irma "the consciousness of having taken that great step,to have moved with power and dominion across the world - O that must have been a night of triumph."

"It was a night of horror," he answered and they passed into the hall.

41-5-14

13

Chapter II.

The Treaty.

From the mouth of the yellow Potomac to the many-mouthed Father of Waters rolls a mighty vari-visaged land. The wild beauty of its face lay in 1845 touched but here and there with human hands. Set for a hundred years from Virginia and the Carolinas down to old New Orleans little whitening spots had been growing here and there,growing and widening. They had appeared about the time a ~~little~~ Scotch-Irish baby was born in the foot-~~low~~ hills of Carolina and as the baby grew the light of the dark land burned in his eyes- the light of the land and the light of the sea.

as the d ark blue splendor of those great deep eyes sank into the head of the groving youth, his forehaed sverlaid them heavily, till they see shrinking back from the world they saw. Strange indeed were the sights on the dace of that white flecked land ~~on the face~~ s that rolled from the foothills of the alleghanies to the brown-bosomed gulf; but two were strangest -the backs of black men gleaning in the sun and the ugly scars on the fact of the land that follow d the broadening of the white fleeced cotton fields.

41-5-15

As the tall thin young southerner grew and walked in the world looking and thinking of land and life, these two ideas seemed to sink into his heart until they became a part of his very soul and then all of it - the black slave and the scarred land. Held captive mind and heart by these vast ideas he grew to shadowy manhood. His soul dwelt apart from the haunts of his feet, even as he mingled with men for he was thinking his own way through the mase of life unaided.

Ever the day of triumph drew near, ever it fled afar. He saw the curse of the scarred poverty that followed the rich cotton fields and fought the New England tariff till he gained a victory, but beside the victory sat a shadow that frightened him. He watched his own black serfs and the hired toilers of the north and saw a vision of labor divided according to capacity under the mastery of strong thoughtful tender-hearted men. So he stood in the senate and told the world of the good of slavery, but beside the triumph of his measures ~~crept the shadow of~~ rose a cry for freedom.

All this he thought of as he led his guests along the great hall. "A night of triumph" he murmured and ~~as he left his guests below and~~ leaving the three with his cousin she walked slowly ~~rod to his dusty office he~~ his sworn and sitting bowed among his books lived that night again and the sweat stood on his face.

It was in Washington, long years he had striven and now tonight he sat by his third great triumph and his third great disappointment. Beyond the broad Mississippi lay rolling masses of rich and virgin soil. It was a kingdom - an El Dorado; it was held by men of American blood and they were calling to thier own. Here that every inward striving mind saw the promised Way rf Life; with fire or six Texan slave states, the two great divergent centres of social and econonic interest in the Union would lie forever safely balanced. New Orleans and not New York would gather the shining wealth of the new cotton fields, and Charleston rather than Boston would speak the new world culture and show the wonderful social system built on the black corner stone of Africa. Here was Opportunity, Peace, Union personified. The moment must not be let slip. He had seen it ten years before the mob guessed it, and slowly tirelessly worked for it. The constitution of the nation seemed to stand in the way - he brushed it aside - which was greater, constitution or union? The Truth faced him waveringly. He deliberately lied -which was greater a little matter of fact or he salvation of a social system? And the time slipped and flew, his frail body ached and shivered beneath the strain. Five days more and James Polk of Tennessee would be president - an unknown man and yet his task was undone. Three days more and an unknown politician would sit in his place, perhaps dishonest, probably shallowpated knowing not the mighty interests involved in the annexation of Texas, and cowed by the howls of the Yankees. Now it must be done. It would be done this very night.

41-5-16

It was the night of the third of March. The streets of Washington lay dim and slimy and from the capitol to the White House, the wind swept with sigh and howl. Ice lingered in the gutters and flakes of snow twisted and whirled up Pennsylvania Avenue. In the east parlor of the White House sat two men . One walked nervously up and down - he was tall and slender, fair and almost youthful in appearance with this brown hair and Roman nose. He was passing impatiently up and down the floor, clasping and unclasping his hands, twisting his black stock, rumpling and smoothing his hair. The other sat still and thoughtful ~~as death~~ beside the table but beneath his brows the fire of his great deep eyes was lighted and burning. Louder and louder sang the storm and the cold rain clattered and crept on the window panes. The hissing of the wind drowned the uncertain rumble of hoofs along the empty streets. Still the tall man paced and fidgeted ~~him~~ and the other ~~one~~ sat motionless Was the storm abating? ~~but~~ for a moment then it was screaming and pounding in greater fury, but the men only heard the swinging of doors , the murmur of voices, the low knock and the entrance of a dripping messenger. He handed a roll of waterproof to the impatient walker, bowing deferentially. Quickly unrolling the parchment, the slender man seated himself at the table with the his companion and the two pored over the engrossed parchment. It was directed to President Anson Jones of the Independent state of Texas and enclosed within it was another parchment haeded "A treaty of Annexation". Slowly they read the letter through.

Then one seized a pen and wrote at the botton, "John Tyler, President of the Unietd States" and the other wrote slowly and wearily "Attest, John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State. In a moment a cloaked army officer stood by the door; the roll was in his hand. "Good luck, Floyd," cried the President. and then a carriage rolled swiftly through the wind and rain.

"You will spend the night here, Mr. Calhoun?"

~~13 24~~ 23½

"No,no Mr.President. I must go home - I need the air and exercise."

"But the storm -"

"That matters little - Good Night."

41-5-18

It was done. What? The secretary straightened his bent form and faced the whistling winds. Pressing forward he closed his eyes and drew his cloak about him;within his head rang and whirled,and the blood sang in his temples; without the cold rain was dashing up and down and eddying in the mad wind. Still the man staggered on but half conscious of the turmoil of the elements. It was done. What? The idle quention seemed singing in his head. Then the wind caught his breath and strangled him . A paroxism of coughing seized him. He leaned against a pillar till it passed and he felt the warm thick fluid in his throat. "Blood,blood"he whispered with his hand on his sore chest "The beginning of the end" And then his weary head seized the refrain "Blood,blood,the Beginning of the End". He could hear the steady marching of soldiers,tramp!tramp! tramp! No it was but a reeling traveller across the broad street. Then something all in gray,dark misty gray rose before him,dim whitish gray,she seemed,with outstretched pleading arms. He shuddered,she looked so ghostly,yet he knew it was but wandering prostitute and he ~~struck~~ shrunk out of her way.

If his head would but clear up and stop its heavy whirling! He fumbled at the door of the lodging house. It opened.

"Oh,Mr.Calhoun,you are so wet, can I not do something for you - some hot whiskey or -"

"No,no,he said hastily and stumbled slowly up the stairs. He sank into the grea arm chair and closed his eyes. The web that spun heavily in his breast slowly unwound itself. He tried to move and ward it off but his limbs were as stone. Slowly it drifted over him enmeshing him surely, strongly. It was whi e and silky like cotton - it was co ton, but unclean cotton. See the specks of dirt in it - ay, great lumps so that it s emed black with dirt - a great dark formless mass of blackness with mighty arms and thick heavy countenance that seemed pressing pressing on his sore chest. He gasped in terror and felt the sharp shooting of the hurt that pricked and pricked and then spread out in utter pain; he sank back with a vast sense of falling, falling into ~~smoed~~ oblivion, ~~oblivoooo~~.

41-5-19

The door was opened softly; then there was hurrying in the hall and a scream:

"Miss Fowler, Miss Fowler, come quick, Mr. Calhoun has fainted again."

Chapter III.

On the Lawn.

She was standing before the gray old pillared mansion~~s~~ all in a shimmer of white - white flowers in her ~~dark~~ yellow hair, white ribbons at her throat and white slippers on her little white-stockinged feet. Her hair curled itself in dainty lovin ringlets, and her dark soft blue eyes ~~sat~~ like stars in a face perfect in beauty and color. Yes, Miss Lacy of Charleston was good to look upon, thought Miss Lloyd as she bent her long, lithe form over her guest gracefully, and welcomed her to the "Magnolias" "It is so warm travelling" she said sweetly " as her eyes noted the embroidery of ~~her~~ the younger woman's dress and the fischu of old lace. And then as she watched Miss Lacy ascend the old stairs with Juno the colored maid, she added "Very, very beautiful .- I wonder if she has any sense" and then aloud and cordially, as she turned:

"Ah, Colonel Hodges, now we are assured of a pleasant ~~afternoon~~ evening - but no flattery, sir!" and again "Aunt Hetty - dear Aunt Hetty it was so kind of you to come" and so she murmured on gracefully and deftly as the guests assembled.

It was a beautiful sight there on the broad lawn in the softened light of the late afternoon. The drowsy scent of Jessamine and magnolia stole in upon the breeze and from afar faint echoes of slave songs trembled across the low dark fields. A score of men and women lounged under the great black oaks on low settees and stools, or moved slowly here and there with a murmur of converstaon and low swelling laughter. The women were languid, richly gowned, sometimes beautiful, always graceful. They sat or moved slowly speaking in low musical tones and sweeping their eyes with a certain languorous hauteur. The men were long-haired, clean shaven or aggressively bearded, talked with a dominant assurance, and demeaned themselves with a courtesy almost elaborate.

The older men gravitated oward the young hostess, Irma Lloyd. Her quick wit and keen appreciation set with fine breeding and tactfulness atoned for her thin figure and plain face. She moved too with a m certain sinuousness, a curving undulation that had an inexplicable fascination about it.

41-5-20

"My dear, this is Major Waggaman, the nephew of President Tyler. He has just returned from that Texan mission over which you are so enthusiastic.- My daughter, Irma Lloyd, Major." The speaker was a tall large bald-headed man with flushed face, thick form, and quick moving eyes. The major bowed low over the little hand clicking his spurs, and then see ing the cold gray eyes, hastened to say, gallantly:

"I have heard much of the women of Carolina, Miss Lloyd, but scarce believed what I now see with living eyes."

"A dubious phrase, Major Waggaman. "What pray, were those terrible tales?"

"Tales of slaughter in cold blood, wounds that baffled surgery and hearts broken beyond thought of repair."

"And so you have coming riding, Sir, armed cap-a-pie, bent on conquest and revenge?"

"Only craving mercy, fair maiden, for a passing pilgrim."

So they railed laughingly on with lightly tossed words, the Major slightly disappointed at the appearance of the young lady of whom he had heard so much, the girl looking straight at him that she might catch some glimpse of the real man. Then she said with sudden gravity:

"Was it hard travelling?"

"You mean - ?

"The trip to Texas?"

"Oh, in parts it was rather trying - I had one railway wreck and a horse back ride across Louisiana swamp. It was georgeously fearful: great flaming streamers, black paths, mud and snakes. The train service is a direct and awful encouragement to profanity and then the dirty boats and the long lonely horseback ride beyond New Orleans - yes, it was a fairly hard journey - I've seen worse but not voluntarily. But I didrnot know you ladies in Carolina were following the mazes of politics so carefully."

41-5-21

"We're not" -she said shortly - then added "But the Texans-were they not over joyed?"

"The Texans - well - no - in fact it was rather hard to discover any Texans; the first hundred miles or so I had about given them up. Then I found a few but they weren't as interested in treaties as in Negroes. They thought I might have a few in my saddlebags, I suppose."

"And are you sure you didn't Major?" laughed the elder Lloyd. "I heard they are getting to be cheap in New Orleans." And he waved his hand laughingly as he strolled over to the group where Aunt Hettie with Miss Lacy in charge was fascinating a group of young men and ladies. She was a little woman past middle age with traditions of former beauty which she still cultivated despite wrinkles and bad teeth. She had little mannerisms once affected now quite natural which proveked many a covert smile,and behind all this a lonely aching kindly heart facing with dismay the ghost of Age.

As DeCoursey Lloyd approached she was saying impressively from beside a little worn fan

"-And that's what ruined the north—utterly ruined it. There was a day when one met ladies and gentlemen in New York and there were a few well bred families even in Boston,but this poisonous intermarrying-ugh!"

"Did you attend the Glennworth nuptials,Cousin Hetty?" said Lloyd.

"Did I att nd them? the very idea! a slave driver ~~and the daughter of a gentleman~~ a gentleman & the daughter of to be sure" she added musingly "the Glennworths were not of the bluest blood - there are dark spots on their escutcheon."

"What were they,Aunt Hetty"said Harrison Coles.

"Nothing for children to hear - and besides,after this mesalliance they are quite beneath our notice."

"The world must depend for its salvation and mastery on the bred and born"announced Colonel Hodges glancing a moment from the radiance of Miss Lacy to Aunt Hetty. The elderly lady assented in deep deference; but Coles wondered what would happen if "the bred and born all died off or got softening of the brain." In fact I think we're only saved by our Indian ancestor. You know we Coleses boast of a full blood Cherokee chief some generations back." Then Aunt Hetty chided him. "For shame Harrison and you an idle bachelor among all these charming girls."

41-5-22

Harrison merely bent and kissed her finger tips and passed on laughing.

A little back from the main groups stood a number of men in earnest converse. "I tell"you insisted a sharp faced man,with quick excited gestures," it is the parting of the ways. Texas turns our faces south. Our backs are upon the north and our feet are started toward the equator. We shall never turn back."

"No,no,Mr.Blakesley,I cannot think that. The idea may be romantic and airy but the American nation is too strongly bound together. We shall not fight Mexico - there's no necessity for it and it would be cowardly."

41-5-23

"John Heathdon,you may call it romantic if you will,but the fate of the south is beckoning and it will go. Calhoun raised the spirit. It cannot die."

"But even Calhoun opposes war and endless expansion."

"Calhoun is failing now and does not see so clearly - his mind moves slowly. He will catch up with us yet."

"Then another thing,how can we spread a slave system over the earth without slaves?"

"Get slaves"answered Blakesley"Africa is full of them." And a silence fell on the group. Harrison Coles approached.

"Fiddlesticks"burst forth Heathdon "War,conquest an the slave trade! a pretty program for a civilized people. I tell you we'll remai n one people and secession is madness. We've ruled the north by our brains and spirit since the days of our fathers and we can continue to do it - and pit our strength against their vagaries and impotent mouthin gs? But Blakesley interrupted eagerly,

"Not against brute numbers, Sir, not against the ignorant offscourings of Europe with votes in their dirty paws - by God! sir, we must look to our homes and institutions and we must look - South."

"I fear I am too old to look much further in any directions" answered another heavy old man "but here is young Coles - Harrison, my boy, Colonel Blakesley is on his hobby - he sees fire ahead and treason and the breaking of bonds; what do your young eyes see?"

"Ghosts" replied the young man "dark gliding ghosts " and he pointed toward the silent moving figures of the black servants, bringing out the tea things.

41-5-24

Blakesley waved an impatient hand but before he could speak the clear tones of the hostess interrupted them.

"Politics, politics, I'll be bound," she said lightly as she glided in ~~easily~~ among them. "Politics when tea has been steaming ten minutes."

"On the contrary -ghosts" laughed the old man, and they all bowed lowly.

"Oh this is interesting - and who has discovered them?"

"Mr. Coles, I believe - and possibly Colonel Blakeley, both are dreaming I believe."

"But the dream of the one are prophetic - mark that" said Colonel Blakeley as he turned toward the tea tables.

"And the dream of the other?" asked Miss Lloyd as she found Coles walking beside her.

"~~Are~~ 9a painfully real- see there they go."

The watched the black servants pass the cups of tea and bits of seed cake.

"Ghosts are usually white" she said shortly.

"Not ours - not ours;they are balck and brown- "and" ~~then~~ as he saw a tall tawny maid slip up to miss Lloyd with a light wrap,he added - "and mellow ". The lady flushed and looked straight at him.

"Whence this sudeen interest in serving maids?"

"Oh,Irma,somehow today the whole thing rings hollow,does it not seem so to you? Beside our lives creeps this black shadow and we cannot lose it. I approaced you an hour ago but betwween the gallant small talk of a soldier about pretty eyes and hands,I could hear the wierd song of the slaves in the rice fields. I wandered by to where Aunt Hetty was preaching aristocacy and purity of blood while a mulatto servant was finding her fan. And then I went over and talked politics with men who propose to cure a case of too much Negro by adding more. The shadow of Africa is all over and about us. Even in the filmy daintiness of Miss Lacy's flounces one can s e the black arms that toiled to make it white."

41-5-25

"How very original"I she said in low mocke y while her steel.- gray eyes encompassed him "And are you looking for a world this side the stars where men say all they think,where clothes wash themselves,where state-craft fears no mob and gentle folk are not worried by their - cattle?"

"No,not all ha t but something of it;I dream of a land where men refuse to say always what they do not believe,where the misery and toil of ten women is not needed to make one woman a goddess,and where cattle are not unneccessarily worried by - gentle folk."

She bent over him,her great eyes full of deep disdain.

"Look"she said"Look then, my friend ~~little Sir Galahad~~ till your eyes drop ~~and your flesh rots~~ and your dreams make you starve and thirst - O Harrison Harrison,I hate sickly sentimentality in a world of work - Ah,Major Waggaman,have you met my friend Mr. Coles? Bring some chairs - there not this is quite One lump or two, Major — Mr. Coles prefers lemon cozy. And by the bye. Major Waggaman you came quite opportunely. Dinah", the large black woman paused with her tray ~~was her ying pist.~~ Irma seized one of her ~~her by the~~ hands raised ~~ther~~ it in her own slight ~~purply~~ dulpy white hands; ~~they~~ it lay there grayish brown-black, gnarled and knotted with toil, and the woman looked shame-faced ~~quailed and faltered~~.

"You washed this dress, did you not Dinah?"

"Yes, mistress."

"Now Major Waggaman whose hands are best fitted for washing, mine or Dinah's?" She asked serenely

The major gasped in amazement and stammered.

"But my dear madam , how can you - "

"Well Mr. Coles has some thoughts on the subject that are really very creditable to his - heart."

41-5-26

And Dinah slunk sheepishly away, While the Major fumbled for the threads of conversation, and Harrison Coles smiled.

"The fact is" said the major finding a doubtful balancing place at last, "the Negro is without the slightesd doubt a distinct order of creation. Every one knows -instinctively feels the difference between black and white. Why I have heard Senator Calhoun, who you know treats his slaves with fatherly kindness and knows each one li ke a book - he has said to me many a time - 'If I could but see a gleam of real first class reasoning power and inte ligence in them' -a Negro reading Greek for instance or mastering Trigonometry - he would change my whole attitude toward slavery.'"

"And yet there are intelligent slaves" said Coles.

'"Intelligent, yes, gquick with trained instinct but not with full fledged reasoning faculties. Egad I'm glad there are none such for what could we do if there were, surely not free them and live beside them."

"No, no, but I confess I'm not so certain of the absolute and eternal inferiority of all black folk and I am of the evils of our assumed superiority upon ourselves. Abolition would of course be silly - fatal to black and white but the extension and deification of the system seems to me equally wrong."

with a certain asperity in her tone

"And so as usual" said Miss Lloyd, "you end in a maze of your own weaving and sit helplessly bound as you used to when as children we hesitated at some crossroads or could not decide which game to play. Negroes - bah - they are the ha piest creatures in these United States tonight, and you Harrison the unhappiest for wasting sympathy upon them."

41-5-27

"The singers of such songs as theirs" he insisted "the wearers of such kindly hearts - such dumb toilers driven tho they be - are not, cannot be beyond the pale of Humanity."

"O no, but beyond the pale of white humanity."

"And how much does that mean?"

"God only knows and he speaks so seldom."

"And then only to prophets or conjure-folk."

Apparently then this

"~~This~~ can only be settled by an appeal to witchery" said the ajor, gallantly looking at Irma. But she tossed her head and retorted:

"Every well appointed southern plantation has its witch, and unburned too save by the Sun."

very quickly with half feigned gayety

"Mom Bett" said Harrison ~~coily~~ "let's go to Mom Bett. It's years since we've been there Miss Lloyd." So entering into the mischief of the thing and enticing Miss Lacy the four of them wandered away from the throng and went down the broad fields to the quarters. The house of the old conjure woman stood ~~apart by the street~~ from the rear - stowed snugly against ~~the~~ a great ~~high red bank, and half cave like~~ black oak of untold age - a dark and sombre hole. "Mom Bett - Mom Bett-they cried. "Tell our fortunes - we are four pilgrims facing fate." There came no sound. "Is she there" they queride but before they could answer they heard the breaking of little sticks and saw ~~shadowy~~ dim movements within, Miss Lacy turned pale and clutched Harrison C,les but Irma laughed and said " "Is not this the essence of sorcery" As the little flame wavered within they could see the back of the old woman as she bent over the hearth, and hear her mumbling. Slowly she said in a cracked strange dialect:

"Tall Mistress ~~has~~ had a dream."

Irma started, then smiled "prophetic insight," she said. "Yes, Mom Bett" she answered "and here it is - listen:

41-5-28

She slipped to the ~~ground~~ door sill and hugged her knees and the others gathered round in the glowing of the afternoon sunset looking ~~toward~~ into the shadowed doorway of the hut - at the flickering fire.

"I dreamed, I dreamed" said Irma "lying on the rocky shores of a great water. My soul rose as smoke before the face of a dark old man with wondrous eyes and as it rose beneath his waving incantation it gathered itself together and I stood before two men - a white man and an Indian. A white man of marvellous strength and daring and an Indian, ~~wondering~~ beautiful and moon-struck. The old man pointed to a great ship and we three sailed in it toward the Great South to take and subdue the land and I stood in the prow all eager with the eyes of the strong man on me, but the Indian was watching sunsets. O yes and there was a voice singing. And as I saw my soul thus facing forth, I dreamed my dreaming body woke and I rushed down to catch the great ship but the lake was dried into black mud and ~~an Negro girl~~ a hound was ~~digging~~ howling on the shore." They sat in silence at the tale till the voice of the crone broke upon them. They looked up. Her black drawn face and hooked haggard features were peering from the door and pointing with her lean hands to Irma she said:

"Fear strong of strong,O Buckra proudful."

Irma laughed. "What is it,what did she say"asked the Major edging doubtfully from the cabin door.

"The interpretation is"said Harrison Coles,"beware the Strength of the Strong,O Maiden Scornful!" And he glanced at Irma. But she rose and suppressed a yawn.

41-5-29

"The sun is almost set"she said "I fear I am neglecting my guests - I must hurry back but won't you all stay for your fortunes?"

They said "No" quickly,and walked back with her.

"Strange"said the major "what an art of really effective mummery these old humbugs can use."

"Isn't it"answered Irma"but I'm afraid Mom Bett is losing even her usual terrors - O Aunt Betty you are not going so soon? And Colonel Blakesley We shall see you soon again,I dearly hope. I fear I have sadly neglected you" Good night Mr.Heathdon."

And so one by one,the guests departed,till the lawn lay dark and still beneath the dark oaks and the twinkling stars. Only in the dim twilight the glitter of the radiant Miss lacy flashed by with roll of wheels and clamping of bit.

"How absurdly beautiful she is"mused Miss Lloyd -"ridiculously pretty and without an ounce of brains. She has not said a sane word today only lolled and posed and glanced in childish innocence or vacuity,and spread her finery. Sweet Heavens with beauty like that,I think I could whirl this dear old earth right mad. Well,well,the Lord is very wise. He furnishes the insides of some heads and the outsides of others and doubtless it is weal,very well. " She mused silently. Then half aloud "His mother must have been a sweet thing, like this and hence his wavering nonsense and puling sympathies. Too beautiful for a man and too soft ,but - yes, father,I'm coming - your evening pipe? of course it is past time. Why where is it?"

They had passed into the waniscoated library where two great candles burned dimly onthe oak table.

"Oh,don't you remember? I took it to my room to fix the stem last night. Wait a moment. No,Don't call the servants,I' ll get it myself."and she swept quickly and noiselessly up the wide staircase.

She opened the door of her chamber and paused abruptly. It was a wide low room;on the side was the smooth white canopied bed;on that a french dresser of mahogany with curving legs and gilded ornament. Between them facing the door was a tall cheval glass;and standing before the glass the startled lady saw a tall ~~slight~~ undulant figure not unlike her own clad smoothly and gracefully in white silk;she held the candle in one hand and with the other she was coiling her dark curly hair hgih on her head and curving her slight neck to catch the effect. Then suddenly she saw the opening door and the netering woman urning swiftly she crouched back with a little cry of astonishment.

"Mistress,I thought - I didn't know" - Miss Lloyd drew herself up angrily.

"Juno - you impudent - how dare -"

Then she stopped and shrank back with a little gasp. The candle in the dark maid's hand lighted the faces of both curiously,and she saw her own face reflecetd in the glass close beside the ~~Negroess.~~ ~~The conversation~~ Mulatto's conversation

41-5-30

a phrase of the afternoon flitted quickly through her mind. "Black ghosts" was it not the wraith of her own face that stood so strangely lighted there? Why had she never noticed it before in all these years? Her brown hair lay there darker and curlier. There was the same high narrow forehead - the same straight cheek and proud mouth, done a bit more swellingly. Then there was the same tall thin figure and trick of swaying. Miss Lloyd shook her head slowly and slipped backward to the shadow of the inglenook in the old fire place. Her breath came slow and hard and she felt a sense of chill creeping up her ankles. The dark girl trembling with apprehension was shrinking almost into the glass and the candle fluttered in her hands.

41-5-31

"Forgive me mistress -I didn't mean nothing - I was just trying on your pretty dress - I haven' hurt -"

But a dry voice came from the darkness .

"Juno, who was your - mother?"

"Mom Bett - Mistress, Mom Bett - the old conjure woman" and the girl bated her breath.

Irman shuddered.

"Who was - your father ?"

"I don't know - Miss- "

"You lie! who was he? - tell me?"

And her hands crept stealthily about seeking something.

"Mammy says it was "-

"Who?" Still the hands crept.

"Old Master."

The hands closed round the heavy tongs. She glided slowly toward the girl:

"Sister"she said musingly and the girl dropped the candle.

"Beast!"she whispered. The cold hard iron struck the maid full across the face and with a little sobbing moan she waved and crumpled to the floor.

The hall was bright and cool,but Irma Lloyd groped her way down the staircase as through a gathering darkness:she looked into the library.

"Come up stairs," she said slowly "your daughter is unwell". De Courney LLoyd, half-hearing listened,called, then leaped to his feet and hastened out into the hall. No one was there. He hurried up the stairs and opened his daughter's chamber door.

Out underneath the oaks Irma Lloyd was walking swaying her white arms in the night air.

"O my poor Head mother"she said.

41-5-32

Chapter IV.

Proposals.

Henry Jones was riding up to The Magnolias. Far down the way he met Miss Lloyd cantering through the early morning mist.

"You are an early riser this morning"he said,reining his horse.

"Yes"she answered simply.

"Have you heard the news?"

"No - I did not look at the papers."

"General Taylor has been ordered across the Neuces."

"That means war?"

"That means war."

"I am glad."

"Glad? Are you? good! so am I."

"Yes," ~~Sen~~ she said slowly "the land needs a baptism of fire to shake it from its legathy."

"[illegible] and to start it on its new life and destiny."

"Destiny?"

"Yrs the day that the Mexican War opens, is the day that turns the rod of empire southward?

"The rod of empire" she said musingly thinking of her dream, "is wielded by men and not by destiny. If men would put power and strength into this movement - but do you rea ly think this generation of young southerners are energetic enough to move the world?"

"Miss Lloyd today there are 100,000 sworn men - "then he stopped suddenly

41-5-33

She looked at him in quick interest

"Go on" she said.

He silently lifted the lapel of his vest and poitned to a silver star and golden circle. Thenbbending forward he said:

"For ten years the movement has been spreading. Never fear, Miss Lloyd there are still men in Dixie to dare and do." Then he hastily drew a map from his pocket. "Look," he said "here we are half way between the equator and the pole on the borders of the Atlantic. We set our faces continually toward the icy north and east. Bah! We should turn south and west. The equator is the center of the world and the Pacific the real world ocean. India China, and the Mediterranean have given the world its real culture and kept ahead so long as the heavy hands and level heads of a master race made the slaves work. The Germans tried working with their own hands and the fool Yankees have followed them, delving like niggers. But we southerners have discovered the real secret of empire. Make the world's cattle do the world's work. Turn our faces toward the palms and sunshine and the gorgeous slenpdor of the tropics. Drive our slaves across the Mississippi down through Mexico"and his finger followed the course eagerly "here over these half-nigger Spaniards of Central America "then his hand wandered into the air an in broad gestures (- "then South America and the West Indes,we're just filling them with niggers"he half whispered.

"A dream of empire"she whispered looking wide-eyed,and rapt straght into the fiery face,drinking in his words. Then suddenly she felt her hands ~~poisoned~~ prisoned and his hot breath puffed upon her cheek

"Irma,Irma"he was gasping "with you,God's darling -oh with you I could help rule this empire - I could make you a very queen over a thousand blacks and make the damned pale bloodless North cringe and whine before our power. Miss Lloyd -Irma - won't you love me?"

41-5-34

The avowal had slipped upon her so quickly and unexpectedly that she could not say a word. She felt an almost unconquerable desire to laugh. She did smile but feeling his great body trembling and his strong hands squeezing hers,she hastily withdrew them, and came to conscious thought. She could not marry him. His father had beena slave driver - a poor white from the hills. He was not a gentleman. His linen was not always clean and he smelled too much of tobacco. What would Aunt Hetty say - poor dear Aunt Hetty it would surely give her appplexy or delirium tremens. And her father? She stopped and grew hard and white. After all this was a man - a man instinct with power- the embo died strength of her dream. A man who cut rudely across filmy arguments,whom Harrison Coles looked down upon as as half-bred barbarism - Harrison Coles the vision of his dark face rose be fore her - and all across these piling hurrying thoughts,she heard the passioned pleading of the man beside her, coming as from a great distnace, echoing like drifting waters.

"No, no! she said slowly "you must not talk so, it cannot be - at least I will think - hark! there comes some one. Were you going to see my father There he comes - good morning - you may come, ~~to lunch tomorrow. Mr Calhoun will be here.~~ I shall see you - sometime. Good day" And she ~~crept~~ cantered on.

"Good morning, Mr. Ll yd."

"Good morning - I waited for you some time and at last feared you did not get my message."

"O yes, I received it last night but was delayed a little on the way this morning." They rode slowly toward the House.

"You were speaking a few days ago" resumed Lloyd "of a certain good agency for the sale of a few Negroes quietly."

41-5-35

"Why yes - there is a great demand from the southwest now, and we are helping the movement with all our might. Texas needs them you know."

"I have really more Negroes than I can use on my land - I am thinking of selling ~~the~~ five or six field hands and, there's a woman I'd like to get rid of - she's been here so long, all her life in fact - that she's getting intractable."

"Young?"

"About twenty."

"Not the waitress Ella?"

"No, the maid Juno."

"O, Miss Lloyd's maid."

"Yes, she has taken a younger and more tractable girl Celia - Juno is a bit impudent at times, although good to work."

"I'll send the agent up to look over the lot."

"Today?"

"Why -I don't know - I'm afraid not before next Monday."

"I have some pressing bills you see.- "

"Oh,don't let that worry you. I'll advance the money and thenwe'll settle later."

"But I'd rather get rid of them immediately."

"Why send them over to my plantation,if you like."

"Very well."

They rode in silence a while.

"How is your cotton?" asked Lloyd.

"Pretty good - a good stand and well opened."

"Mine is not so good and the corn too is poor. These Negroes are so careless."

"You don't drive them enough Mr.Lloyd- a steady hand is needed - particularly now as war approaches and we shall need money and discipline."

"Do you really think we shall fight."

"I know it."

"But will the Abbeville Rifles volunteer?"

"If it's in my power to make them?"

"Good msrning."

"Good morning - I hope for your influence."

They bowed low and parted. Irma meantime had slowly ridden onward down toward the ~~narrow~~ wide throated town. It seemed more dingy and sordid than ever this morning and not even the trees and greetings could light its gloom. In the post office was Harrison Coles,reading the ~~morning~~ weekly paper.

41-5-36

"Good news?"she asked quietly.

"No,bad!"he answered,then - "It is good to see you this morning after ~~our~~ our little duel - somehow I'm always inflicting my unpleasant moods on people. But won't you forgive me by riding over and taking a peep at my flowers? They are gorgeous - come do not refuse."

They cantered off together and were soon wandering among the carefully kept beds.She tore a red rose slowly to pieces and then smiling up into his face with soft gray eyes said:

"Did you ever strike any one? hard?"

"Why,what a question - yes. Once—a Negro "he answered "and I felt like a coward for a year."

"Why?"

"Why? A man striking a helpless thing?"

"H'm! but suppose you st uck O-impersonally so to speak - struck the Thing it meant -the - the - wrong it stood for?"

"Then why strike the man,-strike rather the wrong."

" O but wrongs are simply airy things they do not exist until they are gone and then one can't hit them."

"No,but one can strive against recurring wrong."

"But one wants movement,action,real blows".

"In such case we'd be clubbing each other to death continually."

"Moreover my first attempt at that sort of thing discouraged me."

"What was it?"

"Have you forgotten? A red-faced plebeian forced himself into our play and awkwardly pushed you down."

She smiled. "I remember - what a beating little Henry Jones gave you when we you played knight-errant - ah! well, a little clubbing now and then" she argued sinking down among the flowers, " is good for the system - I feel often as if - " and she tossed a stone against the tree.

41-5-37

"Are you not a little - warlike this morning"? he said.

"Is it not fitting? - Will the Abbeville rifles go to the Mexican War?" she asked

"God grant there'll be no war" he replied, "I think if this war really comes that it will mean a struggle in our ranks. I shall oppose the radicals because I believe such a war would be unrighteous agression - I - Irma don't look that way. I wish we though t more alike on this matter. We are in strange accord in most things- do you not think so, Irma"?

She sat very still. Then he said slowly

"Irma - I love you".

She smiled at him and then he smiled deep into her eyes and they fluttered before him. Then she arose and shook her skirts.

"I think," she said, "that I shall marry the captain of the Abbeville Rifles."

Chapter V.

The Meeting.

The town hall of Wilton Point was low and long with galleries down the side and straight benches across the floor. The tall narrow windows let in a glow of warm yellow light and the quick harsh tones of men and murmur of women echoed across the broad bare platform where the speakers were gathering. It was a great political meeting of the county in the mild midwinter weather, and Irma Lloyd was seated in the gallery watching the gathering of the crowd. They flowed into the building in two streams - the greater stream, black and rumbling spread over the benches - there were men tall and short, loud and quiet; some were well dressed and stiff and found their own eddies and pools; others were noisier and more careless in dress, copious in tobacco and brave in oath. The second stream, lighter and gayer, rippled into the galleries; wives and sisters with lunch baskets; and then again some stepped erectly and held their chins and skirts high and some slipped in silently and watched the others. Irma saw the tall form of Calhoun as he came up the long aisle bowing here, shaking hands there. She thought he looked paler than last fall and his blue eyes burned almost black.

Some one was speaking. She strained to hear his words but the resonance was bad and the women about her were chatting and flirting their fans. So she fell to watching the faces of the men below and musing on the scene. Gradually she felt rather than saw a certain conscious rythm in the crowded benches below. What was it? A movement here, a floating wave of whispers there, sudden silences, then the nervous twisting of bodies - all this gradually began to speak a a language louder than the tones of the orator and more distinct. Her senses tingled as they caught this new faint consciousness of the soul of the throng. What was the man saying? She could catch only a word here and there - "Slavery-.-

41-5-38

Abolitionist --- Yankee fanatics ----- gentlemen --- the South -- Union." yet she knew it all by heart - it was the old speech newly uttered, the same old argument so familiar to her. But the audience? They were moving faintly under it as if waiting - expectation sat on their faces and in their whispers. They were not listening, they were waiting, intent not on what the speaker was saying but rather on what he or some one was going to say. Once or twice they applauded faintly, once heartily, twice they scraped their feet impatiently and some of them yawned and spit on the floor. Then abruptly came perfect quiet - a little hush so that even the faces in the gallery breathed more quietly - "Our great leader, the peerless Southerner, John C. Calhoun, senator from the Palmetto state". A round of ringing applause greeted the introduction but it gradually died away with what seemed to Irma an expectant lull-another silence. The hall seemed charged - tingling with some subtle electricity. Men's muscles were more tense, they bent their heads and their bodies and the air itself listened, even in the galleries.

41-5-39

From where she sat she could just see Calhoun's tall form silhouetted against the further wall and catch the gleam of his carved white face. But his voice seemed weaker and only now and then did it carry audible sentences to her ear. Those below were hearing however and she watched them listen in intense interest. For many moments the heads were tense, expectant; then eyes wandered and hands moved so that a faint rustle waved across the room.

"But, Gentlemen, annexation is not war" the terse sentence struck every corner. There was a quick quiver of movement, hurried whispers and again palpitating silence. Calhoun's tones had lowered and his finger was carefully laying out the logical sequence of thought. She caught the ~~sentence~~ however. He was arguing, abstractly, subtly; she strained to catch the words and then gradually became conscious of a change in the listeners.

A man far in the corner dropped his boot heavily on the floor. Some one rose and apassed out. The two little movements seemed to cause an interruption but scanning the mass more carefully, Irma saw that they had not caused a change but were rather symptoms of it. Everywhere attitudes were more careless and muscles relaxing. Little noddings and gestures just a shade impatient appeared and with the faint signs of less strict attention below the swish and murmur started lightly again in the galleries.

"These men want deeds not words - war not argument" mused Irma and her eyes glowed.

Then she caught sight of Jones yawning slightly and she felt like yawning too, but checked herself and looked away as she felt his eyes ever seeking hers. Where was Harrison - oh, there standing with his back to her, looking out the window.

41-5-40

"Squirrels" she guessed, "or the pale blue sky?" Hark! Calhoun's voice was raising again - but she did not try to listen. She leaned back and watch ed the listeners twist awkwardly, smile, whisper, here and there, and then break into loud applause but not prolonged, not hearty.

"What an elegant speech" said Miss Lacy bending toward her.

"Charming" answered Miss Lloyd.

Then the audience talked to itself. There were other speakers, but few heard them. There were little knots of whisperers. Men hurried here and there and several groups left the hall. Some scraped their throats and moved noisily, others shifted their tobacco and stretched themselves. It was as though a single-souled body had suddenly dissolved into its elemental individuals and they threatened all to drift in different ways. Still there was evident a certain striving, a silent breathless travail toward synthesis. Was something emerging - some tangible thought, some definite movement? Yes. Blakesley was whispering earnestly to Jones. Colonel Hodges started up and looked about, then hurried to the further corner. Coles was watching the chairman intently. Yes, she felt the two centres of strength and thinking, two parties, the divergence, growing and taking shape before her very eyes. Ah, it was good to be there and watch it; it was a battle, a silent bloodless battle and she could not take part in it! Surely, were not two men watching her face furtively- well, one at any rate -

"Yees - ha ha" she murmured in answer to some remark of Miss Lacy's which she did catch. Yes - a slightly built nervous man stepped toward the platform from out of one the eddying groups of radicals.

"Spratt" whispered somebody. "Mr Spratt of Charleston" explained a Charleston lady and a heavy limbed planter rose and yelled "Spratt" amid flickering applause. His speech was a perfect flash of lightning - clear, penetrating, passionate - snap-snap- spap! it struck up on those benches. Amusement, interest, amazement- solemn silence and slow hesitant applause followed him. He seized his audience, thought Irma, subdued it, then swept far beyond them. Every word was audible everywhere. Too radical - far too radical: the South even at cost of secession, a slave empire, war for territory, the African slave trade, free and open - a program daringly brilliant. But it leaves them gasping in mind - shaking their heads and fidgeting, and brings Colonel Hodges to his feet. He begins in a more conservative tone but he is not listened to. The audience has heard something radical - they do not agree with it and yet - and yet the ferment is working slowly, powerfully.

"By God, there's something in that Spratt" growled a fat low-browed man standing directly beneath Irma. Then as the mass sat there swaying in thought half listening to itself, muttering, moving, the door swung suddenly open. and a man appeared waving a letter. Up the aisle he ran. A pause - then the great tones of the chairman:

"General Taylor has been ordered to the Rio Grande."

A yell shook the house till the belfry trembled and the rook within rose from her nest,circled about her eggs, whistled and flew screaming toward the black forests beyond.

41-5-41

Scarce had the audience choked itself through the narrow doors of the hall, than the bugle call of the Abbeville Rifles greeted its ears and the younger men hurried up the street to the rickety old building which served as an armory. Irma and Miss Lacy came down together at the end of the throng and Miss Lacy was twittering over the bugle -

"So martial,you know!"

DeCoursey Lloyd joined them.

"Well,have you ladies politics enough for one afternoon? Do we own a lunch or shall we go to the hotel?"

"O a lunch here on the green - I couldn't enter that dirty hotel - ah, here is Aunt Hetty and the rest. I know they've brought good things. We shall have a jolly party."

"And shall we not wait for - for the soldiers?" asked Miss Lacy,blushing rosily.

"Goodness, no!"said Aunt Hetty,"Harrison tells me they are liable to be squabbling all night - some are determined to volunteer for the war and some are opposed. Then there is the election of officers. Harrison should be captain - he is by far the best family represented."

"He can be captain easily enough if he wants to be" said Colonel Hodges, "although Jones is a better officer no doubt -knows tactics and that sort of thing."

"Jones" replied Aunt Hetty with a sniff. "And why shouldn't Harrison want to be - it is his duty as a Coles".

"Well Coles is a bit queer you know - flighty,dreamy-like - but then a fine boy, a very fine boy."

"Let us hope they won't quarrel long enough to spoil the ball tonight" said Miss Lloyd as she was laying aside her wraps.

41-S-42

"O dear,no" echoed Miss Lacy "I so love to dance with a soldier."

"Now to lunch" said Irma"and then we'll help the Abbeville girls decorate the hall - Colonel Blakeley it was a great meeting,was it not?"

"Splendid,splendid, Miss Lloyd,epoch making,I think - but I fear you could not hear well where you were."

"I did not hear,I saw" said Miss Lloyd as she spread a white cloth under the oak.

Long low festooes of green and white and red verdure decked the sweet smelling hall where in the morning the speeches had echoed. Dim colored lights painted the plain wood-work,and concealed in a wall of flowers,a Negro orchestra was playing quick funny little tunes and slow swelling measures. Groups of gaily gowned girls promenaded up and down and elderly men and women sat about,waiting. Around Irma Lloyd,a mass of girls continually clustered and she talked to them with a light seriousness that made them laugh and think. Yet in their hearts all were listening. Hark! the band!"Dixie" the martial bars crept gaily up the street - the girls crowded about the door. There was a thick rolling of drums.

41-5-43

"Halt! to the right , wheel - March!"

Into the hall they came,gay in gilt,straight,smoothfaced eager in eye and step. Irma turned her eyes slowly - the crowd massed and melted before her.

"Miss Lloyd - Captain Henry Jones of the Abbeville Rifles begs the honor of the grand march."

Book 2

pp. 96-98, 100-141, (2 pages)

86 - 96

Chapter XII.

War.

There sat in the South a woman, angry-eyed. Her face was the twinkling shores of Old Virginia, her hair flew in the forests of the Blue Ridge adown her back; her breasts were the striving mountains of Carolina, the smiling waters of the Gulf girded her mighty loins and her vast limbs lay south and westward, sea on sea. In her hands she held a formless Thing, whose bitter cry deafened her hearing, and whose dark blood dripped on the whiteness of her soul.

To northward lay a giant busy with his dirt and stones, his woolen and gold, until to his thick ears the frenzy of that crying pierced the frenzy and the danger; he stretched his weak left arm doubtingly down by the eastern seas, warding her nimble flashing hands, but his great hard muscled right arm crept doggedly onward by the Cumberland and Tennessee, swept suddenly from Atlanta to the silver sea that zoned her. It held her vise-like, while the freed left hand beat and plucked at her naked breatst and bloody throat, and his gnarled knee pressed her soul into the dust. Cruel, past pitiful was her plight, pain crouched in her voice and the shadow of death in her eyes. The red orbs of the frenzied tireless victor beat in her hair, and his great voice kept whispering "War is Hell". So she dropped the blood-bought black Thing - an lo! it was a man.

41-9-496

Why did they fight in the dust of that red morning asks the child who sat and saw, the man who stands and hears, echoing echoes. '"It was brutish lust" snarls the Woman; "It was wedlock, holy union" reasons the Man. Yet even as they speak their souls whisper each to each - "It was the Thing, the stricken formless Thing, the black and shadowed Thing that was, the man that is and is to be, ever and evermore."

This is the tale of the days of the years of our history from sixty one to sixty four, as it really was. But the tale to them that heard it new was far different. Few realized its inner meanings, or saw through its mist and smoke, its larger movements. Yet to some simple souls, like Silena Smith, the truth stood from the first revealed in all its tremendous import and epic sweep. She was a homely woman, unattractive in body and soul. Her life had been a life of daily toil, without relieving incident save the weekly church service, the weekly wash, the weekly ironing. Her hands were hard, her hair thin and unwaveringly straight, her form showed no womanly ~~no womaly~~ curves and to her life but once had come even the phantom of a man's love. Even then no word was spoken, the man smiled and forgot, and the girl shrunk half ashamed into herself and breathed no whisper of it, even to her own heart.

And yet for all that, as if in eternal compensation, God had set within this thin body a soul whiter than the white drifts of Taghkanic, a spirit purer than the pure waters of the Housatonic, and a heart child-like in innocence, yet more than manful in its readiness for every unselfish deed, every throb of sympathy. ~~and pulse of sacrifice.~~ She looked at life unwaveringly with her simple pale ~~bird~~ gray eyes - to her it held no mystery - nothing but ~~no~~ two great facts, God and Pain. God hated pain and she hated pain and she and God strove to abate the hateful thing. Where pain lurked there she was, and thither in earnest supplication she called her God - whether it was a broken legged bird, or an old woman twisted with rheumatism or a black people shackled with slavery. When before her ministrations unhappiness and ache and hunger fled a vast ~~eternal~~ happiness filled her soul and she crept to some corner of the earth and lifted up her heart and said "For this my life, I thank Thee ~~O God~~."

41-9-497

These days, however, were days when she was bent in the gloom of despondency. Never before had days like these come to her. Before she had ~~but~~ always seen her duty shining clear and hastened to it. Today she saw it bright as the sun, yet veiled from her. The Son of God marched forth to war - but his daughter? - his daughter to whom duty was life's supreme pleasure, she must sit silent and useless because she was a woman. And ~~when~~ Silena Smith wept. The fall of Sumter struck Canaan like a sudden north wind but it called for men, not women. The rout of Bull Run brought her white and wailing to ~~Ma~~ Martha's kitchen, but she was too frail for nursing, the sanitary officers said. And then with the years came a ray of light, she watched it, and it grew and grew.

"Martha" she whispered "have you heard of Pierce's Ten Thousand Clients"

"No" said Martha listlessly, for she was thinking of John.

"Well you know our ships took ~~Hilton Head~~ Wilton Point - "

"~~Hilton Head~~ Wilton Point" said Martha with sudden interest "Yes I know that's where John is."

"What's he doing there?"

"Well you know he's been south since the war broke out. He is an army contractor and has leased some plantations."

"Oh the leased plantations!" What does he say of them?"

"[redacted] he writes very encouragingly."

"Martha, let's go there and teach!"

Martha looked at her in surprise.

"Go south - in war time?"

"O Martha" she cried "they are there in great throngs, the fugitives, the helpless, hopeless, black people, they need food and clothes and teachers - they need us, Martha, our hearts and words and human sympathy; I am going, I must go - come with me Martha."

Martha sat up with a sudden inspiration. John was there - he would be there a long time. He was in danger - perhaps sick, uncared for, unattended. Estrangement, subtle, unspoken, yet certain had stepped between them since that fatal crisis in New York - he was so often from her now - long days and years - why should she not go to him? What would he say - did she dare?

41-9-41 864-9-41

Day after day she pondered, swayed now this way now that. Then a letter came "I've had a slight attack of fever" John wrote "but I think - ". She put it down and reached for her sun-bonnet.

"Silena when do you start" she asked across the fence.

"Next month, in July - answered Silena.

"I'm going with you" said Martha.

Night after night far into the darkness these two sat planning the great crusade. They made clothes for the sturdy growing lad, they pored over old school books and they studied maps.

Then came that month of all the War's red months, when at Gettysburg one hundred and fifty thousand of men dashed themselves pitilessly against each other and left 50,000 corpses on the field; that month when starved and panting Vicksburg gasped in the coils of the anaconda, ~~and died~~ surrendered and the Father of Waters "rolled unvexed to the sea"; on the thirteenth day of that ~~black splashed~~ bloody month, they reached New York and went to the offices of the Mission Society. The man in charge looked worried and annoyed:

"We're having some trouble in the city" he said, as he kept glancing at the window.

"What is the matter?"

"It's the draft, you know, and all the lawless turbulent elements

(p.99 missing)

front way but the mob had overtaken him.

For a moment they all hesitated ,then bending they lifted the inert body into the carriage and covered it from sight. Silena wiped and fanned the bloody head while Martha chafed his great rough hands,and the secretary drove cautiously out to the main street. Above them the mob was yelling cursing and pillaging,columns of smoke and flame ro se in great volumes from the Negro orphanage to the west and below a cordon of blue coated policement came rushing to the scene. The carriage whirled furiously down Third avenue

"Can we make the boat"asked Martha.

"I'm afaid not - but we'll try"and the carriage jolted and twisted on. A crowd of gamins stoned them,women jeered and once a mass of yelling men rounded the corner in front of them but they wheeled into Second Avenue and went on. The horses were reeking with sweat and panting pitifully. There was an ominous sound of fierce fighting ahead, but above it rose a low rumble of thunder;the lightning flashed and quickly a great Hashing shower of rain poured and beat upon the mob-swept streets of the city and cleaned them of their verminggreat and small.

41-6-14

"We'll miss the boat,but save our lives"whispered the weary driver. Yet he pushed on to the wharf.

"The boat is still waiting"he cried in surprise.

"Quick aboard -"

"And Tom's"asked Silena "He's recovering - he's --

!Put him aboard too "said the Secretary ,"no black man will be safe in New York tomorrow? "

So it was that Martha Reynolds and her boy,and Silena Smith,and Tom Calhoun sailed southward in July of 1863.

Martha was now exalted now terrified at the step she had taken. Suppose John should return and find her gone - suppose he should renounce her in anger,suppose he were sick,dead? and she tossed and moaned and kneeled to pray. Then in the great white mornings as the ship rose and cut the foam ,the glory of this her first daring,the joy of her first freedom,the wonder of the strange crusade sent the blood dancing and she stood long minutes rapt in silent prayer. Long they rode silent,with air and curling waters rushing past,but ever the same sweet solemn sky. But on the third day a light house greeted them,then a fringe of trees. The sun dropped rosy to its dreaming,then sprang all fiery from its morning bath and there lay

Walter Pond

~~Hilton Head~~ to the westward with its deep black shores and its bare low buildings. Ships rode in the dark waters of the river, on beyond rose great magnolias and old mansions, and the sheen of tents. The hearts of the women swelled within them as they looked down the gang plank into a dark mass of dusky faces. And coming thus slowly down to them with wet and wondering eyes Martha glanced ~~upward~~ and stopped

"John."

"Martha."

~~And a sudden goodness clothed their [illegible] world.~~

41-9-500

Chapter XIII.

Freedom.

All night the guns had roared and spit above the fierce voice of the storm and this fair sweet morning John Reynolds walked among the dying and the dead and as he walked and saw, strange new thoughs came to him and the vision of a strange new world. He realized for the first that never before had he really looked on black men as men - he had shrunk from them in uncontrollable repulsion, he imagined them with thoughts different from his thoughts, feelings which did not play and battle like his, deeds smaller, narrower, more instinctive. But today the thrill of change lay on his soul. Here were men who with unfaltering eyes had walked into the mouths of those screaming sneering guns of Fort Wagner and never wavered. Some of these torn bleeding bodies lay before him - harsh black faces set in death, soft brown faced lads writhing in dumb pain, great maimed and twisted bodies moaning in utter misery. God! were these not men, brothers, free human souls? He saw a mother hiding her dark face in the blood stained bosom of her boy; he heard a father lifting hands and voice to the burning copper sky and yonder came the death wail, rolling over the dark and blood stained water.

The salt tears crept silently down his cheeks and ϕ in his blindness he almost stumbled over a little group.

The man, tall and powerful, lay stretched silent, rigid on the cotton rows,his right arm mangled and wrenched,dark with clotted gore. A woman lay prone across his great breast choking and sobbing,chafing his hands and kissing his immobile face,and bending near with silent awe-struck facesand wide tear-drowned eyes knelt a boy and a girl.

"Is he - dead?" he asked John.

She raised her head passionately . "No - no! he is not dead,God could n't let him dienow" she whispered in fierce anguish. John started. Where had he seen that face - that brown stricken face,with linesof care and beauty riven across it contradictingly? He bent and found the faint flutter in the silent breast ~~left wind~~. Then he ran and stumbled,hallooing across the fields until the guards and nurses heard and came. They carried the sorely wounded man down through the fields to a low cabin that nestled by the sea and laid him gently on the thick white bed,and bound up the stump of his mangled arm.

41-9-501

"Why - it looks like - it is - Tom Calhoun"said Reynolds in deep surprise. "I left him in Canaan - I thought -"

"Yes" the woman whispered. "It is my Tom". And the boy whispered to the girl "It's papa Tom." But Reynolds was again looking at the woman. Where before had he seen that stricken comely face?

As Reynolds walked away he thought rapidly. These folk were free - they had the making of men in them - they were men. This put a new face on matters. Were they not destined to rule this state and this section? If they evidenced as much ability in ruling as in fighting, they would, especially with the money and arms of the government behind them— H'm; he mused. In that case it would pay to join hands with them,make friends with them and help and lead them. With their friendship,their labor.and ordinary brains and ability this band could be made to blossom as the rose.

The sun was falling athwart the surging waters of the sea and the solemn golden twilight was bathing all the languid tired land. Thoughtfuly Reynolds turned wiestward,threaded the oaks and magnolias,and finally approached a section of the old barracks and stepped within. The scene for a moment dazzled him: a thousand black men and women young and old were crowded,crushed together on the narrow old benches. Old lamps,pine knots and candles threw a wierd and shadowy radiance on the scene. All was silent save the rustle of paper and the slow halting utterance of one old woman reading. John Reynolds had seen men working with swelling muscles— he had seen men laboring with strained eyes and faces,but never before had he seen such evidence of concentrated striving in a mass of men as that which lay before him now. A ragged old man with tufted gnarled hands and weather beaten face was crouched here over a grimy book, his great blunt finger following the line with painful care; beside him sat a girl golden haired and blue eyed, her head aloft, her body quivering, her lips moving rapidly as she repeated something to herself over and over again. Far to the right was a gaunt thin woman with her dull eyes glued on an old broken slate; the sweat stood in beads on her forehead and a piteous bewilderment lay in her face; and behind in the flickering raidiance of a great pine torch sat a little boy fat and brown, his book fallen on his lap, his eyes closed - his soul away in dreamland on the hills of God, his body alone in the low hot room.

Flitting here and there among the throng, bending now to explain now to encourage, now in sympathy and then in gentle warning, glided Silena Smith Always before Reynolds had thought of her with a smile - a thin awkward homely unsexed thing - all tears and longings. But at the sight of this woman, he paused amazed; the same woman, as homely as ever, but transfigured by a radiant enthusiasm, quick, insistent fervid in word and movement All the hesitant dreaming was gone, blossomed, fruited into realization. With Martha, whom John found struggling with a large class in the second reader, it was different. She was wearied and bewildered, and longed for her kitchen. These folk were eager and kindly, but too they were dirty and smelling of sweat, and it was with a sigh of relief that she heard the bell ringing to end the long evening's work. They walked home together, she and John, silently drinking in the scents of a southern night and then sat long on the great cool porch with their son.

"Father, I want to stay here all the time and make money" said the boy.

"So do I" said his father glancing at Martha.

But in Martha's eyes lay the vision of peace and snow swept hills.

41-9-502

Chapter XV.

The Legislature.

It was midsummer. The heat was pelting down on the wide silent streets of capitol Columbia and the sandy bluff gleamed on the rippling waters of the Congaree Up the broad Palmetto Avenue came three boys of 15 or 16 years ago. One came over from the new two storied houses of the east side - a big thick ~~bo~~ bodied ~~light~~ dark haired young fellow with a red aggressive face and a quick shrewd eye. The second came down from the silent decorous mansions to the southward - an olive skinned, ~~dark~~ golden haired young man ~~fellow~~ slight in build and singular in beauty, his eyes wandering dreamily beyond the flowing river The third youth ran hastily up from the low straggling cabins of the North a tall, dark brown-faced fellow, with laughing eyes and a tightly curled mass of hair. The three met at the threshold of the capitol: "Good Morning, Mr. Jones! said the ~~light~~ dark haired one with something of deference in his voice, to the one of the ~~darker~~ lighter hair. But the other had extended his hand to the dark-brown runner - "Hello, Bob," he said and the Negro said pleasantly "Hello, Mr. Lloyd." They all passed in and seated themselves at the clerk's desk in the Hall of Representatives - the Negro at a small table to the left, the other two at a larger table to the right. They viewed a strange scene. - the strangest America had yet known . One hundred and twenty five men sat grouped before them - in the centre and in front 50 white men - ~~behind~~ around and behind them seventy five men, black and brown and yellow. One man was speaking, a broad shouldered black man with a fine brow and a voice that showed education and refinement. The whites craned their necks in astonishment, the Negroes sat in wondering, proud silence.

"Who is he" asked Lloyd Jones ~~of~~ bending over to his fellow-clerks.

"Elliott, R.B. Elliott - he was educated in England ~~and~~ at Eton and some other place they say." answered ~~Henry~~ Roland Reynolds.

41-9-503

Lloyd Jones looked a t the rest of the dark faces. ~~There~~ There were several other intelligent faces, some sharp, some bold, but the mass of them were the timid dull countenances of slaves and the sons of slaves. The white members were more strongly differentiated: there was a silent knot of ~~stiff shaven~~ southerne s, and a gang of loud mouthed mountaineers; there were a score of sharp faced northerners, a number of uniformed soldiers and a dozen business men like John Reynolds who flitted here and there making friends and arranging matters.

"This is my son, ~~Henry~~ Roland, Mr. Elliott; ~~Henry~~ Roland I want you to k now the leader of our colored brethren. Mr. Elliott is going to hav e charge of our rail road legislation" and Reynolds hurried away.

"Why, Tom, glad to see you" he said later " I hear you led your district by a good majority.

"Yes, Mister Reynolds - they voted for me - I don't know why " and a look of ~~sorrow and~~ bewilderment lay i n t he dark face of Tom Calhoun.

41-9-504

All the after noon t he h ouse spent in organization, a nd in veiled and whispered conference; a nd then as the burning sun began to seek the west, ~~they~~ they filed slowly out, lingered on the steps of the capitol, and the greensward. The city paused and gaped curiously at them. Henry Reynolds and his father ~~mustned~~ mounted horses and were soon going leisurely along the shaded avenue. The deep low scent of magnolias hung heavy in their nostrils but they hardly noted it, for they rode ~~close~~ close together and continually scanned a large blue print, which was between them. John Reynolds was talking.

"You see, my boy, south of Baltimore only three seaports really count- Norfolk, Charleston and New Orleans. Now the race between t hese three ports and any other upstarts like Savannah or Mobile depends on which of them can first tap the Mississippi valley - the great west is our storehouse of wealth and if the Blue Ridge railway taps it and open up the way through Knoxville to Cumberland Gap, Charleston will own the great west for we'll beat New Orleans to Europe by a thousand miles" and so they rode on talking earnestly.

As they turned into t he a venue a woman had steppd on the crosswalk and the flutter of her dress frightened Henry's horse so that he reared and the young rider reined him harshly and struck him with the whip; the woman stopped suddenly staring full at the youth and a little cry crept from her lips. She was a tall woman dressed sombrely, but with an air of grace and breeding.

"Mrs. Henry Jones" whispered Reynolds to his son, but he did not venture to greet her. She had quickly recovered herself and walked on and yet she was searching her brain - that boy's face, the movement - the anger - how like how strangely like " - and her mind flew backward. She turned to continue her walk and her face lightened as she caught the swing of a youthful handsome form in the distance, coming toward her. Lloyd was walking beside and talking eagerly to a gentleman of fine face and aristocratic bearing. Who was he? asked Irma Jones to herself rapidly running over her acquaintances. He turned at the further street, leaving the young man with a courteous greeting. Lloyd stood looking after him a moment, then espying his mother ~~ran lightly~~ hurried to her, put his arm on her shoulder and kissed her:

41-9-505

"Good evening, dearie" he said. She greeted him in turn.

"Who was that, Lloyd, I did not recognize him."

He looked at her quickly and then looked away: " It was the ~~secretary of~~ state Treasurer"

"The ~~secretary of~~ state?" She tried in vain to recall -"What is his name?"

"Mr. Cardozo."

She stooped abruptly and crimsoned " Cardoza - Mr. Cardoza - the Negro?" she asked.

"Yes" he said in low tones looking full at her -"the Negro, so-classed."

"LLoyd" she said passionately, "Lloyd" she repaeted sorrowfully - " "Lloyd" she whispered "for Godss sake and your mother's, drop that hateful sympathy of yours for mongrels - remember that even in the bitterness of revolution and defeat you are still a southerner and a white man."- and there were tears and anathema in her voice. He drew her arm in his and touched her hair lightly.

"Forgive me, dearie, " he murmured but his face looked puzzled and pained.

As they came to the house they saw that Colonel Jones had a mulatto - a slight sweet faced girl of ~~mulatto~~ 18 daintily dressed, with that effulgent cleanness of body & soul that seems a party some women. Her bright laughter was pealing as they entered the gate and her yellow hair half tumbled down was bent over a half grown puppy whom she was romping She looked flushed and sunny; "yes - graduated & all" "Aunt Emma" she said I'm back from school, and added: with that half haughty shyness which is the heritage of young women-hood "Good evening Lloyd" Lloyd heard silently over her head and glanced now at her and now away and spoke but few words. His little playmate of earlier days had blossomed as beyond his dreaming that he scarcely knew how to renew the old acquaintance and whether to say "Edith" or "Miss Coles." "Edith is much taken with Dranlo's puppy and Jie promised her hand & her hounded Lloyd will concur" The puppy was a queer long legged hound, with grey blue eyes & buff hide. The mother had long been the property of Colonel Jones and was killed recently & only this puppy was left. Lloyd hastened to accept while Mrs Jones kissed her arm about the girl and asked after her mother and father.

"No" she said at the first mention "I wished not think of staying to supper — mother daddy expects me"

But Lloyd offered to lead the restive hound and together they went down the street. She talked in a quick lively strain & her rather eclectic conversation and was not a little disappointed on him. He was for to handsome for a boy and shy, almost womanish in his way, she thought and then when young Roland Reynolds wheeled by them astride his great bay stallion she looked on the stranger with new interest and Lloyd stopped in consternation Roland was big & ruddy and flushed, from the boy ride with his brother & both were some salivary sites. He bowed to Lloyd as he passed & turned even as the girl coaxed and turned & stare back. Lloyd turned too but just as he turned away heard the hound after a wayside rabbit and Edith could not repress a little cry of displeasure at the loss of her pet. Roland took in the situation at a glance and wheeling on his great horse went down the road after the hound in a chant of dust. Edith reddened with pleasure & excitement and Lloyd apologized lamely and both fell silent until they saw Roland trotting serenely back with the recalled hound in hand.

41-1-159

At her gate the little princess dismissed her cavaliers demurely & Lloyd but smiling at Roland

Mrs Glenmarsh who had long since become his prime backer time & her words

Chapter 16

The New Regime.

For the second time in his life Harry Reynolds saw visions of gold. Ere he came he had not reaped as much from his war contracts as he had hoped to, but he had a strong arm in hand and with the Oregon legislature under his thumb meant seem to be under matter of a few years & a great deal. Above all Reynolds felt new life & new power in the sudden presence of a son. Sudden it seemed because it was only recently that he found on this stalwart young boy a companion & whom he could tell his plans and a keen mind & help them realization. His dreams came & he longed with a new intensity. He kept the young man about him, gave him little commissions which were executed quickly & cheerfully & very soon came to realize that he had a valuable asset in this strong young fellow. He felt at times a pang that this boy was not really his own and that was only passing, & he determined that he should be his spiritual as well as physical son.

091-1-17

"Roland," he said never moving "you see what it means to us to get that Blue ridge railroad into our hands. Once the Wissenatchie valley is tapped & all its wealth will flow through our hands. all we've got to do now is to get work this bond scheme through the legislature"

"That ought to be an easy job" replied the younger man "with Tom Calhoun & Herd the niggers" and delimn the votes."

"It certainly looks favorable and we must not be too sanguine. The blacks are getting a little restive and educated Negroes like Elliot are always there ask & made demands"

"What kind will that do to our scheme"

"Formerly none & honestly at very much it. The Negroes have been pretty well ~~fleed~~ fleeced already and theyre begining to rose around for a share of the efoils. If we ~~of~~ drane to give them too much it will arouse the southerners to frenzy and the fat will be in the fire."

Dane me get enough votes to pass the bill"
I think so if all goes well
"why not make arrangements directly with me by buying over Sands?"
Reynolds thought a while." I'll go see Bonds "he said Sands was big and suave, yellow and well-dressed. He was particularly glad to welcome Mr. Reynolds to his humble dwelling and he complimenting thrup in this soft oily tones that sounded almost sincere.
Sands are you going to vote for my railway bill
Well Mr. Reynolds I surely wanted like to Well then do so
You see its this away Mister Reynolds, we wants to do the right thing but the boys has got it into their heads that we aint getting a square deal ~~on~~ these days
How so
Well ~~the~~ most everybody appears to be getting theirs and we don't get nothing.
Talk plain Sands
Well-then- how much is our votes worth to you
How many have you.
Well there are 25 of us as votes together usually
But there are 75 Negroes in the house- how about the other 50?

41-1-162

O well – you can't depend on them
You mean they would sell out? some would & some would. Most of them is ~~Simple~~ fools and ~~is~~ running after Tom Calhoun's head & call. My crowd means business"
Well Sambo if you come round & my house tomorrow Night & will talk – Coach"
John Reynolds went home wondering for how small a price he could buy those 25 votes, and met Tom Calhoun at the gate.
Tom was a big grey haired Negro, tall and black with a face of great dignity & strength, and yet he seemed always clothed with a sense of humility and a doubt as to his own strength.
"Glad to see you Tom – come in Go no, Master Reynolds let me tell him
Prescence come in – sit here take a chair. Roland
You know Representative Calhoun – of course. Well how's things, Tom?
Pooly pooly – we ~~are~~ but wandering sheep, Master Reynold herded hither and yon, and God alone knows where we're a going.
O not so bad as that is it?
Worse – it's stealing and threats and lying all the time and we don't know who to trust. Now Master Reynolds thinks that railroad bill is yours. I don't know nothing about railroads & I suppose its all right. Sarah – ways I in a gay & debonair what you says. But I wants you in turn & vote for my bill" And Tom present an oddly written bill & ~~buy land for~~ enable the slaves & buy land and sell it on easy terms & the freedmen"

41-1-163

Reynolds smiled inwardly for he could imagine what a bonanza this meant for the theives black & white. But a thought struck him. Was not this a way & secure Sands bribe without openly his own money? Of course it was too bad, but was he & hold himself responsible for this simple old Negro's guilelessness?

"Tom" he said "this is a great scheme - leave it with me tonight & I'll see you tomorrow at 10.

"God bless you Master Reynolds" said the black man as he passed through the gate. It happened however that as he passed down the street he saw the familiar build of Sands approaching and being by no means a ~~fool~~ fool he slipped behind a tree and then followed Sands back & Reynolds gate and saw him enter. Then he returned slowly shaking his head & knitting his brows.

Reynolds received Sands with the same ~~hospitality~~ and the same smile and placed him on the same chair

41-1-14

Then he drew his chair up and shuddering and a document said "Sands do you own any land?
I've got a few little parcels here and there"
Can you get any more
Lord yes and don't check if I had the money.
Well now Sands I'm going to loan you $10,000 and I want you to buy up a lot of land quietly and cheaply
What worthy land – good land?
Away from your side – but a lot of it. Then when ~~when there comes~~ you get a chance to sell this land
I want my money back and – O well my half the profit
Sands looked skeptical – "you can't sell land now-a days –" he commenced
Yes you can if the state buys it and if you are on the committee of purchase"
Sands ~~let a slowly shading a~~ smile ~~creep~~ over his fat face.
"Say – whose scheme is this Your Calhoun's. He wants the state to buy land for the Negroes
I'm this crowd going to vote for it
yes
"So's mine" chuckled Sands
But careful – don't let the arbitrageurs. Around it at re-

41-1-165

"O I knows how" said Sands. "Well then Exclusively I Come down to the office tomorrow & will settle about [illegible] that bill." When Sands went out Reynolds went and bade Roland good night
"Yes I'll settled that dirty business" he said "these niggers are a good-for-nothing set — either fools or rascals"

Chapter 17

~~The Reformers~~ The Missing Cowhide

Roland was toying with the guitar on his favorite knee.
and John Reynolds was rubbing his hands.
"~~I~~ I'll mend things nicely" he said "and now my boy one owes indebtedness ~~bill~~ in the ~~east~~ line from the Miss. & Charleston, ~~If the Yankees~~ ~~have a mind to hurt me~~ with its bonds guaranteed by the state. The stock will run from 10 & 50 yearly It'll be at 75 in a week and all Carolina clamoring & buying it
"Well we will see" said Roland stopping
music
"I don't know" said Reynold slyly. Roland paused in surprise — "Why I thought ——"
"Ed — The trouble ~~comes~~ ought to come from the north & it may come from the North & Savannah. In the first case there is; in the second case we must sell & secede ~~and~~
and a north & south branch"
~~The two end a branch~~ "But there is no such branch!"

41-1-166

& Charleston as I have always said. But I've heard from Yancey

No but there's a charter granted away back in 1854.
Who owns it
~~Jones and Coles + a few others~~ The Eastern syndicate — Jones is in it.
Can we get it?
You're well left — where are you going?
"Dining with ~~Sleight-Jones~~ some ~~other~~ fellows" &
he rode off.

Now it was quite by accident that Edith Coles and her little band, rode out that morning
~~Two girls + boys were~~ ~~at their grounds~~ & Lloyd Jones bright ~~afternoon~~ afternoon & rode right in the way of the hunting party. Now did ~~the young beauty~~ her mother & father would come under it for recognize Reginald although she knew that, the Southern aristocracy held us to nine at the carpet-daggers' can But ~~Edith~~ ~~thanked Robert politely for the favor, & bowed a few~~ ~~steps back at them~~ they talked & laughed & danced — of hunting & hounds, of school & play, of knights & ladies, of tournaments —

Edith
She had met him often during the past year by accident and design & learned to know him

"Let's ride a tournament" cried Roland ~~shrugging~~ & ~~the~~ light of his weakest young man head, and three or four others cried "a tournament" a tournament" all in a trice Rose had gotten a horse. Of course Edith was gay & gave her glove ~~as a favor~~ to Lloyd, but Roland rode quickly to her, & Lloyd courteously reined his horse & gave him precedence. So she bowed her head & ~~loaded him~~ crowned me Rolands grey

L 91-1-14

Jenny held her glove aloft. This shall be the prize, she said eyes & fastened her [illegible] on his coat. Lloyd begged the glove of one of the other girls ("a dowdy!" declared Edith) and they [illegible] for the race ~~on a chunky~~ ~~steed~~. They were to run a mile down the road past a half dozen Negro cabins & the great oak & back again & where the young ladies sat at the goal post

Down the road four horses flew. The little cream pony bounded aloof & shot far ahead; Lloyd's brown horse ran evenly & steadily with the bay che at his shoulder, but Roland's great black stallion reared plunged & fought at the reins & So they went round the corner beyond the cabins & the girls waited with dancing hearts listening & the dying boy held the silence – the clock ticked – no – yes, yes they're coming then thundering & the brown nose of Lloyd's horse inched its long way ahead [illegible] round the corner on the inner track, [illegible] right behind him red nostrilled and snorting flew the mad stallion of Roland & far behind the pony & the bay. Then, how did it happen?
suddenly a little half naked black child [illegible] wild toddled waddled after a kitten. [illegible] Hearing the thundering of hoofs she turned & stopped right before Lloyd's forelegs, her great black eyes

891-1-17

Behind them all running Edith's dark hound yelling & crying upon the horses in solemn wonder. ~~And the great~~ beast ~~the~~ Edith's head clasped. With a great tremor of arm & body Lloyd pulled his horse & the mighty ad lost the race for Roland never reversed or faltered but straight over the child he rode, the horses great forehaps great gnawing its head & scarcely the kitten's ~~the~~ blood & fur on the ground. The child, unharmed, still stood gazing mournfully at dead shelter with two great tears in its eyes, but Roland knelt at Edith's feet & held her glove in his hand.

41-1-169

And she? In all her little life she had not been so torn with overwhelming emotion: fear for ~~the child~~, human life, admiration for dare devil loyalty, respect for human thought fulness, conceit at victory, pity for animals, and above all a little fury at being buried even above — yes above life and death & a little anger at being buried at less than a nigger baby.
Whether she was glad or sorry at the outcome she could hardly say, yet she smiled very Jovianly at Roland and looked at him thoughtfully with a wrinkle in his brow and let him ride beside her until suddenly she looked about with a little cry:

"Dravalo"

The hound was nowhere to be seen. They rode back a little distance but it was rapidly darkening.

"I know he's gone to the swamp again" she said
"Will take two days to search for him in the swamp" and Lloyd

"Yes" said Roland quickly "I'll ride in from the South & you from the North

"The south entrance is pretty difficult riding

"Better than for the better rider" said Roland fondly & Edith looked at him & blushed.

"Then you start early — both of you & I'll ride down by the great road at 10 on the morning & accost you

"At ten" said Lloyd

"At ten on my reality" said Roland sweeping a great bow and lifting his strong ruddy face toward her.

She rode home thoughtfully a little puzzled ~~at~~ ~~she dared~~ at the mornings doings and her mother scolded her for her "Coltiness". She scanned them only the first Roland Reynolds had.

"Roland Reynolds, the cowboy beggar; Edith you are not to accost with him — I forbid it — the very idea; But Edith shook her head and went to her father whose voice she heard in the library. He was sitting there talking to Tom Cochrane. Edith kissed her father and shook hands with the bland man cordially:

"Good evening Uncle Tom" Then she nestled at her father's feet and listened & shrugged. Tom continued:

"Yes, Master Coles, Master Reynolds says dates the land stand as much as me do. He says that he expected Sands to make something off of it but she didn't. Expect even an umpire friend. He says he's going to lease a corporation mine.

41-1-14

ment with the best of the blacks and whites and he wants my help. Master Reynolds this may be the truth but I doubts — I doubts. Anyways I wants to clinch the thing and I wants your help. I wants your white folk, your old masters to join with us black folk and help old Carolina to have a decent government"

Coles shook his head sadly:

~~Is the present government hopeless?~~

"The present government is certainly hopeless"

"The legislature is a den of thieves. Many of our white leaders ~~are~~ are selfish rascals. Most of us black men are ignorant and some are scamish. If things go to the dogs we'll be blamed for it - unborn children will point balk to these dark days and say "See what Niggers did.' Scandal after scandal has followed this government - cheat after cheat - we must do something ~~- won't you tell us what?~~"

"Didn't I warn you against these rascals, Tom?"

"Yes you did Master Coles - you warned and my heart warned me. And yet what could I do? I knows little myself - I needs leading. They offered leadership with fair promises and you - forgive me Master Coles - you offered nothing."

"You know Tom that I think the whole thing wrong that I do not believe Negroes ought to vote." But you did not believe in slavery Master Coles;"

"No - that is -"

"There's no middle ground Master Coles - for God's sake stretch out your hand and help us - it isn't power, it is not money - we wants peace, Mastere Coles, just peace - the right to breathe and belong to ourselves, the right to own our wives and daughters, the right to live and walk like men - won't you help us.?"

Coles shook his head.

The old man still plead "Can't you advise us - what shall we do to escape from the clutches of these rascals and thieves - to escape from ourselves?"

"I can't help you Tom. I do not know why but I can't - perhaps its because of blind prejudice, perhaps is't the voice of God, perhaps it's sheer cowardice but I can't lead you black men. If you were about to die - I might ~~even~~ die for you. But I can't live for you - I can't do for you what I see with perfect clearness you need to have done for you and I can't simply because you're black and I'm white. God love you Old man - you think you are suffering - I'm the real sufferer in this awful paradox - I who see and may not move, who move and may not see. All my life, all my thought is contradiction: I was born to a system I despised, yet I cannto escape it; lost I lost my money to save my country, then took my sword and fought for liberty when I knew it meant slavery: today with my back on slavery I despise the present liberty It's all dark to me Tom - it's all dark and unfathomable. All my life has been twisted - I loved a woman once, Tom and she loved me and yet she rode and trampled on her own heart for the pleasure of crushing me because I hungered for light and truth - No, no word! go Tom."

41-1-172

The old man went in silence.

"Papa - who was the woman you loved"

Damon Cales ~~bothered~~ started in surprise

Edith - why Edith of course I have forgotten you little dumpling. Never mind father's Tales — get your shakespeare where were we reading?"

Tom went straight to Colonel Jones and Colonel Jones disappointed and dogged listened. He not only listened but he heeded Tom with a courtesy and consideration quite unusual for he knew a change must come in the government and that the Negroes like Tom held the balance of power. It seemed to him that present conditions could not endure. Consciousness must come and why not with Tom?

Clyde sees it later from a long wandering funeral his mother furnishes at Colonel Jones's ~~conception~~ reception of a Negro in her parlor. He knows of the murky outrage but ~~suspects~~ suspects the unspoken surrender & rapine and he knows that his father and mother knew even more than he. To suspect his mother can & meet him white & wide eyed.
"You must [illegible]" she said and his heart fell within him for

I'm going to sell out at par which will mean a clear $100,000 profit and trade in the charter for the north & south branch. This latter is of the utmost importance and me you need manipulate ~~young Lloyd Jones to~~ at ~~he would~~. Young Lloyd Jones may object for sentimental reasons at first but his grandfather's scheme

[illegible] be there
[illegible] the better, ~~must be his attorney~~
But father
John Reynolds looked at them. "What's her name?"
he asked shrewdly
Edith Coles
"Coles? good! Now look here: Under ordinary circumstances she wouldn't marry you even if she cared for you. She's a blue blooded aristocrat & you're a carpet-bagger. There's only one chance for you & that is wealth. You let Lloyd Jones [illegible] while you make a million. Then you shake a few greenbacks under her dainty nose."

Roland Reynolds smiled shrewdly and ~~turned~~ was just busying himself in his papers as his father left and the waiters uttered an exclamation
Roland looked [illegible]. Mrs. Lloyd Jones was approaching on foot & alone. ~~To say John Reynolds~~ & Roland discreetly retreated & the inner office & closed the door. To say that John Reynolds

41-1-14

I was surprised put the matter mildly - he was astonished. She represented much that he coveted - breeding, social prestige, wide influence among the still powerful class of unreconstructed southerners. She had not recognized him since the war - looked coldly above his head and snubbed his wife and son. And here she came to his office. He received her warily - being coldly polite and business like, but handing her a chair in the light and then silently seating himself with coolly expectant air and looking straig~~ht at he~~ at her ~~She~~ She did not beat around the bush. "Is it possible for us southerners to come to terms with you - ~~carpet beggars~~ northerners?" she asked.

He considered. "That would depend on your demands!" he said.

"We have but one demand" she said - "the complete throwing over of your Negro allies."

"And in return for that?"

"In return for that I and my friends will work for complete alliance with you."

"In that case I think we can agree" he said after a pause.

"You will throw over the Negroes."

"yes, if your party treats us fairly."

"We will - it is agreed. What now shall be the first step."

He considered, watching her. "Your son might come into my law office and run for the legislature next fall."

She hesitated and paled. "Very well - he shall" she answered and then "on your part" - she bent forward "suppose you - join the Ku-Klux."

He started, thought rapidly. "I'll do it" he said.

"Very well" she arose and bowed but did not offer her hand, and departed. He watched her musingly:

"I wonder who got the best of the bargain" he ~~mused~~ said

91-1-14

did come suspect

John Reynolds [illegible] thinking. He feared a rapprochment between the Negroes and the southerners which would result in the ousting of his par[illegible]. They had carried the last election to be sure but by a narrow margin and the help of only a few southerners like Harrison Coles and the presence of Uni[illegible]d States troops. When the troops went, what? asked Reynolds. And too, he had heard

Tom Calhoun had been ~~impressed by~~ consulting ~~Colonel Jones~~ and other southern leaders, with what success

~~plainness and cordiality.~~ It was a very uncertain situation and John Reynolds ~~was~~ balanc[illegible] yet these things careful[illegible]

Meantime Edith Cales was sitting by the gate Dad tapping her little boot impatiently. Of course she knew how it would turn out: Rolene would come riding in with the poor little beast hanging & pawing round. She would bow and perhaps raise her hand to his lips. And she? Well how could any woman of 19th such loving a strong masterful man who did things? who just crashed through the world and conquered it? And Lloyd? O Lloyd was so namby-pamby - so polite, so considerate & so - "Lloyd!" she exclaimed in surprise as he rode up. She looked about curiously - he was alone.

"I thought Mr. Reynolds would have been detained" he said interpreting her look. She was half angry and elated & afraid when she noticed the bundle at his saddle bags as he dismounted & blood beside her. She dismounted!

"Dramalo?"

Dead, he said, setting down the box which covered the dead & mangled beast. She turned away with increasing resentment in her heart. But as she turned she glanced at him and saw a little rivulet of blood coming down his face. She wheeled back

"You're - wounded"

"Just a scratch" he faltered "the cat came after me too"

"The cat"

Yes a wild cat killed poor dramalo

Enemy by reason a cowboy dragger?

LL/1-17

She bent forward quickly and saw the clotted blood at the edge of the cut and the awkward knob of it. She grew pale – faltered and ~~dropped & the ground~~ clutched & the ground before he could help her she tore the sheer ruffle from her dress & sent the groom for water dress. She ~~sank~~ bent beside her & she ~~bound the cloth deftly~~ washed his cuts & slime skin, and bound the cloth deftly about the wound, touching him lightly yet lingeringly She still on his knee bent looking her & said simply

"I love you, Edith"

And she answered meekly: "Lloyd I am a very foolish little girl and ignorant of the world & many things – I do silly things at times I am sure and yet my heart is good and true and – I long to learn. And – Lloyd, if you will let me I will sit beside you all the days of our lives and we two will – love and learn"

He put his arms around her and kissed her lips and the red glow of the morning shot into the gloom of her cheeks, while round about them swayed ~~drooped~~ the soft leavings of summer & shade

Suddenly she looked at him sorely:

"Why didn't you go and sell your railroad?

I couldn't – I suppose I ought & shame."

~~What kind of~~ You're doing Col Innes and all fellows doing?

a Syndicate ~~thing~~ been trying & buy back a railroad which Reynolds owns and he has at last consented to sell. We're putting all we can scrape with it, dear, and if it fails and I don't know when I can marry you and trading on old memories.

41-1-178

But it won't fail —

"We ornament with his eyes"

But she persisted "How can it fail?"

Well I am a little uneasy — perhaps it's wrong — but why should Reynolds sell just now if the investment is safe? He says he needs ready cash & all that but —

She looked grave: "You ought to have gone Lloyd

And he answered: "All the railroads of the land waited & gone for the love of one little girl"

Late in the afternoon, long after Lloyd had gone she came down and swung on the great gate in the sunset, deliriously happy and wondering how she had ever hesitated or doubted. Rapid hoof beats came down the road and instinctively she knew who it was. First she started to slip away, then all her womanly helpfulness came upon her and she clambered back on the gate & stuck a lily in her hair and whispered to herself "Sixteen Gate, My Lord" and then aloud "Good evening, Mr Reynolds — is not this a happy day"

She leaped from the horse and approached in mingled trepidation and 4-1-17

"I'm sorry – so sorry – I —"

She bent forward confidentially looking radiant in the sun:

"Did you beat them?" she said

He lost his head "What me did" he cried "unloaded the whole thing at a fancy price and got the other myself to pay for nothing" Then he suddenly remembered that her ~~friends~~ were among the ~~was one of~~ the meeting and he ended

~~I'd be a rich man some day" he said "I must be glorious & be rich & have everything & go & [illegible]~~

"I hope I be a rich man some day, and wealth is known. I deemed like I be powerful enough & help those I love"

"yes – and will Lloyd be rich too?

He mistook her thought and chuckled

"Hardly"

"Was he left anything – after this"

~~Poor little a nothing as I figure~~

"Not after this deal" he said looking at her eagerly ~~absolutely~~ for she had never seemed so beautiful and so – so tame

rapture shaded her eyes

"absolute nothing" she persisted, looking forward till her again he mistook her and veered

O. ~~perhaps a little~~ Of course he's got a little something and do you know what that little somethings is:

"Why no – what ~~has~~ he got?" he asked ~~in confusion~~ quickly

"~~I~~ "me"

41-1-14

and suddenly & Roland Reynolds the world was quiet.

Chapter 18

The Lynching

Harrison Coles had changed his ymind yet he ~~did not admit it~~. He merely said decisively:

"I will never consent to such cowardice."

Colonel Jones seemed very angry - "Then you are ready to Africanize South Carolina, are you" he complained.

"No I am not - but I will not consent to fight barbarism by worse barbarism; to stop wrong by ~~conning~~ conniving at it - to stop stealing by murder." And looked at Colonel Jones, ~~eyed him suspiciously, and~~ Colonel Higby ~~said~~ interrupted: "I fear you fail to see the danger of the present situation."

"No - on the contrary I recognize it fully. We have had for four years an awful government. Today there are signs of ~~the~~ reform. The better class of Negroes is crying for the help of decent men; the best of the carpet baggers are striving for reform. What now is suggested to us? To stand aside and hinder the better because it is not the best. To choke the progress of the very things, which we have bitterly pleaded for since the war - it's nonsense gentlemen, it 's cowardly."

"But can you not see the immense danger of this, Mr. Coles" said

~~he~~ added slowly: "Some of you who received Tom Calhoun cordially & his race are now ~~gladly~~ his and his followers everywhere. I ~~too~~ refused this overture, but I did wrong; good government can only come from

"No, no" said Mr Higby "there's your mistake we don't want a good Negro government

41-1-181

~~85~~

~~Mr Highy eagerly~~ "a bad Negro government is a sure guarantee of eventual white supremacy, but a good Negro government is a menace to every white woman in the land."

"Of course it is" growled a big rough headed man "Why down at Beaufort we had a big black nigger judge for three years who didn't know a letter. All we had to do was to shake our ~~fist~~ fist under his nose and you bet he did as we said. It was a roaring farce. Now we've got a nigger that wears store clothes and reads books and by God, white people are beginning to 'mister' him. He knows law too and is raising hell with us farmers."

"Well isn't he a better judge than the ignoramus." asked Coles

"Of course he is and he's a Nigger and a Nigger's no business to be a good judge - and if this one don't take warning there'll be a vacancy in that office by the dark of the next moon."

281-1-14

Harrison Coles arose. "My decision is taken, Gentlemen, I am going to call a taxpayers convention to uphold the good and denounce the bad in the present governmentp I want your cooperation, but with or without it, I'm going ahead." He withdrew.

That night all the country side was alive with riding hurrying men. They came down the riverside galloping softly. They flitted ghostlike along the country road, they santuered lazily through the dim streets. It was past midnight when Harrison Coles left the Negro school house where a group of black men had been whispering their fears to him.

"Remember" he said "I am acting for the good of the state . I did not believe in Negro suffrage but now that it is a fact I want those of you who are men to stand up and support decent government. ~~Remember~~ It will cost you something. They mean mischief, even brute force and murder." He walked slowly out of the door and almost into the arms of a crouching figure. The man slunk sullenly away

"Beg your pardon, sir, no harm meant - just resting - just resting.

Harrison Coles made no answer but unsheathed his pistol and cocking it, rode boldly out into the street. Passing horsemen peered at him, and as he came to the edge of town, shadows flashed quickly by him; and once one rode close to him and whispered some word but Coles made no reply and the horseman muttering rode into the night.

The hours drew heavily on. It was a hot dry September night. The earth was dusty, ~~prached~~ parched and brown, and sullen winds swept lazily ~~upward~~ over from the warm river. A little blue flame curled ~~lazily~~ sullenly upward from the wooden porch that flanked Miss Silena's new school. It curled and dwindled, flared and sputtered. Then it crept hesitatingly along the rafters, licked the ~~pa~~nit of the columns and tasting new fuel glowed red with impatience, ~~s~~ leapt and cracked. Silena slept, her thin hard face, careworn and unlovely, resting on ~~her~~ a gaunt ~~and~~ bended arm, and to her ears the cracking of the little flame came like the far away voice of her mother, whispering from eternity. A girl slept beside her - a beautiful dark faced girl with soft clinging hair. But she too heard nothing but the hail of a prince on horse-back, clicking his golden spurs. Down in the Negro quarter Tom Calhoun paced the floor anxiously in strange unrest. There was devilry afoot in the night - aye he felt it, he had seen the shadows flitting, hurrying. Was it sun-up already? - it could not be! but why was the east so strangely red : it was not the east , it was the west that was red with a wierd ghostlike glow.

"Fire" he cried " Come Rob " and he ~~shot~~ rushed out with beating heart. A black swathed horseman dashed by him but he avoided him. Up the street, he ran and down the hill, up again and the great red curling flames burst on his sight.

"It's the school" he gasped "I knew it" and he stretched every ~~XXXXX~~ muscle. A ~~sea~~ crowd of black folk stood crushed in the square, and in their midst the crimson funeral pyre roared angrily toward heaven. But in the fields beyond huddled the children, all but the two whose souls on piling smoke were mounting upward to God. Out in the seared fields they stood around the slight form of one little woman. whose thin face shone white in the golden glow of the flames.

Meantime John Reynolds was waiting. That night he saw the red glow of ~~John Reynolds rotted.~~ flames unevenly he knew that sooner or later the summons was coming. Violence and murder were spreading and every night the dark riders filled the fields. Frightened Negroes were hurrying to the towns, unrest and apprehension sat on men's faces everywhere and ~~when John Reynolds~~ tonight when he went out late ~~Saturday night~~ to look after his horses, ~~as Boggs had left,~~ he was not surprised to find suddenly two black Cloaked figures at his side.

4-1-18

"Well?" he asked coolly, looking at the two masked men.

"You will come with us, Mr. Reynolds."

"Where?"

"Never mind, the horse is saddled."

They all mounted and rode slowly down the deserted streets, and out toward the wood, ~~when Reynolds had so narrowly escaped them before~~ that bordered the city. It was a damp misty night and the stars glimmered but drowsily in the grey sky. On and on they rode saying no word but ever Reynolds caught the gleam of the pistols and felt the watchful eyes of the masked men beside him. They drew into the wood and passed far into the deeper forest and then they halted and listened to the hooting of owls until the black motionless wood livened into dark ~~and masked~~ fantastic riders. ~~They~~ All of them grouped themselves about the prisoner in a wide circle and one said in muffled tones:

"Mr. Reynolds do you understand that southerners propose to rule the south."

"I do and as a southerner I propose to help them?"

"Do you know what it means to be a southerner?

"I think I do."

41-1-184

Every Legs all comforting himself often. Suddenly a dark figure appeared hurrying along the road on foot. The Watcher Crouched in the underbrush. Let the Lord proceed & then follow Carefully

~~91.~~

"Let us see:- it means first an unalterable determination to keep Negroes in their places - do you agree?"

"Yes."

"And their place is not to vote but to work under white men".

"I believe that too; I did not believe it for a while, but I have been convinced."

"You are ready then to cast in your lot with us?"

"Yes."

"Swear our oaths and obey our orders?"

"I think so, so far as I understand them."

"Very well - let us see: we want Tom Calhoun to night. He is a dangerous Nigger. ~~What was it you told him out in the wood near here last Thursday?~~ What are your relations to him?

~~"I told him about a note to my man Boggs which I had discovered."~~

"And by ~~"And in so doing~~ you thwarted our plans." ~~"We have been political allies."~~ That alliance you have thwarted our plans repeatedly"

"I did ~~not know it~~" what I thought was to my interest"

"Very good - ~~are you ready to atone?~~ where are your interests now?"

"~~I think so.~~" With you.

Very well! "Tom Calhoun is organizing a league of Negroes."

"I've heard so.!

"They meet tonight?"

"Possibly."

"They meet tonight!"

"Yes".

"You will lead us to the meeting."

"Why did you not follow them?"

"Never mind - you know why - will you lead us!" A cold sweat broke over John Reynolds. He knew that these Negroes had outwitted the KuKlux several times. Tom ~~had told them of~~ knew their usual meeting place ~~tonight~~. Yet he hesitated. It was an awful thing to be a bare-faced traitor.

"Do you intend to harm the Negroes?"

"We intend to give them their deserts."

"But do you intend to kill them?"

"No." Still he hesitated. Then he thought of his son, his wife & his plans - he glanced at the pistols - "Well - come" he said.

41-1-185

Slowly they rode out under the dull grey sky, their hoof beats echoing softly ~~and~~ as they cantered along the roads ~~up~~ toward the ~~head waters of the Congaree,~~ sea. At last into they turned and listened ~~to its rippling.~~ A wind sighed in the trees and from afar a night hawk schreeched. Suddenly some one cried "halt". Reynolds peered around carefully - led them further into the woods and then pointed silently ahead. A low dark cabin stood there. They knocked Noone answered. They knocked louder and Tom Calhoun ~~suddenly~~ the door opened, and stood in the glare of a lighted pine knot. He held a rifle in his hand.

"Who's there" he cried.

"Mr. Reynolds" answered some one.

Tom stepped out, ~~and~~ then started back as he saw the masked cavalcade. Then he smiled quietly.

~~Said~~ "We knew Reynolds was a traitor ~~I told to Reynolds purposely for I did not trust him~~ there is no meeting here, gentlemen."

A haunting sense of shame crept over Reynolds' limbs. He turned his head away and as he did a sharp report rang out - another and another, the cabin was ablaze and three saddles were empty. There was a rush and a struggle in the night.

"Kill him" somebody hissed and quickly he felt himself borne round by the horsemen.

"Take this" cried one and he seized the dangling end of a rope.

"Ride - ride like hell" cried his neighbor.

Four of them rode into the teeth of the rising wind and the rope ~~bumped~~ stretched and strained behind them. The shadowy trees flew screaming by and the paleness of the dawn sat upon the ~~hilltops~~ waters. Reynolds was faint and weary - why did the rope pull and thump and strain so - he turned to look back, but a sudden horror gripped him; on he rode hatless, disheveled, gasping; he turned again but the black horsemen wheeled abruptly to the right, and he caught only a dim cloud of dark dust; then as they thundered ~~into~~ out of the forest he turned again and saw at the end of the rope a great black body all blood and grime and dust; and he reeled ~~and shrieked~~ and shrieked, and saw no more.

Chapter XXI.

The Death of Juno.

Young Henry Reynolds looked over the ground carefully. It was the spring of 1877 and he was a massive red faced young man and strode about masterfully.

Chapter 19

Ideals

Roland Reynolds was working with feverish energy. The new railroad to Savannah and Northward was building rapidly and he was selecting a site for his factories and branch roads. Manifestly this tract of land not far from the sea at Wilton Point was the most eligible but a stubborn old black woman would not sell one foot of land right in the center. There was nothing to do but to worry her out by preventing all law suits. And This was soon accomplished and Jinny Calhoun and her son and daughter found themselves one morning without a home

When Mary Reynolds heard of this she trembled but there seemed nothing else to be done "You might get the Negro school for one of the Children to teach" she suggested. for Roland was on the school board and this Mary Calhoun was duly appointed. Yet Roland with all his business cares was scarcely happy; and Katherine Grey.

41-1-14

~~193~~

78 A.

Chapter ~~XXI.~~ 19

~~The Echo of a Crime.~~ Echoes

~~It was of course pleasant to settle the little land purchase but~~ ~~still young~~ ~~Henry~~ Roland Reynolds was not happy. ~~He was in fact quite unhappy~~

~~for~~ The wedding invitations to the ~~great~~ Jones-Coles nuptials were out and he was not remembered. It was bad enough to lose to girl but to be snubbed in the bargain was too much. He knew that his fatier had been regarded as a carpet-bagger, and never received by the local aristocracy even when, as a result of the visit of proud Mrs. Irma Lloyd Jones, he had turned traitor to his former associates and helped lynch Tom. Calhoun. It was a rather stiff ~~purse~~ price to pay, ~~but~~ and the ~~whole~~ Reynolds family had looked for the doors of society to fly open to them after such a settlement. But they did not. Young Lloyd Jones went into politics listlessly for a living, and painted pictures assiduously; the loving pair Mrs. Jones recognized Mrs. reynolds on the street and Colonel Jones called. But that was all. And the rising young ~~Henry~~ Roland Reynolds was bitterly disappointed.

He sat at his desk in the twilight. The clerks had gone and he was about to go. And yet something held him. Twice he started and twice bitter thoughts held him back. But the third time he bent forward to ~~xxx~~ rise it was a singular chanting that caught his ear !- half chant - half murmur:

"Dark midnight was the hour

Dark midnight was the hour,

Hear me, Jesus."

He wheeled toward the door and started involuntarily as it noiselessly opened and the forbidding face of ~~the~~ an ancient black man peered in. He gave no greeting but tottered in with his rythmic murmuring song till he peered close into the young man's face, with his black and red eyes.

"Marse Reynolds, Marse Reynolds" he wheezed "you done turn poor old Juno into the cold. But Caesar lives. Caesar takes him. Marse Reynolds take care - look sharp Marse Reynolds - the curse is a dropping - a -dropping; nothing can't hold it. I saw her when she made it and it's a coming."

Reynolds had recovered from his momentary surprise and was listening to the old man in half amused tolerance.

"Are we all a-cursed Uncle Caesar" he said, ~~"all all you whit~~

"All- all you white folks - you can't never amount to nothing, you can't never die peaceful - for its a-coming. Today just today -" he lowered his voice mysteriously " I done see the Shadow ship and the old dark eyed White Man acoming slow like on the water."

The old fellow with his twisted face looked uncanny in the dying sunlight and Reynolds moved as if to go - but the old man motioned with his claw like- hands -"It ~~began~~ done begin to drop" he continued " the curse ~~began~~ done begin to drop the night of the white and black twins."

Henry rose impatiently, for it was rapidly darkening, and moved toward the doors, the old man hobbling after mumbling- "the black and white twins -one was black and his twenty-five today and nursing his old mother and the curse is not for he; and one is white and he's twenty-five today nursing Colonel Jones - take care old Colonel - take care - "

Henry Reynolds stopped shortly on the stair . He was twenty-five today ~~or tomorrow~~ himself he remembered.

"What's that you said" he asked sharply.

"Oh there's ~~are~~ many white black floks and a many black white folks and the Joneses aint the first nor the last to have 'em ~~im~~ and there's the curse- there's the curse" and before Reynolds could speak again the old man had glided away mumbling and chanting.

41-1-189

All night the talk of the white and black twins ran in Reynolds' head for he remembered something his father had told long ago of trouble in the Jones home soon after his son's birth. Early in the morning he sat straight up in bed with a bitter thought in his head:

"Suppose - suppose there was something crooked in Lloyd Jones'birth - by God!"and he leaped out of bed. All the week he nosed about,asking, hinting until from a dozen queer bits of gossip and fact he was sure he was on the track of some mystery; and on Saturday night he sat down in his silent office and wrote on a bit of white paper

" Are you sure Lloyd Jones is a white man? " and sealed it in a plain envelope and directed it ~~to Harrison Coles, Esq.~~

Harrison Coles received it with his ~~Sunday~~ Monday morning mail.

"What, ~~what~~ that, papa?" asked Edith,curiously. But he answered evasively and went to his study. There he looked at it. Was the shadow of the old curse of the land about to fall on him again? Of course it was but a miserable bit of anonymous gossip and yet - and yet - the servants old tales had not entirely escaped him before this,and if the thing was going to be bruited abroad - absurdly untrue,as it of course was,yet the very lie might bring awful misery to him and his. He ~~took his hat and went straight~~ hesitated a moment and then dropped the paper into the fire place and watched the flame.

Then he turned to the mirror. Two men were struggling in each of his many faced hearts, and deserved then walking in close converse were John Reynolds and his son.

Consummation.

Martha Reynolds sat in Mrs.Harrison Coles' parlor. She had on a very tight silk dress and shoes that pinced fearfully and she felt an animate gasp.

"Colonel Jones'sudden death was very sad"said Mrs.Coles.

"Yes indeed - he was a true southerner"said Mrs.Higby.

"yes" Mrs.Coles admitted "but not of course of our best blood."

Whereat Mrs.Higby was made slightly uncomfortable.

"You were not at the picnic" she said turning to Mrs.Reynolds.

"No,I was making bread - "

"Making bread?" asked Mrs.Coles in surprise.

"Yes the sponge was just ready "

"You don't mean to say - where were your maids?"

"Maids? oh, the girl - why - I - I always make my own bread - mother always did.

Mrs.Coles merely said "Oh!" but she contrived to put several remarks into that monosyllable.

41-1-192

"Besides"said Mrs.Reynolds "our girl - such a good,neat and obliging girl she was - had a terrible accident - fell out the window that very day and broke her hip".

"How careless"said Mrs.Coles. "But we shall all be glad to call on Mrs.Grimes and her daughter"she said as Mrs.Reynolds arose "I have heard my husband speak of the late Mr.Grimes frequently."

There was a little smile in the cirnle when Cartha went. "I hear that ~~Henry~~ Roland Reynolds is going to marry this Miss Grimes"said Mrs.Blakesley

"They'll be the richest family in Carolina "said Colonel Higby to Mrs.Jones.

"Yes" she answered listlessly.

"Reynolds himself is a millionaire" said another and the Grimes' are even richer. "

"It will be a great thing for the section - how did Reynolds make his money?"

"By stealing and lying and slavery"said Mrs.Jones and the others were silent.

"He has had the contract for convicts during many years"said Colonel Higby at last.

It was late when Mr. Reynolds came from the office that night

~~"Besides" said~~ Mrs.Reynolds" our girl - such a good,neat and obliging girl she was - had a terrible accident - fell out the window ~~that very day~~ and broke her hip."

"How careless" said Mrs.Coles ; "But we shall all be glad to call on Mrs.Grimes and her daughter" she said as Mrs.Reynolds arose "I have heard my husband speak of the late Mr.Grimes frequently."

So all the city aristocracy called on the rich widow and her slim shy daughter and learned with interest of the engagement of the young lady to Henry Reynolds.

"They'll be the richest family in Carolina "said Colonel Higby to Mrs.Jones.

"Yes" she answered listlessly.

"Reynolds himself is a millionaire" said another and the Grimes' are even richer. "

"It will be a great thing for the section - how did Reynolds make his money?"

"By stealing and lying and slavery"said Mrs.Jones and the others were silent.

"He has had the contract for convicts during many years"said Colonel Higby at last.

"Happy man"sighed a youngster "that is better than a gold mine."

All this time the happy man was walkwng walking down by the sea.

Yes he was rich at last,very rich . See these were his lands disappearing on the horizon. This was his check book, ^ here the balance; But he was restless. He had just quarrelled with Martha.

"Silena? Silena the Nigger teacher,to Henry's wedding? Of course not- what would the Joneses say - what would Mrs.Coles say? Nonsense. You must drop Silena forget her. We're up in the world now.!

And he turned fretfully from the old dumb suffering in Martha's eyes and walked down ~~to the sea~~ town

His son ~~came by and nodded. walked sturdily with him~~ ; rode by & stopped:

"Where's the bride?"said the father forcing wild gayety into his tones.

"O I left her up there - she's got no sense and she's homely as a cat."

"Sh! she's rich as Croesus, you fool."

"Yes but God! father just think of her beside Harrison Coles' daughter, whom Lloyd Jones has married."

"The penniless fools."

"Yes penniless - but I'd give more for a breath of that girl's nostrils than for -

"Hush - hush for God's sake, boy - don't you see your future! this land will yet be one of the richest on earth and you can be the richest in it - you can -

"What?"

"Well what more do you want?"

"O nothing I reckon - good night."

John Reynolds turned and followed the rider afar with bowed head, stumbling as though drunk, drunk with pale wine of the world. Something was wrong - everything was wrong. He saw his son ride into the back gate, but he himself went groping along the path through the old field in the gray dusk of day, thinking. Dreaming of Canaan, of Grimes, of Jones - of - he shuddered and tried to forget - yes of Tom, of great black Tom, until slowly at his very side Tom rose and stood. He saw his great black bulk against the west; he saw the glittering gun barrell just as on that night - he strove to speak whispering, pleading "Tom, Tom!" and then in great flash and roar he fell headlong in the path.

How long he lay there he never knew. But when he tottered to his feet in the black night he was an old man, very, very old. And always, ever after there were shadows creeping about him - great waving shadows: shadows that shut out his vision, shadows that slipped across his speech and made him forget in mid-sentence, shadows and nets and twines - always every where shadows even on that night when he looked at Martha across the murdered body of their son.

Tonight a neighbor passed him as he staggered onward toward the roaring of the sea.

"Good night, Mr. Reynolds."

"Good night - good night - all nights were good like this and all were hateful. She there sat an old woman on the porch - as old as he was and older who was she? he seemed to know her but the shadows - ah well. Her face was bitter and hard and white and she saw something yonder beyond the dark tossing and ~~even~~ when for a space the shadows lifted his brain blazed with fully struggling thoughts. He saw everything knew everything, lived again the tumult of the day the week, the lengthening years. Then the shadows waned rose again & crept and fall sea. Was it the something - the great intangible Something that all his life he had missed? True he had not searched for it as he might but now and then He had searched when the quest of Gold gave time, but he had never found it - should never find it, for it had fled afar. What was it? Involuntarily he found himself stretching his hands, his old worn hands, doubtingly against the setting sun. A couple passed him, twined with arms walking toward the sounding sea, and behind them a great song arose and swelled across the tossing waters and echoed back again. He stopped and listened, then staggered upward from the sea and toward the setting sun and all was red and dark and black save yonder where gleamed a woman's bitter eyes staring white-faced at the white faced sea.

41-1-194

41-1-195

131
126

The Omen.

On the great cape that beetles with black brows above the northern waters sat an old man with twined arms and head between his knees. Great wind-swept snows lay on the land, and green and glistening ice told of the bitter cold that slept in those cold waters. Bleak and bare lay all the world, and the pale rays of the rising sun glittered and froze in the tall thin throated pines.

Yet on the Indian came, whirling his frail canoe inward from the west and gathering his blanket closely about him, and onward crept a thin and scarred half-frozen hound upward from the east. The old man looked upon them both with dull unhappy eyes. The hound whined and whimpered at his feet searching, searching in the ice, and the Indian threw himself prone upon the ice covered ground and lay there staring at the sky. The old man said sorrowfully;

"So soon, so soon, my Son? The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong." In the brown face of the prostrate man a blue pallor struggled and fought. He spoke thickly and with pain:

"Life is a lie" he said.

"Calling for Truth" murmured the old man and slowly he had his face again between his knees, while even the blond and limping beast walked between the two, in and out, up and down, forward and back with his nose in the ice, his red eyes glazed, searching, searching.

"The world is ugly" continued the Indian.

"Wanting beauty" returned the old man.

"Men's deeds are evil."

"Searching for good."

The young man was silent but the old man continued solemnly;

"For truth that speaks not, Beauty that will not see, for idle Goodness, there was in that world, is in this, and will be in the world to be, no goal but Death."

And suddenly the rigor of death shook the dark frame of the prostrate freezing man. Great white flakes of driven snow filled the heavens swirling, circling and gathering themselves into one great fleecy cloud; then they dropped gently like a vast unwoven pall above the bier.

41-1-197

Book II.

The way of Sinners.

The Way of Sinners.

Chapter I.

The Fugitive.

Great sheets of piling snow lay drifted across the little Massachusetts valley where Canaan nestled; the dark mountains towered dreamily above the scattered twinkling houses and the ~~weary~~ wan wind ~~sang~~ wailed in the oaks and elms. A little girl pressed ~~dere~~ her face against the tiny window panes, saw the gloomy passing of lights and the waving of branches and saw the pale disc of the cold moon; ~~then peering~~ and beyond far down the white lonesome road, ~~she~~ caught the ~~the form of a dark thing moving slowly and~~ formless outlines of a dark slow moving thing; her little heart fluttered wildly.

"They're coming, Ma," she whispered, ~~hurriedly.~~

The tired woman came slowly from the kitchen, with the odor of hot food about her tnd looked ~~out too~~.

"Yes" she said, ~~and~~ walking back to the kitchen, and the dishes rattled.

The dark thing coming swelled and grew, swayed and crunched in the crisp snow, the breath of the horses whitened in the night, and the driver in front of the covered ~~vehicle~~ cart stamped impatiently as he neared the gate. A ~~tall~~ man emerged from the dark ~~interior~~ and opened the gate quickly, the old stage coach swung into the yard and the little girl's heart stood still. She heard the moving and the muffled voices, the opening and closing of doors and the swift silences. At last came her mother"s voice:

"Martha, Martha?"

She walked slowly to the kitchen. A woman sat opposite - a massive loosely formed bundle of rags. And her face! the little girl gazed at it fascinated: it was black, a dark rayless black, unvarying formless. It was not something, but absence of something, an awful void of color and form - so thought the wild eyed child as she gazed, stricken.

"Martha, fetch the milk - hurry."

She slipped to the pantry mechanically, thinking swiftly:

"This is a slave, a real black slave and wicked people sell such slaves just like ~~—~~ like milk" - Crack! and the milk lazily formed a lake and a peninsular on the floor.

"Martha! you careless child - look now at that pitcher of grandmother's and a full quart of milk - you - "

Martha suddenly ~~awakened and~~ woke flew to repair the damage, and soon more milk was there and the little supper ready. ~~Then~~ As the fugitives sat there silently, ravenously eating the girl stood on the sill of the sitting room door and watched them furtively. The head of the woman was crowned with greyish black tufts of curiously crinkled hair. Then she discovered the boy altho already she had been dimly conscious of him. His hair was a closely woven mat of formless black and beneath his face lay in dark monotonous brown. She watched his hands as they greedily flew away the food; how dark and fat they were with their creamy nails, and ~~then~~ she looked at her own pale hands thoughtfully.

All night and the next day the little girl lived in phantasy - hearing the faint echo of her father's voice as he talked ~~below far into the night~~ long, late, below, looking guiltily ever and again at the great grey barn and rushing to hide in an ecstacy of terror when a neighbor stopped to pass the time of day. John alone she told, swearing him to dread secrecy - for John was her only playmate and she told him all things.

The day died again and night came down the snowy mountains and hushed the vale; ~~and~~ the black woman, the boy and her baby, crept silently fromm the cold barn and sat again in the kitchen and the little girl, again, stared gravely at them ~~again~~, listened to the talk and all unconsciously crept nearer to look at the dark baby with its great midnight eyes. But when the ragged woman stretched out her hand half ~~consciously~~ coaxingly toward her, the child shrunk back in sudden nameless repulsion at this uncolored hand and slipped away in a far corner and the smile died in the woman's eyes.

So at last the shadowy stage coach crunched thru the yard under the half shadowed moon. There was a whispering in the night and the sound of dying hoof beats. The little girl crept upstairs shivering to her bed and tossed and dreamed. And in her dreams were cruel murderers buying and selling blood, and great black faces with piteous eyes.

Chapter II.

Thrift.

Sudden springtime beat in the air of Canaan and pulsed on the green and velvet hills. The river sang and gurgled, the trees stood bursting with pride and the robin was full breasted with song. John Reynolds was leaning against the corner of the wood shed and he too was at the springtime of life - a tawny, long-nosed keen-eyed young man, sparely built ~~and nervous, hesitant with vibrant strength.~~ with stooping shoulders, curved back and long arms.

"Time is money, John, time is money - what in ~~the name of~~ tarnation goodness are you ~~dawdling~~ moping about here for and the upper field not touched yet?"

"I wanted to say a word to you, father - I—".

"Well hurry, ~~hurry~~ - make hay while the sun shines - I'll walk a long toward the field with you - thought you were half done ~~with that field~~ - haven't broke the plow have you?"

"No".

"Nor the harness - be careful of that - a stitch in time saves nine, When I was a young man -"

"Father I want to get married."

"Married? Married?, what on? - Married! - good Lord - why you young ass ~~simpleton~~ - where's your cage, ~~where the cage~~ - first get your cage then catch your bird, I say."

"But father I'm young and strong and I'm willing to work and you've got a little laid by and—"

"A little, I should say it was a little, scarcely a cent, hardly enough to keep my gray hairs from starvation when I'm old. None to waste on some crazy girl."

"There's the meadow place with a little house, I might take that."

"It's rented, it brings in money, cash every month - it's wicked to throw away the Lord's sustenance - wilful waste makes woeful want."

"But I can earn as much if I take the place."

"Who'll help me here?"

"Well my help then is worth something."

"Well don't I feed and clothe you."

"But I'll work harder if - "

"A bird in the hand's worth two in the bush - stick to your job boy and when you've saved something then think of marrying."

"But I'm twenty-three already."

"Twenty-three - ha! - a child, ~~a babe.~~ You've got a good ten or fifteen years to work and save yet -who's the girl - has she any money?"

"No - it's Martha Culver -she's smart and willing."

"Pshaw - the Culvers haven't anything,up to their ears in debt and wasting good money helping slaves who don't need help -besides the girl's as old as you are - go on,go on John and get the field plowed."

The wizened blear-eyed old man hastened away ~~xxxxx xxx xxxxx xx~~ mumbling and John took up the reins slowly. He pointed the plow's nose toward the heart of the soft brown soil,clucked to his horse and stumbled across the field turning a great dark wave of fragrant loam. In the field beyond, by the fence,a girl was bending over her gardening . She was bending but not working,and as the plow came nearer,she rose and waited for the young man glancing timidly before and behind. She was not pretty but fresh and good,with honest eyes and lips,round and firm of flesh,shy and sweet in bearing and always busy with work and hidden yearning. They greeted each other diffidently.

"Good morning,Martha."

"Good morning,John."

"Is - your garden planted?"

"Yes - nearly."

Then they looked at each other and in one confused and speaking glance said all or more than their young tongues had failed to say.

"He won't let me,Martha."

She stood still.

Some how his hand touched hers and then before they knew it their arms crept round each other over the rail fence and thru the brambled berry bushes. The hush of the great midmorning sang in their ears.

"Let's run away and get married"he whispered. She grew pale.

"No - no" she said "that would be -wicked - we must wait."

"Why must we wait" he persisted. "The world doesn't wait - the sun and the birds and the brook -" He suddenly stopped and drew back in confusion ~~untwining~~ untwining his arms from the girl,for there her mother stood with bonnet and pail and spade.

"Martha",she gasped,"Martha Culver - you shameless hussy! Before my very eyes."

The girl shrank in utter confusion and the boy with incoherent apology turned heavily away.

"I love him,mother."

"Love - what do you know about love - go to your room and stay there"

So Martha crept to her little room and wept and dreamed and yearned.

Nor did the world and the sun wait. They revelled on until the valley soon was gold and green with leaf and grain. John Reynolds" determination strengthened with the summer. He would go away from here and make his fortune and come back and marry Martha. It was a narrow valley at best and it choked him. The city was calling him - a city of men and work and money Yes he was going to New York and even his father was not whooly displeased when he saw his determination.

"That's where the money is"he quavered "the city's got the money andd if you want it,"he chuckled "why go after it, go after it."

All summer John worked and saved and planned until one day a letter came from New York with printed corner and a great flourish of capitals to tell Mr.John Reynolds that Galesburg and and Grimes would accept his services in their mercantile establishment and pay him five real dollars every week,and many more to hope for if he proved faithful.

On that same day all the low valley flashed with red and gold and swift fall winds thrilled the air. The mountains stood massed in wondrous color,the hills were stacked with yellow grain and red pumpkins,and into a breathless girl's ear John whispered bits of wonderful future - of love and power and gold,o f mansion and meadow and gold,of work and gold. The girl listened willingly altho it gripped her heart to hear so much of gold and so little of love;and yet she knew it was right,for was not love itself golden-eyed? Were not the great dear mountains red-golden in t he autumn sunshine shedding a radiance on her tawny keen-eyed lover as he slipped shadowy across the upper field? That night she strove with God upon her knees that he might forgive her,and care for her on e fortune and make him fortunate.

So soon a day cameya crisp clear day when John Reynolds stood at the little depot with his face set toward New York.

"A penny saved is a penny earned"cried his father "early to bed and early to - " But John had lifted up his eyes to the hills,the flashing glorious hills: For there in the uper field fluttered a little waving of white,and the girl beneath wept with the wide woe of them that wait. The world wept too - a quick chill seemed to strike the autumnal glory of the valley as the train puffed away. A few days and the leaves browned and scattered,a few days and the grain was garnered and the grass sear and too - a quick chill seemed to strike the autumnal glory of the valley as the train pulled away. A few days and the leaves browned and scattered, a few days and the grain was garnered and the grass sere and withered - there was a frost in the breeze, a flurry of snow in the air; the year's night fell and the valley slept.

Chapter III.

Galesburg & Grimes.

Streets, endless streets and a close forestry of houses - a never pausing stream of men and a babel of voices - all this was the wonder and fascination of New York to John. At first it was a picture book, an odd picture book, and he went about his tasks dreamily living in fantasy. Then the round tones of Mr. Galesburg or more often the shrill tenor of Mr. Grimes recalled him and made him blush guiltily. In time his new world differentiated, as all worlds will, into the commonplace and the possible. He began to notice things more keenly, and the first thing he noticed was that Galesburg and Grimes were not uniformly prosperous. Mr. Galesburg to be sure seemed to rise about all fluctuations save those of his cook and tailor. But Grimes was an invariable thermometer; when shipments were overdue, woe to the messengers and clerks; when sales lagged, pity the poor travelling men, and again when cargo slipped in and out quickly and smoothly for cash, could there be a smile more genial than that of Mr. Grimes?

It was a wholesale house down on the gloomy muddy district of East River- old, respectable and with a notable reputation. In the twenties it was John Galesburg who owned a number of stout sailing vessels and traded to England and the Indies; then it was Galesburg and Son, and finally when the astute old Galesburg has signed his last check, Grimes the chief clerk became partner in a flourishing wholesale business. To be sure the house was sorely tried in the wreck of '37 but it weathered the gale and all now seemed plain sailing to Mr. Galesburg; on the whole signs seemed favorable to Mr. Grimes, but he was not so sanguine as his partner, for he foresaw certain changes in the character of business and he had certain unspoken plans. He and Galesburg differed considerably in methods of thought and business. Mr. Galesburg, true to the traditions of the past, was a gentleman dealing with gentlemen, slowly, methodically, almost ponderously. To be sure he demanded passports, proofs of character and financial integrity, but these once given he believed in men. Grimes watched everybody and trusted no one absolutely, he was quick almost ruthless when gain was imminent. When Mackay and Company of Ohio offered their note secured by mortgages on certain western lands Galesburg accepted it because Mackay and Company were old and honorable customers. Grimes accepted it because an agent of his had looked over the land. So when Mr Glenmouth a prosperous southern planter called on the firm & made rosy large purchases the members of the firm received him in different ways — Galesburg with cordiality fadey & ~~bumptious dismissal~~; Grimes with suspicion developing toward ~~confidence~~ deep interest & confidence

"I come" said Mr. Glenmouth as he sat in the private office with the two members of the firm "to arrange a number of transactions in New York, and knowing your firm well from former dealings, I have decided to talk to you first, always my friends of the Commercial Bank feels a little aggrieved" He paused and Grimes cocked his ears while Galesburg shifted ~~in~~ a little

"We are in no competition with the Commercial bank" he said "and I trust our reputation speaks for us" C

"Certainly - certainly" said Mr. Glenmouth. He was a large fine-looking man and Mr. Galesburg was impressed. Continuing Mr Glenmouth said:

My partner Mr. Mackay & myself have in the last few years made very extensive additions & improvements ("Bought 3000 acres in Texas" Mr Gaines remembered silently) The returns on this are sure to be large and increasing ("If Texas is annexed" ~~he added~~ thoughtfully Mr Gaines ~~dubiously~~) and we are going to improve material on a large scale ("Material? = Material?" hummed Gaines). We cannot however ~~afford too~~ afford the second-hand methods of exporting by way of New York and to be frank we cannot afford ~~the~~ a double profit. ~~Now~~ what we want to do is to lease a small number of good sailing vessels (Mr. Glenmorth frowned and tapped his foot. Mr. Gaines rubbed his hands and looked reflectively out of the window)
"Hm" said Mr. Gaines
"Now the Commercial Bank" said Mr. Glenmorth noting Mr. Galesburg's forehead "hearing of our need has seemed us a couple of fair ships for which they ask what we consider a moderate rental, $30,000"

Mr. Grimes looked ~~out of the window~~ up at the ceiling & did not move a muscle, but he ~~did sound a reasonable amount of thinking~~ whistled & his soul "$30,000!"

"We shouldn't deserve better chicks and I may say a prize of better — er — reputation"

Even this did not dispel the clouds on Mr. Glenmouth's brow.

"I'm afraid —" he began, but Mr. Grimes interrupted him quite unnecessarily it seemed seeing:

"I'm afraid we ~~should~~ would have to ~~buy a bull~~ charge a little more than you offer" said Mr. Grimes

"We are quite willing to pay more." said Mr. Glenmouth, promptly and ~~Mr. Grimes~~ a fair answer took credit and Mr. Grimes face ~~fell~~ But Mr. Galeshay mused himself dubiously a moment longer and said decidedly

"I am sorry Mr. ~~Galeshay~~ Glenmouth" but we cannot sell you any chicks"

Mr. Glenmouth looked surprised & annoyed

"If it is a matter of price —" he began, and Mr. Grimes smiled gently beneath his smile

"It is not" said Mr. Galeshay very "Any bargain may be which we can come you Mr. Glenmouth we

In spite of the fact that his face was shining & flushed into a whistle well be glad D, & will grant you the most favorable terms — but we cannot have each" and after a few general remarks the three gentlemen bowed silently and ~~while~~ Mr. ~~Grimes accompanied~~ Mr. Glenmorth ~~and then left the office~~.

A deep and eloquent silence descended the office. Mr. Galeshury glanced at Mr. Grimes and saw sarcastic gloom spread itself over his shrewd features.

"I suppose you know why I refused Mr. Glenmorth's offer —" he said at with an unnecessary assumption of his usual dignity Mr Grimes was silent, but Mr. Galeshury ~~took another~~ proceeded:

"It was because I'm morally certain he wants to use those shirts in the Texas slave trade.

Mr. Grimes lifted his voice ~~snorted~~ — "I suppose you know" he said "that $40,000 or so would come very handy in our business just now?

"Galeshury's has never needed blood money" and Grimes ~~snorted~~. "Did you treat Cromwell's for Glendell a year ago?

"I did not. They acted for true, and as old friends of my father's I gave it to them. I saw no reason for keeping them now that three cargoes of bread are in and that contract near its fulfillment"

But Grimes only growled and glowered at this would himself and without a word — a bit of discourtesy which hurt Mr Galeshury far more than any ~~other~~ financial embarrassment.

As Mr. Grimes went and he met John Reynolds rushing into the office. For Reynolds had made a most astonishing discovery. The cargoes of bread — those cargoes which they had awaited so long & which they were now delivering under limited contract, he had found to be seriously damaged By. he sure the last absence Mr. Grimes had taken the samples which he sent out ~~over to Reynolds~~ was good but underneath — why the crust was rotten from its long delay & ~~by~~ prime.

John knew how punctilious Mr Galeshury ~~Grimes~~ was in matters of absolute honesty and as soon as he had accidentally discovered the condition of the bread he ran excitedly up to the house and rushed to the office. He met Mr. Grimes, and Mr. Grimes moved out ordered & waved him on, so that after a minute walked a thought he knocked full-well in upon Mr. Galesbury. This was of course Lese-majesty for the Junior clerk, and Mr. Galesbury was adamant:

"Your name, Sir? Reynolds? Well, Reynolds, this is no way to enter the office of the head of the firm — You may go Sir:

But the Hemsh—

Never mind the Hemsh, Sir

But it's rotten —

Rotten?

Yes sir — I was down at the wharf on an errand for the bookkeeper and I went into the back and this is the condition of the Hemsh." and he laid a packet foil before Mr Galesbury: Mr. Galesbury examined it and rushed out & saw Mr. Grimes and Mr. Grimes was gone out. He got hold of the bookkeeper:
"Stop delivery this hemsh" he said
"But, Sir, the contract ordines thirteen —

It and incident a word walked rapidly & the wharf.

when he returned a half hour later, the stenographer had stopped work & were dozing their chairs.

"Reynolds, you may write Emmet & Co that we are unable to furnish the bench & ~~provision~~ forfeit the contract You may add the reasons." Then Mr. Galesburg knitted his brows and signed "— you may also write Cavanelli's saying that I am great regret we must have for the payment of their note tomorrow for a — for such & such reasons. You may had better deliver them note immediately by hand — and Reynolds, the Firm (for so the Firm was capitalized in Mr. Galesburg's brain) the Firm is under obligations to you — good day sir."

When Mr. Grimes entered hurriedly fifteen minutes later he did not notice the cold majesty of his senior partners mien, nor did Mr. Galesburg notice how perturbed Mr. Grimes was. Both started & shook but Mr. Galesburg ~~said~~ frowned

"Grimes, did you know the condition of that bench"
Grimes turned grey "94 was all right" he said slowly.

"The Junior clerk called my attention at once

"94 was not" said Mr Galesburg icily, 94 was 2/3 rotten. I've cancelled the contract'

"What?" yelled Grimes leaping from his chair.

"I have cancelled the contract & explained why"
"you have — cancelled — that $25000 contract?"
I have
Grimes face was ashen
Galesburg looked a bit disconcerted but he hastened to say "I have however worked Crosswells that we must have the proceeds of his note tomorrow —
Oh you have, have you" sneered Grimes, "well Crosswells just failed ~~this morning~~ at 9am this morning for $100,000"
The elder man staggered back into his chair; Grimes watched him listlessly and added:
"But we'll beat him, for we shall fail for at least $200,000 to morrow.
Galesburgs hands shook helplessly.
"I suppose we might — Of course I shouted hasty — but I suppose we might apply to the Commercial Bank.
"The Commercial bank" retorted Grimes dully "has got all its money in railroads and is borrowing money to put in the clearing house." and he frowned the old man contemptuously. There a gleam shot into his and he rushed into the outer office.

The clouds were gone save Reynolds and he was reaching for his hat. Grimes looked at him. down

"You don't look like a fool" he said.

The sudden pulling of ~~Reg~~ the young man's elated countenance was not lost on Grimes, and he took a quick resolution

"Do you know that yanine Enlo - [illegible] this morning has ruined this town

John gasped — "I — I thought, sir,"

"yanine got no business thinking. "Now see here" and he scribbled a note rapidly "Do you want to save us from bankruptcy forever?

Yes sir — I'll do anything

Well you find Mr. Glenmuth Longest — you know him — the tall man who called this morning I [illegible]

Yes sir I remember

And then I give him this note — find him now — if you don't find him by 12 o'clock tonight we're ruined" and he almost pushed him out the door.

Reynolds He dared not have fallen from negligence of attention to his hair But there was grim determination in his face when he next set about the [illegible]

He inquired at the hotel

"Gone out — don't know where"

He found his colored valet

He may be at Ernesto's or Old Queen or at Crescent's or at the theatre "or at a dozen other places"

He was not at Smith's. He had been at Cresswell's but was gone ~~either to the Ilex or the theatre~~
"~~Either to the theatre or~~ indeed theatre
Dont know I'm sure
John sat down on the curb-stone & when exhausted & it was already 10 p.m. Then he smoked in a restaurant & over his hot coffee looked up the plays — "Maryland My Maryland" — that sounded about a Southerner — or ~~Shakespeare~~ Hamlet? ? He would try "Maryland" first. Some evenings then he was in a box & a beautiful woman with him.
John bought a ticket pushed through and delivered the note.
Glenmuntle read it, uttered an exclamation and handed it to his wife. She smiled sweetly.
"Shall we accept it?" "certainly"
"When can they be ready" asked Glenmuntle.
John stared
"He knows nothing of writing" put it "and his wife gaily
I will write a note
You'll do nothing of the sort — notes are such awkward things — word of mouth will do very well — tell him" all right, but they must be out of the harbor [redacted] by day light" — repeat it it

John repeated it learned and reached the office at 11 h mn. Mr. grimes was still there, and heard the Message with both relief & dismay
"By [redacted] day light — tomorrow?" He asked blankly
"yee es."
The merchant mused a moment.
"Reynolds" he said at last looking him keenly through & through "Reynolds you can blaze your way to a fortune tonight or you can wade [redacted] yourself. —"
He seemed entrapped with the secretary [redacted] [redacted]. and Reynolds' dismounted coolly. Then he continued:

~~11.~~

~~John sped to Grimes and repeated the message.~~

~~Grimes looked annoyed, worried, thoughtful.~~

~~"I suppose you know, Reynolds," he said, glancing sharply at him and then studying the letter files.~~ "I suppose you have known sometime that this firm was pretty hard pressed."

"I've heard the ~~clubs~~ clerks talking, sir."

"The parrots" growled Grimes. "Well, you've begun the work of helping us out - would you like to do more?"

"I only wish I could, sir.!"

"Well you can - if you will do as I say, and keep your mouth shut." Grimes eyed him so steadily that John felt uncomfortable.

"I'll do all I can, he said"

"Can you keep books"?

"I've studied book keeping nights since I've been here."

"Well you may be bookkeeper one of these days."

John gasped and flushed with pleasure.

Grimes mused a few minutes. ~~Then~~

"It's near midnight ~~six~~" he sad at last consulting his watch. "Go get something to eat, put on ~~Reynolds~~ old and dirty clothes and come back at one ~~five~~."

And he closed the office door.

Looked upon the docks heavily crowded

Chapter ~~N~~. IV.

PRomotion.

It was ~~midnight~~ grew grey down by the dark slivery waters. On two black hulled ships gangs of men were working desperately. Grimes and Reynolds covered with dirt and sweat were hurrying here and there giving final directions. Suddenly a carriage drove up and out jumped Mr. ~~Ellis~~ Glenn worth. and several companions. They hurriedly inspected the ships. Behind came a rumbling in the silent streets and wagon after wagon ~~drove up~~. There was a rattle of chains and iron, the thud of packages and a feverish hurrying. In the dim cabin papers were being signed

"Let's see, clearance in ballast for Cuba?" asked the inspector.

"No, no, interrupted Grimes and he whispered a few words.

"Good" said ~~Ellis~~ Glenn worth smiling. ~~There was a scratching of pens~~ The pens scratched rapidly and the papers of clearance were signed and sealed. Then Mr. ~~Ellis~~ Glenn worth took out three packages. Two he handed Mr.Grimes and the other to the inspector. As John walked from the wharf at 7 in the morning he already heard the creaking of spars and straining of timbers t at showed the ships were departing.

~~and~~ ten ~~packages of bills and silently and deftly unobtrusively handed them over~~

Great holes were torn, clumsy burnished hurriedly with many curses which [illegible]

He and Mr.Grimes hurried to the office and entered. It was dark cold and ghostly and savored of evil deeds. Drawing the shades they opened the first package. It held 50 one thousand dollar bills. Grimes sighed with satisfaction. The other package contained 100 shares in the ~~Ellsworth~~ glenmuvtti Mackay Plantation Company with a par value of $100 a share. All these things were necurely locked in the safe and the tired ~~men~~ pair went home.

"Mr.Calesburg" Grimes said next morning as the head of the firm tottered in,"I think we are saved but I'm not sure. I want Dale to go west on a special mission."

"But to whom can we entrust the bookkeeping? Hoster- ? "

"I want Reynolds."

"Reynolds? Who is - why the new clerk - Mr.Crimes that's against all precedent in Calesburg's- he's only been here two years and he's junior to a ~~schee~~ half-dozen - "

"I'll either have Reynolds's or I'll let this firm go to the devil. - look here Mr.Calesburg your foolishness got us into this hole and now if you expect me to pull you ~~out~~ you must do as I say."

Mr.Calesburg gasped - never before had Grimes dared - but - but - he ~~sank into his chair.~~ sat down and passed his hand slowly through his grey hair.

"Very well" he said ~~slowly~~ finally - "Send Reynolds here - at least he is honest" John came.

"Reynolds" he said kindly "Grimes desires to do a very unusual thing— a very unusual thing; and I have consented. Dale is going west and we shall want an assistant bookkeeper. Grimes thinks that perhaps you may be able to fill the position. It is ~~rather~~ very unusual, as I say in this firm to promote a young man so quickly but Mr.Grimes thinks this is deserved."

John was breathless ~~and incoherent~~ with pleasure and was soon in Mr.Grimes' private office. Mr.Grimes hardly noticed him and seemed preoccupied.

"What are you wages" he asked at last abruptly.

"$5 a week."

"Hump - we pay our assistant bookkeeper $20," he said and relapsed into a long silence.

through streets misty with the shadows of men, filled with heavy silent buildings and echoing with hurrying footsteps, snatches of song and great snarling oaths

John caught his breath - $80 a month - wealth, Martha -

"I'm afraid however you couldn't do the work ." Grimes broke in.

His heart fell with a thump.

"Ever kept books -"

"No sir,but "-

"But nothing - had no actual experience."

"No sir. "

"Well - I'm afraid,come to think - "

A dull ache was creeping into John's heart ,he was sick with disappointment.

"Well " said Grimes suddenly "We'll try you for a week and John Reynolds head swam. "I will leave here a memorandum of your first entries ." And Mr.Grimes went out. John threw off his coat,gave a low exultant whoop and climbed up on the high stool. He couldn't for the life of him resist a note to Martha.

"Dear Martha:-

I am promoted and will get more than $80 a month. Think of it! I'll come home in the fall and marry you.

Your lover,

John Reynolds."

He stuck this guiltily in his pocket. And seized Grimes memorandum.It read:

Ship Silvia - arrived from Southampton with iron.

Ship Venus - cleared for Cuba with hemp.

Ship Susan - cleared for Havanna with cotton.

Ship Jane - Cleared for Cuba with hemp.

Ship Mary - arrived from Cuba - sugar.

Rec'd of ~~Ellsworth and Mackay~~ Smith & Co 1 Sacco for 2 canvas of hemp (damaged). ~~$41,416.32~~ in full of account.

Add to pay roll - John Reynolds,assistant bookkeeper $20 per week.

John read the first line and took up his pen just as his eye caught the second - Hemp? the Venus? Why it went in ballast to the ~~Ellsworth~~ Glenmorrish Mackay plantation; and the Jane too; then he noticed the account of ~~Ellsworth and Mackay.~~ Smith & Co He thought the ~~$50,000~~ 50 tons was rental on the boats;~~he hastily looked for the cashier's receipt; he had received $41,416.32 and not~~ 25 ~~$50,000. John sat stock still~~ for fifteen minutes and then gradually ~~the whole thing dawned on him. This was a memorandum of false entries to cover up transactions~~

And hemp? They had sold no hemp, they had thrown it into the harbor.

And who was Smith & Co.? If this cashiers receipt was for ~~[illegible]~~ fifty thousand, where was the fifty thousand that Glenmorris had given them? There was surely a mistake here. He hastened to Mr. Grimes.

"Mr Grimes ——" Mr Grimes looked up at him and suddenly the scales fell from his eyes. For a flash he saw it all. The rotten deal was now laid. The chicks had gone to Texas on some clandestine errand unknown to Mr. Grimes and the money to save the farm was hard for them nee. And he? Why he was to receive $20 a week to make the false entries & keep his mouth shut. All along of this blunder he had been standing staring all unseeing at Mr. Grimes with his mouth agape. Then he saw Mr. Grimes face with its thin nose and long mouth and little ~~[illegible]~~ sharp eyes and he murmured something and went back to his cell & his hempen stool. He sat there musing.

~~which Mr.Grimes did not want known.~~ Whether had these ships gone and for what? Still it must be legal - the United States inspector was there- but wherefore this concealment - this lying? Then his eye fell on the $20 per week" $80 a month - it seemed like untold wealth. He had saved barely $200 in two years work - and now he could save $700 in a year at least - let's see should he spend a little more on himself - a new spring suit perhaps - a little better - with a start he came to himself . This money was the price of a lie. Well suppose it was, it wasn't his lie - his business was to do as he was told, he was not supposed to clean out ships at midnight and make them ready for mysterious voyages. He had no right to assume to know what money was paid for and what not - but he did know. The sweat oozed on his forehead. what should he do? what could he do? Many things which he had not understood in the daily work grew clearer - painfully clear now, because he suddenly saw a place for lying and deception about him. ~~Grimes had sent him to the Commercial Bank and knew it, but sought to mislead Ellsworth. He was deceiving Galesburg.~~ Galesburg was the soul of honor - but his punctilious were likely to ruin the business. Besides no one profited by the lie more than Galesburg. Was it not right to save him and the firm if a little quiet deception would do it?

The hire of the ships had perhaps saved them on the brink of bankruptcy. Was this business? Was business necessarily dishonest or shady? - then suddenly, the question became personal. Was he going to be bookkkeeper on such terms. No? Well if not, he could hope for no promotion in this business. What had he to do with these entries? he was paid to do his work as bidden. ~~No he could not do it , he " Mr. Reynolds the head cashier is going to show you some of our methods" said Mr.Grimes hastily as he poked his head in the door and disappeared.~~ And then above all he hated to be considered a fool — a baby — a ninny: unknown of the world & its ways. Yet such was the taunting sneer in Grimes cold eyes

The day passed slowly. ~~And at night no entries were made.~~ Other memorandum ~~accountable~~ and accounts came in and, he posted them carefully, leaving that first memornadum untouched.- but he left a space for it.

The next morning John Reynolds went to the private office . He noticed with a start how Mr.Galesburg had visibly aged under the strain of two days.

"Yes, $40,000 and ~~over~~ more" Mr.Grimes was saying and I think that sum will tide us over. "Extraordinary" said Mr. Galesburg " and they knew the condition of the bank?" "Here's their statement"

Mr.Galsburg leaned back with a sigh, and John saw a gathering of moisture in his eyes. A great pity for the old man came over him - he forgot his vanity and luxuriousness, his pompous ways and slowly he realized how the business was to him family and child, love and inheritance. ~~Suddenly~~ Yet Mr. Galesburg ~~said~~ did not seem altogether satisfied: "~~And how are~~ Bring the books, Reynolds?" he said

~~He was punctilious about the methods of business as John well knew.~~

~~"Suppose we see~~", said Grimes, ~~"bring the books Reynolds after you have posted those items.~~ I'm a bout a half hour for I have a few other matters, to speak of."

John rose and in his eyes were visions - faces now clear and honest like Martha's, now stricken like Galesburg's now sharp like Grimes'; then in his ears rang voices and ~~sounds~~ sounds, lies and gold, golden lies and lying gold, visions of pain and death and voices of pleasure. Yet he went straight to his desk opened the ledger, copied all the memorandum in ~~its~~ their places and brought ~~it~~ the books slowly to the office.

Mr. Glaesbugr glanced at them critically, ~~and sighed.~~ bowed to them "Very good, very good" he said and then he rose slowly, and ~~bowed~~ went out.

Mr. Grimes stood watching him. "We've saved his life" he said. John was silent but he feared Grimes must hear the awkward pounding of his heart. And Grimes did. He put his hands kindly on John's shoulder and said " My boy, business is not all Sunday School work" He glanced at Mr. Galesburg slowing passing the window: he continued In his father's time it was a stately promenade, but the day of the mounted bushranger has come and he'll make business hell. So we'll have to be prepared to swallow our consciences and fight for life - a sort of — how is it?

'lay on Mc Duff and damned be he who first Cries Hold, enough!"

"It's the way of the world, my boy, the way of the world.!"

And as John walked beneath the stars that night even they had a steely glitter, and he pondered on life and its ~~memory~~ meaning. He reacehd for his handkerchief and his hand met Martha's letter. He slowly tore it up— ~~Why, he couldn't say.~~ just why, he could hardly have explained.

"Lay on Macduff!
And damned be he who first cries, Hold! enough!"

Chapter V.

The Abolitionists.

The church at Canaan was wide and long and tall, with faded brown frescos, long wide windows and straight austere seats. Today all the seats were full - full and overflowing with ~~breathless~~ dark- clothed people. In the pulpit stood ~~John Brown the abolitionist~~ a tall grim faced man ~~faring from Ohio to Massachusetts,~~ carelessly ~~accorded~~ clothed, burning with fiery eloquence. The people bent beneath the lash of his tongue as he spoke ~~pealing~~ of the sin and shame of slavery - "the disgrace of a land of the Free where human blood was bartered as men barter cattle; where the family was blasphemed and the women prostituted to the lust of monsters; where honest toil was disgraced by the groans of dumb driven beasts, who were they that they dared lift up their eyes to the Lord of Hosts when they saw his work with helpless hands? who were they that sat blind before the flaming wrath of his countenance and heard not the coming vengenance of Him to whom the soul of the black captive was more than all the souls of them that sinfully sell him. Are not these black folk our brothers and our sisters-/flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone - created by the same God and redeemed by Jesus Christ? Hear what God is saying to these black millions: "Shall the prey be taken from the mighty, or the lawful captive delivered? But saith the Lord, Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away, and the prey of the terrible shall be delivered; for I will contend with him that contendeth with them and I will save thy children."

"And I will feed them that oppress thee with his own flesh; and they shall be drunken with their own blood as with sweet wine; and all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Savior and they Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob!" So rose his voice and flushed and fell in that silent sombre church and the fire of his fearful eloquence touched the hearts of all and the souls of some.

"It's the Lord's work" said Abijah Culver" and we must help it with our might."

"But how can we - what can we do - legally?" objected the ~~distant~~ district judge.

"Then do something illegally " said a passerby. "Slavery is a sin and sin must be throttled without why or wherefore."

"Yes, yes, but that is dangerous talk in a civilized land. I dislike slavery as much as anybody but I can't see that I am responsible for the sins of the southerners.

"Am I my brother's keeper" quoted a woman softly.

"Well,if I am I can't drag him to heaven if he's determined to go to hell.

"You can part company with him."

"Does that better matters."

"It clears your conscience."

"Does that better matters."

"No,it doesn't" insisted Abijah Culver,"only one thing will better matters and that is freedom to the slave."

"And then? "asked the judge.

"And then we will trust in God."

But the judge shook his head doubtfully,almost blasphemously thought Mary ~~Mary~~ Culver as she looked about for her daughter Martha and started home.

Martha and Selina Smith came slowly along behind. Selina had been strangely moved and was still almost sobbing with excitement.

"If I could to something" she said,some little thing to help ." Then she whispered "Martha,did you ever help any runaways."

"Once" said Martha slowly "it was a long time ago ~~in '52~~ when I was a child of ten a twelve - a cold and snowy winter and a mother and child came to us in the old stage - do you remember Brackett's old stage?"

"Yes, yes, the great red one"

"Well they came in that - I was half scared to death and I remember I ran when the woman stretched her black hand toward me - something in here eyes has haunted me ever since."

"Wouldn't it be splendid if we could only get a lot of them here and teach them."

Martha shook her head - "You know they tried that in Canterbury and poor Miss Crandall had such a time"

"But that was years ago and people are better now " - I wonder why God lets so much evil go on?"

"To give us work,my daughter" said Martha's father turning back to them. He was a thin bent man,grey haired and earnest.

"But where can we work and how - what can I a lone helpless girl do in the midst of this evil?"

"Do the little nearest - and wait. Wait - the time will come perhaps sooner than we think. The arm of the Lord is bared, the sword of Gideon is aloft, mighty men like ~~John Brown~~ Garrison are raising their voices - be not arfaid daughter, God is not mocked."

A deep seriousness came to Selina's homely face and beneath her breath she murmured "Amen!"

But Martha was still puzzled. On her bosom lay a letter from John - a letter that troubled her. He had been promoted but - but the wedding day still seemed far off; at any rate he did not speak of it - he only spoke of saving more money and buying half interest in two ships. Then he said that he knew a southerner " a tall finelooking man " who owned large Texan plantations. But weren't they filled with slaves, she wondered, and could tall fine men deal in flesh and blood? and could John, her John like them? It seemed strange. Yet he was going south ~~and~~ to visit him and on his way he was coming to her - coming to her next week Tuesday ; ~~and yet~~ she had told nobody as yet. She was afraid to have him come, lest he should be in the flesh even more changed than she vaguely felt he had changed in spirit. The change had come gradually - in the field, the dear old upper field it had been love and home and work - then as the years went it was money and work and love and now it was work and money and --- yes - money again. There was little love in the letters now, only the cold rattle of gold. And she slipped from ~~Sarah's~~ Selina's longings, and stole from ther mother's glances and crept away among the berry bushes of the upper field, and read and wept and dreamed of the five long years of her waiting.

A ~~sense~~ sense of revolt rose in her soul. She was a woman grown, yet half cramped to a child's horizon - twenty five years old but a month since and John was a few months younger. Why could they not have married then - why not now? Why must she wait and waste her life away, with nothing to own, nothing to call hers - not even her life. She felt the void of life, the sense of loneliness, the want of closer humun sympathy than her tired mother and busy father could give. All her life she had looked to John for the fulfillment of her dreams and now - and now a dull fear crept into her heart and she dreaded the coming week.

He came and went in two short days - a well dressed affable young man before whom she was shy and embarrassed, but of whom she could not help being very proud on Sunday as they came from church. He was kind to her and brought her a real Indian shawl; he put his arm about her in the old hair clothed parlor and kissed her burning cheek and told her of the cargoes that came from Liverpool, and the rising price of cotton and the great Glenn Mackay plantations whither Mr. Grimes was sending him to investigite.

"But - but don't they have - slaves there, John?"

"Thousands of them."

"O John how can you go to such a place?"

"O I have nothing to do with slavery - It's a matter of business with us."

"But isn't it wrong to deal with wrong in any way - I - I of csurse don't know, only it seems - "

"My dear girl, don't worry your little head with business - it isn't a matter of Sunday School texts by a long shot. We've got to take the world as it is and not as we might like to have it. Indeed I'm not so sure whether some of our reforms might not prove disastrous."

"But John surely you know slavery is wrong."

"Well - yes - I suppose it is but when you've seen as many Negroes as I have in New York - ignorant lazy set - you could imagine a situation when it would be better to drive them to work - than - " But then he saw the horror in her eyes and said - "O well, dear don't worry I won't buy any slaves." and he laughed and kissed her again. Then and other times in the few hours they had alone she felt a new John blended with the old, who was different and strange and did not open hiis soul to her or dared not. Once she fancied he was concealing something from her - perhaps he loved someone else? But no, her woman's instinct soon saw that apparently he knew no other women but her and cared for none. So she gave up in half despaire She did not understand him, she did not know him but she still loved him, for whom else could she love? and he said he loved her. When would they marry? She did not know. He only said "Well dear, I'm getting some money now and in four or five years we'll be able to marry and live like folks."

Four or five years! her heart fell, but he thought she was only weeping at the parting and he slipped the hand that held his notebook about her and held her to him soothingly as he jotted down the last important memoranda of his journey. So he had come and gone and Martha still waited among the great green hills.

Chapter VI.

A journey in Life.

It was thus in 1852 that John Reynolds faring westward slowly from Philadelphia reached in due time the crest of the Alleghanies and looked for the first time into the great vale of the Mississippi, the empire of the Father of Waters. A new sense of vastness permeated him and a vague longing to stretch himself across the beckioning wilderness. But he quickly put away such mental maunderings and buying a ticket to Cairo embarked on the winding waters of the Ohio. Sweeping along there in lazy idleness, he watched the woods and villages, the sky and distant hills, and then he watched his fellow men. He grew especially to like the white boss of the black slevedores for his ways and looks and manner of talk. He was tall, lank and yellowish, with harshly drawn face and tobacco stained mouth and he swore to a degree that shocked John Reynolds considerably at first.

"Are all the roustabouts slaves" he ventured one afternoon.

"Yes! God damn them!"

"I - I hope he won't," said Reynolds.

"Won't - what?"

"Won't damn them - they're having a hard time here."

"I hope he will; that's all they're fit for, the black ~~spinks~~ rascals - hard time, why damn them they've got the easiest job on the river.

"Then you thing slavery is a good thing?"

"I think it's the damnest, meanest, rottenest institution on earth".

"Then why not pity the slvaes."

"Because I hate them as bad as I do slavery - I hate slavery and I hate niggers - if I could I'd emancipate every damned one of them tomorrow morning and drown them all in the Mississippi in the afternoon, if it choked the damned creek. I tell you sir " and the expletives flamed "slavery is stealing white men's bread and butter and giving it to - hi there! - " and he hastened toward a crowd of roustabouts and swore so volubly and ~~earnestly~~ fiercely that Reynolds turned hastily away. (and his name was Bates + who

A young farmer not far away who had evidently been listening, smiled:

" Tough customer" said John.

"Well no, not exactly tough - rough rather - had a hard life I presume and his father's before him - life and decency literally crushed out by slavery."

John was puzzled "Well" he said " are all you westerners Negro haters?" "No, I don't hate them - I don't like them particularly don't want them round, but it's the slavey system I dislike. It's poison, its death to free labor and we don't propose to have spread in our section. It shan't cross this water if we have to fight it. It was a big mistake to allow it even in Missouri."

John looked at the Kentucky shore curiously and went to his cabin deep in thought. So in fitful converse and curious observation he came to Cairo and turned, by the mighty golden waters of the Mississippi toward the great south. A certain misty dreaminess sat upon his spirit. The Admighty waters seemed flowing to some mysterious haven wherefrom there was no turning backward The dark and curious faces, the calls, the songs, the wails brought back to him all the dreams and terrors of boyhood - he remembered crouching with Martha in the snow beside the great dull barn peering to see the faces of the fearsome slaves. He remembered the terrible sermons preached in the old church and strangely enough he remembered too the vision of endless wealth revealed to him but a few months since when James Glenn ~~Bl~~sworth sat on the banks of East River and pointed southward. He could not shake from himself the mingled creeping feeling of ~~dead~~ dread and nameless exaltation. There came a whispering down the long dim galleries of his memory crying "Beware John, beware, this is the Land of Egypt and the House of Bondage - ~~the house of blood bought slavery~~ the haunt of the sellers of souls." And on this whispering came echoing back from his dreaming a vision of gold and empire, a sense of eastern luxuriousness, of tropic magnificence - "~~of old~~ and all the Wealth of Ormus or of Ind" as the fourth reader said in the brown school house of Connecticut. And so the future and the past, warning, alluring, clashing and twirling met in the splendid present of a languorous balmy tropical morning, when Mr. Glenn ~~Bl~~sworth stepped quickly up the gang plank and said:

"Welcome to the South, Mr. Reynolds - Mr. Mackay, our friend Mr. Reynolds of Galesburg and Grimes, which is soon to be, I take it, Grimes and Reynolds".

Three months crept silently away and the good ship Lucy was sliding lazily into the harbor of Charleston, S.C. On its prow was Mr. John Reynolds smoking leisurely and a black servant was pointing out the landmarks. "Yonder low lying and long is Sullivan's island and MT. Pleasant beyond, that is Fort Moultrie in front. The ~~squal~~ square building straight in front with slits for windows is Fort Sumter - this to the left. Of that is Morris Island and Fort Gregg, and beyond is Hilton Head - now sir, you can see the city" and then the vision burst - of houses and palmetto, magnolias and squares, wide spaces and low cabins, a lazy, happy sleepy southern city.

Mr. Reynolds errand was to meet Colonel Henry Jones of Wilton Point to whom he carried letters of introduction from the Glenworths of Texas. He wanted to talk over certain matters of Southern development with Colonel Jones and hastened to make an early appointment. When he arrived on the afternoon of the appointed day, however, he met a funeral procession

An old man not far away had paused with mailbags still over his shoulder, and was leaning against the post office door murmuring

"One by one they go."

Reynolds asked him the name of the deceased and found it was Henry Jones' father-in-law. It would hardly be denent to call immediately although Jones' note had said "Three" plainly. He would ride a bit in the country and return about five. So he rode off hardly noticing the old man's chatter about some black witch of the country side. As he skirted the burial ground by St Luke however a singular old black woman of forbidding aspect was resting on the fresh made grave. He paused and gazed toward her at a distance remembering vaguely now the gossip of the postmaster. As he came back a couple of hours later she was gone, but he noted on the grave three little bones linked in curiously and he smiled:

"A powerful spell cast" he said laughing and rode on. Yet he had an uncomfortable memory of that singular figure. It seemed to typify something. Colonel Henry Jones home place gave the usual evidence of luxurious extravagnece and undeveloped waste that he had come to be so familiar with in the past ~~mon~~ months. He saw the idling Negroes with disapproval .

"Ought to be driven" he said, and when he cuhgt sight of the grounds and mansion:

"Must cost a deal to run this" he opined, and throwing his lines o a black child, he approached the door.

Colonel Henry Jones was a massively built man with hair long, sleek and slightly grey, a red pimply face, dark eyes and a manner slightly exaggerated with courtesy. Has clothes were faultless but his linen rumpled, while the house was luxuriantly furnished.

"I am delighted to see you Mr.Reynolds - delighted. I have of course ~~know~~ known you and your firm long by correspondence and thru our mutual friend Glenn~~worth~~ worth of San Antonio. By the way how did you leave him?"

"Very well indeed and he sent heartiest greetings."

"Thank you, thank you very much - I am sorry, deeply sorry that Mrs. Jones is not down to meet you - the fact is we have a new boy up stairs and this with the death of her father has been almost too much for her."

"I trust she is not in danger."

"I think not, the physician thinks she will pull through with care and time; it is awkward however not to be able to greet you with true southern hospitality."

"Pray make no apologies - this is but a business call you know."

"Ah, but we of the south do not divorce business and society as you all in the north."

Reynolds laughed - "I should think it would bring you strange associates."

"No sir, no sir" said Colonel Jones with dignity " no one unfit for our society can do business with us" he said. Reynolds looked a bit puzzled but said nothing and they passed into the library.

They had hardly seated themselves, lighted their cigars and begun to talk when a faint cry and the ~~south~~ sound of something falling, reached them. ~~Her~~ Colonel Jones listened.

I thought I heard a voice in her room"

"Excuse me a moment" he said "I fear my wife may be sick." He was gone quite a time and appeared laboring under some excitement when he returned.

"Well, well" he said ~~exactly~~ with an effort assumed at ease "I did not mean to leave you so long. I beg a thousand pardons. One of the maids has been taken ill and Mrs. Jones is feeling badly, too. I must excuse myself for the night but you will remain all night of course and we'll finish our business in the morning."

Mr.Reynolds started to protest, ~~again~~ but Colonel Jones would not hear of it and soon Jim the body servant had him comfortably esconced in a great cool white bed room with abundance of fruit, cool spring water, a wide soft bed and easy chairs. Mr.Reynolds stretched himself comfortably and lighted another of Colonel Jones' fragrant Havannas. He listened to the ~~hoof beats without~~ - turned morning incident

"The doctor I suppose" he thought "I hope there's no danger. Then he thought how strange it must be to have a home, and a wife sick and a little baby in a cradle. He thought of Martha and shook his head. Too bad they had to wait so long - well, wealth was in sight now, and then! He heard the wailing of an infant in the next room - "uncomfortable, damned uncomfortable noise," he declared and felt no hurry to be disturbed by it. Then came the shock instant

Yes, he was willing to wait a while - where was the use of hurrying and marrying and breeding like cats. When he had plenty of money for nurses, money, money '- and away flew the golden dreams curling in the tobacco smoke, smiling out of the twinkling stars, crooning in his drowsy dreaming - he started - what was that among the bushes? It looked very like that strange old black woman - Why did the hag haunt him so? and the child's cry come again He drew the shades and went to bed .

The next day they rode about the plantation and then seating themselves on the cool broad verandah after dinner talked.

" I trust you were interested in the Glenn sworth-Mackay plantations, Mr. Reynolds?"

"Very much indeed, it was a revelation to me."

"Of course the labor system was new to you."

"Yes and but I confess my ideas on the subject before were hazy ~~have been revolutionised in this visit~~ - I had many altogether erroneous ideas of slavery."

"So many of our northern fellow citizens have I regret to say - what an empire Texas is."

"Isn't it, and think of the lands to the South which must in time surely be ours."

"Ye-es - the trouble is we haven't slaves enough for that."

"There I confess I do not follow the south - I do not see that more slaves are needed, only enterprise and push to seize the opportunities ~~with the present stock.~~ and above all — railroads."

"I think you are mistaken there Mr. Reynolds - all the present stock of slaves ~~and their natural increase are~~ is needed in the present confines of the south - that is proven by the rising price of Negroes - if a new world like Texas opens up, new stock of slaves is needed .-

"But not a permanent slave trade?"

"Certainly not - certainly not - that is preposterous - No simply enough once to stock the new plantations."

and the child cry came again as he heard and heard another cry wilder. "Well how many children are there he exclaim and he heard and heard another cry

"Why not wait for the natural increase of present slaves to fill the land?"

And have the riches go to waste or have enough white laborers to stagle in and spoil the slave institution."

"Would it not be possible to develop on a free labor basis?"

"What develop sugar and cotton and rice with free labor? Why, Mr. Reynolds."

"~~True - true;~~ well - well, perhaps ~~I believe~~ you are right there - and I confess your argument for a slave trade, temporary and limited, is strong ~~- very strong~~." ~~Then~~ They talked and figured and at dusk as John Reynolds rose to go he left with Mr. Jones a stiff parchment like document signed and sealed between Grimes and Reynolds parties of the first part and ~~the~~ Henry Jones representing the ~~Ellis~~ Glenn sworth-Mackay plantations, parties of the second.

Yet he did not feel altogether comfortable riding toward Beaufort in the slanting glory of that hot afternoon. The argument was obvious, it was good - it was unanswerable, but repeated in certain circles - in Canaan for instance, was it not a bit too obvious? But pshaw! was there anything more to ~~estrange~~ blame in this business transaction than in a thousand others? Besides it paid - it paid all round; it paid the county, it paid ~~taxes~~ Texas, it paid ~~Ellis~~ Glenn sworth, Mackay and Jones - and it paid Grimes and Reynolds; it certainly would pay Reynolds well, very well, and he rubbed his hands thoughtfully - what was that - he suddenly became aware of a woman staggering across his path, the red-golden sun was shining full in her face and lighted her features till they shone a vivid golden bronze; her hair was black, curled and tangled, her slight forme clothed in rags; in one arm she held a sleeping infant and with the other dragged a wailing toddling child. But it was her face that brought the blood to Reynolds' head and chased it down again - a face tear-stained and bloody drawn and scarred in utter agony, sorrow and despair, and yet showing beneath ~~xxxxxxx~~ a dark half ~~forgotten~~ married beauty. Somehow it was strangely like and strangely unlike the face of the haunting hag. The woman never noticed him but staggering and weeping, stumbled on across his path, on and on before he had spoken, before he could bring himself to speak she had staggered wailing low, up the slight hill, through the pines and was gone - a passing moaning breath of woe. John Reynolds' head dropped slowly on his breast as he rode down toward the bridge. Something was striving and whispering within him.

"This is slavery" it said " That was slavery", it echoed and again - "That

But in any case what the south & west needs is railroads — now see here; history is history & the Alleghanies & Mississippi valley were in 10 years time all the chance of capital was but temporary - part of a longer vastly extreme which was unthinkable T

Farmers

was Life" - in vain he strove with the heavy sense of shame, in vain he argued stoutly, the hounds of his conscience seemed unleashed and were howling and yelping - howling as once he had heard the blood hounds of Texas yell for a runaway Negro. Slowly he straightened up with a dawny realization that it was not memory alone that was bringing the slender awful howl of the hounds to his ears - Louder and louder came the ominous baying. He raised his head and looked across the river. A tall black man was flying over the fields straight toward him - he was bent low, with outstretched neck and head, skimming the ground with great swift strides. Reynolds spurred across the bridge and reined his horse. The Negro ran down into the water, then along in it beneath the bridge then doubling back with incredible swiftness, he slipped up the other side of Reynolds and threw himself panting in the underbrush beside the road. Reynolds could see the great shining beads of sweat, the quivering muscles, the death like panting and the dark eyes fixed full on him. Scarcely had the slave concealed himself that the pack of hounds in full cry came over the low hill to the right - pitching, yelling shrieking for blood they flashed ~~thru the very air~~ past the rider and gathered baffled on the bank of the river, sniffed the waters and ran about furiously; then one sniffing the bridge shot across, another and another followed until the whole pack in full cry were dashing back toward ~~Hilton Head~~ Wilton Point whence Reynolds had ridden. At first he was puzzled - then suddenly he realized that losing the scent of the man at the water they had caught the footsteps of the wailing woman and were dashing after her. A sense of horror struck him. He waved to the ~~dashing~~ men who now came galloping on and one reained up - he meant to tell them where the slave lay but his panting almost echoed in his ear and the words struck in his throat.

"Are - you - after the woman? he wavered?

"No, we're after a buck - a tall black powerful fellow -

"Then the hounds are wrong - they'll kill the woman - the fellow went up the creek ." The man thanked him and swept from him with a yell.

When at last they were out of sight, Reynolds turned toward the slave half impatiently, ashamed of his own weakness and expecting a nauseating torrent of thanks. The Negro arose - he was a tall magnificently developed man, and despite his physical exhaustion, outwardly calm.

"Thank you, master" he said respectfully but clearly.

Then he stood silently waiting. Reynolds was puzzled, it was a stoical deference which he had not seen before ~~xxx xx xxxx x xxxx~~ He knew how to meet a fellow white man ; he had learned in the last three months how to treat a cringing cowering slave ; but he did not know how to meet this slave who acted like both. He half thought of ordering him home on pain of delivering him to an officer but - he looked at him and dared not. He thought of taking him with him, but it was still light. What the devil had led him to interfere anyway? But he could not leave him. Suddenly he thought of a plan.

"What is your name?"

"Tom Calhoun." "To whom do you belong?" "I used to belong to Senator Calhoun and I belongs to Harrison Coles now, Master"

"Can you hide here ~~till night~~ for a while?"

"Yes, sir."

~~"Well if you can get to Charleston before Tomorrow night or~~ ~~"Then come to the wharf at Beaufort and~~ enquire at the wharf for the Susan ~~at midnight~~."

"Thank you, Master" and in a moment the Negro had slipped into the shadows of the underbrush and the sun was shooting its dying rays on the horseman hurrying toward Beaufort.

It was on the stroke of 12 the next night when John Reynolds pacing the deck of the Susan saw a furtive shadow by the wharf. He sent the white watchman below on an errand and slipped the slave into his own cabin. Soon the anchor was up and the Susan was headed for Charleston. ~~xxx xxx~~ John still smoked on deck. He was not satisfied with himself . As a business man, as a shrewd business man (and did he not pride himself on this as his proudest accomplishment?) as a business man he had made a successful journey in the south and held a contract in his pocket worth thousands; & schemes in his head worth millions the only flaw was that incidentally he had stolen some man's property - about $1200 worth as prices ruled - and was carrying it off on his ship; which was an inexcusable thing for John Reynolds the business man. And yet for John Reynolds the man who had just made a rather long journey in life, well, it was certainly a deed of mercy to save a soul from hell or a body from slavery; ~~and yet~~ but when some echo of the youthful abolitionism thus glowed deep down in his heart, he bethought himself of that fat contract in his pocket and he swore. Yes, John Reynolds was uncomfortable, for a few leagues. Then a glow of gradual contentment suffused itself in his bones; for Tom Calohnu was silent and busy and hurrying toward freedom, and he was voluble and idle and hurrying toward wealth.

Chapter VII.

The Marriage.

"Mr.Galesburg is dead" said Mr.Grimes as he came up the gangway and Mr.Reynolds found himself one minute striving to keep the exultation of his heart out of his face and the next, endeavoring to drown the smile on his lips with the real regret in his heart . He was indeed puzzled at himself and told himself so as he was telling Mr.Grimes of his stolen slave.

"You"ll have to be careful of that sort of thing" growled Grimes or we'll get in trouble down there. Only day before yesterday Sanson of the Venus brought up a colored nurse and a baby that looked white, though you can't tell. I believe he was paid to bring them - they never could have pierced the hide to his heart otherwise. I carted them over to the Abolition Society by night and they've sent them up the country. You better send this colored man to them too."

And John followed his advice.

It seemed a curious coincidence to hear in Martha's next letter that they had added two to the family. "A colored nurse and white baby came here, and the nurse got a good chance to work and so we let her go and kept the child - it is so cunning. Then came the man whom you so nobly rescued and father kept him to help on the place. Father is growing old and needs help. I always knew your heart was right John and I'm proud of you."

"And so you think" said Mr.Grimes looking at John searchingly "that its it a safe and legitimate piece of business for us to enter into regular relations with Glenn [redacted]sworth-Mackay Plantation Company and furnish them supplies and ships from time to time?"

Mr. Reynold looked at the fiery end of his cigar with interest. "There is no use pretending the business is exactly legitimate — we shall undoubtedly be aiding and abetting the slave-trade. It's a pretty safe venture — quite safe as long as the authorities here mind their business The chief thing however Mr Grimes is this: there is coming a tremendous development west & south in the near future. Which will come first I can't say. It's coming on railroads [redacted] and shipping [redacted] as well

Now if we want to get on line we must invest money and expand and ammass & seek new investments. The coming American expansion is going totally to eclipse the old as your frame of the Civil. Now we need money for this. Here's a chance to get it. If we don't take it a hundred others will and I say take it — in fact I've signed a contract"

Mrs Grimes watched Reynolds as he talked. "This young man is developing" he mused "he is developing fast — very fast. I trust and the fast" and then he said aloud ~~glad to hear your judgment.~~ Let's see the contract."

He looked it over.

"I'll tell you what I'll do" he said "You know this end of the business. Suppose you take it wholly in your name with me as a silent partner without responsibility but furnishing capital. I, on the other hand will run the regular house here under the name of Grimes and Reynolds. - you having a third interest, and both of us will gradually reach out for good railroad property."

John thought the matter over. The temptation was great and so was the risk. Yet it appealed to him strongly. Of course it meant the postponement of marriage for several years but than it was as Grimes sententiously said:

"You can't afford to get married - wives are expensie luxuiries. She's waited this long for and she'll keep a few years longer. In five years you ought to be rich." And so this is what John wrote to Martha only he phrased it differently.

Martha was not surprised. It had grown so natural to see the wedding day postponed that she sometimes wondered if it ever really would come. Her engagement had become a mild joke among the young people of the town and she saw herself gradually pushed into an anomalous spinsterhood, half laughable, half pitiable. Once she cared, once she wept hot secret tears and watched the hardening skin and fading bloom and ~~thriving~~ shining hair in dismay. But now all this had ceased, for something new - something wonderful had crept into her life. A little homeless waif of a baby had come to her mysteriously, almost accidentally on the Underground Road for Slaves. They came one May morning, the babe and the nurse, she a reticent half-scared, half-frivolous woman.

"Yes, maam" it's white" she said.

"I don't know whose it is - it was a sort of extra one I guess - and - and they gave me my freedom to bring it away. — Name? yes'm, they called it "Henry" " and she chuckled.

Then she secured work in a neighboring town and said no more. Nor did Martha want to hear more - she simply wanted the curious pink clinging thing to warm her heart by. Her mother was scandalized at first and talked of poor houses and orphan asylums, but the talk never materialized; the father shook his head but he was getting old and feeble and has head shook often. The towns people smiled and gossiped, but Martha did not care. She had come into her kingdom. / She did not like the name "Henry" and in a flash of romance called the child "Roland" — "Roland Reynolds" it will be sometime, she laughed

She dressed and fondled the wee thing, cared for it and fed it, carried it out on the great green hills and as in years it grew and waxed strong they were ever together, ever satisfied, every loving, till the world wearied of its gossip and let them alone. So, too, the coming of Tom had been a God-send to the little family. He went to work silently and faithfully and soon the farm was flourishing beyond the memory of dreams of Canaan. The feeble father sat in peace as the shades of life fell, the mother grew grey in silence, until suddenly one day without a murmur she fell beside her kitchen fire and passing stood before God. Still the sun shone and the toddling ~~light~~ slender-haired boy ran and romped in Martha's kitchen and the father bent lower in the chimney corner.

It was in the winter of 1855 when Abijah Culver fell softly to sleep and did not wake again. But Martha awoke to an awful reality, for the mortgaged farm was going and she stood naked in the world, with only a little fondling of five years. John was annoyed at the news. AFter gains and losses, ups and downs, the money was at last beginning to roll into his coffers. Grimes was cautiously withdrawing from the southern business and ~~[illegible]~~ investment enlarging the banking features of the branch.

Reynolds kept on lured by the Vision of Gold. He was too busy to stop now, he could not go to Canaan but he sent a hasty letter to Martha telling her to come and get married and to bring Tom for he needed a new porter. And then he turned to his figures again. Martha came. Why not? To whom else should she turn in this great crisis of her life. How could a lone woman face life alone? She came a dark dim morning in November- slipped across the ferry and stood before John. He started - why! she was getting old - then he half apologized for the thought and felt his own thin ~~hair~~ hair and ~~puffy~~ bony face. Yes, they had passed the golden age of youth - they were thirty five - how time had flown since the days of the upper field - the great green upper field, and a sense of unutterable loss overwhelmed him. He kissed Martha fondly and she clung to him with a glad litle sob. He greeted Tom kindly and then he saw the child.

"Who's this", he said in surprise.

"It's ~~Henry~~ Roland - the baby you know" she said watching him. He looked again.

"O yes, yes - well we'll have to find a place for him."

She thought she understood him, but she was not sure.

They hurried up town to a little narrow house crowded modestly in a semi-fashionable quarter. It was furnished carefully - gloriously Martha thought. And then she and John walked out together to a minister and joined their hands before him and he joined their lives.

Tom was soon at work as porter in the counting house and at the wharves. Henry was exploring new corners at school and Martha was making the house ~~a~~ a home. The first crisis came suddenly after dinner as the boy had nodded and fallen asleep on the floor.

"Well" said Reynolds "I've made all arrangements and we'll send him to the Home tomorrow."

"The Home?" she said vaguely.

"Yes the ~~Pratt~~ Summa Orphanage - it's a pretty good place - he'll get some schooling and a trade."

Her eyes grew wide with terror.

"John" she whispered "you don't mean it?"

He moved uneasily "Why," he said in surprise, "we can't keep him you know."

She ~~crept on~~ bent to the floor, picked the child up and pressed him till he whimpered and woke.

"I want him" she whispered piteously fiercely - "I want him - I never had any thing I wanted before this. All my years I have ~~pierced~~ pressed the heart out of life - I never had a laugh or a dress or scarcely a kiss." She spoke more and more rapidly and breathlessly - "I have given up my youth, my flesh, my teeth - even motherhood has waited so long it may be God is angry and will never send us other children. But he sent me this baby and I want it - I want it."

He looked at her in amazement and doubt.

"But you see" he said slowly - "He may be half Negro for all we know."

"I don't care if he's all Negro. Negroes are folks aren't they? I want him, I'm going to keep him. If - he - leaves - (she swallowed hard) this house I'll leave too."

~~59~~

John stared gloomily out the window. So this was marriage ,this was gratitude -

"Well, well don't take on so - I dadn't - he'll be considerable expense but of course if you - " and he went out thoroughly ~~rightfully~~ and left her. So John Reynolds became a father.

Chapter VIII.

The Downfall.

There was a reform wave in New York and John Reynolds was nervous.

"Reform is all right" he explained " but business must not be disturbed by new f angled notions - you can't make people good by cleaning the streets." Consequently Mr. Reynolds viewed with consi erable suspicion the candidacy of Mr. Fernando Wood and predicted much evil in case of his election.

"I do not think you understand Mr.Wood" answered his discreet visitor. "He is a practical man,I think an interview might bring about an understanding.

And sure enough a few interviews with Mr.Wood brought so complete an understanding not only with John Reynolds but with certain other gentlemen that the reformers themselves turned against Mr.Wood in 1856 and nominated new and strange men to rule the city. They sought the aid of Mr.Reynolds but Mr.Reynolds was obdurate. "I'm not in politics" he sneered ("and besides I'm busy" as indeed he was for two great ships lay at the wharf and they must be refitted within the month.

And these two ships refitted and sent southward and - well John Reynolds ran his eye over his bank books,and his holdings in railway stocks. He rubbed his hands. "I'm a rich man" he said,and he walked rapidly to dinner. The house was small and cramped.

"We must have larger quarters - more space and air," he said.

The dinner was frugal. He grumbled a bit. "I saw some strawberries in market" he said.

"But they're so dear this early,John"said Martha.

He glanced at her,hot and red from the kitchen.

"Martha," he said " why in the world are you always digging in the kitchen with your sleeves rolled up - can't you let the girl do the work?"

"Why John she's a greenhorn from Ireland and doesn't know a thing that I don't tell her."

"Well get a better one and live in the parlor more and buy some clothes."

9 im going south & Charleston for a couple weeks he

"Here!" and he hastily wrote a check and handed it to her. Then he glanced at his watch and rose from his half eaten dinner and hurried away. Martha was so flurried at the criticisms and the check that she and the hurried parting did not hear Tom Calhoun until he had knocked at the kitchen door a third time. Then the little boy ran eagerly to him and Martha hurried after.

"Why, Tom - I'm so glad to see yo u - it's ages since you've been here"

"Yes, Mistress, I'm kept pretty busy at the wharves - "

She looked at him carefully. He was ever solemn and taciturn but today she saw a deeper gloom on his dark face - she hesitated:

"Is Celia well?" Celia was the reticent brown nurse who had brought sittle Henry to Canaan and to Martha's surprise Tom had announced his engagement to her sometime ago.

"Yes, mistress". She had wanted to speak to him of Celia several times. he did not seem very attentive to her, spoke little of her, visited her little, down in the alley off ----- Street where she lived. She felt she ought to chide him in some way but she hardly knew how -

"Mistress I'm thinking of leaving you "

"Leaving us, why Tom, John can't spare you - he depends so much on you -what has happened."

"I don't think that I and Master John can get on together."

"O - have you quarrelled - has he discharged you ?"

"No - no - we haven't quarrelled but - Mistress, I don't like the way things are going."

A vague coldness crept in Martha's limbs. She moistened her lips, put out her hand appealingly,

"Tell, me, Tom," she said.

"Mistress, ever since I came here I've been afraid of some of those great black ships down there that slip noiselessly in and out. I knew them - I felt them in my bones - and sometimes late of a misty nights I seemed to hear groans and see strange twisted forms within those empty echoing hulls as I wheeled out the rubbish. And one night - "

She crept nearer, almost crouching in the garish noonday sun.

"Yes?"

"And one night I saw blood,great clods of crusted blood - O I knew it,I've seen blood before. But yon night,the blood glowed red and I saw her."

"Her? Who'"

He lowered his voice - the witch woman - Momm Bett - you do not know her - tis and old story - you couldn't have seen her - she's a spirit. Saw her ten in the black ship and she told me suddenly like,in a flash that - it was - a - slave ship!"

"A slave shiw" she said wonderingly "in New York" "Why how strange are you sure?"

"Yes,mistress,I've watched and I know it." But thy should such ships come here - surely no slaves are brought here.".

"No they come to refit between voyages."

"But why don't you tell John?"

"He knows."

She looked at him - then caught her breath.

"No,no" she whispered " you don't mean it."

"Yes I do"he said "among your husbands 20 ships are five or six slavers and one or two are constantly stealing men while the others are refitting on the East river wharf."

Disbelief - fear - horror grew in her eyes. She sakn upon the door step trembling.

"It's a lie,"she gasped " a cruel lie - how dare you say such a thing of John - it cannot be true Tom, I say - is it so,is it so,Tom?"

"It's so,Mistress Martha,as God hears me."

They sat in silence hald-hearing the prattle and play of the boy in the yard.

"Then "she said "what can we do,Tom?"

"There is but one thing " he said "first I'm going to appeal to him then if it doesn't stop,I'll tell the authorities."

She gazed at him open-mouthed.

"I came to tell you - so that - so that you would know the truth."

And then he turned and hastened away.

When John Reynolds returned from the south two weeks later,

~~To John Reynolds~~ he found to his intense disgust that Fernando Wood was defaeted for the mayoralty in 1856 and yet those great black hulks lingered at the wharves. He worked feverishly day and night. A week more and they would go but what a week - what a long weary week.

It was a cold dark night and he sat over his papers in the office at the wharf making the last estimate. "In two more days" he said, then paused. Who was that on the wharf - he arose and went to the door, reaching it just as some one knocked. He stepped back and arranged his papers.

"Come in - why hello, Tom, couldn't think who it was, well what can I do for you?"

"Master Reynolds I owe you a heap - my life and my freedom."

"Oh, that's all right, Tom, you've been a good workman"

"But Master Reynolds, for all that I must speak out." John turned quickly toward him.

"Master Reynolds you must'nt fit out any more slave ships."

The blow fell from clear sky, but John Reynodls never winked.

"What are you talking about" he said with a slight huskiness in his voice.

"It's no use Master Reynolds - these ships are fitted with every thing but the water buckets and troughs and you expect them tomorrow or next day."

John Reynolds glanced at Tom. Useless - he was six feet and weighed 250 pounds. He stood between him and the door. There was not even a paper weight near.

"Tom" said he "you're strangely mistaken and if it were not that I think a great deal of you I'd ~~show you the door~~ discharge you for impudence. As it is I haven't time to talk with you tonight, but you come to my office tomorrow morning and I'll explain everything." You mean well but you're mistaken

"Thank you Master Reynolds - thank you " then he hesitated.

"Well?"

"Don't try and deceive me, Master Reynolds - don't for God's sake and your own sake" and he hurried out. John listened to his retreating foot-steps with strained ears. Then he slipped out the door and looked. Great drops of sweat oozed out on his forehead.

"The ships sail tonight" he said, and gliding down the wharf - he paused, listened and ran swiftly up the street. The hours flew and lingered. Dark forms slipped down to the wharf and there was a creaking and mumbling aboard. Along the black shadows John Reynolds kept careful vigil. After all the buckets and troughs made little difference - they could get them in Cuba or pick them up on the coast. At the most it meant but the loss of a few thousand dollars. An hour more and if all went well, the ships would glide peacefully down the twinkling harbor. What could be delaying the inspector? Hark! He crept forward. Two men were hurrying toward him. He stepped out.

The men stopped suddenly and separated slightly. A blinding light flashed in his eyes.

"Mr. John Reynolds"

"Yes" said John slowly as he caught the gleam of brass buttons.

"You are my prisoner" said the policeman.

The crisis was on the land, banks failed, stocks fell, money disappeared

Chapter IX.

The Turning.

All down the long Atlantic, ~~time~~ Want rose gaunt and hungry and shook its awful arms. Children shivered at their mothers' hearts, thin dark eyed men haunted the edge of the white waters, strange crives split the night and crime lurked on the nasty streets of New York. At such a time it was that John Reynolds staggered up to his door with empty arms.

"I am ruined " he cried wildly. "Thank God" cried Martha "O thank God;" She ~~Martha~~ had been waiting for this, two awful weeks; watching his face, hearkening to his midnight breathing, listening to the noises of the night. And now it had come at last an awful load lifted itself from her heart.

~~"Thank God - O thank God"~~ she sobbed softly as she bent on her knees and took the soaked shoes from his feet and confessed all she had known.

He stared at her blankly. Then bending toward her - "do you hear that wind - do you hear it yell? it's crying for victuals, I tell you, for coal, for clothes - yes by God for this roof - for the whole damned thing - won't pay us out of this mess". Then he choked with rising tears.

~~"O God"~~ I tried, Martha - I tried - I've worked like a slave for fifteen long years, worked and delved and struggled, pushed and slaved, one more night and I would have been worth a million gone hungry and threadbare just to save you and me from this - and now and now - " and he ~~burst~~ bent over on her shoulders and shuddered and wept as a man weeps but once in this world.

She did not say much but ~~just~~ put her cheek against his and smoothed his hair and when at last, the paroxism past, he sat silent with his head between his hands, she bade the wondering little boy to run to bed and on the warm glowing fire cooked a fragrant simple little supper. Then they ate together half silently yet with here and there quick sympathy in word and glance. And then they went to bed. All night long John Reynolds dreamed that he still held his railway stocks, that his ships still sailed the seas and that in his coffers lay heaps of beautiful red gold.

"John" said Martha early next morning, "we still have your father's place do we not?"

"Yes."

"Who lives there."

"No one. Old Nelson gave it up last September."

"Let's go there."

"Go there? - we can't make a living in Canaan."

"I've got a little of the money you gave me for dressing. You gave me $500 ~~$25.00~~ you know and I couldn't spend but $150. The rest will keep us till spring and then we'll start again John."

He looked gloomily at the floor.

"Never midn John," she said quickly "what they'll say, we'll just keep our mouths shut and pay our bills - it will be all right - besides all men cannot succeed and no man can be successful always. Come John lets go home and breathe the good old air, and get young again for a new start in life."

The scent of dear old hills rose suddenly in his nostrils and in his soul a great longing to flee forever from the narrow, cold and grimy city.

"We'll go today" he said as he dressed rapidly.

Mr. Jacob Grimes in his Wall Street banking house heard with regret but scarcely with surprise of the arrest of John Reynolds. He had expected it but he was genuinely sorry and he imparted that smuch of his feelings to his visitor, Mr. Fernando Wood.

"Capital business man - indefatigable worker and fertile in resouoce, but lakks poise, that delicate intuition that tells a man when to go slow."

"Do you think he'll recover his nerve sufficiently to be of use to us?"

"That is the question - at any rate we must try him and see - it's barely possible that this has happend at the psychological moment. He'll have to go to Washington anyway to straighten this slave trading business out with the federal authorities. He has a wide circle of southern friends and he'll probably succeed. In that case he'll be just the man to further this business.

"Do you think he could do the work?"

"There isn't a man in the United States that knows shipping better and the ins and outs of the TransAtlantic trade. He knew the Green Star line to a tee and often wanted me to go into it. If now we can put him in Washington in the hands of a good politician we ought to stand a splendid chance of getting the mail subsidy renewed. It would be a mint for us."

"!The thing that bothers me is the squally political outlook."

"Well then too, Reynolds may be of use - he has, as I 've said a wide aqqsaintance in the south.

"That's so - well, well, send for him and fix him."

And the ex-mayor went down to Five Points to organize a new campaign.

When John Reynolds hurriedly returned to Martha that aftertoon he was reticent.

"When shall we start, John," she finally asked timidly.

"I think you and the boy had beter go this week, I can't go with you on account of the court case which will take me to Washington but I'll join you - after a while."

Her face fell.

"Is there any danger to you John - I mean personal danger."

"Oh no, it's a matter of money - don't worry."

And in a few days Martha returned to Canaan.

Back again on the bosom of mother earth she sucked new life from the soil. It seemed like a holiday. All the memories of her narrow ~~unhappy~~ childhood came back and she often half listened for the shrill ~~quavering~~ voice of her old father. The valley changed and glowed and shivered as she worked. In the late spring it smiled and flowered. She hired a man and replanted the fields with corn and potatoes and vegetable and tended the meadows. Then the vale glowed and warmed, the grass waved in the field and the gardens and fields were full and radiant. She and Roland Henry helped work in the field and the boy grew strong and healthy. Her kin remained blank but she saw no trace of darker blood in his ruddy chesnut color, he was quick tempered and headstrong but had a certain innate dignity of bearing and temperament that Martha liked. When the valley softened into autumn and the fields were yellow and red and white, Martha foresaw at least a fair living for the winter and the blood danced in her veins as it had not for many a year. She was almost happy. She wanted nothing further in the world but this quiet honest hard working life. But she watched for news of John anxiously and with a sleepless sense of fear. And then one day as she sat in the twilight, a dark travellor came to the door.

"I just dropped by" he said "I was afeared you might need me."

"O Tom, Tom, how good of you " she said seizing both his great hands. "~~DF~~I do need you - you will stay and help us won't you?"

"But will Master John like it?"

She hesitated - "Well you can stay until he comes" she plead. And he saw her need and stayed.

Before Martha was well out of town, John Reynolds was closeted with his old partner Mr. Grimes.

"Of course after this" said Grimes "Your name had better not appear in the firm."

John reddened.

"How are your finances?" continued Grimes.

"This has brought down upon me all the creditors I ever had, I've lost the two ships, forfeited my contract with the Glennsworth-Mackay Company and am liable to ~~damages, besides~~ fines and lawyers' fees - two hours more and I'd have been a rich man.""

There too Glennsworth my chief friend in that business did last year and I can't count on Mackay. There may be damage suits & all that

Mr. Grimes coughed and leaned back.

"Reynolds" he said "I like you and always have. You've got good stuff in you, but, to be real frank, you lack ballast, you need metes and bounds to yourself. It isn't so much importance of where a man draws the line in his doings as that he draws it somewhere and sticks to his limits. No one expects everybody to tell the truth always but we must come to learn in individual cases how much margin to allow for lying and feel safe in banking on that margin and no more. Men will steal but to steal everything you get your hands on is criminal - to steal within recognized ~~limits~~ limits is business"

"I don't see the application of all this" said Reynolds, nettled.

"Well - it's this. When you came to us a raw country lad you were honest, most inconveniently and foolishly honest. When there came a chance for shady transactions you took the bait, traps and all. Now it's ~~xxxx~~ time you learned some rational middle course; and I believe you will - now as to this business: the best thing you can do to save money is to go ~~into~~ into bankruptcy. Your railway stock you can quietly turn over to me and I'll hold - it's madness to try and realize on it now in this falling market.

The next thing for you to do is to go to Washington and work on the federal authorities to get this indictment quashed. Fernando Wood is willing to help you and he can. In return for this we have a scheme in which we want your help."

"What is it?" asked Reynolds ~~eagerly.~~

"I and Wood have bought a controlling interest in the Great Star Line."

"Splendid" cried Reynolds in excitement.

"Not so fast - it's only splendid in case we get a renewal of the government mail subsidy. We want you to help lobby it thru - if it succeeds your fortune is made - when can you start?"

Reynolds looked at his watch - "Tonight."

"Good - here's the first installment of your salary ."

"Good day." One thing more: Mrs Glennworth, widow of your man is in Washington, & is already a power in the social world. I want you to be introduced to her in the lobby.

Chapter X.

The Gathering of the Storm.

John Reynolds hurried to Washington. He looked well-dressed and prosperous, and when he registered at the ----- Hotel the clerk was sure that he was at least a member of the Lower House. It was the afternoon of the fourth of February 1858. Reynolds looked at his watch and pondered - he wanted to see a certain New York congressman, and he also ~~had a letter of introduction from Henry Jones of West Point, to~~ Congressman Harrison Coles ~~of that district~~ whom he had remembered in the South. This gentleman he learned was a particular friend of the Cabinet officer whom he wished to influence Then too there was ~~xxxxxxxx~~ Mrs. Glennworth whom he knew to whom Grimes had particularly commended him. He decided first to go to the capitol and button-hole Coles if possible. The day was brilliant and Pennsylvania Avenue was gay with carriages which set off in contrast the low straggling buildings on either side. It was late afternoon when Reynolds ascended the marble stair and sought the gallery of the new hall of the Representatives. The rays of the sun were dying in the checkered ceiling. The gallery bowed low over the speaker's chair, the doors beneath swung incessantly with passing men. The men below longing, sitting, standing were bearded and long-haired, the black frock coats, and drooping collars held by many folds of silken cravat. There was a confused murmur when John Reynolds ~~said~~ entered:

"Will they adjourn soon?" he asked of a stranger.

"Hardly" returned the other with a smile "The Kansas matter is up."

Reynolds sat down. The sun died completely away and a wierd gloomy radiance streamed from the ceiling and illumined the shining semi-circles of desks. As the yellow light waxed, the unrest, excitement and half veiled exasperation below increased on every hand. A young black haired man was hurrying from dest to desk on the right and on the left the crowds were knotted, gesticulating, arguing.

Reynolds glanced at his watch impatiently and half rose to go - but something held him perhaps the shaven face of the young republican leader who was crying repeatedly "Mr. Speaker". The black haired young southerner, with has domineering face, his rumpled mane of hair and his velvet collared coat flung carelessly back from his white vest, smiled sneeringly at the Quaker and drawled another motion to adjourn.

"Why don't they adjourn" asked Reynolds.

"Want to vote" returned his neighbor.

"Well why don't they vote then?"

"Southerners are filisbustering."

Reynolds rose again but the hubbub increased below, angry epithets were hurled and the speaker pounded the desk. John Reynolds leaned over the balcony and found a fascination in watching the faces beneath. The hours flew before he realized it - it was ten, it was eleven. In a little breath of silence the clerks voice rose clear and incisive and there came a jeer and a snarl. The mysterious yellow radiance flickered and flared, the house whirled in two great eddies around the slim young Quaker, around the tall black haired southerner. The southerner tossed his hair, and slipped swiftly across the room, and before Reynolds could realize it, he had his open palm slapped the Quaker's face.

"You black Republican pup" he cried, and in a moment the floor of the house was a mass of seething fighting oursing men. John Reynolds was petrified with amazement and the gallery about him shook with cries and hsses. He saw the waving of arms and swaying of men, he heard the rattle of the gavel and the faint cries of the speaker, the sergeant at arms came stumbling along with the maze and then murmur by murmur, a great quiet sank over the hot misty chamber - a silence and a shame. John Reynolds, looked for his strange neighbor, but he had gone, so he followed walked down the stairs in disgust. What on earth was there in the Kansas muddle to make all this row about he argued as he searched his mind to remember the details of the thing and then gave up in despair.

Two men passed him.

"Mr.Coles, Mr.Coles - your vote will be needed."

"Very well - I'll return in a few moments - I must have some air."

"~~Is this~~ Mr.Harrison Coles." interrupted Reynolds eagerly.

"yes?" "~~It is~~" returned the fleshed bald headed man. — ah? " "Mr. John Reynolds" I must see you about something — Oh yes, yes, all the former. yes — "If you do no mind I will walk with you" said Reynolds " I came in this afternoon particularly to see you."

"I must apologize for your reception then" said Coles.

"It was - surprising" said Reynolds. "It is perhaps too bad to trouble you now ~~with these letters of introduction~~ but I very much want to meet Senator — ~~"Not at all - not at all "~~ no trouble — he is a friend of mine ~~"O yes"~~ I am glad to smake your acquaintance again, Mr Reynolds and I shall be glad to introduce you to the Secretary tomorrow afternoon - shall we say at two?"

They parted and Harrison Coles went wearily back to his desk back to the circle of white drawn faces glaring into w faces, red, swollen and Histortед. All night they sat there in tense silence that pulsed now into snarling angry bursts of speech and now died again quickly nervously. All night they sat and when the morning sun glinted furtively thru the roof it lighted a scene of wreck and havoc, and a straggling crowd of one hundred and fifty holloweyed and bedraggled men passed down the great white steps of the capitol.

With aching head Harrison Coles passed out into the morning sunshine and the fresh sweet air. Was ever a man so miserable placed he asked hi mself again. He felt himself gripped and pushed on by a mighty fate which he despisd though he bowed to its power. What was there in slavery to worship, fight for, uproot a civilization for? Why were his fellows mad, wild over ~~xx~~ this false faith. Or if he turned from them what could he find on the north but sordid shop keepers, blatant demagogues, wild reasonless fanatics. O the foolishness of all this, he fumed as he wandered far into the morning. Even the social life in this sporadic city was a thing that nauseated him. He knew what to expect when he crossed the threshold of the hotel:

"Why Mr.Coles -

"Dear Mr.Coles -

"O Mr.Coles do tell us all about it - we have been perfectly wild with excitement - I declare I haven't slept a single wink not a wink mind you thinking of those horrid Yankees. What did you do?- why I hear they actually attacked you with blows."

This last speaker was a florid expansive woman befrilled and powdered, and Coles answered her courteously, mechanically and looked at her with thoughtful eyes.

"My dear", he said at last turning toward his wife "I think I will ask the ladies to excuse me now - if a Mr. Reynolds calls for me let me know.".

"Very well, my dear," said the faded little woman, girlishly clothed and old faced and then turning away she continued "O how lovely of you, Col.Breckinridge -how perfectly lovely."

The following day Mr.John Reynolds arose at 9 and dressed carefully and calling a carriage was whirled rapidly up town to a certain elaborate private residence on ----- St. The livered footman ushered him into a parlor luxuriously furnished and had scarcely gone to announce him than the hostess appeared. She was a tall willowy woman, whose gown seemed part of her own magnificence and the very marks of time in whose countenance but emphasized its grace and comeliness.

"Mr.Reynolds" was all she said - and it was quite enough for in its cadence was surprise, pleasure, the end of waiting, the welcome of the stranger and the camaraderie of old acquaintanceship. The welcome was so cordial that Reynolds was slightly incoherent in reply, but he quickly plunged for a packet of papers and stuck them toward her. She took them, glancing a mute apology and putting him among the deep cushions of a divan. Then nestling in another carelessly and yet quite as her dress maker would approve, she fingered the documents keenly, rapidly, saying "h'm - ah - humph!" and breathing softly. Then she sprung up lightly and looked at her watch. "Gracious - gracious?" she mused

"Very good" she said "Now Mr.Reynolds you've been in Washington something over 48 hours and have just presented your credentials -pray what have you been doing?" and she smiled at him.

Never ask and admit a stranger while he explains matters at least

"I went down to the session day before yesterday afternoon to find a gentleman to whom I have a letter of indrodu[illegible]tion"

"And saw the brawl - how delightful - who's the man?"

"Mr.Harrison Coles of South Carolina."

"Good - I've been wanting to know him - you'll bring him here -and then?

"He introduned me to Secretary ------ and -".

"And the secretary told you that -er - he would give your case consideration - erz careful attention - the press of business,Sir - is - er - great now but I assure you - ha - ha - ha - " and she laughed so heartily that John Reynolds reddened.

"Evidently Mr.Reynolds" she added soberly "you are new,very new in Washington. Mind you! Congressmen are amenable to reason only when they eat and when they gamble. I will attend to their appetites in this matter and Bates will take you to Pendleton's. Let's see, where is my dinner list — James,the carriage."

It was a furious campaign that Reynolds guided by this fascinating,astute woman and the calculating Bates,led in Washington in the winter of 1858. Bates as Reynolds even remembered, he had met on the Ohio river boat in 1852. The capital was riotous with costly entertainment and expectation, apprehension stalked about on tiptoe, listening,gossiping,wondering. Now the men were loitering in the ante rooms of the "Hall of the Bleeding Heart." where amid carven oak,gilded art and solid silver plate,senators and congressmen and ambassadors gambled and drank rich wines. Here Bates lost carefully moderated sums to plunging westerners and hilarous southerners,and here Reynolds sat in serious conversation with legal papers,facts and figures , and the rattle of ivory chips and gold made music late into the night.

Or perhaps they were in Mrs.Glennworth's parlors,a chosen few,rolling in cosy luxury,and each revelling in the soft side glances of the hostess; tasting the broiled oysters and venison pie and playing a careless game of euchre ~~in~~ for careless ~~states~~ stakes -hearts and votes and gold.

It was at one of the earliest of the suppers that Reynolds met the Secretary he was seeking,after vainly calling at his office.

"Why Secretary ----- " Mrs.Glennworth said "what a veritable recluse you are."

"Madame - madame!" protested the secretary vaguely.

"Have you met Congressman Coles of Carolina - the most elusive of men, I have sought to know him for years and only tonight has he honored me."

"Ah,Mr.Coles this is a pleasure - I know your family well - your honored father was often at our Savannh house."

"I have heard him say so " returned Mr.Coles,yet his smile was but a weary one.

"These are strenuous days in Congress."

Coles threw up his hands with a gesture of despair.

"I thought I had seen the worst when Keitt slapped Grow but today we had another brawl."

"So I heard,so I heard " sad the secretary " but just what are the details?"

"I'm afraid I hardly know - I was day-dreaming in my seat when I became conscious of a sort of ~~rousing~~ roaring and Lo! Lovejoy was bellowing."

"Isn't it a shame "said Mrs.Glennworth "to let loose such a fellow among gentlemen - I remember him well :his coat off,his collar unbuttoned,his big bushy head rising like a bull's between his brandished arms."

"Ay but the uncurbed strength of the fellow - the brute earnestness.

He is the Embodied West rampant."said Bates.

"I never heard such an indictment of slavery in my life" said Coles -"it it froze my blood."

"The impudent rascal "growled the Secretary over his napkin "we've got to take measures against these abolitionists."

"On the contrary they're taking measures against us " said Mrs.Glenn-worth.

"With their dirty tongues."

"Not only that, but by the law and federal aggression -by the by, in your very department, is it not, Mr. Reynolds?"

"Why - I didn't know - "

"~~Why~~ It's one of those periodically trumped up slave trading charges in New York, by which the abolitirnists hope to kill southern commerce."

"O those charges always fall flat."

"But they have actually had the impudence to indict our friend Mr. ~~Reynd~~ Reynolds - have they not?"

The Secretary waved his hand -

"Yes, yes but the whole proceeding will be quashed and by the way, Mr. Reynolds will you come over to the department tomorrow? "

Mr. Reynolds said he would and they all listened to Mr. Coles who was detailing bits of Lovejay's speech ~~on Mr. Coles~~

"The thing that maddend Pryor was his assertion that 'Slave holding has been justly designited as the sum of all villainy. Put every crime, he said perpetrated among men into a moral crucible, and dissolve and combine them all and the resultant amalgam is slave holding. It has the violence of robbery, the blood and cruelty of piracy! it has the offensive and brutal lusts of polygamy,all combined and concentrated in itself,with aggravations that neither one of these crimes ever knew or dreamed of."

"All the time he was advancing toward the Democrats and waving his great fists. The sweat poured from his face as he yelled in the very faces of the Democrats ' The principle of enslaving human beings because they are inferior is this:If a man is a cripple,trip him up;if he is old and weak,and bowed with the weight of years,strike him,for he cannot strike back;if idiotic,take advantage of him and if a child,deceive him. This,sir,this is the doctrine of Democrats,and the doctrine of devils as well,and there is no place in the universe outside the five points of hell and the Democratic party where the practice and prevalence of such doctrines would not be a disgrace.'"

This was too much for Pryor - he leaped to his feet -with his clear carven face aflame and his long sleek hair flyink and rushed forward. Then bedlom broke loose. Bark dale of Mississippi stood on his desk and cursed Lovejsy with every epithet he could find."

"Yes," I read them" said Bates. " A Black hearted scoundrel, a nigger stealing thief," a perjured liar,and infamous villain and a few other gems."

(over)

"I tell you this ~~thing looks~~ situation is altogethem too serious to be comfortable."

"It means secession" said the secretary " if not war" and they rose and sought the parlors.

The first part of Mr.John Reynolds' mission to Washington was easily accomplished next morning when he called on the secretary at the department. An hour later a message went to New York quashing all further proceedings in the case of the United States vs.John Reynolds et.al.

"Did you happen to notice the old man standing beside him" asked Coles

"No"

"There was a curious old man beside Barkedale – a small dark old fellow, with a fringe of curly grey hair & forked white beard – looked like a Jew or some Eastern nationality. He stood tapping and rubbing his hands. at first I thought he was remonstrating Barkedale – then he seemed more as though he was shrieking them forward dancing in some weird incantation – the aspect of him seemed weird unearthly and the gleam of his eyes more hideous, awful. I can find no one who knows him or apparently noticed him"

"Some wandering wizard" laughed Mrs Glenmuth.

"The fracas needed no witchery to make it any worse than it was" said Bates

lusts of polygamy,all combined and concentrated in itself,with aggravations that neither one of these crimes ever knew or dreamed of."

"All the time he was advancing toward the Democrats and waving his great fists. The sweat poured from his face as he yelled in the very faces of the Democrats' ' The principle of enslaving human beings because they are inferior is this:If a man is a cripple,trip him up;if he is old and weak,and bowed with the weight of years,strike him,for he cannot strike back;if idiotic,take advantage of him and if a child,deceive him. This,sir,this is the doctrine of Democrats,and the doctrine of devils as well,and there is no place in the universe outside the five points of hell and the Democratic party where the practice and prevalence of such doctrines would not be a disgrace.'"

This was too much for Pryor - he leaped to his feet -with his clear carven face aflame and his long sleek hair flyink and rushed forward. Then bedlom broke loose. Barksdale of Mississippi stood on his desk and cursed Lovejsy with every epithet he could find."

"Yes," I read them" said Bates. " A Black hearted scoundrel, a nigger stealing thief," a perjured liar,and infamous villain and a few other gems."

"I tell you this thing looks altogethem too serious to be comfortable."

"It means secession" said the secretary " if not war" and they rose and sought the parlors.

The first part of Mr.John Reynolds' mission to Washington was easily accomplished next morning when he called on the secretary at the department. An hour later a message went to New York quashing all further proceedings in the case of the United States vs.John Reynolds et.al.

After paying costs and damages clearing up bankruptcy proceedings, Mr. Reynolds found himself with some cash on hand not counting the railway bonds in Mr. Grimes hands.

The other matter of the mail subsidy for Mr. Grimes steamboats did not progress so favorably. So turbulent was the session that it seemed best to let the present subsidy lapse and wait until the new congress. Meantime there was plenty to do in making friends with the various congressmen and heads of departments and preparing for the opening of Congress the following winter.

And the summer? Mrs. Glennworth said "Saratoga by all means. The Southerners are in force there and the Southern influence is the ruling one in Congress."

"The west is coming" suggested Reynolds.

"But not yet arrived" said Mrs. Glennworth.

A little silence intervened.

"I am greatly - very greatly obliged to you" said Reynolds "for helping me here - without yyour marvellous guidance I should have floundered in this morass."

Mrs. Glennworth came and sat on the divan near Reynolds. She was gowned in something pink and rustling and the folds of her voluminous skirt billowed to his very knnes. Her shoulders were white and bare and soft brown hair coiled over her ears and shadowed the faint rouge on the lines of her cheeks.

"Mr. Reynolds" she said, then hesitated.

He mumbled something. He was never able to talk when this woman grew confidential.

"Mr.Grimes is - rich isn't he?"

"Yes."

"And we are poor - "

"Well I've just escaped utter ruin."

"And yet with Grimes' help and influence you can rise again."

"Yes."

"Are you sure of his influence."

"No - I'm afraid that he has but partial faith in me."

"You have one sure way of gaining his full confidence."

"What's that?"

"I propose to marry Mr.Grimes."

He stared at her. "And if I do" she continued reflectively -"I shall not forget - my friends; will you help me?"

Chapter XI.

The Conference.

Mr.Grimes promised to join Mrs.Glennworth in Saratoga early in August but also proposed, with her approval, a quiet conference of certain forces in some out of the way place far from the newspapers. He wanted Harrison Coles on account of his standing, Colonel Higby of the same state, member of the Postal Committee, Bates of Illinois, and a Virginian, member of the committee of ways and means.

"Why couldn't we go to your farm in Canaan" asked Grimes as they were casting about.

"Just the thing", said Reynolds and he wrote to Martha hurriedly, and to the village hotel.

Martha bustled about arranging things.-

"Tom, John is coming and Mr. Grimes and three or four congressmen, we must - " then she saw his look and she stopped. "Never mind, Tom, we won't say anything we'll just act as tho it was perfectly natural and if he objects to your staying - why then I suppose you'll have to go. But he won't Tom, I know he won't - he's a good man at heart and he surely cannot blame you."

Yet three men started in surprise when Tom met the party at the little depot. Reynolds grew red with anger but said nothing merely tossing his valise t o the black man. Harrison Coles looked at him long and carefully and Tom started back in bewilderment. Then Coles extended his hand and said frankly "I'm glad to see you Tom."

But Colonel Higby said in a low voice to the Virginian: " Do you see that buck? Haynes, I'll bet a thousand dollars he's a runaway; I thought first he was a nigger I lost two years ago, but he's not. Yet he's a valuable darky and ought to be sent back south, and by God I half believe I'll send him." Then as he found himself beside Reynolds and noted Reynolds' anxiety to please and influence him, he said suddenly.

"Do you have many runaway niggers like that up here.?

Reynolds flushed. "No - and we could spare him."

Higby pricked his ears. "He is a runaway then, is he?"

" Yes - that is I'm pretty sure he is."

"I lost one like him two years ago," he said.

Reynolds turned quickly "Won't this one do" he said. Higby glanced at him , "Where's is there a United States marshall? " he asked. Then they lowered their voices and whispered.

As the party came up to the house several children were playing "I spy"

a boy came running round the house and colliding with a little girl, both tumbled to the ground at the feet of Harrison Coles. He stopped with an exclamation and stared at the boy:

"Who is that" he asked almost harshly.

"That is my son ~~Henry~~ Roland "said Reynolds apologetically. "~~Henry~~ Roland have you nothing to say for your rudeness."but Coles had quickly recovered himself and and dismissed the incident with a laugh.

Martha was in the midst of serving a county dinner two days later when two strangers drove up to the door. She hurried out,hot and perspiring

"Is there a Negro here named Tom Calhoun."

"Yes he's out ~~—~~ she stopped and looked suspiciously at them and ~~then~~ said more slowly ~~said~~ he— "he's out in the wood shed I'll get him" The potatoes were scorching on the stove - the guests were waiting, but she sped recklessly out the back door around the barn and down into the fields. Yes - yes - she knew the face of the marshall if it had been five years since he seized the runaway slave in Canaan and took her south -

"Tom - Tom" she cried. He started up from digging potatoes and hurried to her.

"Come"she said breathlessly. She slipped around the barn and into the barn yard, and clambered up to the main floor, and he followed in confusion:

"The marshall's after you Tom - climb up there on the hay and press on the ceiling there - no, further - won't it open - God, God - father used to - there,thank heaven crawl in. I'll bring you supper". And she flew back to the kitchen,,rescued the rapidly spoiling potatoes, and then called out the door:

"I can't find him"she said. "I think he probably down at the grocery" and hurrying back she began dishing up the rest of the dinner for her waiting guests,and directing Silena Smith who was helping her. The waiting guests had lapsed into anecdote and Coles was speaking. "I was curiously upset the first day I reached Canaan - first at the depot I thought I recognized an old - friend here, in this far away village. That gave me a reminissent turn but when I reached the house there came an incident that made me feel eerie. Let's see - fully 57 years ago, I was once playing hide and seek with a lot of children,when an interloper joined us,rushed carelessly around the corner and knocked my sweet heart down. This lead to my first bloody battle and ~~may~~ my first bitter defeat, for he was bigger & stronger. I shall never forget it. Well, day before yesterday as I stepped into the gate that same boy rushed around the corner."

The guests burst into laughter and Coles smiled. "The resemblance was marvellous" he said."and the situation so like that I think only one thing saved my sanity."

"And that was"?

"It was a different girl."

Reynolds had excused himself at the beginning of the narrative to seek the cause of Martha's delay.

"What's the matter,Martha?" he asked going to the kitchen.

"Someone looking for Tom." He went quickly ~~to~~ out the door. With the marshall he ~~scanned~~ searched the farm but could not find the Negro.

"He was digging potatoes here evidently"said Reynolds. "And here are his tools - ah - to the barn."

They ransacked the barn. There was no one to be found.

"Well,he may have gone down town - suppose you come back about husk"said Reynolds. And then he returned, sat among his guests and thought. As he sat there he glanced up and saw Martha looking at him from the kitchen door. An appeal lay on her face but he did not see it - he only saw a look that brought back through the mists of twenty years and more the memory of a round girlish face, with terror in her eyes who crouched on the lintels of that very door and told him a tale of runaway slaves, and then he and she had slipped out into the yard yonder - he started to his feet. Fool! how could he have forgotten that old trap door. a moment ~~Then~~ he hesitated but the memory of that dark night on the wharf arose and he went white with anger. Sauntering out on the porch he watched the road and met the marshall. He whispered to him and the marshall and his assistants hurried to the barn just as Martha appeared on the back porch with a plate of food. She threw her apron over it and stood petrified. The tardy minutes dragged away and then the barred door opened and Tom Calohun chained hand and foot came out slowly between two heavily arned men. The food crashed to the floor; she staggered back to the kitchen.

"Silena,Silena" she cried "they're taking our Tom back to slavery" and then she settled into the old chair and stretched her arms on the kitchen table and faitned away.

Silena lost not a minute of time She dashed a whole pail of water over the prostrate woman and then picking up her s kirts, jumped through the window leapt the fence and flew up the dusty road. Far behind she heard the hoof beats of the marshall's horse, but she threw back her head and ran like a fawn, across the bridge, under the great elm, into the post office.

"Father - father" she screamed "They're kidnapping Tom Calhoun."

And ~~then~~ with a shiver and a roar the town of Canaan poured into the street.

Meantime the guests save Higby had no inkling of the incident.

Grimes was showing certain specification on a large blue print to Haynes and Coles and Bates. Higby had ridden down town, and John Reynolds was listening to Grimes.

"What's that" asked Grimes as a low rumble reached his ears.

John Reynolds stepped to the door. A distant roar of voices was wafted in.

"Excuse me - I'll step down town and see." he said seiz ng his hat and to Grimes' disgust Haynes followed. The wagon of the marshall was in the midst of the long street of Canaan surrounded by an angry crowed of men.

"Thief".

"Slave-catcher."

"Murderer", ~~The~~ the yelled, "Let him go - let him go."

John Reynolds pushed his way through the throng and clambered into the carriage. The marshall recognized him. "Gentlemen" said ~~he~~ Reynolds " we are all law abiding citizens. You know me - I promise you that this man shall not be taken from town without a fair trial. Let us see that he is safely put in the lock-up tonight and his case properly tried tomorrow." The crowd looked upon Reynolds as defending the Negro and quickly assented.

~~55.~~

The next morning Harrison Coles sauntered down town. Something had been said casually at breakfast about the trial of a fugitive slave, but no particulars were given, and yet he was curious. The court room was crowded to the doors with men women and children. The women were in tears, the children wide eyed and the men stern and solemn. A gaunt minister opened the proceedings with a long earnest prayer and then Tom Calohun was arraigned and Colonel Higby offered documents to prove that he was his property.

Surprise, disgust and indignation swept over Coles' face.

"You acknowledge that you ran away from slavery.?" insisted the prosecuting attorney.

"Yes" said Tom.

"And that you came from South Carolina."

"Yes"

"And this description could not be more precise" he argued as he read from a newspaper.

"That description might fit a thousand Negroes" protesed the lawyer of the defense. "There a is absolutely no identifying mark outside the general description of height, weight, etc.

"I think I can identify the man" the voice came from the back of the room. Higby looked round in surprise and Reynolds in apprehension.

Harrison Coles came forward. "This Negro" he said "belongs to me. He was the property formerly of Senator John C. Calhoun and came to me through my aunt by inheritance. He was always well treated, was married in my house and had two children. Suddenly and to us, unaccountably, he beat his young wife terribly and ran away. We suspected that he escaped north on some of the sailing vessels out of Charlestrn, and altho I advertised locally, I made no great effort to trace him. His action was to me unaccountable. His treatment was the best I could give and if he wanted to leave I was willing he should go. I have here a decription of his with certain scars and marks, published in the South Carolina -------- on March --- 18 --" Moreover I think Tom will corroborate my words."

"They are true" said Tom Calohun. "I am Master Coles' slave."

A groan went through the strained audience.

John Reynolds arrived at Saratoga in chagrin and disappointment and was soon closeted with Grimes & Fernando Wood. They were perturbed but hopeful, and all three sought the parlors of Mrs Glenmorith at the Congress Hotel.

and Wood. we must hold the fire-eaters by all odds; the democratic party must not split - I'm going to win in New York this fall and we've got Douglass beaten. If we can prevent a split we'll have New York, city and state and the Nation solidly democratic and tha means - that means - well it means a new start and wide open ~~on~~ commerce for Reynolds" and Reynolds winced.

"I can't understand" said Grimes this new aggressiveness on the part of the South - they can't be pacified; they've got all & want more.

Mrs Glenmorith coaxed and straightened her silken stockings toward the fire place.

"I understand it perfectly" she said.

"Who's back of it all" said Wood. Who's stirring the muddle and backing up the agitators

"The Inner Circle" said Mrs Glenmorith wisely and carefully closing the door.

O I've heard of that mummery — the Knights of the White Camelia, the Golden Circle & all that but —

"Yes its mummery" said Mrs Glenmorith "but its more than mummery — I know because I belonged" you?

Well Glennmith died & that was the same thing — she here: there's a secret oathbound organization now more than a generation old that has a death grip on the whole south. It's leader is some mysterious personage whom none seem to know. They meet with him in grand conclave every decade on the 9th year ~~that is will be this winter 1859.~~ The meeting of this year 1959 will be the 4th or 5th meeting. After each meeting comes some sudden dashing stroke - Missouri & Mississippi in the earlier years, Texas after the meeting of 39, Kansas after '49 and after '59 - what? This much I know — and this much is enclosed & limited might lead to — heart-failure." and she laughed nervously.

The men were silent. Then Woods and ~~asked~~ slowly ~~what can be their~~ — "The explanation sounds plausible although it sounds a bit flighty, I must confess. Yet there's something in it."

"It's true" asserted the woman "I know what I say"

"But what can they want?"

"Want? they want the earth and as a first step to it war and secession, then a southern slave empire sweeping over Mexico and the West Indies and then - "

The men looked at each other doubtfully and the woman continued: "at any rate we must know their program if we expect to checkmate them. They meet within the next 3 months — one of you must meet with them."

"Ward slapped his knee — "the very thing" he said & looked about. "Grimes you are too old and we want you & Jimmie this week — I must stay and guide the political ship — Reynolds you must go"
Reynolds hesitated & Mrs. Glenmouth said "you may never come back"
"I'll go" said Reynolds quickly.
It will cost us at least $25,000 "said Mrs Glenmouth.
"It will furnish that & more if necessary" said Grimes
Mrs. Glenmouth rose and went to the door and whispered a name. A black bearded man of medium size entered "My brother, Gentlemen" said Mrs. Glenmouth.

Thus it was that John Reynolds went south hurriedly in the fall of 1859 to renew his southern acquaintances and keep his eyes open. He sailed ~~south to~~ in Charleston in a swift yacht and the face of the captain seemed in some way familiar - he was tall and and yellowish, with harshly drawn face and tobacco stained mouth, and he swore to a degree that shocked John Reynolds. Then he remembered "You've given up river work" he said, thinking of that westward journey in 1852. The Captain smiled.

"Yes - but I'm still hatin" niggers" he said and they fell to talking ~~planning~~.

~~Reynolds first errand was to find Colonel Henry Jones but he had disappeared~~
~~For some days Reynolds could not find Colonel Jones~~. Then suddenly as he returned to Charleston from reconnoitering inland where he got wind of some secret gathering he bolted into Colonel Jonies hurriedly enterin a carriage with a trunk strapped behind.

"Colonel Jones".

"Mr. Reynolds."

"Well this is fortunate - I -

"I'm very sorry but I have scarcely a moment" said Jones hastily and as Reynolds thought uneasily. He offered to ride along in the carriage to the depot ut Jones said he had a companion and added hastily "Can't you run over to the Magnolias and await me or a letter to-morrow"and scarce awaiting an answer he was gone. And so was John Reynolds for he saw Jones' carriage haeding furiously for the wharf and he ~~rushed after it~~ hastened cautiously in the same direction hailing another cab as he ran and leaping into it. He saw Jones embark and but a half hour later he too was sailing southward in his swift yacht behind the dark vessel that bore Jones to the secret conclave.

The smaller swifter vessel passed t e larger one in the night and then hovered lazily about the bahamas until the larger ship caught up. Scanning its decks carefully with their glasses,they were able to discover nothing but freight and a few black saliors.

"Are you sure that's the vessel?" asked Reynolds.

"Dead sure" answered the captain grimly,and then for days came the game of hide and seek until one golden morning they lost the ship and twelve hours later spied her again alomst hidden in the harbor of a tiny for ested island in the Florida straights. Skirting on in the tract of the usual traffic,they made no attempt to approach until night fa l,and even then Reynolds hesitated. But the gruff captain would listen to no temporizing. Anchoring behind a neighboring island, they embarked in a small boat & crawled listen to no temporizing, ~~and gliding~~ silently and noiselessly under the black sky across to the little island. For many hours they slipped about and ~~they were soon riding at anchor on the opposite side of the tiny island.~~ watched but no sentinels appeared.

Reynolds was uncomfortable. For a respecta le business man to be chasing strange ships in mid ocean savored too much of piracy and novels for his practical mind.

"What place is this?" he whispered finally ~~as the captain rowed them noiselessly to the land.~~

"One of the slave msmuggler's nests, I reckon" was the answer, as they crawled upon the rocky shore. It proved to be a larger island than it ~~seemed.~~ appeared at first sight Dense forest covered the southern part and it seemed quite deserted. The captain reconnoitered. "I'm going to send th ship away a d stay here a day or so" he said. Reynolds remonstrated.

"Well what do you suggest?"

What Reynolds wanted to suggest was that they go home but he did not dare. He squated in the darkness and listened to the sighing of the trees and said

"It'll be hard for us to get away, in case - in mcase-"

"It'll be a damned sight harder if they wake up and see a strange crafte swooping aroun."

This was very logical, but to hear that man calmly toying off on such an errand was most fearfully disconcerting and John Reynolds shivered in the hot night and swore softly. Sleeping in the dense dank forest beneath the great white ones, The next morning they climbed a reat tree and cautiously reconnoitered. There lay the glowing silver ocean, shading into sh mmery gold on the misty horizon. Around them rose dark half tropical forestry harboring great winged bbirds and strange scents. And to the northward at the edge of a vast natural amphitheatre gleamed a great white pillared temple with long low arm like wings.

"Marble"gasped Reynolds, hearing cautiously.

"Stucco"growled the captain, spitting copiously.

"What do you suppose it is?"

"Meeting house of some kind."

All day they watched it furtively, noting black clothed figuers here and there but not daring to approach.

At night they slipped neaer and caught a glimpse of three or four figures that looked familiar.

"What can they be doing here?"asked Reynolds.

"That's for us to find out if we can." said the Captain peering carefully through his bony glass. At length he seemed satisfied and they climbed down.

"Had not me better go?" suggested Reynold cautiously

Go? go where?"

Alone

Alone? Look here young man, I've been offered $10,000 if I'll get you into their secret conference and I'm going to earn that cash & don't you forget it get-me-in? why they'd kill me.

Possibly, but I think not "said the Captain coolly while Reynolds flesh crept." at any rate we'll see before the night is gone — you stay right here keep this bay tree. I'm going calley."

Alone in the great forest, in the grand seas, in the great wood, John Reynolds lay staring at the silent sky. Strange sounds startled him as the ghastly steps of unseen men seemed drawing near. Any hour death day and just as finally his terror had abated & he was drifting into dreamless dreamed, someone touched his shoulder and the captain stood beside him; he leaped to his feet and saw against the dark figure dark of the captain. Cautiously the captain flashed his dark lantern now on Reynolds, now on the strangers face & Reynolds noted that the man was, ~~black haired~~ & bearded & accompanied the glenmorris butler

"Come" said the captain, and they marched single file through the forest until after a long hard climb Reynolds caught the dim outlines of the grand white temple. The captain paused

"Good night" he said — "~~good night~~ good night I would say, here" and he was gone. The stranger lead Reynolds cautiously until slipping noiselessly through doors & passage ways they found themselves in a plain cell like room. The stranger lighted the lamp

"Mr. Reynolds," he said ~~you are safe & safe~~ I am a member of this secret enclave. You are safe & take my place in the deliberations tomorrow. Discovery means death. I am going but carefully & disguise you with my clothes & then give you minute directions."

It was broad day. A black bearded man splendidly uniformed in crimson and gold stood before a great carven oak door knocking and his hand trembled as he knocked. The door flew abruptly open and a blast of trumpets rolled in vaulted corridors. The room into which ~~Colonel Jones~~ he stepped directly from his simple quarters was of stately magnificence. It was tinted in crimson and gold - two rows of massive pillars lined each side holding great rounded

~~Magnificence. It was tinted in crimson~~ ~~& gold - two rows of massive~~ pillars lined each side holding great rounded arches of gleaming mosaic. The light streamed in from ~~great~~ long transom windows above the pillars and high over them hung the carved & vaulted roof. Down the length of the hall between the massive ~~columns~~ pillars, stretched a ~~great~~ broad table of rich dark wood, polished & inlaid, resting into carved claw feet on ~~a~~ red velvet carpets which guarded the white marble floor. Twenty one ~~chairs~~ ~~carved~~ golden chairs, with crimson

~~stones~~ of gleaming mosaic. The light streamed in from ~~great~~ painted windows above the pillars and high over them hung the carved and vaulted roof. Down the length of the hall between the inmost pillars, stretched a ~~great~~ wood table of rich dark wood, polished and inlaid, resting its curved claw feet on red velvet carpets which guarded the ~~white~~ marble floor. Twenty one golden chairs, with crimson trappings surrounded the table. The chair at the foot was empty. From the others rose twenty men ~~and Henry Jones~~ as the black bearded man entered. He stepped forward quickly with eager face - he knew that one, this one, all? yes, all of them, as he glanced rapidly and the great names of the South crowded to his lips but froze there for he remembered ~~that here all men were Nameless.~~ what must happen if they knew - if they ended! They were clad in the same gorgeous military t uniforms as he but each different, cream and grey and blue, and they bowed gravely and courteously as he seated himself in the empty chair.

Directly opposite to him and close to the unoccupied end of the table, ~~rose~~ was slightly raised above the level of the floor, canopied and the throne. It was of pure white marble, carven magnificently and garlanded with cloth of gold. Upon it rose a great black chair, strait and ancient and on the great sparkling arch that folded itself above the chair ~~rested a triple crown of crusted jewels and gold~~ hung a circle of jewels and gold.

Two giant black heralds — men mighty in limb & stature stood by the arm posts and as the last great crash of trumpets stirred & mailed throngs the hall — as the richly garbed company rose and faced the chair, the black bearded man bent forward in arrangement.

A singular figure was already seated in the ~~great dark chair~~.

The slight body was draped in a flowing silken robe that almost the soft black carpet. Above rose a ~~white~~ face transparently white pinched and shrunken; the top was bald so that the forehead rose like a pale dome; the upper lip was shaven but from the chin flowed a long white forked beard and the fringe of ~~silken~~ silvery hair from head clipped down and mingled with it. The eyes were dim & shadowy

He seemed unearthly, a thing shaped in mystery, unsubstantial, yet real

~~and yet real~~ with a stinging forceful reality that gripped the heart of every man then
And next a mysterious power that lay in these men's hands, that ~~power~~ before which a ~~Continent~~ continent was humbled, and the Five Seas recently, seemed here suddenly incarnate flesh & blood & yet that flesh spiritualized and the blood, bloodless and then ~~Who was he? What~~ ~~was he? Whence had he come? and Account to~~ ~~Does these counter-~~ ~~Reproved~~
~~Arrested there in Charleston~~ ~~it echoed~~
~~and smelled~~ Over his face & form hovered all, seemed ~~made~~ ~~grass be that will wither before~~, an appearance of extreme age, endless years, ~~impenetrable~~ Army
Army acquaintances with the unfurled past and the man unfathomable thought, shrouded with — the Impenetrable Future. ~~He~~
~~The man~~ ~~face~~ seemed himself nervously looked about him and over the unasked question clutched to his lips — Who is he?

As you answer the old man spoke and his voice sounded full and musical as it rang in the great hall: "My Lords, it is now full forty years since I placed myself on this throne. Whence I came & why matters little to you. I have seen the crashing of empires and the staggering of nations until weary with the old world's bitterness I conjured in the new world the true divinity of Right, the true doctrine of human inequality & human subordination. That I set myself to establish the supremacy of the central all-dominating Will-the formidable of monarchy to which the South was ever true. Wrongs that will me shame to establish a great slave empire stretching from Hudson bay & the south Pacific & from Sea to Sea."

We paused & scanned these strained faces

"The record of our empire has been unexampled, magnificent. The day of the crisis & its fortunes is at hand The traitor that triumphs the decker the dangers. Our foes are militant and faintly suspect our power and designs

Book 3 pp. 1-147

41-121

Book III.

The Seat of the Scornful.

The Seat of the Scornful.

Chapter I.

Mom Bett. (?) The Wild Woman and the Shadow Ship.

All the dark lowlands were sleeping. The solemn oaks dipped to the gloomy waters and a wild bird frightened from her nest rose and shrieked in the darkness, circled in the air, then settled to her sleep again. But the little boy whom her shrill cry wakened, started from his dreams, sat upright in his bed and turned fear-struck eyes toward the sea. Within the cabin all was dark and still save a dying gleam in the fire place and a sound of breathing. The little boy hearkened -how the sea roared like a great Voice! what was it saying? What were those little answering whispers, and whence that glowing in the outer blackness? A slow dim terror crept and trembled in his ~~limbs~~ limbs; his dry lips would not speak, but he strained ~~with~~ his eyes out through the great dark door. See! a flaming sat upon the midnight waters, and round it - yes, round it- rode the dark shadow of a shadowy ship, sailing swinging hurrying; and above it swirled a face, a great dark awful - "Mammy", wailed the child "Mammy - mammy - mammy" he shrieked in an ecstacy of terror till two great soft arms came out of the night and held him, and a voice crooned:

"There, honey, there; it's all a dream, nothing shall hurt mammy's child."

When the child awoke again, the sun was streaming across the waters. He wakened his sister and whispered to her and together in their scanty night gowns which scarce covered their smooth dark flesh, they stepped to the kitchen where the mother was hurrying to and fro and singing softly.

"Mammy, please tell us another story about Momm Bett" they asked in unison.

41-1-2

"No,no" said the mother"you've done heard too many tales already and it makes you sleep bad nights,and scream and wake us. Run along and dress and get ready to take this bundle to Unce Caesar".

41-1-3

After breakfast the children started for Uncle Caesar's hand in hand, going under the great oaks and skirting the lagoons,around the green rice fields and through the rows of blossoming cotton,treading carefully so as not to harm the plants. At last they came to an old tumble down cabin and knocked at the open door. No one answered. They knocked again & again until ~~Then~~, they heard a queer cracked voice:"What you want over there?" "Mammy's sent us with your mending." Out of the far field came a curious old bent black man. His hair white as snow and bushy,his beard scanty and scraggly. Sharp snappy black eyes twinkled in his head and his face was folded and seamed,wrinkled and forbidding. He glided along slowly bent half double and mumbling always some unintelligible jargon. The children always half-feared him and shrunk from him,~~yet~~ and yet he had a fascination and could hold them spell bound with his black eyes when he would. Today he seemed so minded. ~~He~~ He looked at them sharply till they began to slide off. Then he chuckled and searched in his great pockets until he brought out a grimy paper and in it a great piece of striped candy. The chlidrens' eyes grew big but they hesitated.

"Is you good children"?he asked.

"Yes,sir."

"Does you want some candy?"

"Yes,sir."

"Wall sit down" -they sat under a great tree and the old man squatted in front.

"This is powerful fine candy" he said "powerful fine - it'll make you grow."

They eyed it wistfully until finally he broke off two pieces and gave it to them. Under the spell of its wondroun goodnes ,the boy ventured to speak.

"Tell us about Mom Bett,Uncle Caesar."

41-1-4

The old man eyed them.

"What do you know about Mom Bett"he asked.

"Mammy tells us things sometimes."

"Go way - your mammy don't know nothing about Mom Bett - I knows - I knows all about her,but I won't tell all,nobody could tell all. She was a Wonder Woman."

The children crept nearer. "Tell us something",they plead.

So he told them and this was the tale he told,only he used curious language which the writer has straightened:

"Mom Bett,Greatest of Wonder Women,The woman!came in the year of the great Coming,when the doors were opened and Africa poured in suddenly upon the land,and Charleston harbor was black with slaves. This was the way of her coming. It was a red night, a hot red night when lights were flashing in the north. Just after the crimson sun set there came a great hailing at sea -a sudden angry wind swept by,with black clouds,and signal lights flew furiously up and down in the east. Then at last the gathering crowds on the wharves heard a whistling shriek and a great dark ship of ancient build staggered around the bar from the south under torn and flapping canvass,rushing like a fiend,and grating and tearing as she hove to. There was a strange creeking and tearing of cordage;black clothed and uncanny men moved about silently and their master hailed the crowd in some strange tongue that none understood. At last an old hermit from the mountain, he that was half daft and wandered about silently, heard and answered the jargon. It seems the strang folk had been making for Holland around the Cape called Good Hope. There long beat back by eastward storms they had struck a sudden east wind which threw them violently westward till starving and thirsty they had made with difficulty this harbor. All this we doubted for we had seen no storms; still when they offered a slave cheap for food and water, men hurried forward to bargain. An old white bearded man with cavernous eyes brought her ashore. No sooner did I see her than I knew her. She was a queen and one of the Wonder Women. I crept upon my face. But they, the white folks, they only saw a black woman, six feet in height, lithe and straight as a pine with a mass of curiously puffed and bushed hair. A white man started toward her but she looked at him and he slunk away. Another clutched her arm but she siezed him suddenly and threw him ten feet along the docks and the crowd roared. Then her eyes fell on DeCoursey Lloyd - a perfumed darling of the day and she beckoned him. He came over laughing and offered the old man a thousand dollars for the Amazon. The grey-head looked strangely at Lloyd and took the money. The black woman smiling looked into his great dark eyes, waved her hand at the shadow of the ship and followed her new master into the darkness

"Ha ha" (the old man chuckled) she was a wise woman very wise." But there were some things I knew and everybody knew that she didn't. She was so wise about big things, she knew little of many little things. She thought she was to be De Coursey Lloyd's chief wife and queen - slave, of course, as all wives are slaves, but chief slave and ruler by her cunning and her guile. And for a time -will you belive it - she was. Far off beyond the rice fields in ~~yonder~~ this old hald dead cabin, she sat and queened over the young exquisite; he seemed. fascinated, love-mad with his new mistress. A beautiful brown child - your mother- was born to them and they sat together and sang to it beside the mighty sea. Then men began to talk -or rather women.

41-1-5

41-1-6

"Is it not shameful"

"A Lloyd of Carolina."

"The libertine - "

"He must save him."

"He must be married to a white woman of standing."

So they gossipped and whispered until at last weary of this toy and fearful of his set and shameful of his life he took a pale doll of the country side and made a proud wedding.

"And then ah, then, rose the real Wonder Woman. She turned on him sudden-like as a tigerwrithes to its prey. They say the seat that night was red, and the whistling wind echoed on its bosom. She struck him across his face - do you mind the scar of his right foreHead - no, no you're too young - well- only his dodging saved him that hot night. And then she sent for me. I was his body servant then, and had dared raise eyes to her, the Queen, thinking to come by her as I came by his cast of clothes. Bah! she slapped me to the earth and spurned me, and thereafter I was Her dog and she the Queen. It was midnight--black moonless, starless midnight when we two went out together on the shore. One of the mad southern storms was muttering in the southeast and the wind was chill. We lighted a circle of fire on the black beach, till it enveloped her tall form and waved and fanned about her. Then she led the mystic rites and at her feet I then began to learn the secret wisdom of the earth - the voice of spirits, the charm of snakes, the conjure of herbs- th not all then, O no, but begining then and after bit by bit in years and years. Then I learned but a forestaste and lay prone on the earth in terrified silence while in the circling flame she cursed DeCoursey Lloyd and his doll = wife and their issue forever and a day. Then she cursed the land and the sea. God! it was terrible -I sweat and tremble when I remember the muttering thunder and muttering woman, the air flashing with lightning and hate, the darkness and the flame and the misty swaying woman. This land? these white folks? They can never be anything, they can never prosper, they are accursed and I heard the curse. Hasn't it come true" he said lowering his voice mysteriously "- Did'nt old Lloyd live in terror and die of an unknown disease, didn't his proud-faced daughter run away and marry a scamp, didn't their child -" he stopped suddenly "Listen" (he said as the children's eyes widened and their breath came quicker) "Listen: the day old Lloyd died shrieking and screaming for Mom Bett - that next night Colonel Jones went across the rice fields to whip Mom Bett for her conjuring. He evendared to raise the snaky thing against her but before it touched her mighty form there came a whistling tearing wind from the south and round the bar shot a great black ship of ancient build, ~~aflame.~~ a-flame. And from it ere it touched the shore a white-bearded man, old, older than the sea itself beckoned and Mom Bett was gone and there was left only the wondrous glowing of the sea."

The old man stopped and sat staring rapt at the sea. They watched him breathless,half comprehending. Then suddenly he rose and glanced at them.

"What you doing here - it most noon -your mammy wants you - go home - go."

And they went fearfully running across the low black land.

Juno was worried at the lingering of her twin children. Several times she called across the fields:

"Rob - Mary - Rob -ert".

41-1-8

But they did not hear. It was full noon when at last they came gauntering talking rapidly,pointing, gesticulating.

"Where ever have you children been"Juno cried menacingly.

"O mammy,Uncle Caesar told us all about Mom Bett and O, mammy will the shadow ship ever come again?"

But Juno said "Hush" and "Go along". Thereafter Robert brown and sturdy lived in a world of dreams,worshipping the deeds of Mom Bett,but Mary,frailer and more delicate lived in a wierder web of mystery striving in her childish way at the curious heart of things. Ever the children hovered over the tale of the witch woman,till it was their play and their dream,their solemn thought and inspiration of the work,as the sea swept harder over the grey and twinkling islands and the winter mists gloomed the air.

Chapter II.

The Wooing of Juno.

It was ~~the~~ Christmas week of 1863 - ~~the week of the Christ Child~~. Up through the chill of war rose a new strange Peace and far away along the waters and down from the rolling hills came a new song,a song of freedom. It came down through the streets of the crowded cities and all the city rushed into the streets;it echoed in the great hills and the men of the mountain hushed their voices and looked thoughtfully into the valleys below. Far down the valleys,down where the blue sea was talking and telling its world old tale, there,by a thousand twinkling camp fires came the new Song and two thousand black men rose and yelled,cheered again and again and cheered the echo. All through the land rang that wild cheer and the soul of a black nation awoke. Had a black man dreamed a dream of happiness? That night that dream ~~that~~ came true. Had a black woman dreamed of a child that was hers and hers alone?that night it leaped in her breast. Had a father dared to hope to own his children? that night they were his. The girl who yesternight owned not even her body, tonight slept mistress of both body and soul. O it was a glad night,the gladdest night four millions ever saw,and ever they shouted and cried and prayed and the sound of their singing was as the ~~sounding singing of the~~ four voiced winds.

41-1-9

Juno pasued in the doorway with a great white cloud of clothes from the Big House and with her children heard the swelling cry.

"What's the matter"she asked.

"We'se free" cried the man running by.

" We'se free"shouted the surging crowd of women and girls,and the old woman hobbling painfully seaward,turned toward her with streaming eyes:"We'se free."

Juno ~~sat~~ stood still and the children looked up into her face. "No" she thought, "this was not the freedom she had dreamed of. Once she too would have welcomed freedom with songs and tears but now why should she be free since He was far away. With him would come freedom,without him,the chains hung thick and nlose about her soul.

"Mammy who's Tom?said the boy - she looked at him.

"Who told you of - Tom"she asked.

" You just said "Tom,my Tom" and at night you pray for him and in your dreams he comes and talks to you."

She looked at them thoughtfully,then gathered them close in her arms.

"Tom's your papy"she said, and turned to her work again.

41-1-10

The children paused. Then Robert said timidly:

"Mammy,where's papy?"

Juno ~~sang~~ ironed slower and more slowly - then the tears came creeping. She paused over her ~~ironing~~ work a moment,then grasped ~~them~~ the irons sturdily and they flew over the white linen.

"Pappy's gone"she said. "Pappy's gone and left us - but he'll come again some time,some long time. My God has promised me and oh - he must come."

"Why did he go mammy?"

"Shall we know him - did he look like me mammy ?"

"O,he was high and great and pretty. Smooth and black and stronger than everybody. When first I saw him wading to me in the young rice field with his great arms and sweet eyes,my flesh went all atremble for I knew my man had come,my own man. Yet Celia wanted him and Celia was yellow and witching. I saw her tempting him once as he took her across the great lagoon under the ~~tortuous~~ shadows of the trees;she leaned toward him and put the spell of her eyes across him and he looked at her puzzled-like. O I was mad with jealousy - I was crouching in the slimy underbrush and they glided almost within my touch and then disappeared. I was but a girl and I ran home in wild tears and

Mom Bett saw me. (She fell silent and the hot irons raced across the cloth.)

"She didn't beat me that night."

"Did Mom Bett used to beat you, Mammy?"

"Yes" (with a shudder.)

41-1-11

"Were you a naughty girl?"

"I ~~expect~~ reckon so - I ~~expect~~ reckon so - but this night she looked at me with curious eyes and said ~~abruptly~~ 'Do you want him?" You see she was a Wonder Woman, and knew ~~all~~ everything."

"Yes - yes, Mammy, we know."

"So I crept on my knees before her and told her that I wanted nothing on earth like I wanted him. That without him I would die - that I would creep to the slimy lagoon and drink death. She smiled her awful smile and then (the irons moved slowly over the clothes and beads of sweat rose on the brown forehead) then she worked the witchery."

"How did she do it mammy?"

"How did she?"

"Hush boy," cried the woman with a frigthened glance. "Hush - ~~this~~ that night he came and sang a song before the door with his banjo. Mom Bett brought him in and married us then by the rites of his fathers with blood and salt and song. The next day we went up to the Big House and he asked Master Lloyd for me and Master Lloyd laughed and said "Sometime, sometime" for he did not like to have his folk marry off the place. But Mom Bett came and looked at him, and then the wedding was set for the next week. It was the month of blossoms and oh, the world was beautiful. We had had a garden party up at the Big House and when I saw the beautiful dresses I wanted one to be dressed in. I slipped up stairs to Mistress Irma's beautiful room and, just to see how I would look, dressed me in her white silk and stood before the mirror coiling my curly hair. Ah, mammy was beautiful then. Suddenly I heard a noise and saw Miss Irma standing there. She was angry - so angry and she struck me down in her madness. I do not see why she was so angry - I had tried on her dresses before and sometimes she had let me. I lay in the cold dark room till opening my eyes I met the eyes of Master Lloyd. He picked me up so carefully and stopped the bleeding in my head and carried me to Mom Bett. There was black anger in Mom Bett's face when she saw us and long I heard her cursing at him far out under the oaks where they stood talking. The next day I was married in the chapel of St. Andrews but after the ceremony, Master Lloyd told me I belonged to Colonel Jones and was to have a new cabin all to myself [a sudden weakness came on the woman and she sank down in the doorway and wept] O evil day, she cried, then came that knocking at midnight, then came the cry of my babies, there came that night of pain and horror when Mom Bett went away in Blood and the sea glowed - "

41-1-12

"And the shadow ship mammy, did you see it?"

"No child, I did not see it, but some did and surely I heard the screaming of its sails - and the child - "

"What child mammy? "

"No child - I forgot - your pappy came then and was angry - angry because your mammy had sinned a great sin."

"Did you mean to, mammy?"

"God knows I did not."

"And if you ask God to forgive you - "

"Didn't I ask - O Jesus - haven't I begged you but you won't hear - but there, then. Your pappy went away but sometime he'll come again - he must come for till he comes I cannot die."

Then she and the children fell a weeping and the wind sighed in the trees and the shadows lengthened across the billowy rice fields. A wildness crept into the mother's eyes and her fingers twitched.

41-1-13

"It's bed time" she said hurriedly.

"O mammy it's hardly dark. Let us stay up and talk more about pappy." But the mother hurried them off to bed and sizing her irons again worked swiftly almost fiercely far into the night. As the night advanced she listened, going often to the door and peering out. At last she dropped her irons wearily and paced to and fro wringing her hands until she heard the shuffle of footsteps before the door and a low knocking.

"Uncle Caesar"she said looking at him in suppressed excitement. He growled gruffly and crouching by the fire relapsed into silence, watching the flame. She hovered about him clasping and unclasping her dark hands.

"He's alive"he said. She gave a great sob and sank into a chair. The children turned uneasily in their sleep. The old man started. Then rising quickly he stepped to the bed and raising the sleeping girl lifted her high and held her up where the north star blazed through the little window. He peered darkly into the darkness but the mother sinking to her knees cried "The child,O God,the child"and the half awakened little girl whimpered to the night. The old man shook his head.

"Nothing,nothing" he mumbled and he laid the child slowly in her cot again.

"Can't you bring him bback?"wailed the woman.

"He's with Celia" he said.

"Kill her" she cried fiercely starting up. "Kill her,conjure her,he's mine "and her voice wailed away into tears. He said nothing but crouched again on the hearth. She bent fearfully over him and saw before him a little ~~waxen~~ clay figure,black and misshapen. He threw an evil glance over his shoulder.

"She is sick" he said.

41-1-14

"Kill her" came the bitter answer.

He drew a long sharp needle from his coat and heated it in the flame. Then he paused again.

"Kill her" cried the woman with a half stifled scream that started the children in their dreaming. Muttering low and waving his hands he plunged the hot needle into the softened ~~wax~~ clay and whirled it and worked it there,till the black mass quivered and settled and spread into a dark splotch on the stone hearth and as it flattened and froze the door flew suddenly open and there drifted in a faint sharp cry as from afar.

Chapter III.

Celia.

Whence came the cry? Surely from the northward. Perhaps from up yonder where the pink limbed curlews were circling on the dim coast;perhaps it echoed further from the rolling highlands of the north state or from the high walled valleys or even drifted with the silences of the night far down from Virginian vales, perhaps. But the strange old man whispered in after years that the death cry came from a thousand miles away, far up there where a great dark city sleeps in its forestry of houses. A stable was there up near Forty-second street and over it a home. A woman was rolling there on a bed of pain and Tom Calhoun sat moodily beside her.

"You never loved me Tom," she was saying " you married me out of sympathy- and yet I always loved you."

41-1-15

"There, there Celia, don't fret yourself, Honey—"

"I must, Tom, I must, I shan't stay here long and I've something to tell you You asked me once you know about the baby I brought north and I didn't tell you. You never asked again and I was afeared to speak. But now I must tell.

"Don't fret over it Celia, you'll be better soon."

"I must -Tom - I'll never be better. Listen. You know I was nurse in Colonel Jones' home and Jim his body servant had long courted me, but I had seen you and -I'll be honest- first out of spite against that high stomached Juno, but at last out of real love I set myself to win you. Ah, it was a hard thing - she was so crafty, so jealous and you so indifferent. I hid in the cotton field, waded the young rice, and once -do you remember? concealed myself in your boat and you did not know it till we were gliding over the lagoon. I would have won you fairly had it not been that the ugly witch woman cast a spell over you - no, no don't stop me, I know she did - and you married Juno. Still I swore I would have you. Your twins were born while I was maid to Miss Irma in Juno's place. Then a year later Colonel Jones' baby was born. Old Mammy Jean nursed it and I helped her. It was dusk one night -I had just laid the child in its cradle asleep. I peeped in the bedroom -Mistress was asleep too,so I slipped down the back stairs to talk a minute with Jim. I wasn't gone more than a couple of minutes but when I came back the mistress was lying white and still on the nursery floor,the hag Mom Bett was bending over the cradle,Juno was standing at the head of the stairs and there were two babies - one in the cradle and one in Mom Bett's arms. My coming frightened Juno and seizing the child in Mom Bett's arms, she rushed down stairs. Mom Bett laughed - oh,how she laughed and I shrank in terror from her, just as Colonel Jones appeared at the top of the stairs with the baby Juno had carried down. Mom Bett brushed past me in the gloom and hid in the door way as Colonel Jones quickly changed the children and rushed back down the stairs. All bewildered I slipped after him and saw him lay the child behind one of the great pillars of the porch,and then turn and enter the library. I glided out and bent over the sleeping baby but the evil face of Mom Bett peered into mine as she snatched it and disappeared. I told Colonel Jones. He ordered me up stairs to take care of my mistress for I had forgotten her. As I climbed the stairs I saw him go out with a great black whip and they say he whipped the ~~old hag~~ witch to death that night - leastways no one ever saw her again. I got the mistress to her bed but she moaned and tossed and when I brought the child to her she eyed it suspiciously. -"Where is the other one"she said - 'You -you were dreaming mistress" I faltered -but she flung me a murderous glance and we never spoke of the thing again.

"As I sat in the nursery late that night pondering over the strange happening and trying to think it through,Colonel Jones slipped up the stairs and beckoned me. I follwoed him timidly to the dark library for women told bad tales of him, and he was ashen like and trembling."

"He lighted a slim lamp and pointed to a bundle. "Celia" he said hoarsely "you take this brat north and lose it and don't you ever return - and if you ever say a word about tonight, I'll kill you if I have to follow you over half the earth." And there was red murder in his eyes."

41-1-17

"But the mistress- " I faltered.

"Never mind the mistress. Take this and walk to the Calhoun plantation. There's an empty cabin there which old Caesar will show you. Stay there till tomorrow night. Some one will call for you just after dusk. Follow him." He listened then pushed me into the hall. "Look you" he added "here's money and once north you'll be free." My heart jumped, and a fearful resolve came to me. I would go, but I was determined to make you come too. He was sending me to your plantation and as luck, or was it the devil? (or the soul of the evil woman?) would have it, I met you coming to Juno. I was mad. I whispered in your ear "See, I said, I've got Juno's white brat and Master Jones is sending it north, come with me" God forgive, I never saw such a look on man'n face before nor since. You crushed the bone of my arm, you shook me till my teeth grated and I staggered and fell into the brush and heard your steps tearing wild up the way toward Juno's cabin. I was half dead with fear, fear of you, fear of Colonel Jones. I slipped down to the wharf where I knew a sailor and giving him half my money sailed away that very night "- The woman gasped from pain and was still.

Tom bent over her eagerly "Celia" he said "Was it Juno's child?"

"I don't know - she answered slowly "I don't know ,one of them was,I know, but which one? sometimes I think -"Just then there was a confused noise in the street below.

"Hark"said Tom,. He went to the window. No,he was not mistaken. Far down the street he heard the cursing and yelli ng of the mob. The draft riot-ers had broken loose and they were coming straight down the street. He must get the horses around to the mission in time for Mistress Martha and Silena Smith. But his wife? He dare not leave here here.

81-1-14

"Celia"he said "the rioters are coming "I dare not leave you here" and wrapping a blanket around her he carried her swiftly down the stairs and placed her on the seat of the carriage. He started down the street just as the mob rounded the corner. The horses reared and snorted. He whirled them round,the carriage tipped,the woman clutched the side just as a great stone hurling through the air struck her in the side;she screamed a wild piercing scream,a scream that echoed far,far away and trembling sank prone on the bottom of the carriage. He drove furiously up the street where the red walls of the colored Orphanage pointed the way. Stopping there with a jerk he ~~lifted~~ carried the limp heavy form to the Colored Orphanage tenderly. But the physician shook his head. "Dead" he said "quite dead" Tom stood for a moment dazed. Then he remembered. The ship south would sail in a couple of hours and Martha and Silena were waiting,perhaps in danger. Leaving the body there at the Orphanage he again wheeled his horses into the street.

Chapter IX.

The Home Coming of Tom.

What had happened? A great drowsiness, a half misty consciousness lay on him and the bed where he lay seemed rising and falling. Then: room how strange it was, so small so - then he fell to dreaming. He awoke again in the darkness and the words of Chloe were singing in his ears "I never saw such a look on man's face before and alone" - so she but O, if she could have seen His risen soul. He had loved June in all the wild untrained strength of his young manhood. He had enslipped her from afar, watching her tottling feet and her proud young curled crowned head. When she passed by, his heart was still. And then in his affliction and despair came her vicar strange mother, saying: "Go to her - she loves you". Ay, for one short year the world grew rich and glorious, wanton in flower and fruit. He remembered afterward that sometimes in their mad happiness her eyes grew fear-struck and she clung to him terrified - the shadow of wanton wickedness, he said, in his awful bitterness. The children were born, the hands out beam twins that eased and called to him. And then - then what was it? How the room rolls and that ship that was like the breath of the sea - Yes they sent him away on the far off sea islands with a gang of men. He could not take his wife and babies. They were not his, they belonged to Colonel Jones But they promised to buy their freedom while he was away and then they could live together on one plantation. Blithely he had rushed back from the sun. It was long after midnight but he ran across fields to his wife and babies and hurrying on he had set Chin and her devil's tale. He threw her from him with a curse and rushed blindly on. He burst in to the cabin at first daybreak. June rushed to him with a glad cry then shrank crouching, trembling before his awful face for she knew and knew he knew. The words were drowned in his blazing anger and she, what had she said cowering there in utter trembling - "I - I couldn't help it - I didn't know - He was my Master" God, how he struck her struck her straight across her brown grey face, till the babies shrieked, and the women, but she sat dumb and speechless. The overseer rushed on him but Tom threw out his hand and with a sickening crackle of bones the slave driver went to his long home. Then blindly he turned toward the fields and ran whither? - he knew not, cared not. The fresh dew of morning fell like gentle balm on his parched and glowing skin. He had run far when suddenly he stopped and whirled about. He must kill Colonel Jones - yes he must die. He turned and sped across the fields bending low and running easily in great long strides with his head thrust forward like a hound's. And the cry of hounds rose behind him faintly, surely - nearer and nearer, and his breath came in great gasps. No, he could run no further. Beyond him swayed a woman and two little children. He would call her - no it looked like June - was it she or her spirit? An old bridge sat beneath the oaks and above a silent black stream, he dodged under it, ran up the water a bit to throw the scent and then quickly with a last spurt doubled back on the Beaufort road. In vain! a white horseman sat on the road and with a crash he fell headlong in the underbrush and lay panting as the hounds and horsemen swept by.

61-1-14

41-1-20

The sea air - the wild sweet air, how sweet it was and how plain that face, the face of the silent staring horseman in the road. It was an interesting face - a sharp face - a vacillating face but not a good face. But there was a good face beside it in after years - a face of sorrow and timid dread yet of goodness, pure goodness, sweet like the great fair hills where it was born. He turned uneasily and felt the tinge in his side and looked dreamily into Martha's face. Strange that she should be here and where was Here - was he dreaming - why -

"There, Tom, you're better now - don't try to move lie quietly."

"Where am I" he asked vaguely "I've been dreaming of the South and the sea and the days, the black days of long ago - I - I smell the sea - surely I smell the sea."

"Yes, Tom, we're on the water."

"On the water, on ship board - how did?"

"You were hurt in the riot, Tom."

"O yes, yes, I remember now - I remember poor Celia."

"O heavens Tom, is she left behind?"

"No, she went first - she's dead - where are we going?"

"To South Carolina, Tom, to Hilton Head."

"Hilton Head - Beaufort" - He half rose in excitement then fell back and closed his eyes with a sigh. "Beaufort" he murmured "Beaufort."

The next day Tom climbed slowly to the deck and watched the soldiers in the bow. Some were black and his eyes lighted.

41-1-21

"I drilled with a squad at Yonkers once" he said."

"Did you learn the manual?"asked a passenger.

"Fairly well."

"Why don't you join this squad?"

"Where are they going?"

"To Hilton Head to join the 54th Massachusetts colored troops and they'll see some hot work if rumor is true.

"Will they fight - will they let them fight?"asked Tom in excitement.

"Without doubt."

By the time the boat hove to off James Island and near Charleston, Tom Calhoun was an enlisted soldier and was embarking with the black trops in boats. It was the morning of the sixteenth of July, 1863 and the ~~clamp~~ camp of black soldiers was already stirring when and the new recruits marched into camp.

"We want to no green men"growled an officer.

"These men have all been thoroughly drilled before embarking"was the answer.

An eager spirit of epectation and unrest lay on the camp. Already they had waited years and days for this opportunity. Last night they had stepped forward with their pickets peering in the gloom and then fell slowly backward. But today, this very night the movement was to begin. Charleston lies by a cluster of islands and waters formed by the great harbor and the Stono river where Cato of Stono, the first black rebel, lived. Here Carolina like a great mouth bites the seas. The tip of the tongue is Charleston itself. In its great upper jaw is Fort Moultrie and between its teeth is fateful Sumter. Its heavy lower jaw is James Island and over it like lips slip Folly and Morris Island. On Morris Island lay a fort, a low black grim fort, Fort Wagner, and thither the black mass waiting on James island was to go in force. The night was drifting slowly out to sea when six thousand shadows moved across the ugly marshes of James Island; great sloughs of mud yawned before them, sullen dark waters, rushing swollen streams and broken dykes. Thick sombre trees watched them silently and dipped their moss swept limbs deep into the mysterious black water. Serpents hissed and twined beneath their feet and wild birds screamed: yet all the long night, voiceless, breathless, they slipped and struggled toward the sea. Just as the faint grey dawn tinged the lowering hurrying clouds, they stepped on Morris Island; afar lay the grey dull walls of Fort Wagner sleeping sullenly.

41-1-22

As the soldiers halted, suddenly the air grew thin and chill, the far off muttering of thunder shook the morning hush and the sea flashed and roared and foamed. It was as if nature hesitated to let these black men go, even as their leaders hesitated and whispered and glanced.
The storm started from the face of the sea like passion sweeping a soul, screamed and panted, yelled and roared, while the black rain streamed and beat upon the sea and land. The soldiers crouched in the misery and hunger of wet waiting, six endless hours, and then above the voice of the dying storm rose the thunder of mighty guns. East, west and south they flashed and the iron and lead pounded into the stone and sand of Fort Wagner. Far out at sea the gunboas hissed and crashed and the air was thick with the whirring of death from noon till shadowy night. No sooner had the death

41-1-23

Hail lulled than again the storm clouds boiled over sea and land, the lightning lashed the purple clouds and the low tense chiding and chasing of the thunder knelled on the ears of the crouching, dripping soldiery. It was dinner time but there was no dinner; it was supper time but there was no time to eat. Five thousand white men swung suddenly into line facing the fort, but in front and ahead of them stood a thousand black men. They paused. A young man rose and stood before them. He was pale and thin His high cheek bones stood out beneath the burning beauty of his eyes. His ~~high cheek bones stood out beneath the~~ tones swelled like a benediction over the dark faced men and they took one word -"The eyes of the world are on you black men this day." They said no word but when the order came moved like a tidal wave against the gloomy fortress that peered dimly above the shadows of the falling night. From Sumter, from Wagner, from Cummings point the roar of artillery pouring into the massed ranks of the black men, shook the very sands beneath their feet. Yet the machine like fall of their feet oozed and splashed across the black island. Up tore the murderous rattle and crash of rifles. The dark mass shivered but swept on. Across the trenches they leaped, up the side of the angry frantic fort. For a moment the coiling flag waved from the very parapet -a a moment, then the black mass wavered, staggered, parted, recoiled. The very fires of hell were bursting in their vitals. The white face of the young colonel flashed a moment clear in the red light and then his thin hand clutched the black air and he fell beside Tom Calhoun. Tom raised him tenderly and staggered backward, and then - how sweet and cool the air was, filled with the scent of jessamine, and the voice of the little girl singing softly in the sweet fair sunshine rose like some new incense over the blood and dust of his torn life.

41-1-24

41-1-25

He lay and listened. His little girl must be as old as that and his boy the size of yonder lad sturdily splitting wood and then he turned and his eyes met the eyes of the woman bending over him. It was Juno. And his heart leaped and was still.

Chapter V.

The Pleading of Juno.

Long days he lay there nursing the remains of his stricken arm, calling back the strength of his sorely strained body. The children hovered about him singing and whispering. And ever sleeping or waking the woman's great sad eyes were bent upon him but she said no word, only lingered there serving him with her soft hands and quick thought. Ten days he lay there and then one day in the noontide silence, when the children were afar, he turned and looked into her eyes. She dropped on her knees and groped toward him.

"Tom" she sobbed "Tom for God's sake listen to me, listen Tom, while I tells you." Silently he stretched out his one whole hand but he turned his face to the wall. She covered the hand with tears and kisses and stroking it softly knelt beside the bed and spoke.

"I never had no one to teach me Tom, I came up wild-like as a weed. The other children was afraid of me for my mammy was a witch and I wandered half dressed in the bushes and stared at folks. My mammy didn't love me she almost hated me and beat me frightfully, spat on me and drove me out to wander under the trees late of nights. What could I know - what could I learn? Once there was sickness in the cabins and Mistress Irma came down to help. I worked for her and wondered at her paleness and her clothes, till she noticed me and took me with her up to the Big House to wait on her. One day they went hunting- or at least she and Master Coles started and I was sent along after them to the picnic grounds with the wraps. One of the men drove and I and the cook went in the wagon. We passed them down the road and a big red faced broad shouldered man had ridden up and join them unbidden, I guessed from master Coles' face. It was the first time I had ever seen Colonel Jones, but not dear God the last. R That day I saw you first, awalking slowly across the cotton field with a gr- great red welt across your dark skin and your face twisted in fury. A wide pity was a-stirring in my heart as I stood there half hidden in the foliage waiting for the picnic party. Then - O I need not tell of those days of my loving from that first sight, to the day I was sold suddenly to Colonel Jones. Yet I dreamed of no harm, I thought only of my new cabin and my new husband. You were far away on the other plantation but I knew you'd come often and O I was so happy when I lay down that night to sleep. I was dreaming of great green fields and singing trees, of buds and dark red flowers, when suddenly I heard a knocking a low strange knocking in the night. I started up in terror "Who's there" I cried then I thought of you "Tom -Tom - " I whispered. "Is it you honey?" I flew to the door and as I laid my hand upon it, a great fear came upon me all alone in the grim blackness of the night. Again came the strange knocking. "O God!who is it - go away, go away". I half screamed and then came his voice - the voice of Colonel Jones -"Don't be afraid,Juno,it's I,I've got a message for you." I quickly threw a blanket about me and without thought or fear opened the door. And then -o God,Tom don't judge me harshly. I did not struggle - I did not refuse - I did not think of refusing. He was my master. All my life I had drunk submission from the air - no one had taught me differently, no one had whispered fight. I crouched before him in dazed and dumb submission and when he slunk away I lay on the floor like the bruised stolen thing that I was,sobbing and trembling in utter misery and helplessness. And when I woke to morning - what could I do - what could I say - who could I tell - you ? I was afeared with shameful fear. My mammy? She would have beaten me or laughed in my face or killed me. For three days you could not come to me - do you remember? And then we were suddenly married at master's command in the dark little church and he married Miss Irma and went to war. Then came my year of happiness,my one year. The plantations were moved to Beaufort and we lived side by side. The twin babies came,yours and yours alone thank God - but then,then he came back from the war. For months he did not notice me and though a terror always was ~~apeering~~ a-racing in my blood when I thought of him or saw him,still it had begun to wear away till one day I met him riding. His face was red and black with liquor and he flung me a wicked look,bending ~~to~~ over he seized and fingered me by the arm."Where do you live"he asked. I told him faltingly. And then he named a day and said he was coming. That day I strove to keep you with me but you laughed and told of your work,so I took my babies and followed you to the field and you scolded me. For two weeks I dodged and slipped till I was sick ~~w~~ with tire and terror and yet I dared not tell you, lest you kill him and they you, and I be left alone helpless with my babies. But I could not dodge forever and one day he found me. I fought, I screamed, but he whispered something in my ear and then I lay still to my shame. What did he say? He said he had bought you and if I yielded you could live with me and if I did not he would sell you south. It was a lie - a cruel wicked lie but I had seen ~~xxxx~~ husbands go chained to Georgia, and had seen children torn from their mothers' bursting breasts - O I was weak in yielding, Tom, I know it, I know it. I ought to have died afighting the great rad brute, but I thought even then that I had no right to - that God and the Law commanded me to obey my master - Tom, O Tom ~~is~~ aint there no forgiveness for the woman who sins? Can every creature rise from its ~~degradation~~ falling and ~~become~~ be new and good and true and ~~lovable save~~ loving, saving alone the woman who falls? O it is wrong Tom, it is damnable it is the justice of devils and not of God - but I have not told all yet Tom, do not turn from me Tom, My Tom, listen. I found myself with child - whose I knew not: yours or his. Then you went away on that six months journey on the sea islands. I felt it was our last parting and I clung to you and kissed you and wept wildly on your neck, do you remember, Tom? Then in fear and resignation I went to my mother's cabin and told her all. She kept me there smiling strangely the while and when once Henry Jones came she sneered in his face and whispered and he went sullenly away. The child came and looking into its white face I knew the worst was true. O how I hated it. I could have killed it but I dare not, yet I said nothing, I was glad when Mom Bett seized it naked, rolled in a rough ~~gown~~ shift and started out into the darkness. I knew what she meant - she meant blood sacrifice. It was the Great Witchery of her dark religion, the killing of a male child of the hated race in the full moon. Then once she was gone I started in affright. This child was not full white but there was a white child up at the Big House. -Mistress Irma's child, born the same night - she might ! Would she dare? I rushed out after her in the night, weak and tottering from childbirth and hearing the wail of my own babies in the deserted cabin behind. I saw her slipping on ahead between the ghostly trees. I saw her enter the house and I crept after her. Up in the deserted nursery she unclothe d the sleeping child of Irma Jones and lay my baby in its place and clothes and I watched her dumb and trembling. Then turning she saw me standing there frozen with fear. She cursed me, but in sudden courage I rushed and seized my child from the cradle just as we heard steps coming up the back stairs. I folded my hateful ~~baby~~ brat to my breast and slipped down the front stairs just as the library door opened and threw a glare of light on me. I was half blind."

4-1-26

41-1-27

41-1-28

"'What are you doing here" asked the harsh voice of Colonel Jones."

"I stood still - Then he saw the child and started."

"'What! my God - is that - whose child is that?"

"Yours" I cried ~~holding~~ threatening it to him frantically. He called me a name - a low nasty name and the devil leapt in my blood " You didn't dare " he gasped " you -' Is your brat up stairs' "he hissed in fury and I lied - I lied - God forgive-I lied to the brute who had shamed me and he seized my child and rushed away."

"I tottered home in dazed half consciousness and when I came there sat Mom Bett and a baby - whose I do not know whether mine or Miss Irma's. I shrunk speechless in the corner. I heard her witcheries over the child; I saw her glide like a ghost, ~~into the door~~ in the shadowy firelight; I heard the whip hiss and lash, then when I woke again my mother lay there quivering, silent, clotted with blood, before the cold hearth. All alone in the darkness I buried her - did I bury her? I do not know, perhaps I dreamed it all but I saw neither her nor that accursed child ever again."

41-1-29

She sank lower by the bed in quivering silence and her voice came huskily and from afar.

"My God can nothing ~~atone~~ make up for my sin? I did not know, they did not tell me, why did God leave me ignorant and punish me in hot and awful anger when I fell? Is cleanness simply of the body - God knows my soul is clean as the stars; I have never wanted man but you. And can the body never ~~atone~~ make up for deeds of ignorance and force? Since then my body has been clean as the limbs of the Mother of God. Are these stains that neither Time nor Goodness can wash? - Forgive, forgive me, Tom, take me back to you - take my babies, your babies - O Tom, Tom forgive me or kill me, kill me or forgive me."

All the while he had lain still his face toward the wall, but now slowly he lifted his hand, his one thin hand and laid it reverently on her bowed head. The children crept out of the gloomy day and knelt beside her; and a great silence fell.

~~Chapter VI.~~

41-1-30

Chapter VI.

The Arrest.

As Tom looked across his forty acres and saw the neat cabin and the nodding crops, heard the happy song of the mother working, and half listened to the prattle of his daughter, he suddenly realized that never before had he lived. At last he was a freeman - free, free as the air which filled his great lungs. He was his own master and his own man; no one had the right to command him, to drive him, to order him about as one with his cattle and his dogs. His wife was his and his alone, his were his children. He raised the stricken stump of his arm aloft: God! was it not worth a right arm - a body, a life to be free! The boy came racing toward him across the field - "Supper's ready" and the three hurried home, the girl aloft on his shoulder singing, the boy romping round them and the dog leaping and barking. Once home, the mother came to kiss all three, chiding them for being late and spoiling the biscuit. They sat down in the kitchen and ate - crisp fried ham, biscuit, white flaky rice, golden molasses - ah, it was good! Then came the twilight. The mother sang over the clinking dishes; and the father and the children - first they played games, then they sang the old folk songs and then came a story of Brer Rabbit - the African hero of the weak against the strong.

The next day was Sunday. They slept late and rising from a hurried breakfast, they dressed and went to church, riding in a wagon drawn by two fat mules - Juno in a blue gown that reddened her brown face, Mary in a wonderful red calico, and the man and boy in smooth dusted black. Other wagons and buggies and wayfarers met them along the road and they greeted them all joyfully

"Howdy, Good mawnin"

"Hows all" How you all?"

"Tolerable" All up?"

And gay laughter and frolic filled the air, along with rough banter and noise. Sometimes great carriages filled with white folk passed them casting the dust on the walkers and the humble wagons; some laughed at the gay costumes and some cursed at the dark faces. At the cross roads sat the church - a great square board house, rough and plain. There were benches within and the sound of singing, and without rows of mules and crowds of wagons and throngs of girls and boys and knots of men and women. All the colors of man had met there: there were a few pink and golden haired girls, many black and white-haired old men, young bronzen giants and soft brown-cheeked maids there were olive hued men and women, girls golden faced and freckled brown, and every hue and shade of the wondrous changing human color from pole to circle but all set and shaded in a great background of unshaded black and brown. Next their color strangers would have seen their hair: with a few it flowed in yellow brown and black; most of it curled and crumped and twisted itself - some so minutely and crisply that it lay in hard grey black masses, immobile and thick. On others its bushed itself to a dark mass of piling cloud or was tied stiffly in spreading thongs, and then again it curled and waved and wantoned in tiny kissing ringlets or great midnight curls touched with gold. They were not as a rule beautiful, as the white world counts beauty, but they had faces of interest and strength and lovableness that could easily grow in one's ideals and dreams, and then too a certain untrained and unfathomed depth of thought and doing - a new world peasantry with the dirt and roughness and ignorance of primitive man and the promise and aspiration and hidden beauty of all humanity. An old man was preaching when Tom and his family entered the church. He was unlettered, unattracitve and slovenly. And yet the burning earnestness of his talk, the half barbaric splendor of his nature imagery and the wonder of subject held his hearers in breathless strained attention. They were a primitive folk and their feelings sat naked and unashamed upon their faces clothed in laughter, stare and streaming tears, incensed with groans, low rapt wails and deep Amens. And why not? Was he not talking of Freedom? Of how God let his children toil in the blackish mud of Egypt, and then in his good time let them go? ~~Tie~~

41-1-32

41-1-33

The sermon was a great chorus and the preacher was ch orister. He intoned in two rythmic major and minor keys the strophe and the swaying chorus beneath him, standing, sitting bowing and on bended knee sang the wild anti-strophe ~~shout~~, in moan and cry and praise and loud "Amen."

"O my brethren and my little sisters, dark was that day (m'm'm'm'"sighed the people.) The sun was hot in the cotton fields, the waters boiled in the seas. (The seas boildd O Lord," answered the people.) Way over in th e Egypt land, the Children of God lost faith, my brothers, just as in the dark days of yesterday you lost faith. (Preach it, Father"sobbed the women) They sinned and cursed God, my sisters and hung over Hell on a single thread. And then my God was pitiful - O he's a pityful God, my sisters (Halleluah"shrieked a soul) and the hot tears of his children dropped on his heart and melted it. And he lifted up his voice "(Glory to God" they chorused) and stretched out his great black arm. Let them go Pharoah- I say!- Oh,Pharoah,O let them children go. (Let them go,Let my children go" come the great full-voiced ~~ec~~ echo). But ole Pharoah,the old slave driver shook his head like a mule and said no,keep them slvaes,work them,kill them, (m'm'm'm' sighed the men) hoe that cotton, Nigger - but the Lord rose up and shook himself, "(Rise up Lord" cried the old men)and he screamed again till the mountain trembled and the sea got afeared and he say,says he -" A quick swaying and whispering, the crashing of falling benches and the sound of an oath broke abruptly upon the worshippers and the old man was suddenly silent.

41-1-34

The audience rose tumultuously in surprise and fear. Tom turned and saw the white sheriff advancing up the aisle:the folks behind rising quickly had overturned the benches and were whisper ing angrily,the forward benches sat in sullen silence half fear,for they were but a step from slavery and the spell of the white face was heavy upon them,but as the officer strode up the aisle he pushed a black soldier's wife roughly aside and in a moment a hundred men had leaped to their feet amid the crash of over turning benches and the screaming of children. Tom pushed quickly forward and ~~quickly~~ put his great form between the sheriff and the surging crowd. "Quiet brothers,quiet" he said "this is a officer of the law and we are peaceful citizens" The sheriff had his pistol in his hands and handcuffs. He turned quickly toward Tom "You're Tom calhoun aren't you"?

"Yes,sir."

You're my prisoner then hold out your hands."

"I've got only one" said Tom quietly "what am I arrested for?"

"For the murder of Sam White, overseer on Calhoun's plantation, in 1838." said the man. "Stand back there, you Niggers" he cried brandishing his pistol. There was a moment of hesitation but Tom nodded reassuringly. "It's all right boys, I'll straightend this out " he said "Let us go by". They slowly fell back and the sheriff got bolder.. "I've half a notion to take a dozen of you Niggers along for resisting an - "he did not finish, for somehow, somewhere, a great black arm shot out from the crowd and when the sheriff came too he was lying beside the road near the church and his prisoner was sitting quietly beside him.

41-1-35

The hearing of Tom was quick and summary. He admitted the killing and was bound over to the January term of the court for trial and sentence. Meantime he was put onto the chain gang for detention and with bowed head, marched past his own home in clanking chains to work with other convicts on the rock piles. Juno meantime had rushed straight from church to the commanding officer at Beaufort and begged his interference but he refused.

The January court term came but Tom's trial for some reason did not come off, and still he was working on the gang. He stood one day in the burning sun. The driver was swearing and cursing at them and ever and again the whip hissed around some chained slave. It was too much. Tom straightened up. Why not die like a man instead of quivering away like something worse than a dog. He straightened up, dropped his hammer and stood still The driver looked at him in amazement.

"You damned black scamp"he yelled "get down there to work". He raised his whip threateningly - then lowered it slowly.

"Oh,"he sneered "stubborn are you - tired - going to run this show? Well we'll see". Tom knew what was coming, he had seen it before; only yesterday a great black fellow had been dragged down back of the guard house to the two stakes. They tied his hands to one stake and the feet to the other, strapped his sweaty back and then the driver had bared his great arm. Yes he had seen but it would not happen today. No. This was his last day. He was going to die but he was going to kill this man before he died. He knew how - ~~he fumbled on the ground and slipped into~~ for loose his jacket, lay a great jagged stone. The brutal bully would seize him by the shoulder - he always did - to throw him to the ground and as he seized him he would dash his damned brains out. He could see them ooze and spatter now and he chuckled to himself. Then he thought of his children. He would never see them again. When he brained the driver, the guard would shoot him - or perhaps a mob would hang him or burn him. No he would never see them again - the dear happy little souls - would to God he had never brought them to this ~~brutal~~ world. And Juno? He almost sobbed aloud: Juno - his poor, poor girl, who had suffered and almost died for him - ah - the fellow was coming, striding up with his fat red face, his nasty shirt and great leathern boots - yes - there was the place to strike him, there where his yellow matted thatch of hair lay twisted down his low dirty forehead. (Here he is - now - no not yet, he is not near enough - God! suppose he didn't come near - well he could throw it, "like this" -

"Halt!"

A squad of soldiers had marched into the yard and at their head was a mounted officer.

"Who's in charge here" he asked tersely.

41-1-36

The driver of the gang had thrown off his coat and was just reaching for Tom's shoulder. He turned quickly.

"I am" he growled "what do you want".

"I have an order here to bring a Negro named Tom Calhoun before the Commission of the Freedman's Bureau for a hearing -where is he?"

"I'm him"said Tom dropping his hand.

41-1-37

"Shut your black mouth"said the driver angrily turning and raising his whip. But the officer thrust him aside.

"Here,Jones,take these chains from Calhoun's legs and bring him along with us." Tom swayed and staggered stared vacantly at the other prisoners and then caught the step of the soldiers and walked firmly on.

The trial was brief.

"Do you mean to say,sir,expostulated the states-attorney hotly,that you are actually going to free a murderer in the face of the laws and the courts of this state?"

"He hasn't been proven a murderer"growled the commissioner.

"He has confessed it -confesses it now."

"Why then didn't you try him and hang him,instead of working him a year like a slave."

"We are proceeding according to law.

"Then the law is pretty bad."

"Which is our business, I take it, and not yours."

"No it isn't perhaps,but I'll be damned if fighting for a man's freedom shall be made a capital crime in this state so long as I command a regiment. Tom Calhoun,you're free!"

Chapter VII.

Hesitation.

Tom walked out the house and down the street. He looked neither to right nor left and greeted no one but strode along the road, in his ragged convict garb, with his head up. Across the fields he went and down the big road toward the sea till he saw the cabin. He strained his eyes; there was no movement, no life. He walked faster but heard no sound. He could see the great weeds growing in the field and he broke into a run. The cabin was closed and silent, the yard full of weeds and dirt, the crops ruined, the gate barred, and across the palings was a sign :"For Sale". Tom leaned against the fence and shook with fear.

41-1-38

"Is that you Tom Calhoun?" It was an old woman carrying a bundle of clothes.

"Yes" he said raising his head.

"Juno and the children are up to my cabin .- they'll be glad to see you - powerful glad."

"But why did they leave home?"

"Why, why didn't you hear, honey? Colonel Jones allows that this is still part of his old plantation and that he never sold it and he turned them out within a month after you left.

"But the deed?" he asked excitedly.

"Juno couldn't find it - she looked high and low and tried to find it but couldn't. And then she went up to the office but she couldn't get no satisfaction and they wouldn't let her nigh you."

Tom had leaped the fence while she was talking.

"Don't tell her I'm out, aunty - is she well? are the little ones well? Well, don't say a word, but bring them home tomorrow a t noon - coax them down to see the place" and he disappeared around the house. Tremblingly he forced his way into the back door and sought the old hiding place between the logs. There lay the deed safe and sound. Back up the road he ran and almost forcing his way to the commanding colonel told him his tale.

"The court house and records were burned the month after you were shut up"he said "and it's lucky you have this. I'll see to it in the morning." Tha Tom flew home. Out into the fields he went and dug and hoed in the monnlight. Then he mopped and cleaned the house, mended the fence and trimmed he trees. Toward morning he snatched a few hours sleep, but was up again with the sun, whitewashing. A forlorn looking brown dog sneaked inquiringly into the yard and seeing him leaped and barked and capered for joy. There was little furniture left in the house but he knocked together a table, built a fire, and by noon a dinner was singing over the blaze. And then they came, Juno and the children trudging wearily up the street, stopping in amazement and half dread and then the children rushed crying laughing and shouting into his arms, kissing him and hugging him until Juno drove them away and put her arms about his neck and buried her face in his heart and sobbed "My man, my man!"

One by one the neighbors dropped in that night. "Brother Tom" said the bent old minister "We'se mighty glad to see you back I'se done wrestled with the Lord all of these twelve long months and I knowed he'd answer me - I knowed it" Tom grasped his hand, but the stalwart young black in the corner moved impatiently. "God didn't never mean us to take all we'se been suffering

41-1-39

he growled "here's Tom put on the gang a year and his house and land almost stole - then Old Pompey killed in cold blood and Jim Adams whipped and his wife and girl abused before his eyes. Old Mammy Elkins had her house burned down and all round through the county, they've beating up the Niggers and beginning to work them like slaves - I tell you, men, we must fight -by God! the white man that touches me - "

"There, there boy not so loud - easy! hollering ain't fightin. Keep your smile, look humble but do, see? do . I ain't forgot my wife - I aint forgot the clot of blood down in the cotton rows, but I ain't sayin nothing. The night's our time, niggers, Gods drops his darkness for the helpless to burn and shoot and kill. " He was a bitter faced stolid man and there was a hush when he spoke for they all knew. Then an old black woman in the corner said "No, no we can't do it that way. Bide you time children - it will all come right. I've seen a heap of this old world and there's nothing I've seen that time won't cure."

"Yes," said a young brown man quickly "Time and Reason - the south will come to its senses in time and all the more quickly as we deserve respect and confidence. The government is back of us and it won't let us be imposed on or put back into slavery. Just let us prove our worth and capacity."

A low chuckle came from the corner where a smooth faced sleek mulatto was tilted against the wall .

"Huh" he said "you can talk and talk, but you know that if there's one thing a white man hates worse than a Nigger its a nigger that knows something and is something. No sir! if you want to get on with white folks make believe you're a fool and no'count, flatter them and honey them an fool 'em and look meek - that's the way I does and Lord bless you I got more white friends than I knows how to use."

41-1-40

"Yes,we knows it,Sands,we knows it" flashed the first young black,"but before I'd crawl as you do,I'd die ~~no~~ by God,I say fight open and above board in the daylight,I says - "

"You're both wrong " mumbled an old grey haired woman "both wrong. There's only one way - to give and bear,to bow and yield - to say nothing just wait for death - there's no hope for black people on this earth — freedom? pshaw! who's free?"

41-1-41

"But in heaven,Sister,"said the old minister "in God's heaven we'll rest (she rejoined "Yes brother.) and there'll be no white folks there,blessed be Jesus"and a low moan swept the room. But it clapped with a half A tall yellow man who rose and paced the room: "That talk will do for old folks" he said"but not for me. I've got a life to live - I and my wife and my babies. If I can't live it here,I'm going somewhere else. Aint there any place where human beings can live and be let alone? We're at least free to go if not to stay."

A girl spoke up eagerly "But if there was,we'd need intelligence to develop it and run it and so ought we strive for schools and education first?"

"That's it" assented a black man -"that's it we need schools."

"And more than that we need land to earn a living so we can send our children to school."

"And we need law and protection for them and for our wives and ourselves while they learn and we work.

"The government will tend to that"said a blue coated soldier -"they're going to give us land and keep soldiers here."

"I don't believe it " answered another "they're promised and promised land for two or three years now and they'll never keep the promise. First thing you know the soldiers will go and we'll be naked to our enemies."

"Protect them with your fist and pistols"growled the first speaker.

"No"answered Tom."Protect them with your votes - that's all the defense a single man has today in a free country. I didn't think much of this voting before they did me so cruel,but boys,I don't see no other way - we must have the right sort of government if we want to be men " . And sothey talked and argued till deep night.

41-1-47

After they had gone and Tom and Juno were alone,she came to him:

"Tom" she sobbed "it was all my fault - it was a punishment put on me "

!Why - what? Juno-"

"I - I killed Celia! Tom."

"Killed Celia - what are you talking about - Celia died in New York."

"I know it,but I knew you had married her and I hated her and I got Uncle Caesar to conjure her."

"Juno,that's all nonsense and you mustn't think of it. I did marry Celia after I went north,but she was killed in the riot -"

"She screamed Tom,didn't she scream."

"Why yes, a great stone hit her and she was sick before ."

"Ah,Tom it wasn't a stone,it wasn't a stone,honey."

"There, there,Juno never mind,you must forget these old superstitions - this is a queer and twisted world, hun, but its depths are beyond Uncle Caesar's witcheries."

And Juno sighed; but Tom said cheerfully "All will be well now, honey, all will be well."

Despite his struggles, the world did not go well with Tom. It was hard work to restore the stricken home to something like its former comeliness. It was too late to put in a crop that year and there seemed no way of avoiding debt to keep the family going. He worked at day labor and saved a little but at last put a mortgage of $100 on the little place. The next year he put every available corner in cotton but just as the bolls were opening a cavalcade rode through it during the night and left a warning pinned to his door. By hard work he saved a third of his crop but another mortgage of $150 was laid on his home, and hard lines crept into his face. He woke suddenly one night with the smell of smoke burning in his nostrils. Rushing out he found all the kitchen ablaze and on the front door another notice with skull and cross bones

"Let's go way Tom" plead Juno, but he sat his teeth and said "Never", and then he got down his gun and cleaned it carefully. The voice of unrest echoed in from the broad low fields. Often of a night Tom opened to a low halloo and brought some maimed and stricken black peasant, running from slavery, into his home. A vast loud hunger like a devouring burning thirst was crying among the blacks. The ignorant were running away, sitting by the wayside, loafing in town and asking "Master Lincoln - he promise us land when we'se free - when's he going to give it to us?" Masked bands of white men riding by night met these wandering peasants and flogged and harried them. Some times the hostile crowds met by day and sudden anger flashed with sudden frenzy "click! click! bang!

41-1-43

bang! went the guns and the green wayside flushed red with blood.

"Something must be done" said Tom after a race riot of this sort that counted its victims by the score. He went to the Bureau officials and they shook their heads "General Howard will be here in a few days" they answered. From lip to lip the word flew: the government is sending him down to divide the land; the saner men of the town and city did not believe all this but they believed much; the head of the Freedmen's bureau was coming and times would change and the simpler men and women of the broad flat fields believed everything: now freedom in truth was coming - now the day of the Lord approached, now they would have home and shelter and safety, and the day of endless heart-wearying toil ~~wa~~ was done.. Soon the rumors strengthened from Wilmington to Beaufort; from Abbeville to Charleston, from the mountains to the sea: "General Howard is coming" and great black throngs crowded and crushed down to the white circle of tents where he was to speak. There they sat, thousands upon thousands, their upturned faces gleaming darkly in the red glow of the pineknots. They caught their breaths when the uniformed soldier in cord and epaulets arose. They caught their breaths hopelessly when he sat down and an old woman swaying, bowed and burst into tears and weeping sang:

"No body knows the trouble I've seen."

Like the gathering and swelling of a great water the Sorrow Song rose, wavered and swelled. The soldier stared blankly at the throng and wiped his eyes furtively. "What have I done"? he whispered. And the fierd wailing beneath him answered: Nothing, nothing - only told these and other thousand that the government is too poor to give them the land it promised and the days of the years of their servitude ~~were~~ are not ended.

41-1-44

Chapter VIII.

The Legislature of South Carolina.

"Tom you must go to the legislature"said the group of colored men who had long come to look to him for leadership "the government ain't going to do much for us but it has given us the right to vote and we must use it."

"I've got so little learning"said Tom "I'm not the man to make laws.-"

"That's right"whispered Sands unsinuatingly,but the men would hear of nothing else. "Tom goes to Columbia"they said and Tom went.

It was toward the end of the first week that a white member came to Tom. "

"Mr.Calhoun,"he said "How are you?"

"Tolerable,sir"said Tom,starting at the title,and they fell to talking of the crops. Then the member pointed to the upholstery of the chairs,

"Disgraceful isn't it?"

Tom hadn't noticed it in particular,he said.

"The whole room needs refurnishing"said the other looking around the old desks and grimy room.

"It does look a little worn."

"There's a bill to come up for furnishing tomorrow and I hope you'll vote for it"and Tom said he would.

The day the bill came up there seemed to be some hitch but Tom promptly rallied his colored friends and the bill went through. The next day his white legislature friend approached him and slipped an envelope into his hand Tom opened it and found a $500 bill.

"What's this? " he asked.

"Just a little present - the house that got the furnishing contract is remembering its friends."

41-1-46

Tom thought this very generous and he was particularly glad of a ~~wonderful~~ sum large enough to pay the mortgage on the place. A few days later a bill was presented to redeem the state bank notes.

"A steal - a dirty steal" said the colored leader Elliott.

"Explain it to me" said Tom and when he heard, he said "I'll vote aganist it." Just then his white legislature friend came along and clapped him familiarly on the back.

"Well Mr.Calhoun"he said "how's things today -(and then lowering his voice confidentially)I've got another good thing afloat."

"Rally your men and vote for this - and say,don't go out to dinner - hang around, it's liable to pop up any time" and he gave Tom a printed copy of"A bill to Redeem the Notes of the State Bank." Tom looked it over carefully.

"Isn't this the steal you mentioned" he asked Elliott, afterward.

"Yes,that's it" and Tom set off to find his friend.
"I can't vote for this" he said as he came up to him.

The man looked about cautiously "Not so loud" he said and drew him into an empty committee room. "Now Mr.Calhoun this will be worth as much as the other job."

"What job?"

"Why the furniture."

Tom looked puzzled.

"It'll mean $500 cash."

A slow light broke over Tom's face but he was silent.

"Tell you what I'm willing to do"said the man bending forward confidentially and putting his hand on Tom's shoulder. "I'll make it a cool thousand if you deliver us the same ten votes." Tom arose "Wait here a minute - well say a half hour." The man hesitated.

"Very well I'll be here at 10:30 and say, if a thousand won't suit you come to me before you hitch to anybody else. We do the fair thing and we've got the needful." Tom hurried down the street and at 10:30 he was back in the committee room . He handed the man a bill .- a $500 bill and the man stared at it.

"What's this?"

"It's the money you gave me a few days ago - I didn't understand it then - I think I do now."

The man blew a cloud of smoke into the air and looked Tom over:

"Well you're all sorts of a fool" he said and Tom answered "That's just my opinion, boss."

Elliot smiled when Tom told him. "You'll be a marked man after this"he said -"they'll try to scare you next - bribery and force is their policy with us. By the way, I've just got your boy a job as page - I was asked to name one and thought of him. Here he is now." Tom looked at him proudly. He was a tall dark brown lad with a fine face and closely krinkled hair.

"How old are you, my boy."

"Sixteen, sir."

"Well report to the clerk yonder - he has your name."

Calhoun, the young son of Tom,
Robert walked down the steps of the capitol in pleased pride, and dreaming sauntered down the streets and far out by the murmuring river. Up into the deep woods he went, listening to the birds and whistling and singing: perhaps he would be a representative some day and then a senator; he would stand like this and throw his hands, and the men would gape at him. He'd have a fine house painted green like Colonel Jones' and then, he dropped his dreaming with a laugh, and throwing back his head sang a merry rollicking work song such as he had heard the wharf hands sing on the Charleston docks. In the midst of his song a faint "halloo" struck his ears. He stopped abruptly and listened till he heard the voice again. Breaking through the underbrush he approached the river and came into an opening. A tall white girl stood there. Her dress was frayed with clambering through the wood, and in her arms were an easel and sketch book. She had evidently lost her way but she started back when she saw the black boy. Then catching herself she drew herself up and said imperiously "Show me the way to the road." He smiled at her haughty air for she was not over 15 and he said cheerily:

"Which road?"

His air and smile reassured her and there was unspoken apology in her tones as she answered:

"The road to Columbia - I wandered away sketching and lost my bearings."

He turned without a word and she followed. Then he noticed that the path was hard to follow with the easel and he quietly took it and went on ahead. As they proceeded she felt more and more uncomfortable at her manner and she walked a little faster.

41-1-47

"Do you live in Columbia?"she asked.

"Just now"he answered and then,as his dreams returned

"I'm a page in the legislature."

She looked at him in surprise for she knew another page down there only he was different - so different that she found herself saying:suddenly:

"Are you sorry to be black ?" She had not meant to say this but her thought spoke itself before she could stay it.

"Sorry,No!why?"he answered looking at her in amusement. They were walking side by side now and the river was rippling near.

"It must be - awful -"

"It isn't a bit - I laugh and talk and eat and drink just as you do"with a perplexed wrinkling of his forehead.

"But - black people are not - pretty."

"Neither are white people always,and beside looks are not all."

"No,but they're lots."

"That's so, and I like good looking black folk;they can be fine in form and face to my thinking."

"Ye-es - but their hair, and they, well they can't blush" she said, blushing frankly.

"No," he said feeling a flush in his own dark face and feeling too a sort of unreasoning anger in his heart -"they can't and then disdainfully "what's the use of it - as for hair I don't like straight hair - I think brown curly haired people prettier that dead white folks with strings flying."

"But -but most black people seem so dirty and -

"That's because they're been slaves and haven't had time to be clean like white people."

41-1-50

"And now that they're free do they expect to become like white people?"

"No, but they expect to be people in their way just as you are in yours."

She looked at him -"but white folks can go with such people as they like and visit them - and - and marry them."

"Yes but I suppose that means you go with yourselves and visit yourselves and marry yourselves - all right we'll do the same, go with ourselves, visit ourselves and marry ourselves."

"But there'll have to be laws always to keep the two races apart."

"Why" he asked definatly.

"Why because you or some of you would want to go with white folks - and we are proud of our blood and have a right to be."

"And do you think we want your old blood." He said. "Do you think I'd want a friend or an acquaintance or a -wife who didn't want me?"

"Why no, I suppose not."

"Well then,if we didn't want each other we shouldn't need laws to keep us apart."

She looked puzzled. "But if some did want each other?"

"Then laws would be no good."

"But they've got no business to want each other,"she cried,and then suddenly she caught sight of the road and the city spread before her. She started and a sense of indiscretion,of vague wrong came over her. She had been talking almost familiarly with a Negro not as she talked to the servants but with a new feeling of human fellowship. She took her things from him quickly. "Thank You"she said coldly and started away, and then she turned back quickly and searching in her little knit purse found a last bright silver quarter - "Thank you" she said again and with a smile "I am Harrison Coles' daughter - here". But the boy had turned his back suddenly and was walking into the woods. She started in surprise then looked after him thoughtfully,holding the money in her hand. She turned slowly away but looked back. He was gone. She felt a vague discomfort,a feeling of anger, disappointment,curiosity and regret all mingled and softened into something disquieting and wavering. So the two children parted and in this world they never met again.

41-1-51

Robert walked back with a new thoughtfulness, a new wonder in his heart, for the girl's questions had wakened new thoughts and questionings. He had hitherto received the differing colors of men in something the same way as the differing colors of earth and sky and sea - as interesting facts, differing orders,but not warring, jealous unadjustable things. To be sure, he had instinctively felt differences and gaps and discriminations but he had viewed them curiously as from afar,or looked upon them as in the course of nature or thought of them as relict of slavery. Himself he never found strange to himself nor realized that others did. He held out his hands; they were dark brown - the color of the good brown earth ,deep rich and warm: such was the color of primal man.— So was Adam hued when his dark body trudged doubtingly together at the bidding of his soul. So once peered all mankind, till they were paled with hiding from the sun and their sharp faces bleached with haunting midnights of sin. To the awakening boy this color of his hands seemed far more natural than any other;there was to him a sharp hard gleam about a white skin that struck him coldly,while darker hues seemed warmer homelier,nearer; and then the other things,the hair,the differing kind of comeliness,the mingling and marrying - he had never thought of these things definitely or lingeringly as he could remember. He groped in his mind for his past thoughts - but found none. When in his dreams he had married,it had always been of course some brown maiden like his sister Mary:it seemed strange and unreal to think of any one else ,to feel any affection for them, any fellowship or nearness,and then it suddenly occurred to him that they of the un-colored world perhaps felt the same,but he laughed at the discovery and thought it natural. So it was that Robert Calhoun entered the portals of a new world.

41-1-52

And this same world it was that sorely puzzled his father. His world simpler and solider was set with great metes and bounds,hemmed in with bog and mountain and mud. And yet this slender,narrowed,shadowed path of a world of his held hopes and gleaming glimpses of promised happiness. With his strong untettered sense he strove persistently toward the gates called Peace and he thought they lay - he was sure they lay,in the silent flat soil round about. The Negroes must have land,little homes of their own,bits of soil to cultivate,havens of ~~xxxxx xxx~~ refuge against aggression and interference and a new slavery whose coming he foresaw. Day and night he worked toward this end. He wanted the state to buy up land and sell it cheap to Negroes or even give it to them. He talked of this to white men and to black men. The blalks were unawakened or over-sanguine. Sands in his silk hat and white linen suit,fingered his watch and chain and lifted himself on his toes.

41-1-53

"O well"he said "there's no particular hurry. We can buy up a lot of land ourselves when we get ready. My white firends will help too. There's no use pushing matters now because I know how the white folks feels."

"But waiting is dangerous,Sands,and you know it and what we black folk need now is a start,an acre of land today is worth ten tomorrow."urged Tom; but Sands waved his hand and walked on. Tom went to see John Reynolds. "That's a good scheme"said Reynolds "and I think I can get hold of some excellent land which a friend of mine is anxious to sell. Don't say anything about it however - he wouldn't want it known he was selling to colored men - you understand."

Chapter IX.

The Land Bill.

So the bill was drawn and introduced into the legislature,and day and night, night and day Tom followed its fortunes as they rose and fell. A state election was approaching and the spirit ran high and bitter. Three factions faced the Negro voters - the old ring of carpet baggers, the new reform element and the Southerners. All of them were bidding high for Negro votes and the Negroes were elated, confident and ambitious. Sands backed by the old ring, and in secret alliance with the Southern whites, was already a state senator and looked to a supreme court judgeship; while Tom was determined to bring his bill to a vote before election and secure all elements in support of it. It came to a vote and passed the house by a large majority but there was a hitch in the Senate. Thinking to bring pressure to bear, Tom called a mass meeting of Negro leaders but found nothing like the unanimity he had expected. There was a feeling that they ought to stand behind Sands and support him as leader. When he held a high state position other Negroes would get preferment and the color line would be broken.

41-1-54

"But Sands is working hand in glove with Colonel Jones and the fire eaters" argued Tom. The other winked mysteriously and laughed. "He's fooling them" they said - "he is shrewd - you can't win by complaint and force, you must use diplomacy". Seeing that they had evidently been influenced by Sands, Tom set out to watch that individual to see how far he could trust him.

"Sands" he said "why won't the senate take up my land bill?"

Sands put his hand confidentially on his shoulder! "I'll tell you just how it is, Tom," he said " there are certain interests that are fighting the bill and I'm trying to head them off. Now I'm in position to win this fight for you, if I can get your support in the next election."

"I don't see what that's got to do with the land bill."

"A great deal - you see we've forced them to promise us a judgeship next term. Well now,to get this we must win this election and we can do this easily if the Negroes unite. But there are certain parties who are afraid of your loyalty and are disposed to hold up this bill of yours until they know where you stand."

41-1-55

"Very well,"said Tom" they'll find out when my bill is passed. You and your friends have got a majority in the Senate - if you don't pass this bill it will mean that for a fat office and a big salary you have sold out the best interests of the black people of this state - and I'll take the stump and tell them so."

Sands thought of the matter a week or so and called in two or three friends.

"Will you promise me your support if this bill passes" said Sands.

"Yes"said Tom "if you will help get this bill through giving land to the poor freedmen, I'll give you my support." The next day the bill passed and Tom was jubilant; but when the commission was selected to spend $700,000 in purchasing the land, his heart fell for it consisted of Sands and two of the biggest white thieves in the legislature. Several times he tried to see Sands but Sands was busy and gradually the scandal leaked out as the commission bought in at exorbitant prices swamps,barrens,bare hills,abandoned holes and worthless tracts.

Tom Calhoun was sick with anger and disappointment"who owned this land?" he asked and in nearly every case the records showed it was some unknown person who had bought it of John Reynolds a few months before.

As the election approached Tom took the stump against the old ring which was supporting Sands. A great mass meeting was held at Beaufort and Sands spoke. He was an imposing man and his argument was shrewd.

"Gentlemen" he said in conclusion "these men are the ones that first recognized you as men and voters;they organized a government of and by the people. They have made mistakes,perhaps been extravagant and not done much that they might have but I tell you they never held you in slavery or sold your children or drove you with a lash through the cotton fields" Loud applause greeted the speech and Tom went valiantly to the attack. A great black and brown mass of humanity filled the hall. The air was stifling with smoke and sweat. The wind sang without and a murmur and roll of voices rose and fell within. Yet Tom talked the calm direct speech of the folk: "I tell you, men,"he said "it pays to be honest and Joe Sands is not honest. I've worked for a year to get land for us poor people and he stole and gave it away for an office. Ever since you put him in the state house by your votes he has been bartering away your rights. He has flattered and lied and deceived on the theory that the only way to win in this world is to fool somebody. Today men, we face two roads:by the one we must stand up independently and honestly for our rights,uniting in self-defence and for self-protection and voting for honest men and honest measures. The other road is pointed out to you by Sands and it leads to slavery,trickery,stealing and bowing-down. I don't know what you are going to do about it but I'm going to vote against Sands and everything he stands for." The effect of the speech was tremendous both from its simplicity, its well-known truth and the honesty of Tom. Sands was furious.

41-1-56

"You promised to support me and I can prove it" he yelled.

"I did promise to support you, if you'd do one honest deed" retorted Tom "and you did it but it turned out to be the biggest piece of theiving lot - the of the last steal -. For that reason, I didn't keep my promise and I won't— would you?" he cried turning to the people. The answering yell shook the sea:

41-1-57

"No!" they cried, and Sands turned to the door.

The ring and the southerners were beaten and the reformers were in the saddle. They promptly refused to appoint Sands as judge although he brought every influence to bear. Instead of the improvement in government decreasing lawlessness and intimidation however, evidence of organized effort to intimidate the Negroes and break their power was daily manifest, and Tom Calhoun set his teeth grimly. "Fight the devil with fire" he cried and he called meetings secretly of the leading black men. But Sands was watching him and what Sands found out came quickly to the ears of Colonel Jones.

41-1-58

It was a bright balmy night. In the sombre home at the head of High stood two women. One was tall and erect - her face pale and finely cut, touched with age and wreathed with whitening hair. She stood with her hand on the door knob of the front door - she was just opening it - it was already partly ajar when she heard her name called and threw her head back to catch the meaning of the sudden call. Without the great, partially opened, front door in the arched corridor stood another woman - rather a girl, slender and lithe, with smooth dark brown face, thick clinging hair and ~~lips~~ lovable mouth. She seemed very happily standing there, her head half turned backward toward the scented magnolias, and a faint love light in her eyes like moon-rise. She had rung the bell and stood with a little note in her hand not noticing that the door had begun to open. As she stood she crooned half consciously a melody - a song without words in deep low tones of infinite sweetness, that seemed ever about to escape into wondrous melody yet ever fell away into some tearful minor cadence - the woman within, the tall old woman with her hand lingering on the door knob heard two sounds - a sound of singing - low sweet singing, distant beautiful, and from behind a sudden quick whisper - "Irma - my cloak and mask we're after that Calhoun nigger tonight."

41-1-58

The song in the heart of the girl choked in her throat, the note fell to the floor, she saw the door half ajar, she heard the words, she whirled and swayed and fled like a fawn. Past street and lamp she flew, silent swift as a cat; past the pale half lighted stores on Broad Street, through the dim alley to Sixth-down Sixth. A horseman reined up just to see her flit across his mare's forelegs; a dog ~~xxxx~~ snapped furiously after her, a watchman hailed her gruffly, but ~~xxxx~~ ere he turned she was gone. Slowly a dull red light spread above and about her. A murmur of voices and crackle of flames rose clearer and clearer down where the First African Church used to stand, but she heeded nothing until the roar of the fire and the shout of the mob flared full upon her as she turned into Cedar. Pausing suddenly she stood like a bronzen statue,slight and still. The flaring building threw a crimson glory on the rising street and behind loomed the great city dark and dead. Against this awful shadow the slight figure of the lone black girl stood for a moment glorified and the mob swept straight toward her, grim and hoarsely shouting - masked men red-shirted or black cloaked,with long glistening ~~ropes~~ rifles:tall lank mountaineers with shot guns and pistols, slight youths in fantastic headdresses,drunk and blasphemous.

A second the girl looked on the ~~two-inch~~ horsemen with widened eyes, then turning darted like a deer back through the alley to the left.

"Stop the wench"cried a voice.

"Stop Hell!March on!"came a low stern command.

At the edge of the city where the city street free at last,bounds into the rolling country-side,where straggling dim-lighted cabins sit lonesome here and there,a panting girl still fled to the west. Up the knoll she flew,past cabin,until all sweat and mud,she had left the last house of the red city behind,and there rose before her Smith's hill and the dark oak spreading its black limbs.

With dizzy eyes she peered into the gloom as she dashed along,until, at last she seemed to see a tall,dark form silently rise beneath the sawing tree. An awful gladness clutched her heart. The earth rose,reeled,and staggered beneath her feet - the hot blood pounded in her ears.

Then a terror crept slowly on her. she slipped and stumbled,rose and wavered on. Why did he stand so still? Why did he look so strangely tall? His hands seemed - my God! his feet were swinging in t he air!

She bounded toward him "Father!" she shrieked. The tree moaned softly and the red light of the city fell full upon the dull hillside.

41-1-60

"Pappy" she wailed and shivering crept beneath the swinging body, stretched her frail form upon the dank, red earth and writhed.

Chapter X.

The Mourning.

Robert was writing hurriedly/swiftly. "Hello! sis" he cried cheerily "Did you take that note last night?"

"Yes."

He chuckled. "What did he say?"

"!Nothing".

"Ha, ha" I'll bet he's mad - how's ma?"

"I don't know."

"Don't know - why?"

" I haven't been home."

He looked up at her with surprise. As his eyes caught hers he started ~~a start~~. The pen fell to the floor with a bound. A great lump hardened in his throat.

"Sister - sister?" he cried.

She put her arms about him and in the depths of her clear sweet eyes stood neither tear nor fear, but the shadow of supreme sacrifice and she pulled his head down gently and whispered in his ear and whispered again and said "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

41-1-61

When they came forth into the street, sister and brother hand in hand the shadows were streaming upward from the moaning river, and in the boy's face God had carven two straight lines, downward through the cheeks to mark the beginning of the hours of the days of his manhood.

As they came to the home he put her gently back and behind the shelter of the gate she kneeled and waited.

Juno saw him from the door - "Where's sister" she cried - "she did not come home last night -"

"She's safe - mother - safe - I kept her helping me."

She looked at him.

He came and stood silent within the lintels of the door and she went all a-tremble.

"Will it - rain, honey" she said, groping for her flat irons.

"No mother the sun is all a-shining."

"The cow" she said " the cow hasn't - isn't -"

"The cow, dear mother, is grazing yonder."

The trembling crept into her voice "is the place - then they've taken the house and lot - yes, yes."

"No, mother."

"Yes, O God, it is - it is the place, tell me it's the house, Oh, it must be - Rob - O God - Rob - Is - he - dead?

~~"Is he dead?"~~

"Dead - dead - long dead."

Of a sudden the trembling ceased. She put out her hand vaguely and spread another garment on the board, dampened it carefully and ironed it, swiftly steadily. Another and another followed. Into the back door four men staggered with an awful burden. Still the woman ironed moving ~~not~~ neither fast nor slow but evenly. The girl came silently in and replenished the fire. "Mother will you not rest?" she asked. Juno looked at her with strange eyes. "No, I must work or die" and all night the girl sat feeding the fire and the mother stood ironing and re-ironing the clothes.

Then in the great blue morning, she turned slowly, wearily away and grooming herself carefully. donned her black dress. She stepped to the dark kitchen door. The boy and girl made as if to follow; but she motioned them away and entering closed the door and then alone with her torn and twisted dead, all the flood gates of her soul swept loose and she wept the mighty weeping of the strong.

41-1-62

The murder of Tom Calhoun fell like a northern blast upon the Negroes of Beaufort. They bent and bowed before it as before the cruel storm, that swept their low lying islands in December. Not that murder was a new thing to them— Human life was ever cheap in Carolina, and the lives of black men cheapest of the cheap. But this death was the End of Something and the Beginning. The end of the vast dream of Freedom toward which they stretched in sudden and sweet awakening, Jan. 1, 1863. The beginning of that second nightmare of slavery that holds them bound and crushed this day. They came then to bury a Dream - to weep over an Ideal for which their dark and bleeding hearts had striven piteously, if blindly, earnestly if in vain. The burial had been quick secret and at night but the funeral was preached a month later, according to slave custom. They came in droves to the crossroads church, Siloam,and sat before the preacher in great rows of silence,and the voice of the preacher faltered and broke in the midst of his sermon;then gathering strength swept onward and upward in hope and faith and wild exultation and the audience crept after him but faltered by the wayside. There came a hush and a thousand eyes were strained toward the silent bended figure that sat between the tall son and slight daughter.

Then Juno rose and turning toward the upturned faces stretched her arms and moaned before the Lord,even as her mother had moaned and her mother's fathers had moaned in the presence of their dead a hundred and a thousand years agone:stark and straight she stood with closed eye and swaying body waving her arms rythmically,chanting wierdly in tones that rose,fell, wavered and almost sang:and all the host bowed, bent,and slipped to their knees murmuring in one low minor monotone "Hear her,Lord,Hold up her hands, O weeping Jesus - Amen and Amen". And these were the words of her death song:"O Tom,Tom,where is you Tom,my Tom"she muttered and then,full-voiced, "God has taken my man and reached him up on high:why did you do it,God? - didn't you know I loved him,Jesus?-didn't you feel my heart a pullings when you called him in the night,the dark cruel night. I love you God - yes - but O God,your ways are hard and dark to poor old Juno. Reach out and smooth my soul. You give him to me God,and now you's took again,blessed be you God and blessed be your ~~son~~ Jesus son. O Tom was a marvel man, so strong and high and pretty when first these old eyes lighted on him. I loved him with my life even when I sinned against him. I had rather a died than sinned against my Tom. I did die, long years I was dead and then dear God you brought him to me again and I woke." She opened her eyes streaming with tears and stretched her hands straight upward while the host sank lower and wept and wailed; "Blessed be God, the God of black folk who brought again my husband from the dead. Forgive his enemies, Great God, but when they come to the dark river show them my twisted murdered man. There's no more moaning now Tom, no more mourning" and she sank quivering against the altar in one dark bowed mass - "I'm just awaiting, Tom, just awaiting". The sobbing of the bowed multitude fell to moaning and the moaning to murmuring and the murmuring spread like a great wide wave and the wave swept into song. Far down the coast and across the islands and across the waters of the purple sea men stopped and listened to these thousand voices raised in Heath-song:

41-1-63

"Were you there when they crucified my Lord?"

Chapter XI.

The Beginning of Battle.

Robert and Mary sat in the cabin door of the little cabin near Beaufort talking.

"You must go to school, Mary at Columbia" he said " and finish."

"But, Rob, Mmmay isn't well and needs me here and you are just ready for college - I can't -"

"You must, sis, there's only three careers open to black women in the south: teaching, drudgery and shame. If you don't prepare yourself to teach you must work in some white man's kitchen with an even chance for shame or drudgery or both - no,sis,there's no arguing - you're going to Columbia when the term open next week. I'm going to stay here and take care of mother and carry on the farm."

Mary looked up at him in half wonder. The boy of yesterday was gone and he was a man - tall,broad and brown,resolute yet kindly of face with great dark beautiful eyes and white even teeth. She felt her one time guardianship of her twin brother slipping away and a sense of loving dependence coming in its place. For years she had been older,shrewder,deeper than her brother but now age and knowledge and deftness seemed to shrink behind a new born strength and masterfulness that was written on his forehead and on his more deeply carven cheeks. And so Mary went up to Columbia to Silena Smith's school,and Robert turned his face toward life. He had to begin with 40 acres of land burdened with a mortgage of $250; a mule, a cow and some pigs. There was but one thing to do and that was to borrow seed for planting and food for living until the crops were up. The little ready money on hand and what he could earn must go for Mary's schooling. Yet he started with strange light-heartedness for the fire of youth was in his veins - the glory of morning. By executing a mortgage on the mule he found the neighboring store keeper willing to loan him seed.

"Guess you'll need rations too,won't you"said he. Robert thought he might need a little sugar and coffee now and then but he expected to make out without much. Still it was extraordinary how quickly his little store of food and money dwindled and how the bill at the merchant's increased. As soon as the cotton peered above the ground with its tiny pale green twin leaves, Mr. Johnson the merchant called on John with a p aper. "It's just a little mortgage I've had made out on the crop for you to sign" he explained. "Of course your word's all right with me, but it's a little more business-like" and Robert read it over and signed it, but he kept careful account of all he bought at the store and when he realized the enormous prices charged determined never again to get into the clutches of the credit system. The cotton grew sturdily, the little rice field was tall and green and all went well until harvest time. It was a great sunny morning and the cotton field was white and waving as though some magic summer snow had fallen and lay banked and billowy along the smooth dark face of the land. Robert bared his great sinewy arms and seizing two big baskets started for the fields.

41-1-65

"No mother" he cried" you can't come out, it's too hot, Betty and Frank will help me and we'll finish in a couple of days" and he went whistling gaily to the fields. The dark brown cotton plants nodded and bowed, bent their laden heads heavy with harvest beseachingly, and the harvesters swung lightly between them grasping them swiftly with deft fingers, playing a moment with the soft and silken fibre and then with a twist and a pull leaving the stalk brown and bare, and passed onward singing. As Robert far ahead of his helpers passed swiftly onward and counted the white basketsful of coiled snow, he counted and reckoned and dreamed great golden dreams and life seemed ——

"Hi - there - what the devil do you mean by touching that cotton without letting me know"cried an angry voice and Johnson the merchant leaped from his buggy,whip in hand.

Robert stared at him owen-mouthed. "What do you say?" he asked.

"I say that you've got no business to touch this cotton,I tell you and am here to oversee it."

"But it's my cotton" isn't it?"

"No it isn't -it's mine - I've got a mortgage on it - that's the law and you know it and I could have you shoved in the calaboose for this - how do I know how much cotton you've made away with already - I - "

Robert whirled and walked straight at him hot and angry and the man retreated precipitately,falling over the rows and brandishing his whip.

"Don't you touch me" he cried,"Don't you lay your hands on me."

Robert paused and recovered himself.

41-1-67

"What you say, Mr.Johnson, may be the law and it may not be. I never heard of it and if it is the law it's unfair and rascally. As for the cotton here's every boll of it right before your eyes and if you dare to say I've concealed any, so as not to pay my honest debts,you lie."

Johnson's face flushed and his hand crept down to his pocket. Then he looked at Robert and paused.

"O well" he said awkwardly "I suppose it's all right but you see we merchants have a pretty hard time keeping up with mortgaged crops and avoiding being cheated out of our eye-teeth. I don't belive you meant wrong but the law is just like I tell you -you can't touch mortgaged cotton without the consent of the mortgager. But's all right ,go ahead - I can stay and see to the weighing this evening just as well as not" and slouching off under the great oak tree he sat down and mopped his face with a red handkerchief. All the afternoon he sat there and Robert picked the cotton in silent rage, and no song arose among the sullen workers.

Robert slept uneasily that night despite his great weariness for he began to fear for his years' work. Early next morning he left his helpers picking under the argus eyes of Johnson and went to town. He entered the office of young Henry Reynolds whom he had known in the legislature and asked him about the law. Reynolds shook his head.

"Rob,he said "the man who plants on credit is the slave of the merchant It wasn't so before the war but the recent laws and rulings have changed things:the merchant has almost full control of the crop until after sale and then hands over the proceeds to you after deducting his little bill.

"But I have a careful account."

"Worthless unless the merchant accepts or unless you sue him and disprove his record".

Robert hung his head. It was a bitter disappointment but his fighting blood was up. He must make some money someway - but how?

"I'll tell you " said young Henry Reynolds "I'll tell you what you must do Rob:it's nonsense for a colored man to try and make anything at small farming. If you've got any capital,buy a lot of land and rent it and make by squeezing the renters. That's what all the farmers are doing since the war. Of course it's just slavery by another name,but it gives the shrewd colored man a chance to get in the ring."

41-1-68

Robert shook his head.

"You needn't let your conscience trouble you - if you don't live off the black tenants, white folks will and treat them worse in the bargain. "

But Robert still shook his head. "I'll tell you what you might do" said Reynolds thoughtfully - "You might try shipping cotton - buying it up from planters and shipping it out. There are not many men in that business now and I believe it would pay." Robert went home and began to figure. The sale of his crops turned out as Reynolds had predicted. The price paid for the cotton was 10 cents. "But the Charleston price is 12 cents" objected Robert.

41-1-69

"Well, you can't get 12 cents here" said Johnson and sure enough Robert found that none of the local agents would offer more than Johnson. so that Robert sold his 10 bales for $500. Then came Johnson's bill.

"I have calculated that it amounts to $136.23" said Robert.

Johnson opened his eyes and the truculent white loafers in the store edged nearer "$136!" said Johnson - "it's $252.50" said he laying out a bill. Robert sat down and laboriously checked off the items: amounts had been doubled, prices raised and new items inserted recklessly. Robert groaned in spirit. In his program of life he had girded himself to fight for success by desert and ability and toil — what did these avail against injustice and lies and theft? He saw the white men whispering together: they expected him to get angry and storm. He would disappoint them.

"Mr. Johnson" he said "your bill is $116 larger than my account."

"Well,what are you going to do about it?"

"I'm not going to do anything - I can't."

"Well you can sign this receipt and get your balance or leave it - just as you please."

Robert silently signed the receipt - took $247.50 for his years' work and walked out amid the low jeers of the crowd.

41-1-70

"It's just that sort of damned Nigger that makes trouble"said Johnson "and I'm agoing to see that this Nigger gets his deserts before I'm done with him"for he remembered the day in the cotton rows. Robert went straight home. He had resolved on his course. His cotton crop would not pay the mortgage - it would not hardly keep the family next year. In that case he determined to make a dash for liberty. Without ~~x~~ longing a moment he went to a bank and deposited his money. When as he went home he stopped at a white farmer's :"I'm buying cotton Mr.H -- H he said " at 12 cents a pound. Have you any to sell."

The planter looked at him. "Why,yes and I've been getting 11 cents. Do you ~~buy~~ pay ~~xxxx~~ cash?"

"Yes,sir."

"How much do you want?"

"Four bales today."

"Here they are."

Robert bought them - shipped them to Charleston and in two days cleared $50. He said nothing but went silently to work and in two months'hard striving and figuring he had a balance of $2000 in the bank. He could hardly realize his good luck and the road to fortune seemed open. He paid the mortgage on the farm, fitted up a little office in Beaufort and put out a gilt sign:"Robert Calhoun- Cotton-buyer." Then he noticed a change. There was no sudden happening,no noticeable incident but gradually the atmosphere about him grew different. One by one white planters ceased to sell him cotton,either giving evasive replies or curious excuses or coming out point blank as one did:

"I don't belive in trading with Niggers when white men can do the business."

In a few weeks the boycott was almost complete and only the few independent colored planters came to Robert's office with cotton. He pondered over the matter and at last he went to Harrison Coles and laid the matter before him.

41-1-71

Mr.Coles shook his head sadly "It's but another chapter of an old story my boy,Johnson and the white commission merchants have combined against you and are using their tremendous power of race prejudice to put you out of business."

"But what can I do - I paid good prices and no one lost a cent,I did my work well."

"Too well,my boy - your only mistake lay in paying off that mortgage too quickly,buying a gilt sign and wearing better clothes - yes,yes,I know there are little things and well within the rights of a freeman and you're not free,my boy,you're not free. More than that you never will be free until the rank and file of the race is capable of economic organization so that the boycott will be ineffective against it."

"Do you mean Mr.Coles,that our race can only rise by stealing upward in the night or fighting in organized battle,if not with hands,with wits?"

"Something very like that,Rob"- Ah,here is Lloyd Jones - you boys know each other? of course,of course. Well Lloyd is to be my son-in-law next month Rob." and the young men shook hands heartily.

41-1-72

Chapter XII.

The New Start.

Juno was ~~fairly~~ failing fast. "No honey,"she said "I can't go up to Columbia- you go and see sister graduate and bring her home to me before I die."

So he kissed her and went up to Columbia. The new school,risen from the ashes of the old sat back among magnolia trees,a little green oasis among the low close crowded cabins of the Negro quarter. The building itself was bare red brick but today trimmed with humanity - a great dark cloud of mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers. A sense of longing and unrest fell on Robert as he sat and heard the music and the voices and saw little sister,slight and womanly,stand before all those hundreds and tell them of "The Glory of Sacrifice."

His eyes wandered over the sea of faces and turning half around to look farther back he saw a face and ~~he~~ started - there sat a girl of perhaps sixteen. She sat among the other girls - she was but one of a hundred two, three hundred and yet she - ah, she was Woman Wonderful; ~~and he saw~~ her face was burnished gold and her hair the wavering brilliant changing brown of bronze. All her soul seemed to stream and quicken and quiver thru her lithe limbs. Her eyes - o, her eyes were little pools - dark liquid pools that stand of a summer's day in forests' fastness. Nay, they were fires that leap in dark mountains - they were depths of mighty night all starry and meteored with threading light and now they were lightning gleams, shuddering on the eternal halls. Her hands were blue and red beneath the gold. Her hair did not string lankly to the ground but curled and hesitated, coiling in a thousand shivering ringlets, soft and gilstening like a summer sea. Her head was poised proudly on a slender neck, and her little bosom burst above a waist that was all rythm and movement. She did not blush but went red gold from cheek to ear and glowed darkly like a summer sunset kind and silent, on a brown and silent sea. Ah, she was Woman Wonderful.

41-1-73

"Why -Rob- haven't you a word for sister?"

And then he woke shamed of his monning and kissed little Mary and carried her beribboned diploma, but still his heart beat riotously. They hurried homeward that night and found their mother tossing on a bed of pain. She looked at them fondly - "Just a waiting - children" she murmured "only -only one thing lies on my soul - and Robert, sister, listen -when I come to die, I a going to call for somebody and I wants you to run and get him for I'se got a death word for him", and she felli into fitful sleep.

As Robert and Mary sat on the door-sill talking a stranger came up.

"Who owns this place" he asked looking over the land.

"My mother does"answered Robert.

"Is she in"?

"She is sick and can see no one but I do all her business for her."

"Got about 30 acres here haven't you?"

"Forty."

41-1-74

The stranger looked at it critically and turned as if to saunter away.

"Mighty poor land - he said - "I'd been thinking of buying up some land here but - "

Robert said nothing.

"What would you sell this place for?"

"We don't want to sell."

"Pshaw!anybody wants to sell if they can get their price ." And the stranger moved off. At the gate he paused again. "I'll give you $250 for the whole thing"he said but Robert shook his head and he went out.

"Robert " said Mary "I have a plan. "I'm going to teach school and take care of mother and you're going to finish your college course."

His heart beat faster at this spoken echo of an unspoken, almost unrealized thought.

"Nonsense" he said shortly. But she was in deadly earnest. "Robert" she said "you must. It isn't merely land or money or even knowledge that our people need,Robert,it is Vision and Sacrifice. We must know what the world was and what men have thought. I have gotten in these two years as it seems to me a faint gleam of the meaning of life. I have stood on the foot-hills and glimpsed the peaks of the world. And yet you see I only finished the Normal course and we got so little - so little."

"But you know,Sis,I wanted you to go through college."

"Yes - yes - but I know that but one of us could afford that and it would far bettey be you because you will have larger and better opportunity to use the things you will see and know. And so for four years you must go up into the hills of God and sit before the vision and then come down and lead us to the Promised Land" and she smiled into his eyes through her tears.

"I've got a thousand dollars in the bank and the place is clear of debt.

She leapt in glee - "O Rob have you? is it? why we're rich "- the weak faint voice of the mother came to them and Mary rose quickly "Mammy ,poor mammy,"she murmured " if only she could live to see it" and she hurried in. But Robert sat and dreamed and behind the dream hovered a girl' s sweet face, the wonderful witching beauty of one dark golden face.

41-1-75

"Did you sell the place,Rob,"asked his neighbor eagerly over the fence next morning.

"No" said Robert..

"I did- got $400."

What's he buying for?"

"I hea r they're putting cotton mills and a railroad through here."

"Well,I won't sell my father's place"said Robert.

"You'd better - they'll buy you out or cheat you out."

"O, I reckon not."

He turned back to the house and met the land agent again.

"I want to buy this place" he said and "I'll give you $400 which is about twice as much as it is worth."

"I won't sell" said Robert shortly. Two or three times during the next week the agent importuned him until he had offered $750. But Robert was obdurate and the agent went angrily away. Robert thought little of the matter for his head was full of the college course which he and Mary had now fully planned. If he could get the village school for her to teach all seemed well. He could put a tenant on the land, building him a small cabin at the other end of the plot. This would pay living expenses for mother and sister. Mary could then save a large part of her salary and his $1000 would pay his way through college. It seemed a fair world that Robert looked upon that night as he walked quickly in toward Beaufort. It seemed fair to Henry Reynolds and his land agent as they rode past Robert not recognizing him in the darkness.

41-1-76

"Do you suppose it's spite against your father for lynching old Tom?" the agent was saying.

"O no, he's been in my office since that - these Niggers haven't much family affection - no it is stubbornness and the only thing to do as I told you is to attach-" and they rode on out of ear shot.

The blood was roaring in Robert's ears and the thrill of bitter vengeance for his father's brutal murder rose as wild and insistent as on that awful night when Mary had whispered in his ears. He hurried to town and straight to the home of John Epps an old colored friend of his father. "Uncle John he said "what did John Reynolds have to do with killing my father?"

"Well,buddy,he was in the mob you know and they say that it was him that lead them to Frazier's woods."

"A traitor and a murderer"said Robert.

"And a white man "added John Epps. "Now see here buddy,don't be a fool. This is a hard world and God knows hardest for black people- so hard that you can't afford to make it harder. If a white man comes at you,buddy,kill him,if it takes your last drop of blood. But don't go calling up old quarrels and righting all the wrong that's dead and gone there's too many -your pappy's only one in a thousand. Let God tend to it - you know what the good book say about revenging - how is it?"

41-1-77

And Robert repeated it mechanically "Vengeance is mine,I will repay, saith the Lord."

"That's it - that's it."

"Yes,"said Robert wearily "that's it - the refuge of cowards since the world began."

But the old man put his hands on his shoulder "There's braver things than dying in this world,son,and one of them is living"and Robert walked away in silence.

It was two weeks later that Juno Calhoun was summoned to court to defend the disputed title of her property. She wass too sick to go and Robert represented her. He hired the best lawyer he could get - a sharp young fellow,who fought the case well and won. It took half of Robert's savings to pay him,but he did not care - he was flushed with the victory over Henry Reynolds. But the case was promptly appealed to a higher court and the young lawyer advised Robert to compromise..

"But the place is mine."

41-1-78

"Yes".

"And they are just trying to wear me out with law suits."

"Yes".

"Then I'll fight it" and he mortgaged the house and land to the young lawyer and fought on. He won again but his money was gone and the property was mortgaged to its full value and the case appealed to the SUpreme Court. It was a useless fight and when the lawyer offered him $50 for his equity in the estate ~~he~~ Robert sold it to ~~him and the lawyer~~ him and he sold it to Henry Reynolds.

They moved Juno at night over to old Uncle Caesar's cabin. She started up"where are you taking me?" she cried but they soothed her and said "We are carrying you out to smell the sea and then we'll go home again." She lay still and sniffed the air and then they carried her to the new cabin arranging her room as well as they could to look like the old. She did not notice the difference in the room but she heard the nearer roaring of the sea "The sea"she cried "the Sea -it's coming nearer - and the Ship-Robert-Robert go -go bring Henry Jones to me."

It was a grey cold morning and the mists lingered low above the leaden waters. Within upon a bed white-shrouded was stretched the form of Juno Calhoun-thin, haggard and dead. Beside her stood her children.

41-1-79

"It's no use - no use" said Robert "the hand of God is against us."

But Mary lifted her eyes up to him and said "Shame on you Robert -sh shame! here in the morning of life, in health and strength with the memory of our dear old mammy before us, to falter and hesitate because God has not made our way rose or our paths peace. Shame on you Robert" - "and then slowly they fell upon their knees and with bowed heads and trembling words searched for God in the great misty morning and stretched doubtful hands up to the shining armposts of His throne, and without the dog crept in the clay and weeds and howled to the howling sea.

"Robert" said Mary the morning after the funeral. "You'll have just four weeks now to get ready." He looked at her in surprise.

"Why, for school" she answered, smiling at his expression. Then seeing that it hurt him she added quickly "You see my school begins in two weeks".

"What school?"

"Didn't you know I had the village school? $40 a month and, which I think is very good."

"But I tried to get it for you and couldn't - they said it was promised to Lettie Sands."

"Well here's my contract signed yesterday."

He glanced it over -"Henry Reynolds!" he said bitterly and then added -"I'm awfully glad sis,but of courge I can't go away."

"Why not",she said eagerly "I can stay here with old Uncle Ceasar with perfect safety and I wrote to Miss Silena and told of our losses and hshe has a scholarship and some work for you. Rob, if you don't go I'll - be so disappointed". He sat down almost overcome by a sudden vision of a dream which he had shriven to renounce in the last weeks of hardship and loss.

"It doesn't seem possible"he murmured.

But Mary made it more than a possibility - a duty,a way of life. He put his hand lovingly on her head - "Dear little sister" he said.

41-1-80

Cdapter XIII.

The School.

The day of parting came. Mary stood at the depot and smiled brightly and joyously into Robert's face as he boarded the train for Columbia;she waved her handkerchief cheerily as far as he could see but as the train faded away,her eyes grew misty and when at last it was gone and the sense of utter loneliness sank on the brave girl,the great hot tears came rolling unheeded down her face. She was ever a girl older than her years;sensitive as a flower and deeply sympathetic,she felt the sorrows and troubles of others almost before they came and her perfect wonderful unselfishness brought her so quickly to aid that people came easily to expect it of her. Her spirit of sacrfice was perfectly simple and sincere and attracted no notice to herself. Indeed she was at first glace,to all,and ever to the ordinary eye,an unattractive girl,scareely noticeable alone,quite unnoticed in a throng. She was slight almost frail in build,dark brown in color with short greyish crinkled hair,which was always neatly piled in rounded motionless cones,deftly inbraided and twisted. To those whose eyes were trained only to the more glaring flashes of light and shade on white faces,the softer shadowings of her sensitive countenance were all unheeded and unknown,and her soul looked out from the liquid depths of her eyes dead and unmoved. But those who came to know Mary Calhoun better knew the depths of passionful striving,the low tense yearning for goodness,

41-1-81

the great brave feeling that for the good of others no giving of herself was too great - too exhausting. All the mystic and wierd wanderings of her mother's and grandmother's souls, had in her, through the strong balance and sense of her father become transmitted into a great vivid passion for spiritual purity. She wanted to be good and true, she wanted the world to be good and true and she wanted this with a fervor so intense and burning that all else paled before this flaming zeal for souls. Long years before when she was but a child she had sat very still in that great reeking revival and then suddenly had risen and stretched her little arms toward God and said clearly, calmly "I am free!" They called this her conversion and on its testimony took her into the church although some who believed in visions shook their heads. The freedom into which she had stepped that day she never left. Ever after she was free - free from all the littleness of life, all its baser passion, all its jealousy, envy and strife, and into her clear eyes came and grew the spirit of endless sacrifice, the sweet lovableness, and tender pity - all this, but veiled and unknown to most men because it was shrouded in a dark skin.

41-1-82

Perhaps her greatest physical gift was her voice - a low wonderful contralto that came tremulously welling upward as from hills of tears and fell upon her auditor in sudden over-powering sweetness. Today she hurried quickly from the depot and wandered homeward under the great oaks and sang as she walked the wierd old songs of the far off motherland:

"You may bury me in tie east,
You may bury me in the west
But I'll hear the trumpet sound
In that morning."

The low winds crooned with her and at last she found herself weeping again with that sense of perfect loneliness that comes with song. All had gone - her dear old Mother, her new found father and now, today, Robert. Tomorrow she must face life and face it alone and if life be hard and puzzling to men, who much harder, narrower, bewildering to a woman? And if bewildering to a woman, what is it not to a black woman in a land that despises them and leaves them naked to their enemies? She felt with sudden dismay all that she must face: they would call her by her first name as they called their slaves and servants; they would couple her with strumpets by refusing to call her "Miss." They would leer at her in secret, take open liberties with her sense of modesty and decency, and regard her ruin by force or wile as the lawful pastime of a gentleman. And if she anywhere, at any time she protested or rebelled, they would laught at her anger, sneer at her airs,mock at her chastity or slap her face - O God - could she stand this, could she go through it. She lifted her eyes toward the grey sky and stretched her hands,then dropped them in sudden shame and contrition,sank upon her knees by the great gnarled roots of a black ivy, wreathed oak;the birds sang above her and when she rose it was with the old sweet look of gladness and sympathy and sacrifice.

The school was to be held in the church for there was no school house and the committee refused to build one. Which church then should be chosen? To Mary the new board Methodist church just built seemed cosiest and better sheltered than the great hulk of old Siloam at the cross-roads. But no sooner was her choice known than the whole black community was rent in twain. "What"said the baptists "in a Methodist church?; "What" sardamed the old paster of Siloam "going to that new darky's shanty with his stuck up ways,No,Sir!". Mary hesitated in dismay and went to consult her committee. Henry Reynolds was too busy to look at her "Who?" he asked "Mary Calhoun? O yes, well Mary,you niggers settle that yourselves,if you can't get 50 scholars why give the thing up. Now Johnson"and Reynolds plunged into his figures again. Mary took her usual direct and simple way out of the difficulty. She called a meeting of the patrons and conquering her timidity told them in a straightforward way the situation:"if you want a good school you must have it in the best place;Siloam church is big,the benches have no backs and it leaks;the Zion church is new,tight and small and has good benches. I'm ready to teach in either place - which will you have?" They chose Siloam church sbut they fixed her some new benches and patched the roof. On the opening day of the first regular free school in the community,125 children of all ages,sizes and conditions crowded in. Mary was thoroughly frightened at the row upon row of solemn faces and prospects of teaching them single-handed. The first few days they were interesting,they sang with vigor,looked at the pictures in their books and wrote on the limited black boards. But the books were few in number - one to every three or four - the sitting still became irksome and then the mischief maker began to appear. Paper wads flew, bent pins brought agonized yelps and the whispering made reciting difficult. But the big boys mistook their mild-faced little teacher. She stood the hub-bub and disorder several days, pleading with them and warning them. And then suddenly one morning she sent a troublesome girl home and whipped a half dozen little boys so vigorously that they alarmed the neighborhood. The next morning as she approached the school house she found a great fat yellow woman with towselled hair and angry mien planted squarely in the door way, with one of her victims of yesterday. Affairs certainly looked warlike and Mary felt a chill down her back: but she came straight on:

41-1-83

41-1-84

"I'm so glad you came Mrs. Johnson" she said sweetly - "I wanted to talk to you about Jimmie - come right in and sit down - and here's Aunt Jane too, move right in, there we've quite a family party . Now Children, we've got two visitors this morning ~~xxxxxx xxx~~ Jimmie's mother and Willie and Tom and Sarah's, who've come to see if this school can't behave just as well as any". The visitors who had not been able to get in a word as yet, straightened up now with sense of importance and the school day began. Four children, it is needless to say out did themselves in studiousness and exemplary conduct. One small incorrigible in a far corner started in with a paper wad while the second reader class was reading a story that astonished Aunt Jemima very much, about a gentleman named Alladin. The ensuing snicker disturbed Aunt Jemima and she spoke right out:

"You Jim Banks over thar - if you throws another one of them I'm just goin' wear you to a frazzle - you know your mammy don't allow no such cutting up". And James Banks subsided for the day.

It took but a few experiences of this sort to make Mary full mistress of her school, while her never failing courtesy and kindness with the ignorant but well-meaning patrons disarmed most of their hosti;-ity. Still even that did not make the children come to school regularly or continuously. The school dwindled to 100,75,50,25 and the school committee promptly warned the little teacher that she must close unless the average was kept up to fifty. She was very tired nights after school but she started now regular visiting and it opened her eyes. She found that she had had no idea of the difficulties the sorrows,the slovenly habits of her community. Here in filthy rags and vermin-infected hut lay a sick mother with a new baby "Sarah has to stay and tend me and Josie gets the meals." Here was a father struggling in a fearful battle with debt. "I needs the boys to help me right now,Miss Mary - I'me mighty sorry,but we must live". Yonder she met sloven indifference "O they can go if they want to \- but what's the use - white folks got everything and going to keep.it,I 'spect - no use no Nigger trying to be anybody." Into this slough the little woman threw herself with sympathy,kindlines and unwavering determination. She helped surse the sick,strove to systematize work and accounts,spoke a word of cheer and encouragement. Made the girls mend their clothes,hunted jobs for the boys until the school became a centre of love as well as learning,of work and play, of striving and sacrifice. John came home at vacation time and saw his sister's work with astonishment and pride. But he hurried away - he had work for the summer in Charleston.

4/1-1-85

"I - to - did you know Hilda Quarles at school?" he asked as he was almost ready to start.

"Little Hilda - why yes."

"I met her in Beaufort yesterday - her little brother was in trouble and I'm going to try to help him out."

Mary felt just a tinge of jealousy but she put it away quickly and turned to her work again,bidding him a fond good bye.

Another year started in and it brought new troubles. This time it came from the white planters and employers round about. They had at first looked on Negro schools as non-sensical experiments bound to fail on account of the sheer stupidity of the children. Then when they prospered they begrudged them the public monies. At last there came a new and more sinister plaint - the scarcity of labor. It was a new thing - unknown in its present form in slavery times and the planters attributed it to the deviltry and laziness of the freedmen.

"There are a dozen good cotton hands down at that Nigger school" said Mr. Johnson to the loafers in his store "and a couple of dozen half-hands -it's bad enought to keep these niggers idle without teaching them all to shun work or making them impudent. By God they'll think they're good as white folks in a year or so." Thus the white community grumbled. Nor was the black world altogether satisfied.

41-1-86

"Miss Mary's a good teacher but she's had her share of the school money now and she ought to let somebody else have a little now" suggested Sands, cautiously.

"She don't pay no attention to my children, it's only the smart ones she cares for," growled another.

And so the leaven of criticism and discontent grew about the unconscious hard working girl, until the day that Henry Reynolds found himself with a grievance against her brother and ordered her dismissal at the end of the school term.

Chawter XIV.

The Servant.

She went into her little room in the cabin and lay down on the bed and thought it all out. Next year was Robert's last year in college - it would be awful to have him stop now, he must not stop. He had worked in Columbia last year and in the long summer months had saved $75. His scholarship had added $50 to this and she had sent $150 from her salary.

This year would cost him a little more and then too he might not be able to make so much in the summer. The wave of misery overwhelmed her and she wept and wept and sobbed until the shadows rose from the sea and Uncle Caesar's querulous voice called her to make supper ready. She rose and smoothed her dress and washed her face and came out to him with her old sweet way - cooked a pone of corn bread, made him some coffee and sent him mumbling off to bed. Then she went to her room again and took down her little bank book. She had taught three years, six months in each year at $40 a month - let's see that was $720. Of this $475 had gone to Robert -$200 the first year, $125 the second and $150 the third. That left $230. It had cost her and uncle Caesar but little to live and they raised their own vegetables and chickens and had a bale or so of cotton each year; still she had only $75 left in the bank and it looked very, very small. She wrote a cheerful letter to Robert saying nothing of the school, but urging him not to come home in vacation -"stay and work in Columbia and perhaps I'll run up and see you, if I'm lucky. Uncle Caesar is well and so am I. How sweet it is to live and work, Dear Robert - Lovingly your sister Mary" and carefully blotting off the tear, she sealed it. Then she sat down to contrive and think - a county school? it was too late this summer and they did not run in winter and she could only wait for next summer - and even then would have to be very near for how could she leave Uncle Caesar alone? She thought of sewing - now there was a chance - she had often in summer done fine needlework - but O, it paid so little; she thought of private lessons but so few, so very few of the colored people could afford to pay. Then she turned and faced it - faced that which was ever there but from which she shrank in nameless repulsion - house-service. Why not? Why not?she said bravely and resolutely and yet she knew why not;because it was the sign of the slavery out of which she and her people were creeping - because it was wasting her talent in doing what a thousand others less fortunate than she could do as well and often better. And yet that was not all - the chief and greatest reason was that it held the raw sore of her sensitiveness at slights, jibes and discrimination open to the careless, the scornful and the harsh. Her very soul revolted against the semblance of bondage. Her mother and father had shielded her from it and although she was ready to do almost any honest work - yet her whole being recoiled at this step And yet,and yet, her soul whispered, perhaps this last sacrifice is what God asks - perhaps this is that dark valley of Humiliation through which all true souls travell. Was it the drudgery she feared,was it mere pride that bound her? She hesitated,walked to the wall and threw back the wooden shutter and drank in the night air. A silent figure passed along the road and sudden fear shot through her. She remembered Robert's word "Drudgery and shame and perhaps both." Suppose she should go into some home and fall into wanton treacherous hands - what was there to protect colored girls; Tradition?God save the mark! Chivalry?there is no chivalry for ~~helpless~~ black women in the South. Christianity?was not the canting Christian south mottled with the bastards of white fathers? Her hands gripped the flesh till it bled and fierce hot anger rose in her throat - but she turned- shut the window and slipped to her knees beside the little bed and strove with her wavering soul to think how 2000 years before another heart, upon which lay the sin and burden of a ~~hunted people~~ world, bowed alone in a great shadowy garden and prayed "Let this cup pass from me."

41-1-87

41-1-88

41-1-89

She had scarcely finished the breakfast dishes next morning and tidied up the cabin ~~next morning~~ when she saw the shadow of a woman at the door. She went forward and greeted her pleasantly, trying in vain to remember where she had seen her before.

"It's getting real warm" she said "won't you come in and sit here in this chair. It just catches the breeze from door and window and Uncle Caesar says it's the coolest spot on the coast."

The lady seated herself thankully. She was a short fat woman, with smooth brown hair parted in the middle, and a worried kindly face.

"I thought I'd come and see you" she said - "John told me - that is O I meant to say I am Martha Reynolds, John Reynolds wife. I was so sorry when you lost the school and I told Henry and he said - Well at any rate I do wish I could get you to come and work for us. I've heard of your school and I heard you sing once and my heart sort of went out to you. I never had any children myself - that is, except Henry. And I thought that you'd like a good home. There are only three of us and there won't be much to do,although just now we are expecting company from the north, Mrs.Grimes and - but of course you don't know her. These girls I've been having are so trifling and dirty,and somehow I can't get hold of the decent tidy-looking colored girls - I don't see why;I'm sure I try to treat them right and pay they good wages - won't you come?"

Mary's heart rose to her mouth and she stammered. She meant to say "No,no"I can't"but she said vaguely:

"How much do you pay?"

"We've been paying $5 a month but I'd give you ten gladly if you'd come -only of course you mustn't mention it - John is so close."

Mary sat with her arms in her lap staring out doors and almost forge ting her visitor _- $10 a month and that included board. She could work 11 months and ore John's graduation - $110 . This with the $50 in the bank would make the $150 for him and $10 over. Could she live on $1 a month outside her board? What would the colored people say who had known her as teacher,and with this thought came trooping tumultuously all the throng of doubts and fears and pains - but she thrust them aside with one great sweep and rose. "I'll come" she said "tomorrow."

And Martha Reynolds rose and took her hand. The two women looked in each other's eyes and saw something of each other reflected there,each in each,something deeper and nearer than money and color and years. And Martha's voice faltered "We'll be good friends,Mary."

41-1-90

"We'll be good friends Mrs.Reynolds"said Mary in quick understanding and then speeding her guest,she went slowly into her little room and shut the door.

It was busy times at the Reynolds'. "I don't see what I ever should do without you Mary"said Martha plunging her arms into the white dough. Mary had just slipped a cake into the oven door and she was humming to herself, for Robert's last letter was blithe and hopeful. "I am glad I came" she said as she cleaned up the dishes and hung up the clothes. !There now- my part of the baking is done - what next?" "I guess that's all"said Martha and you'd better go home and see to Uncle Caesar and take him something good to eat. Now tomorrow you'll have the windows to wash. I'll go to Charleston right after breakfast as soon as I put the bread in -" and Mary for Lord's sake don't forget it. Turn it round twice, I always do and take it out when it's gold-brown. And then -let's see - O yes, Henry will be home by tomorrow on time for the picnic.I s'pose it's wrong for me to be away at this time but these picnics are the pokiest, stiffest things and I hate 'em. He'll find his clothes all laid out. ~~Fu~~ Funny,he hasn't been home since you came,has he? Well he's a good boy - with a little temper but that's man like - Good night."

41-1-91

The house was empty when Mary came next day. Martha had gone to Charleston shopping,John REynolds to his office and Henry was still out of town. Mary went blithely about her work for she liked it. With all its drudgery and long hours and endless repetition, there was something fascinating in the keeping of a home. It grew to feel like some great quiet friend, loving sympathetic with its great broad bosom, its moods and tempers, its many sided character - it was very pleasant to move in a great rich cozy place like this and care for it tenderly and know that one's duty lay here - safe-guarded from the cold hard hurrying world without. She ~~turned~~ turned the bread and took it out gold-brown; and then took Robert's letter from her bosom and sitting on the stairs with duster, pail and wash cloths, read it again and laughed and cried a little. Hilha - little Hilda-she must have grown into a nice big girl and Robert seemed to mention her often. She wondered - but she laughed at the thought and started up the stairs. She had not told Robert yet of her new work. He thought her still teaching. It was hard to write it and it would make him ill at ease. She went to Henry Reynold's room first and dusted it and put it in order and washed the window. Then she went into Mrs. Reynold's room. She looked out of the window -a bed of great white lillies grew beneath and she bent far out to catch the fragrance and felt for a moment like plunging down into them. A man with a satchel came rapidly up the street - a tall broad shouldered red faced young fellow and turned quickly in at the gate, glancing up toward her. It was Henry Reynolds and she drew back in something like confusion, and went rapidly to her work. She made the bed swept and dusted, hearing him stamping up the stairs whistling and banging the doors. She started to the window and began washing it and sniffing the lillies. Suddenly she heard the door behind her open quickly and Henry Reynolds looked in. He was dressing for the picnic and had neither coat, vest nor collar and his hair was rumpled.

41-1-92

"Where's Ma" he asked vigorously applying the towel to his recently shaven face.

"In Charleston" -she answered "there's a note on the dresser."

"O yes, hello you're a new one aren't you" regarding her. She murmured something, growing hot beneath his continued gaze. He seemed disposed to keep up the conversation but she picked up her pail and brush and would have started to the door when she realized that he was standing between her and the hallway. He laughed and A wild crazy fear surged up to her heart as she watched the gathering sneer on his red face and the swing of his great bare white arms. Her hands shook and she faltered backward twisting her apron and whispering to herself - "He will not - of course he will not - he is a gentleman - he would"-then as he tossed the towel away and stepped confidently carelessly toward her, she raised herself erect in sudden hot fury that battled with the whelming sense of utter helplessness, God would not leave her thus alone and unprotected in this great dark empty house - God - Oh! and then she caught suddenly the scent of lillies and the rush of the wind. Like a flash she weeled,never faltering never doubting;with one light bound she was on the window - the man cried out in horror - but she leaned upon the air,the trees and house whirled upward,the skies flew,she felt her body wheeling twisting downward;up roared the good sweet air and the great fragrance of lillies - nearer,nearer- falling,falling - and she closed her eyes and slept.

41-1-93

Chapter XV.

The Pain.

41-1-94

Mary lay before a wide window gazing dreamily out upon the sky - great clouds,grey and silver and white sailed silentlm,majestically by as if on long and mighty missions to some blue and unknown land afar - thrones and kings rolled on in gleaming splendor and changed and grew and altered as they rolled. She turned away:why was it - ah-a - ah God, the Pain,the dull deep massive pain, - the grinding, pressing, sickening ~~pa~~ pain! The beads of sweat bubbled on her forehead and she sank back with a sigh as Martha bent over her.

"Poor dear- poor dear!"she mummured "there don't move - you mustn't move - is it easier now?"

"Yes - yes - I-I want to write - I must write."

"To your brother- I'm writing now,dear - "

"You must not write l- no - no - yes I am strong enough quite - (ah the Pain the deep tingling bitter pain - ah,ah - there) yes,yes get me a pencil and I'll tell him all - thank you - yes, I'm quite easy now - quite - ah - well."

She seized the pen and wrote:

"Dearest Robert:-

Is not this sweet weather?this glorious [oh,the pain the pain,the bitter pain] summer time? The sun is tender to us here and sends us [ah,dear God!] kissing cooing winds. I am sitting,no-lying (am I not lazy Rob?) here and watching the great white clouds fly - they seem like God's great waving banners marching always marching so silently and swiftly on. I am as well as can be - I hope you're in good health Work and study hard next year - I shall send you $150 for the year - it won't pinch me at all. My [the pain,the awful whizzing pulsing pain - I cannot bear it,dear God - ah] love to Hilda and all your friends [ah, it comes again dagger-like and strikes my hand] how careless - my finger slipped Goodbye,dear Rob, Good bye,

Mary."

"There - there"she whispered faintly "now the envelope no,no I'll back it - there then now you won't write you won't - " and she fainted away.

Long days she lay there watching the sky. Now in deep peace now wracked with paroxisms of fever shivering pain.

"What,what is broken" she asked once.

"Your hip is crushed dear."

4-1-95

"Will it ever get well?"

"O,it will get much better?"

"So I can work - so I -" she began eagerly.

"You are working now and here are your first month's wages"said Martha. Mary took the little envelope and opened it and there was a hundred dollar bill .

"O no"she said quickly "no I"-

But Martha was kneeling by the bed sobbing."You were hurt working for me and this is my own money,my own savings,if you do not take it I shall never forgive myself."

Mary looked at her and lay back with a sigh -

"Thank you"she said "thank you very,very much".

But Martha still knelt.

"Mary"she said and her voice came dry and harsh

"Mary - did you - fall out the window?"

For a moment their eyes met but Mary closed hers quickly.

"Yes" Mrs.Reynolds"she said.

"O thank God - thank God"murmured the woman -"O no,no,I don't mean that Mary - I - "but Mary put out her hands and slipped them about the woman's neck and kissed her.

"Can you not give me some needle and cloth. I think I will try to embroider a bit"said Mary one day,and lying there she wove a figured mat with flaming border and waving lillies strewn ~~without~~ within and Martha took it out and sold it for her. Many of these she made (yet the pain,the low grinding pain,lived ever with her)and then at last obedient to her begging they moved her to Uncle Caesar's cabin and put her in her little neat room where half sitting ,half lying,she sewed and wrought and sang([The pain the cruel pain,it wrought and sang there too.] One day a child came in for help on its lesson. She eagerly turned to her books and helped it and in after days others came and others,and though they wondered to see her pause now and then,and closing eyes and teeth,drip silent sweat,yet the class grew and the black parents came in and hovered over her and paid her little sums as they could. Thus so that soon she found herself earning $3 and $4 a week with her sewing and teaching and she was glad and brave and happy. One day a letter came and she opened it. There was a long blue check and a card. The blue check said $500 - the card said "Henry Reynolds- Real Estate". She sat and held it. Wild anger, cold contempt,calm resignation strove in her heart. Would it not be right to use this for Robert's training,for the poor about her,for the school? Then she sighed. No it was the price of shame,and the next day Henry Reynolds received back his check and card.

41-1-97

She wrote long letters to Robert filled with cheer and cautioned all the neighbors lest they worry him with gossip.

"He knows all he needs to know"she said sweetly. "He's hard at work, dear boy, and does not need to be troubled with little things. Yet it was hard as commencement approached. "When are you coming "he kept writing anD she hobbling about on her crutches and knowing that the Limp and the Pain had married her body for all this life kept putting him off and at last said "Dear Brother-I have met with a little loss and I cannot come to see you graduate. God only knows how I am disappointed at this". The next mail brought money but she sent it back saying "When you come, I will tell you all, dear Robert - I cannot come." There came no answer. She knew how deep was his disappointment - and hers? [Ah- the bitter, bitter Pain the slow hot pain.] She put away her crutche s and hobbled to her little chair before the door and waited. In a few hours he would come. She draped her skirts so as to hide the sick bones and glanced at her face in the little mirror - poor little thin, lined mask of deep brown. She sat back with a sigh and waited - waited.

41-1-98

week, in a few days and now at last in a few

Chapter XVI.

Hal.

A little boy sat on the fence swinging his legs. He was a symphony in brown- yellowish brown of face, with flying light brown hair, dirty dark brown trousers hitched up with dingy strings - a ragged neutral tinted shirt and ~~many~~ red brown feet and legs. All the coloring he was engaged in heightening with bright orange persimmon juice — devouring the luscious little golden ~~galdenabungsofrbrighy and nhipersimmonsjuicebetdevouring the luscious little g~~ bulbs greedily and whistling lustily between.

"Get out of there you little scamp" yelled an angry voice "I'll break your neck if I catch you in those persimmons again". The boy measured the distance of the oncoming owner warily, grabbed another good handful of the fruit and dove with incredible swiftness into the underbrush, wriggling, screwing, slipping, flying across the fields until with a whoop and a swing of his old felt hat he landed in the limbs of a great black oak at th edge of the cotton field. Finding that the pursuit was not pressed, he finished the persimmons, licked his hands and looked about for further adventure. Beneath this long accummulated layers of dirt his face was almost beautiful but it was spoiled by a precocious sharpness slynss and and restlessness. It seeme d as if the little body was tingling with pent up energy and the restless mind quivering and sparkling every minute - and overall hung a furtive watching for blows and yells, a preparedness for missiles and oaths and a mocking, mischievous sense of ability to triumph over and laugh at a hostile world. No sooner had he finished his persimmons and spied the land out with his great shining black eyes,than he shook out his tangled hair and doveagain to the ground and in a moment he was moving stealthily among the big green striped watermelons that lay in the field beyond the cotton. He tapped the melons carefully,cocking his head aside and had just chosen a big ripe melon when he heard a furious barking and saw a big brown dog dashing across the fields. It was a long pull to the nearest tree and he measured the distance carefully. Then with the melon under one arm and a big stone in either hand he fairly flew across the field. It was a race that made the angry planter stare in astonished amusement. The dog skimmed silently with head down and in great skipping curves. The boy ran like a deer clasp ng the melon. Once when the dog was almost on him he turned and sent a stone straight at the brute's eyes and the dog leaped aside and started again,but before he had dodged the second stone the boy,melon and all had wriggled like a ~~snake~~ snake up the tree and squatted on a branch. The dog rushed boldly up and the boy bent over and waited. Just as the dog was directly under him he suddenly threw the big melon straight at his head. It hit him squarely in the eyes and the astonished animal turned with a wild yelp of surprise and pain turned and flew acros the field like a streak. The boy watched and rested a bit. Then climbing cautiously down he gathered up the fragments of watermelon ate the juicy meat carefully and threw the rinds at the ~~birds~~ birds that hovered near.

66-1-14

It was quite dark when he sauntered into a little dirty cabin. No one was there and hunting about for a piece of musty corn-brea d,he curled himself in the corner and fell fast asleep. It was ten oclock at night before anyone came. Then the door opened and a little ragged girl came it. Her face was sweet and innocent and of etherial beauty- the same wonderful symphony of brown as in the boy's but softened and with the sharpness and restlessness absent. She was tired but first she looked about for her brother. "Buddy,buddy?"she cried,then listened and heard his breathing aed lying down besied him,she slept. Some time later in the night a man came in and slept hevily in another corner and a woman followed toward midnight. At day-break the woman rose hastily and hurried away. She was a brown woman with straight black hair and tired eyes. The man stretched himself and called "Hilda - Hilda- breakfast". He was a slender weak looking man,white to look at but colored in the eyes of Carolina. Hilda hurried about - cooked a bit of bacon and made corn bread and black coffee. He stood and ate it ravenously and ran out putting on his coat and Hilha leaving the dishes on the dirty table took a needle and tried to putll together the widest rents in her little brother's trousers as he lay in them; but he slept on. It was a curoius sight - the dingy dirty room,the sleeping boy,the brown girl bending over him in her rags and softly curling hair Silena Smith looking in at the door caught her breath and stood there till the girl turned her head and started up in mute apology,yet with something of reserve and haughtiness in her air despite her squalid surroundings.

41-1-100

41-1-101

201-1-14

Silena apologized. "I'm a schoo>teacher"she said "and I'm looking for pupils."

Something eager lighted in the girl's eyes and the boy awaking suddenly sat up and stared.

"Have you ever been to school"asked Silena-

"No,Missus ."

"Would you like to go?"

"O yes,missus."

"I wouldn't"sang the boy "I'd ruther drive mules"and he dove toward the table.

Silena sat down on the door step and pulled the girl gently to herp

"How old are you?"

"I was born the second crop after the storm,mammy says."

"That makes you about ten,I guess - and where's mammy?"

"She's nursing for the white folks up at Captain Snyder's and I helps in the kitchen and pappy is coachman."

"And who ta kes care of little brother?"

"I takes care of myself"volunteered the boy as he gathered up the last of the breakfast crumbs.

So finally Miss Silena went up to Captain Snyder's.

"What pretty children"she said looking over the fence at the six children and their brown nurse with the tired eyes. The mother who was lolling near in the hammock with a novel looked up and greeted her.

41-1-102

"They're great troubles"she said languidly.

"But you've a good nurse."

"O yes I don't know what we should do without Jane."

Silena stepped nearer and lowered her voice. "I've just been to the cabin looking at Jane's own children"

"Oh!"said the woman looking at her narrowly.

"They look sadly neglected."

"Negroes have few natural affections- I believe Jane thinks ~~once~~ more of our children than of her own."

"Perhaps"suggested Silena "she hasn't time for her own - at any rate I came to ask if I could take them into my school."

The woman rose hastily and haughtily:

"Are you the Yankee school teacher?"

"Yes".

She looked at her and turning walked into the house and closed the door. But Silena went to Jane.

"Jane"she said "I want to talk to you about your children - when are you at leisure?"

"Never,Missus,or almost never!she answered dully -then she said "I'll have next Sunday afternoon from 4 to 6."

"I'll come then"said Silena. She came and talked to the mother,and it was agreed that Hilda and Hal should go to Miss Silena's school. The mother wouldn't give them away.-

41-1-103

"I wants 'em - I aint got no time to care for 'em right I knows but I'll pay what I can and save up; p'raps, if their pappy'll only stop drinking, and maybe we'll have a home and a piece of land sometime."

To Hilda the new life was a veritable opening of the heavens. She was in her every instinct a lady born to caste and rags "- some ancestor whether Zulu chieftain or Virginian aristocrat had bequeathed to her a poise and delicacy, a pride and beauty which made her rise to her new life with a naturalness and lack of affectation that seemed wonderful when Miss Silena remembered that morning in the dirty cabin. Then too she blossomed like a rose - in a certain tropical magnificence mingled with a great innocence and simplicity of soul and a yearning for life and the beautiful things of life. She grew ashamed of her squalid past -yet it was a good solid shame - a shame that was an incentive and not a temptation - a source of loving and striving and doing and not of hating and repining and waiting. By such shames the world rises and rises upward from cloud to cloud. She was religious by nature but had a certain fine paganism, a Greek love of form and fitness, an African sense of song and color, an Italian longing for pure beauty. Having known poverty and squalor and dirt and hunger in childhood she leapt from the old dark chrysalis gay-winged and gorgeous in spirit, sensing a new world, looking for daily miracles and knowing few metes and bounds. The things she had suffered she thought

41-1-104

due
~~dire~~ wholly to her position and not to anything in herself - she had been a servant and therefore took the slights that rained on servants but now she was to be a lady - why not? Was not the face that looked out up on her from her little mirror bewilderingly beautiful and framed in pride and sensitivenes So she set out toward the great sky - all she touched grew beautiful - the plain print frocks took to frills and touches of color, the hats flashed with bits of gay ribbon and the flowers of the field came willingly to garnish her toilets. Yet with all this there was nothing sordid and selfish. The beauty of her new world was a beauty for all - not just for herself; her joyousness and song ligthened ever one it touched and Miss Silena loved the girl as a strange new flower of the deep forest - strange Bedause so utterly different from herself.

41-1-105

The new world soon had its touches of tragedy and sorrow. The weary mother came now and then with dull eyes and faltering words and then Hilda's eyes would fill with sudden tears - why, she hardly knew and she would stroke the mother's hand and kiss her timidly, for Hilda had known but little kissing in her baby-hood. Then from out the blue cloud-kissed roof of her new world dipped the great shadow of her race . It startled and bewildered her on street, in newspapers and in talk and thought. Why should there be the these curious maddening distinctions when there was neither ignorance nor dirt nor slavery to base them on? And sitting one day in a cabin, looking on the ~~sahes~~ ashes of the burnt school over the way she suddenly said to Miss Silena:

"Isn't God queer?"

"Why - I - that is - " none of these thoughts seem d to fit,so Miss Silena compromised:

"Why Hilda!" Just then Hal the little brother came along the street. He was cleaner and tamer than before but not tamed. On the whole he despised the school life and longed for the freedom of fields and waters and trees. Some th things,to be sure,were fairly interesting - singing,errands,sweeping the big halls in clouds of dust,and driving old Jim the mule;,the fire too had been glorious and he had romped and yelled and worked and enjoyed himself hugely. But books and lessons and long hours of squirming and giggling and frowning which were called "study-hours" these things he hated with perfect hatred and the shaggy restless mook grew beneath his tangled hair and lay plainly in sight this morning. He wheeled round the corner in his usual half-run,half skip,and met a white boy somewhat larger than himself,stiffly dressed and feeling important. The boys' eyes met each other "Get out of my way" demanded the white one;"I won't"retorted the yellow one and then before Miss Silena could realize it the boys were rolling in the dirt,fighting and clamoring like animals. A fight between two small boys in most lands is a thing for laughing,chiding and waining ~~kk xxxx xxxxx~~;it is the same in the south if the boys are both white or both black but when one is of one color and the other of another,and when the darker boy bids fair to give the lighter one a good drubbing, then there is food for mobs and riots. A crowd of white men and boys gathered suddenly and seized Hal Quarles ~~and~~ while another crowd of colored people edged near. A policeman hurried up,the crowd began to jostle and curse and Hal saw his danger. His eyes danced with mingled anger and merriment and diving suddenly he upset his captor, slipped between the legs of the policeman, wriggled twisted and dodged an was soon running like a deer with a long string of hallooing cursing men after him. Hilda stood rooted with fear and terror and then in an agony of tears she ran to the tall young man entering the gate and put up her hands piteously: "Robert, Robert" she wailed "save my little brother."

41-1-106

41-1-107

Chapter XVII.

Hilda.

And Robert?

When he had come up to Columbia this time it was like some strong swimmer rising to breath on the curving sea, like the intaking of a great sweet new breath of a morning, like a new baptism of faith and love for the good old world. He was but 22 and yet he was an old young man, for his life had swept the vast limits of human feeling - joy and sorrow, hope and despair- life and death, birth and burial, joy hope and dreaming - sorrow, anger and despair. The blood bounded too bounteously in his veins to let him ever sicken of the joy of living and yet just now he needed inspiration and breadth and vision - new dimensions to his narrow and narrowing world, new sources of joy, new and greater ideals. Born to the common lot of men, he could have lived a little life and made much of it, but crowded to a life narrower than his soul he needed new and large dimensions - a breadth of vision and upward lifting of ideal which should compensate in greater ways the loss and theft of of the common goodness of living.

And so he came to college not as his paler brothers northward, in budding half green manhood, serious in little and realizing but a bit of the riches round them before they pass quickly beyond the college green. Robert came on the contrary thirsty to know, serious beyond his years, eager, with all the half used eagerness of youth to explore and sound and measure the meaning of life. He brought with him too his measuring rod - his grim hard experience at making a living and meeting men and doing things. He grasped his new books curiously, read and re-read them. Pored over them with a thoughtfulness that delighted the older teachers and worried the young er ones. His was a quick bright mind that leapt and flew where others walked, that saw at times with fearful clearness straight across the world and at other times was dull from very over-richness.

Yet in all and about all his new world of wonder, his passion for knowing and understanding dwelt a faint strange halo of something new. The shadow of some far-off dream of wonderful happiness. He remembered that face of commencement morning and always when he remembered, the day how dark so ever, glowed, the drizzling rain sang, the blazing noonday whispered and rang. He did not love the face - it seemed to his queer soul a thing to be felt not seen, a revelation to be waited for and not to be sought garishly, and so when he came in the great dining room with its cheerful wonderful hum of voices, its mischievous eyes and nodding faces, he did not look butd drank the scence cautiously in half embarrassed wonder - a little startled at the white faces of teacher sitting here and there among the darker students,a little troubled at his table manners and yet always conscious that he was waiting for a vision that had not yet come. A bell tinkled faintly and a quick silence came. A neighbor nudged him to stop eating and he put down his knife and fork and raised his haed and then - he heard faintly and from afar the voice of the white haired little woman reading of the blessed feet of Him that bringeth good tidings that publisheth peace - he joined in the prayer that asked and gave forgiveness but all this was faint and from afar,for in front of him and at the table beyond sat Hilda Quarles.

In the days that followed he saw little of her and if she had noticed him at all,she gave no sign of it. Yet this seemed not unnatural to him. If perchance he met her he was in a panic lest some accident should throw him in her company and in greater panic lest it should not. Other boys spoke to her and greeted her carelessly and familiarly and she threw them back quick greetings or a little laughsand passed on quickly. But Robert scarce dare look at her and never spoke. Once indeed at a social when he was talking in eager quick tones to a crowd of boys, a bevy of girls came by and, melting apart a senior introduced some to the others saying carelessly - "O Calhoun have you met Miss Quarles - let me present you Mr.Robert Calhoun,Miss Hilda Quarles - called 'little Hilda' usually I belive". Robert stood doumb and Hilda glancing at him whispered "What an awkward fellow"and passing on forgot him.

41-1-109

Yet it was not easy permanently to forget Robert Calhoun - his height and bearing, his splendid scholarship and his knack for leadership made him soon well-known in school and once Hilda, puzzled with her algebra - (she had watched the moon instead of studying last night) came skipping through the normal room and seeing him there asked him:

"O please-how is this? no, not that here. A + B - " And he bent gravely over the little brown golden head and tried to hold the insane beating of his heart and blundered over the simple thing like a junior prep - so that she said "O never mind - thank you"; and rushed out and told the girls "that Calhoun boy may be good in Greek, but Algebra is beyond him - Mary what did you get?

When the annual picnic came and all the school went out by the paths and woods over rolling hills and beside the surging river, Robert walked with Miss Silena and helped her carry her bundles and talked long and rapidly of the world and its ways. And then he wandered apart and down to the river and there he saw Ellis Jones handing Hilda into a little boat. Ellis was slim, dapper and womanly handsome with his creamy face and straight black hair, and he held Hilda's hand as though that wonderful little thing of blue and red and gold was just ordinary human flesh and she skipped lightly into the boat and laughed till she saw Robert and then - why she did not know - his look startled her, it was so grave, surprised, sorrowful. She did not often look at him or think of him consciously and yet when she did there was always something like approval and fellowshap in his great dark eyes and now - not that she cared, she shook out her curls and tossed her head half angrily to think she had even noticed - and yet what had she done wrong,why could he disapprove - and then she put the incident out of her mind and stroked the curling waters with her hand and thought of Robert's look. On Robert settled grim blackness and despair - he thought his world had reeled and tumbled,and his idol broken and ruined. To think that she-She,to whom he dared scarce speak- should let another chatter to her and hold her hand and of all fellows that addle-pated Jones,who has already been four years making the prep. course and bade fair to be four more if he got his deserts. Unreasonable anger and hatred rose in his heart and he strode off through the woods,beating cruelly the shy little violets sneering at the great white clouds of dogwood,until pushing impetuously through a clump of dark bushes he almost stepped on a sleeping boy - a neatly dressed dirty-faced brown boy of 12 with a bundle rolled up under his head,a carefully whittled staff by his side and his rumpled light brown hair curling about his face. Robert looked at him - who was he? He had seen that face somewhere. It must be - it was one of the boys in the grades at Miss Silena's school. What was he doing here - running away? Just then the boy awoke stretched himself a nd then sat up with a ~~stra~~ start,suspicion lurking in his sharp eyes.

41-1-110

"What are you after"he sad doubtfully,gathering up his bundle and staff and edging across the other side of a big log.

"I'm running away,too."said Robert.

The boy looked incredulous "What for?"

"I want to see the world."

41-1-111

"And Chase rabbits and sleep out doors and steal watermelons"said the boy eagerly.

"And dig for gold,and own a palace and ride on the wind."

The boy looked suspicious. "How can you dig gold" he asked.Robert took a bit of paper and drew some marks on it. "Fairies hide their gold deep in rocks like this and men hunt around and find it and take it out and it makes them rich.

"Who tells them where to look?"

"O you have to study books."

The boy tossed his head as if that were too hard then he said "What's a palace?"

"A great beautiful building of marble and gold and - "

"I like this better"said the boy glancing up at the trees" it feels wider than a house - and how can you ride on the wind?"

"Did you ever ride on the cars?"

"Yes"said the boy contemptuously but we didn't run into anything and I got tired - I wanted to just smash up something."

Robert smiled "But wouldn't you like to take a long walk in the dark to see a good witch and - and - some fairies and learn how to be free and learn lots of things".

"Would I have to study books?"

"No - not much."

"We'd talk together and go hunting."

41-1-112

"For bears - every day? Have you got a gun?-"

"I (mysteriously) have got a pistol and he extracted an old broken horse pistol from his bundle .

"Not every day - but some days and you shall use my shot gun."

"Come on" said the boy eagerly.

The long lean shadows of night were creeping across the land as they started. Robert t old long tales of hunting and adventure trying always to bring the boy's mind back to a realization of the toil that guards human happiness. The night deepened and the ~~little~~ young limbs already began to falter.

"There's houses" said the boy suspiciously.

"Yes, it's a town" said Robert.

"I thought you lived in the woods."

"No but the woods are near - only an hours' walk"

"I'm sleepy" said the boy at last.

"Let's lie down here" said Robert as they came to an open lot and in a few minutes the little fellow was in deep dreamless slumber and taking him up in his arms Robert carried him carefully through the streets of Columbia, up to the school house and into his room.

The next morning he sent word to Miss Silena and before he h ad hardly finished cleaning up a knock came and Miss Silena and Hilda stood at the door. He stared -

"It's Hilda's brother you know" said Miss Silena and Robert stammered his surprise. Miss Silena went and wakened the boy and he sat up bewildered but Hilda turned to Robert and put out her hand and tried to thank him but two little tears came and drownded the words and a great throb of sympathy surged in Robert's heart. So they touched hands, timidly reverently ~~then~~ Then in the sweet new morning beside the bewildered little brother and so parted.

41-1-113

Robert kept his word with Hal. Every Saturday they went shooting and wandering in woodland and they were allowed to room together so that Robert could show the boy how to study. The new life did not suit Hal altogether and he could not quite forgive Robert for brining him back home and yet he grew to like him far better than he loked most human beings, and to try a little now and then to endure school life. So it was that when the street fight occurred and Robert came it seemed so natural for Hilda to stretch her arms as to some elder brother and cry "Save him."

Robert never doubted but that Hal would elude the crowd - he was fleet as a hare and knew every nook of the city and country. but where would he go and where could Robert find him? That was a problem. All day he searched and all night. There was no record of him at the police station and Robert was in despair as he started out the second morning when to his absolute amazement there sat Hal on the fence not two hundred yards from the school swinging his legs and peering narrowly down the street. Robert stopped and leaned against the fence in the sheer weakness of his supprise.

"Hal" he gasped "what in heaven's name are you doing here?"

H11-1-14

"Waiting " said the boy grimly "I'm going to finish lickin'that kid he comes by here every morning." . Without another word Robert seized the struggling protesting boy and slipping round the back way carried him to Miss Silena's cottage. A little council was held and to Hal's great delight it was decided to send him to Beaufort where he was to go to work with a friend of Robert's,who kept a livery stable.

41-1-115

Chapter XVIII.

The Mystery of Love.

So the world went,and so through the bond of the wayward brother, there rose a bond of fellowship between Robert and Hilda and through this their lives began to meet and twine. She seemed to him more and more like some new little sister,whom he must protect and teach and listen to;and to her he stood where father and mother and brother had not stood,where Miss Silena could not - some one of her own blood and thought,in whose grave guardianship she trusted her thoughts and questionings and puzzles of life. But there behind this soul-brotherHood lingered the deity that he worshipped from the first day he had seen her misty eyes,unknown,unnamed but loved and felt. And to her sometimes in the midst of their talking and reading,when she glanced into his eyes,came to her soul a strange new wonderment like the hearkening to wierd low music from afar. And then her golden cheeks would glow dull red and her blood would pulse and quiver and she would marvel at herself and lay long into the night trembling and questioning.

Then came the change and changes come to all - sometimes slowly in painful steps of years, sometimes swiftly in some great piteous day, when childood and its far flying train of castled splendor goes and life becomes a low hard-riven thing with skies still flaming but reddened with blood. The change came to Hilda the summer she went back to Beaufort to visit her parents. Ah! the dirt and squalor of that cabin - it had been four years ago that she had left it a girl of 14 and she looked about her with a little gasp. Was it the same- could this have been home - this sordid mass of ill-smelling discomfort? A sense of utter misery overwhelmed her. Why? why? why? she wailed must this be in so beautiful a world? And then rolling up her sleeves and slipping off her outer skirt she began - weeping, dreaming, ever working upon the almost hopeless task until a gruff voice called in at the door.

"Is Hal Quarles here?"

She looked up at the blue coated officer in surprise.

"No, sir" then her heart jumped "what do you want him for?" but the officer stood staring frankly and boldly at her rumpled beauty and she reddened and raised her head haughtily and saying "search if you want to" she walked out into the yard and waited. She was walking up and down still chafing with anger when the officer appeared pulling her manacled brother after him and grinning triumphantly. Hilda sprang forward with a cry "Hal - hal: why did you come - what have you done" The look of fierce hatred and shame on the boy's face softened a minute."

"Stealing" answred the officer.

"You lie" cried Hal and the man struck him across the forehead with his club. The girl screamed and clutched his arm "O don't - for God's sake don't" she pleaded wildly and the officer half ashamed let her wipe away the blood and bind her handkerchief on the wound. The boy was hysterical with anger: "I took few persimmons from the —— old tree where I always used to —— take them, and then I came home eating them - I did it an broad daylight and then I came home and went to the attic to sleep - I sleep there always, Sis, now - I meant to wake and go meet your train but I overslept until this —— " She put her hand over his mouth "There,there,Hal go along quietly. I will come right down" and she hurried in to dress."

41-1-116

A moment on the threshold of the dirty court room she wavere d - a hundred eyes were on her,a dozen loafers discussed half audily her hair her face her limbs. The blood rose dizzily to her head but she walked in and sat down and slipped her arm about her brother's shoulders. The judge was a coarse heavy faced man smeared with tobacco juice,and the air was heavy with smoke and odors of liquor. She did not dare turn round but sat staring blindly at the desk and the lawyers until she realized that one big red faced man was staring persistenly at her. She turned and looked out the dirty window and hot blinding tears welled in her eyes. She scarcely heard what was said until her brother rose and hs sturdy defiant voice rang out. The answer stunned her - 30 days? 30 days? her little brother to live a month among the deparved and wretched,paraded on the street like a dog - chained and bound and manacled like a slave. O God - a ~~robbery~~ sobbing shook her and stifled her;she tried to speak - to plead but what she said she knew not - Some one came up and said pleasantly "Come to my office and we'll try to get him out "- she thanked him hysterically and took his card and then it seemed so natural to look up and find Robert's kind grave face,to put her little hands in his and let him lead her silently away.

It was just twilight when she bade little Hal good-bye. He choked a bit but kept his old defiant look.

"O I'll get on all right,Sis -I'll - O yes,I'll try and be good - You ought to have some one to protect you,sis !- I saw them fellows staring at you, damn them - dam but you just tie to Rob- he's the best fellow I know and he loves you" and then he was gone. She stood bent forward her hands upon her breast, her head turned away from Robert. The message had rung her soul like summer thunders, new yet old,so old so natural. She turned slowly and looked at him in sudden wonder - wide-eyed as though her soul new born unclothed itself to him alone and then she lifted her little arms and clasped them ~~lovingly~~ about his great shoulders. He looked into her eyes - her great ~~death~~ dark ~~terror~~ tear-stained eyes and therewitin saw black and endless depths - upon those depths slept other detphs as deep and dark again - deep calling unto deep. Beneath the deep flowed flame and in the flame burned Love. Bending hown he clasped her with a great sigh - her bosom fluetered warm and wild on his and in the world was ~~Peace~~ Peace

C11-1-14

Wither walk the feet of them that newly love? In green and flowered ways, in paths all sweet and golden with sunny shadows and shadowy shine. Up far up the great and glowing mountains to the gates of Revelation - happy the man to whom those gates lie open and the woman who finds them wide unbarred - she is of maidens thrice time blessed,the film fledged fairy of God's one wonder world To Robert and Hilda,these dark children of a darkened world,veil-swept before the burning glory of the sun,came insomuch the larger fuller and more splendid Love - new from untainted untouched hearts,great fm all-believing souls, wide with the width of all the world,they knew. Within the gates of Revelation they walked reverently with bowed heads,and half veiled eyes;with midnight prayer,orisons and madrigals,little silent tremblings tinid touchings of hands and great flashhes of utter whelming happiness such as men may not taste often on earth lest earth be heaven.

41-1-118

They did not talk of Love - they lived it and talked of Life - of the wonderful world of tree and sky and cloud and creeping thing and how God made them,of men and the thoughts of men,of the glory of doing and the ~~dirty~~ duty of deeds. Together they sat in humid twilights,with light clasped tinorous hands and wandering misty eyes and sang,sang the sorrow songs,the old sweet heart songs of their fathers and set what thoughts they could to the little words and winding music. Then he would rise as he rose tonight:

"There's the study bell,Hilda,I must go - "

"So soon,Robert"-

"Yes,Hilda,dear Hilda,"

"Good night,my Robert."

He hesitated,then bent forward toward her and she swayed to him,as two wild flowers curl together on a windy moor - his eyes found hers and all the world went singing,her lips found his and all the sky blushed crimson to the sun. Then he turned and parted lingeringly glancing back to where the maiden marvellous stood darkly silhouetted in silvery golden light,with outstretched arms;when he walked on again face forward there where the giant gateposts stood stalwart and stone,stood now white satined heralds and they cried to the thousand ears of Night - "The King - long live the King", while unseen silent hands brushed back the curtains of the night that hang before the stars. And Hilda above in the arched doorway standing so sweet and still in the s aying gentleness of her dawning womanhood watched him swaying onward and saw him last turn backward at the gate. She kissed her hands to him- kissed all ten tiny finger tips and stretched them toward him benediction-wise till he was gone. Then turning with a great Joy upon her heart,she mounted the broad stair case walking as on piling cloud or thick green meadows - up,up,bounding up,slipping through bright clear air;she laughed low and shook out the silkly curling of her hair till it haloed her dark beauty splendidly,she heard the tinkling music of little far off bells,the eager gates of paradise flew back and lo! her room,her room-mate and her little bed.

Chapter XIX.

The Criminal.

That same night two hundred miles away lay a long low row of filthy huts surrounded by a great stubborn fence. Two or three fat lazy looking white men with rifles,guarded the palisade and drank and laughed and talked. At last one arose looking at his watch. "Well I guess I'll take a last look at the niggers" he said and he strode to the huts. Kicking up the doors of the first he entered uncerimoniously. It was a dark ill-smelling place with one smoky lantern. A couple of dozen half-dressed women were strewn about the floor. Some were sleeping heavily on dirty straw with bits of bagging or mats over them,or lying in half naked abandon,the great dark limbs stretched out or their half naked breasts showing. Others were disrobing - some hastily concealing their nakedness as the guard entered and others stood in brutish impudent abandon and leered. "Well girls,all here"said the guard good naturedly and he walked carelessly among them,stepping over their limbs,slapping one woman's flesh familiarly and chatting and joking. "Where's Susie"he said at last peering around. A dark half dressed girl,comely and sullen stood up. He crossed over to her and took her by the arm and she crouched trembling as he whispered something to her. A half-dozen others laughed loudly. Passing he caught at the foot of another woman and she struck at him fiercely. He scowled."We'll train you yet,Sadie"he said and "Well get to bed and blowing out the light he left locking the door securely on the female section of the Beaufort city chain gang. The men's huts were even filthier and the black bodies lay packed together closely save in the last section where a crowd were massed together and cries and curses rang. Some were on their knees around a circle while others bent and crowded over them.

41-1-120

"Seven come 'leven"cried a voice."Ha!" - it was a peculiar half fierce explosion of breath that accompanied the wave of his hand and he dashed the die down.

"Gamblin' a gain,you black rascals"laughed the guard and he came and stood over them. "Come it's time to quit"."Just a minute,just a minute,captain,till I skin this nigger"cried one of the gamblers. The other one seized the dirty yellowy dice. It was Hal Quarles - with drawn face,and blood shot eyes and clothed in rags;the shackles clanked on his ankles as the threw the dice three times. - He was pale with excitement

"Six come seven - ha!"

"Seven come twelve - ha!"

"Two come eleven - ha! - hell - take it and be damned!"and he threw the last greasy coin to the other and the crowd yelled and jeered. "How much did he lose"asked the guard.

"Five dollars!"

"God!his lady is keeping him rich!"

"Yep- he gets a fiver every week or so."

"Huh- an Ned gits it nex'day."

The lights flickered and went out,the harsh voice of the guard yelled "Get to bed"and quiet settled on the quarters. Hal turned restlessly "Sam got any more of that whiskey"he whispered. A bottle was passed and he drained it silently,and greedily,and then lay there burning and tossing.

Some one touched him "Come on Hal."

"Where?"

"Over cross the way."

"Another game? will you loan me a quarter?"

The fellow chuckled and Hal followed eagerly. Out through a hole in the rotten cabin three of them wriggled,across a dark space to another building. One of them rapped and listened while Hal took another drink of the raw whiskey till his brain fäämed and whirled. Soon a bit of plank was pushed aside and and they crept in. It was pitch dark. "How can we see here"growled Hal fiercely. The other men laughed and crept away -he put out his hand and touched warm flesh and heard a woman's low ~~hideous~~ shrill laugh and the lad sank down in wild confusion and half shame.

Robert would have gone to Beaufort and met the boy on his release from the chain gang but Hal begged him not to - "I shall come to Columbia and see you and sis and then I'll go off to work."he wrote. But they waited in vain no Hal came and deep in the eyes that Hilda so often lifted to Robert crept shadowy pain.

"Where can he be,Robert?"

"Perhaps he's gone to work and wants to redeem himself and surprise us" answered Robert's lips but his heart said "Perhaps he has gone to the devil" And Hilda looking into his eyes read both answers and was silent.

Robert was looking,always looking for Hal and at last one Friday night after school he said "Hilda I am called away over Sunday - I'll "-

But she looked at him and said "Thank yourRobert"and he went. All day Saturday he searched Beaufort,but he did not go home because he had so little time. One hint he got from a bold besotted woman in the back allies. "Hal,the little gambler - o he's in Charleston"she said raising her bloated face,and Robert shuddered and turned toward Charleston. Ah!the alleys of Charleston - where in those vile sinks of vice that shame the city should one search for one lone man? All the hot sabbath day with the far off ringing of church bells in his ears he searched in the mire of hot low coarse packed houses,full of strange scents and sounds,with oaths and lewd talk in his ears,misery and crime in his eyes,and even when he looked and found him not,he started at some seeming familiar form at finding it strange felt his heart lighten and ~~he~~ said "Thank God."

41-1-121

This time he said again "Thank God"and was turning away when the man he was staring at suddenly stopped his cursing,turned uncertainly as if to slink away and then with an oath strode in front of him and said with a swagge

"Hello!Bob."

Robert sat down on the doorsill amid a gurrulous crowd of loud mouthed women and men,and stared at Hal. It was a year since he had last seen him -one little year:let's see,he was ~~eighteen~~ seventeen now - or was it ~~nineteen~~ eighteen? Yet her was a face scarred and stricken,seamed with vice and passion;he was thin and bent and his skin parched blotched and yellowish and a great red jagged scar ran from his eye down to his thwhat -was this Hal - was this little mischievous Hal? Could he take this back to Hilda? A s Hal looked at him and saw astonishment fade into pity and then into disgust and horor - the sneer on his face,flashed to fierce anger,dropped to shame:

41-1-122

"Go on Bob- you don't know me - tell her I'm - dead. God damn these white devils they -"his face twitched,a paroxism of coughing seized him and he sank to the pavement with the blood streaning from his nose and mouth. Robert leaped to action.

"Help- water"he cried "don't crowd round."

"What's the matter"growled a policeman.

"My friend is sick"said Robert.

"Your friend"said the policeman"well you've got a mighty slippery friend there,cully." Robert sadd nothing but hailing a passing hack got Hal into it and drove to the house of an old friend whom he knew. Here he bathed and attended to the boy and got him new clean clothes. The physician shook his head when he saw him: A wreck from dissipation,exposure and want"he said, "only the carefullest nursing will help him and I doubt if that helps much."

It was not till Wednesday that Robert came back to school and found Hilda pale with waiting.

"You found him?"she whispered fearfully.

"Yes and no - I have not found the little brother you left - but I have found Hal sick and broken and we two must nurse him back to health of body and of soul."

She laid her hand lightly on his head and he bowed beneath them "God bless you,Robert"she said,and then she went up to the little room and packed away her clothes and books and little trinkets and kissed her room mate and kissed the little bed and walked down the wide stair case and out into the storm swept world. The mother now bent and grey came up from Beaufort and took in washing and Hilda ironed and cooked and together in a little home not far from ~~the~~ school they tended and nursed the sick boy. He was a fearful patient- now raving and cursing with all the filth and obscenity of the chaingang and the brothel,now still and gasping white as death,now sunk in stupor. Great shadows sat beneath Hilda's eyes- her hands were hard with toil and she crept to Robert's breast of evening when he came, with a great hunger in her soul and a great fear.

4/-/23

"O Robert"she would gasp "I cannot stay in this land I cannot bear it - ~~so~~ see what they have done to my brother,my sweet little wayward boy- see how vile and wretched and riven they have left him - I cannot live here,Robert,I cannot live in the South the very air reeks with slavery and injustice and oppression.

Then Robert would sooth her and kiss her shining hair and say:"This is our land,dear,as well as theirs ours to redeem and save and not to desert"but tonight Hal started up suddenly from his stupor at the words and swore a ~~great~~ great oath:

"Save?save what?Damn the land and cursed be the people. O Christ, I hate a white face worse than I hate hell. The pale sneering sneaking devils, what have they ever done to us but steal our ~~money~~ work and ruin our women and damn our souls-"they sought to sooth him but he waved them off "O I was no saint- I know it - but I wasn't bad I wasn't bad - I just wanted air,movement,freedom. I was head-strong,wild careless but my heart was innocent and instead of of guidance they gave me chains,temptation,durdgery,whiskey,gambling and filthy women - forced them on me threw me among them and held me there till my soul and body were filthy thought and then when they smell the carrion they hold their beaks with their dirty hands like the swollen hypocrites that they are and shriek "crime and depravity" -I hate them - I hate them,Christ I hate - if I could drain their hearts "- and then in a great rushing flood his own dark blood choked his voice and he fell back gasping and lay as if dead.

Yet he did not die,but strengthened with the cooler weather;slowly and slowly gained until at last with the spring he stood a pale thin young fellow at the threshold of life with a dubious future beckoning him and an awful past behind him. And the mother seeing him at last standing alone sighed wearily closed her dull tired eyes and died when the jasmines bloomed,staring blankly at the cabin walls.

4/1-1-124

"Hilda - you'd better go back to school now"said Hal- but the girl looked at him with startled eyes - "No,no Hal, I'm going to keep a home for you,buddie, you need one - you never had one before."

Chapter XX.

The Murderer.

And so Hal started,staggered out into the world. The burning thirst for alcohol raged in his blood but he fought it grimly;the old wild wander-lust called him but he remembered Hilda and his home. Beneath the slights and curses and petty discriminations of a despised class he writhed in dumb fury- striving to hold hand and tongue and stay the impetuous fury of his blood;the life of the gambler tempted him at every corner when he heard the half-hissed "Ha" of the dice thrower,or saw the urchins flutter pennies,or the horses racing;and then in the still nights when he wandered wearily home from fruitless searching for work - he heard the voices of sirens and saw their beckoning hands,but he cried "Hilda,Hilda!"and ran home sweating in the darkness.

But it was hard - bitter hard. What could he find to do ? He went to work in a restaurant,but they served liquors and the smell was maddening ravenous so he left;he became porter in a store,but the headclerk cursed him his slowness and called him a "damned nigger". Nor ever knew how near he was to murder and death that day. He got a dray to drive, but he cursed at some white children who were stealing a ride and lashed them and a policeman arrested him,. His employer bailed him out after a few hours detention but he gave up the job. Then he found a place in a private family as butler. It was quiet and they seemed kind honest people. "God help me to stay - if I fail here-"but the woman looked at him narrowly and suddenly asked him"Were you ever in jail"and he answered rboldly -"Yes, three times" and she discharged him immediately. The frenzy of that night! he had hardly earned $10 in two months of his recovery: he knew that Hilda was washing and ironing and seeking to keep the home, and that Robert to shield and protect her was gathering and delivering the clothes - and he? he a man, wandering from pillar to post, a drag on creation, unable to earn a living for himself - a beggar living on the crusts of his sister. He hurried wildly down the street - Hark!

"Seven come eleven - Ha!"

He stopped. He had $5 - a week's wages in his pocket. He rushed into the dark alley and into the house. The gamblers leapt up but he growled at them and flourished his money. Long into the night they gambled. Whiskey! he kept crying as he threw his dice.

"Ha!" And the fiery hell burned through his body. It took but a few hours. At ten he had sixteen dollars and his brain was blazing and his laughter and curses filled the room and the alley; at 11 o'clock he had not a single cent and neither coat nor hat, and his brain was mad with liquor and poison Up the alley, up the stree up the broad cool avenue he lurched. A gentleman and lady were coming toward him and he staggered sullenly to the right. This however was the inner side of the broad side walk and the tall white man determined to make him take the curb. "Turn out there, nigger" he commanded holding the lady closely and reaching quickly to his right hip pocket. But Hal raised his blood shot eyes and with a fearful oath leapt straight at the man's throat. There was a pistol shot, the clash and crunch of steel against the bone and Henry Reynolds sank bleeding to the ground and his new made wife bent screaming over him.

41-1-125

From them flitted a dark shadow,through street and alley,leaping fences creeping through gates until Hal burst in upon Hilda - hatless,coatless, reeking with sweat fuming with liquor,his clothes all blood,his face black with powder. ~~She~~ She backed away from him,slowly,silently her eyes sick with dread until she stood flattened against the wall with outstrecthed arms like some golden crucifix.

"I've killed a white man"he said thickly"I knew I should some time - it had to be - I'm going to d hide at Beaufort,under the old cabin you know the hole - burn these clothes"he rand into the cabin and grabbed bread and meat slipped into other clothes washed his face and was gone.

When Robert hurried down in t he morning with a great basket of clothes full of the horror of the murder and the frantic search for the unknown murdered - he found her still there,sunk shrunken,still and pale against the wall,with tangled glowing hair and shadows beneath her eyes. She pointed to the pile of bloody clothes and then he knew. He started toward her with a cry but she waved him back -"No,no"she said"chokingly"Robert-dear Robert- you must not touch me - I - I am - unclean - her voice sank into a hoarse whisper - "I am - a murderer's sister - I - I must go to him and die with him. O God,Robert,my Robert - anything but this,anything but this - what's that?" There was the sound of hurrying men,clattering footsteps of horses, and the low roar of mingled shouting. Robert swung to the door and barred it and brought the shot gun from the kitchen - his present to little Hal in the long ago. The girl watched. She rose to her full height standing tall and lithe and shook down her hair. He looked at her and she smiled the old sweet smile. "At last"she said "at last,O death." Then they turned to the window "They'be got him" "They've got the nigger"yelled the boys on the street. Then came the crowd - the dirty grimy crowd - the policeman dragged a bound man,the hatless,coatless followers,the wild-eyed men,the pistols, rifles and oaths they swept on - but they did not stop They did not stop at the little home,they did not even look -on they went like a mad whirpool

"Burn him!Burn him"they yelled and the eyes of the prisoner turned for a moment toward Robert and Hilda;Hilda screamed and Robert dropped the gun and gasped. It was not Hal Quarles whom they saw.

Robert leaped from his post and gathered up the bundle of clothes. A bloody clasp knife dropped out. He made a hasty bundle of it all.-

"Hilda "he said"do you know where Hal is".

"Yes"she whispered "He's ——"

"Hush -"he said "he's not - here?!

"No."

"I must go then,must I not"he paused then with the bundle.

"No - O God forgive me - yes,yes , go go! tell them - all."

He ran swiftly through the streets and winding and turning came breathless to the police station. Only one officer was there.

41-1-127

"Is the prisoner Here?"

"What prisoner?"

"The Negro charged with Mr.Reynolds' murder."

The man smiled grimly "I reckon he's in hell by this time"he said.

"But they've got the wrong man"panted Robert. The officer looked at him

"At any rate he's a nigger"he said "and I reckon he'll do."

Robert rushed out with his bundle and hurried down the street .

"Which way did the mob go?"he asked of an old black man;the man pointed silently and Robert ran. He ran silently,swiftly,in great sweeping strides bending his head forward like a hound with widened panting nostrils. As he rose to a hill top he saw them in the full noon day glare,heard the hoarse ravenous grating of their shouting and shifting the bundle he ran till it seemed his heart would break - Before him he saw the column of smoke and flame and heard the yelling of men and then as his feet struck the bridge that spanned the Congaree,the crowd broke and staggered toward him;leaving the thin curling smoke and the ashes. He leaned sick and weary against the bridge and his heart hammered pitifully:

"Too late,too,late"he muttered. The crowd began to straggle b, him - the older men silent ith set faces,the younger flushed with liquor. Robert raised his bundle silently and balanced it on the rail. A half grown boy rushed by.- "This is his finger,nigger"he yelled truckulently and thrust a little scorched bone before Robert's sweaty boiling face. Robert made no answer but he pushed the little bundle. It fell with a splash into the water and went bobbing and whirling down the swift curren.

"An innocent man has died a shameful awful death"he whispered "and I have hidden the guilty of the guilty." And he turned wearily toward the sullen angry city.

41-1-128

Chapter XXI.

The Home Coming.

It was Commencement time. Yet to Robert there hung a veil in the air,between him and the sun. Mary had not come — -she had forgotten him and was thinging only of her school and money "too busy " to come and see her brother graduate. Hilda was there - with her silent gravely beautiful face and the unspoken sorrow that lay brushing out her life.

They stood that last night where the great dark hall did slow and vast obeisance to the moon, and all about was the soft sheen of velvet darkness. It was the last meeting and they spoke to each other nakedly, soul unclothed to soul. He took his face between his hands and whispered "O I have loved you so long - so unutterably long - since that first hour - for the endless ages of hours and days and the minutes of endless years. And she answered creeping to him"Before you came I did not live and when you go I shall die - not suddenly and frantically but slowly - slowly - o slowly in long weary ~~lead~~ leaden years," and I must - Robert this is breaking my heart - I cannot bear it- I cannot. And I have tried - God knows I have tried. But I must go to him. I do not believe he can be saved - I do not believe I can save him, but if any one can, I can. I am all he has. You Robert have - O I know, I know heart's darling, kiss me again and again - yet it is so - you have a world about you and I am an outcast's sister. I cannot breathe the air Here it burns me. I cannot live here in this choky slavery-haunted place. It's hard enough for you here Robert,but O you do not know what a girl must suffer

-the heart hurting blows, the slurs upon her womanhood, the petty dirty insults which every white thing - loafer or gentleman considers it his right and duty to heap on us - O I should die a living death here - Robert could you marry a wife here knowing that you were powerless to protect her even with your life? Robert do you know that that very Reynolds whom Hal killed has followed and persecuted and insulted me in every way possible and that I dare not tell you lest you stand where Hal stands or lie a heap of moldering ashes? O darling, darling, would we dare bring children into such a world, with such a destiny? Robert - my Huty is calling me, my fears and hate is calling - I must go north and loose myself from this hateful world - and ~~I~~ from you" And a wild weeping shook the stricken girl.

41-1-129

He answered slowly - thoughtfully.

"Suppose I should come too?"

She grasped him in agonized entreaty "Don't don't tempt me, Robert - have I not thought of that and dreamed it a d wrestled before God with it and - and - but think of your sister, think of the things a man coul do here -think of them , but if - if no, no Robert if your duty called you as it shrieks in my ears then come and let us be happy and free - but no! there is no such happisess for me. Your duty is calling here - you see it - I see it " - she turned to leave him, then suddenly fiercely clasped him to her -"I am yours forever - yours and yours alone till the Trump of God shall sing upon the sea yours - yours and you are mine" and turning she fled into the hall and the shadows burned and twinkled in the night.

The train was flying toward Beaufort and Robert was going home. "We shall start from Charleston next week - Hal has saved $200 from work in the phosphate mines and given it to me. He is crazy to go, and my faith in him has given him new determination. He has only been drunk once. And so, my man, my one true man, Good bye. Heaven love and keep you true and noble and good and God rest your soul.

Little Hilda.

P. .The train goes at eight -Atlantic Coast Line. My love to Mary."

He mused. "The train goes at eight" and then he supplied the unwritten words "Come to me Robert and god too." Why not, he argued. Mary was satisfied alone - he had not seen her in two years - nor she him and yet she was cheerful and busy - so "busy" he said impatiently. It was hard to work here, and hopeless. There was no peace - no beauty, no upper air. Every where was the mob or the making of the mob, harsh words, epithets, ugliness, ignoarnce. The world was tight, narrow - hemmed in. Above, below - he gasped for air as Hilda gasped. Hilda - could he give her up? She rose before his vision glorified - beautiful as some dark eastern dream, touched with deep yearning sadness, he saw the changing gleaming bronze gold of her curly hair, he felt the soft hair heaving of her breasts and saw the curve of her little limbs - he closed his eyes. Hilda Hilda, he murmured and out from her shadowy eyes stepped her soul - her silent striving soul, her panting wounded soul and her voice blew upon his watting ears as the voice of sighing singing waters -

"Beaufort - Beaufort - change cars!" He grabbed his valise and stepped into the street. Mary was not there. A fierce anger shot through him. Miss Sands simpered up - "Why Mr. Calhoun? So glad to see you. I-er- I've been wanting to see you a long thme and thought of writing but - well you know we ladies must be so careful" and she giggled aimlessly "How's Mary" she said" "Very well" he answered coldly " So glad I hated it so after her awful accident". Robert stared in amazement but Miss Sands did not notice "-about her losing the school." Robert dropped his umbrella and fumbled for it tremblingly and a great light crept through his darkened mind -"I suppose" ~~con~~ continued Miss Sands rapidly and confidently " "that she thinks it was my doings but it wasn't, honest, I hate it - it was all Pa's work and I could a cried when I found I had to teach all those nasty little dirty children -" Sie stopped breathlessly and picked her handkerchief "I wish I could come to see Mary - I know she can't walk "- but Robert muttered something and hurried away.

"Acident - lost the school - cannot walk" was he dreaming. He hurried almost ~~sank~~ ran down the street and out into the country side . The shadows hung over the black disk of the sea, and the groaning of the waters st uck wildly on the gathering twilight. Uncle Caesar's cabin gazed darkly out upon the road and swelling waters. Robert stopped and steadied himself, and then with hammering heart opened the gate and walked up the path. A little light shone within up on the dim form of Mary where she sat a waiting. He rushed forward with glad cry, but just as he reached the treshold, she rose twisted misshapen and limped and hobbled forward, with pale face and great dark burning eyes. He strode in and snatched her lightly tenderly in his a rms and groaned:

41-1-130

"Sister, O my sister."

Chapter XXII.

The Mom Bette School.

41-1-131

It was Thursday night.

They sat on the door step with clasped hands as they used to sit in childhood days.

"And that is all, Rob" she said smiling ["Ah the pain the sharp cruel pain] All! He looked at her in dumb wonder for a revelation had risen in his soul. He remembered that day four years ago when she had spoken commencement morning of sacrifice- Sacrifice - it had meant little to him then. But now he saw it embodied here beside him in this little weak sister - this wonderful girl who had borne pain and humiliation and neglect, had looked full in the face of Death - all for what? for him - for him wo had forgotten here, neglected her, blamed her. For h im, because she believed in him with the transfigured idealism of a woman's heart, because she saw him a leader and teacher of his people and through them, of the world. Why had he not seen the angel sitting in this child's soul? Why ha d he not seen her transfigured, glorified as she ever had seen him? He knew why - his vision had been too gross - selfish small. He had dreamed of his pleasure, has good, his success. And in sudden humiliation, renunciation and high resolve he bent over her hand, touched his knees in the dust and murmured "Ave! Maria!"

The sound of church bells striking the hour of eight came echoing from the town. He rose and raised his hat and going out looked toward the eastward stars. "Good-bye Hilda"he murmurred"my first love and my last." And then he came slowly back and seated himself on the step.

"What did you see,Robert?"

He smiled gravely into her eyes"The passing of a dream"he said and then added quickly"And now little sister,come let's plan for the World and its work. A sudden rush of happiness came over the girl [The Pain - the low udull grinding pain!] and she lifted her soft full voice and sang till his clear tenor caught the strain and far away that night came wondrous singing

"I know my mother will be there
In that beautiful world on high..
"Then palms of victory you shall wear."

41-1-132

Far down in the rice fields a weary mother clutched her dying child and lifted her eyes up to the stars. Far up in the mansions a grey haired man clasped his wife's hand and smiled,and all down the dark land where the melody echoed came peace and the shadow of Joy.

Mary's plan was simple. "Robert I have thirty two day pupils and I can have more. Uncle Caesar is old and feeble now but he has forty acres here and the title is clear. We might arrange to buy it of him,and in turn to build a little home and school where we could live and teach. We could have our garden and a little church perhaps - and " she looked at him half fearful of his judgment. A year ago he would have said "Nonsense,sisseer"and showed her a better way or another way. But now the awe of her sat fresh upon him and he said "Good! We'll do it,little sister - let's go talk to Uncle Caesar". Uncle Caesar would not hear of sale - he gave them land outright.

"Done bin savin' it 'twell you'd want it" he muttered "it b'longs to Mom Betts, children" Mary said "It shall be called the Mom Bett School"and she produced a little hoard and with this they purchased for a song 40 acres of rough bare land adjoining. Then Robert took off his coat and seized his tools and began to work. Soon a sturdy crop appeared on the land he tended it faithfully.

The children came from round about and a few Mary contrived to stow in the little home. The crops prospered and at the end of the first year Robert began building two cabins - low wide cabins of sweet palmetto logs. Mary watched him [the Pain the dull aching pain!] with bright eyes. "At first, Robert, I wondered why you built of logs and I half wanted to say boards then it would be bigger-roomier, but I see now - there are ours, homelike simple beautiful " One was the girls' home - there Mary lived with 12 country girls. In the other Robert lived with 10 boys and in the middle cottage was for Uncle Caesar. There Robert and Mary sat of evenings hand in hand to drink the inspiration of the sea, and behind was the long low school room.

One day a stranger walked by and stopped in surprise. And well he might for it was the ~~odor~~ month of the oleanders and jessamine and all the front of the three dark cabins was riotous with color and perfume, while behind lay black-green cotton and tossing corn, and to the side low billowy rice. A fence of crooked crinkled vines ran round the wold, two cows stood mincing gravely and above where a tiny gate stood gaping arched in crmison glory, dead sweet and languorous in the hot still morning, was a legend in white shell and it read "The Gates called Peace". A gleaming white path of spotless sea stone lay up to the cabin. The man hesitated, then entered. He as a ~~large~~ spare man clean shaven, with clerical dress and that aggressive all-judging face that seems so often to accompany it. He wandered in, and then where a little bower, blue garlanded guarded a simple bench, he seated himself and looked about. He had sat as hour musing, wondering when the voice of children came to him. He rose looked and knitted his brow in surprise - a colored woman twisted and limping was coming out the door and with a troop of little girls - dark vari-colored girls romping and laughing about her. They turned toward the little cabin to the right and ran and raced.

Then came from the other side came the voices of shouting boys and a tall young brown man walked after them. The watcher hesitated . He had waited to ask about the school - to know more of this strangely attractive place ; but somehow it was difficult to ask. He could have apologized politely and enquired had the persons been white as he had supposed they were of course when he entered the gate. If the place had been a dirty hovel of black folk he would have entered as some being from above and received homage and given advise and censure. But these folks - these surroundings?he rose half vexed at his hesitation,and then something occureed to him - Of course he arguedy,releived,there must be white northerners at the haed and these were under teachers or monitors; he did not like to even approach those officious Yankees but perhaps it was his duty - he stepped into the path raised his shoulders,looked about with his gold eye glass and coughed slightly. Robert turned and seeing him came to him

"Good morning,Sir,can I be of any service.!

"Ah,thank you,young man,I was looking for the - er - principal or head of this - er- establishment."

"I am he"said Robert.

"But who has charge - oversight."

"No one beside myself."

"Who owns the property."

"I do - that is I and my sister."

The rector stared "But I never heard of the -

"The Mom Bett School?"

"Oh - wh y - yes,but I thought that was -" he stopped. He was about to say that he thought it was a Negroe pnherprise and to his mind "Negro" meant - oh,it meant so many things - first of all Negro was synonymous with dirty and this place was clean;"Negro' meant badly manged or not managed at all,while this looked orderly "(tho of course ose could not tell");Negro meant silly, inconsequential childish imitative - everything low laughable and wrong,while this - he spoke slowly

"I thought it was a more unpretentious affair -"

"This is very simple - let me show youp"

They walked together over the little place. Peeped into the neat cottages,saw the school,saw the children at dinner. The rector kept alternately t hawing and freezing. He like the place but he could not rid himself of the uncomfortable feeling . He felt like tipping his hat to Mary and then reddened at the memory of the impulse.

Yet as he walked slowly toward the rectory his mind and heart were busy He began to see a faint light in one dark corner of his soul where there had long lain an unwelcome heaviness. He did not read the passage often but when he did he felt ashamed:"In asmuch as Ye did it unto the least of these my brethren,ye did it unto me." and had he imagined it?was there not at such times an uncomfortable flutter in the well-bred pews of St.Andrews?

ChapterXXIII

Mission Work.

It was Wednesday evening,the service had ended and there had been a very fair attendance. Mr.and Mrs.Harrison Coles were out - he a bent and feeble old man of seventy and she a fussy prim little lady of fifty-five,well-preserved and complacent. Her daughter was there too,Mrs.Lloyd Coles-Jones, a tall fair goddess visiting from New York where her artist husband was struggling;then there was the young widowed Mrs.Reynolds,the Misses Cox,the dowager Baxter,Judge Wade and one or two gentlemen. Yes and back,half hidden by the great shadowy pillar sat a tall and stately woman, her face rouged dead white,her thin white hair piled high and her dark eyes dreaming beyond the walls,beyond the sea. "Mrs.Irma Lloyd Jones - one of the Abbeville Lloyds married the late Colonel Jones -- you know the story" whispered Miss Adelle Cox,and her guest Miss Weir of Savannah bent eagerly forward but shrank to find the haughty eyes blazing toward her.

"And does Miss Weir apwrove of such attempts at educating Negroes?" Mrs. Jones was asking coldly. Miss Weir recovered herself hastily and groped for the thread of the doings. The chest tones of the immaculate rector came to her rescue.

He had called a little after-assembly:

"For the purpose - ah - of considering two missionary enterprises. One was the matter of sending aid to a promising mission in Angola,West Africa The mission had been very successful during the year. There had been twelve converts,a little church had been built and it sorely needed a bell. With some desultory comment $200 of mission money was devoted to bell and maintenance. Then it was that the rector had cleared his throat and said:"The other matter lies nearer" he had thought to say"to our hearts"but thought better and said 't -"to us. It concerns our own colored population"and then hearing a faint warning rattle,he hurried on talking rapidly"after all we owe these people aid and guidance. They are ours,their mistaken emancipation was not their fault but misfortune. If we do not take their training in hand how can we complain if they are mistrained and filled with absurd ambitions and thoughts. My friends the welfare of these dark brothers of ours - for they are our brothers - has long weighed heavily on my soul. Yesterday by accident or by divine guidance I visited the colored school kept by Robert and Mary Calhoun. I was favorably impressed by it and I want to help it. I happened to be speaking to my young friend Miss Weir of Savannah and she was telling me of a similar enterprise in her city -"

41-1-136

"And does Miss Weir approve of such attempts at educating Negroes"? asked the cold voice of Mrs.Jones.

The Rec tor scented danger and hastened to explain "Training- training. I should say,rather than education,My dear Mrs.Jones,and perhaps I should explain my reference to Miss Weir. We all know how poorly trained our servants are since the paternal system has been broken. In Savannah as I understand there is a school supported by the church which is supplying this need of training." Miss Weir nodded gently.

"And who will see that the money is properly expended and the teaching properly done"asked Judge Wade.

"Well,eventually we should of course have a board of trustees and I had hoped that some of our ladies might help in the teaching at times. The bulk of the routine work would be done by colored teachers."

"But wouldn't that involve the training of colored teachers?"

The speaker was a stranger - a rather dried up elderly man with a northern accent. The rector ignored him and after some demur induced the mission society to give $100 to the school on condition that as soon as practical the school be turned over to a board of trustees who should conduct it.

Robert looked at the rector with a puzzled smile as he explained next day.

"But our property here is worth at least $500" he said.

"Yes - I should say so"

"And it has cost us $500 a year to run it."

"$500!" said the rector "why - why where did you get it?"

"The boarding children pay a dollar a month - all except a few - and the day children pay 25¢ - that amounts to about $300 - the other $200 come from the crops."

"That is better than I expected" said the rector.

"And of course" continued Robert "I should hardly think it fair to transfer to others the title and control of my own proerty for the sake of small and- pardon me - not altogether certain support."

41-1-137

The rector was silent and half embarrassed but Robert continued

"Could we not arrange it this way? Suppose you and two members constitute a committee for the expenditure of such sums as the church contrives and that I expend them as your agent reporting carefully to you and being at all times under your inspection so far as the spending of the money is concerned?"

The rector readily assented, and thus it was that the Rev. St. George Tucker and Robert Calhoun began their friendship. And when two men find each other, and walk together in the golden day and talk amid the shadows of evening they come to know each other soul and soul despite all the piling barriers men place between. The church stipend gradually increased until it was $500 a year. Robert read the Episcopal service in the school and gradually by studying a few months in the year was raised to the diaconate and built a tiny log church at the edge of the oaks and near the song of the sea.

But there were those that watched all this jealously and did not understand and when the Bishop dined with Mrs. Irma Lloyd Jones the subject came up:

"You do not mean to say that a Tucker can so far forget himself as to receive a Negro as an equal" gasped the Bishop.

"He certainly is giving some ground for the suspicion" said the young Mrs. Reynolds.

The Bishop frowned." I will speak to him " said he - school?"

"I wish you would go see the school"said Mrs.Jones "my opinion is that much of their time is being given to book study and very little to the training of domestics."

"Suppose we go now"said the Bishop and in a half hour the horses were at the door.

There were seven in Mary's little latin class. Two were bright quick students - "John they ought to - they must go up to Columbia to college" she had said that morning. Two others were fair students earnest plodders. The other three were poor and one of them - O he was so stupid, and Mary was in despair over him;he ought not to study more,but it was hard to discourage him. So Mary sat that morning giving him more of the class time than he deserved, and trying O so hard to make him understand,when the door behind opened authoritatively and Mary knew by the widening eyes of the children that dignitaries were come. She rose with a limp [Oh,the dull grinding pain] and started to ask them to be seated when the Bishop ~~was~~ waved his hand "What class is this?"he demanded.

"They are the Seniors - they are having six months of beginners'Latin"

"Latin!"

"Yes,sir."

Mrs.Lloyd Jones smiled "Let us hear this fellow recite" she sai d. If John's recitation had been bad before, in his perturbation now,it was simply awful. His Latin flew and his English took after it. Mary quickly called one of the brightest students,a bright-eyed little black girl of 14 -but the great eyes of the ~~Bishop~~ Bishop were too much for her and she stammered, looked at Mary in tearful appeal and sat down. Mrs.Jones smiled again. "Is this what we're spending our money for,Robert,"she said sharply "to ~~teach~~ skoil plow boys and serving girls with Latin?"

"I do not think you can judge the school fairly yet"he said quietly"Let me call - "

41-1-138

"I want to see the industrial work "said the Bishop peremptorily. I found some girls sewing in the girls' cottage. "How much do you sew a day?" asked Irma.

"An hour Ma'am".

"And the rest of the day?" "One hour helping in the dining room and kitchen and six hours on our lessons."

The old lady glanced at the bishop - "Two against six"she said.

"It shall be six and two next year"he said decidedly and Robert heard.

He found the rector gloomy and taciturn that night when he called and the usual cup of tea was not served.

"I'm afraid that Latin class of yours has played the mischief,Calhoun. It had grown to be "Mr"Calhoun for a year or more back,but now it changed again.

41-1-139

"I am sorry."

"You had better give it up"

"Why?"

"The bishop is determined upon it."

"But you advised it and you have seen the need of the training."

"O I am not criticising the work - only others do not know it as we do

"Then let them study it and not judge it from a five minutes look."

The rector shrugged his shoulders,and said Goodbye coldly when Robert left.

Chapter XXIV.

The ~~E~~Bial.

It was the morning of Exhibition day,when the Mom Bett School was to close. Robert was nervous,for this year there was to be a very distinguished audience. The bishop was to be there,and the white dignitaries of the town where to sit in reserved seats in front. Behind would be ~~banked~~ grouped the darker patrons of the school. The graduating class of five sat on the platform of the vestry,but the rest of the school sat banked aloft in the back gallery,whence their clear young voices came rolling down in sweet massed ~~song upon the audience the slave songs,Mary pick out~~ song upon the audience.

"They will want to hear the slave songs, Mary pick out the best and wierdest.

"They?" answered Mary.

"I mean the white folks."

"Yes but our people want also a glimpse of something else, they yearn for music and they can hardly appreciate their own till they hear some of the world's harmony - I'll tell you what I want to do, Rob - at the end when all is through I want to sing Gounod's Sanctus Spiritus with a small chorus of girls - surely no one can complain of that and the children want to so."

"Well it all right "said Robert doubtfully "but don't forget plenty of our own slave songs."

So it happened that all came - the white aristocracy of St. Andrews in half curious patronage led by the Bishop and Mrs. Jones. The black village in proud wonder, decked gorgeously, and happy; and the children hard and fluttering with giggle and whisper and solemn stare. The graduates sat in one half frightened row below the reading stand and beside them to the left sat Robert in his new deacon's robes. Tears of great happiness were in Mary's eyes as she watched him from the thronged gallery opposite where she had marshalled her little host. On the platform sat the Bishop, the rector and the judge and they whispered together glancing at the black faces.

First there was a slave song "Bright sparkles". Then the rector prayed for "the least of these our brethren" and there came another slave song. Then a tall boy brown and slim arose and recited "The Slave that saved St. Michaels"; the black audience applauded lowly, the whites scatteringly. A girl then read an essay on Napoleon which smacked of the encyclopedia and made the whites smile and the blacks look mystified. After a simple part song in which all apllauded another girl read an essay on "The Faithful Slaves" which the whites applauded generously and the Nearoes half ~~heat~~ heartily. A boy talked on the "Value of Work" while the Bishop yawned and then came the valedictory. ~~She was the little black~~ She was the same little black girl of the latin class, small bright eyed and intelligent and her shrill clear tones roused and held the house. The blacks bent forward breathless clutching the seats. The children back aloft sat silent and wide-eyed, and the whites roused themselves, grew tense rustled in their seats and whispered. The rector looked uncomfortable, the judge seemed amused, but the bishop was angry. It was as essay on "Ambition" - a school girls' effort with many of the usual platitudes and echoes of greater thought, but singularly clear and straight forward. In a white girl's mouth it would have been applauded and expected, but what did this audience think to be told that black boys and girls must "aspire to the highest" that "all things come to those who wait" that "labor conquers all things" that they "should never be content to be mere servants and menials but should aspire to the great things of earth in this land of freedom and opportunity."

41-1-148

"Let us then be up and doing
"With a heart for any fate
"Still achieving, still pursuing
"Learn to labor and to wait."

The still clear little voice of the dark white frocked girl ceased amid a thunder of applause from the black world and absolute silence from the white. Robert arose with the little bundle of diplomas - but the Bishop strode forward. "I have wanted to say a word to you black people" he said in sharp forceful tones "and this seems just the place to say it. You have heard this girl's talk and you have foolishly applauded it. Let me tell you plainly that such talk is silly, wrong and wicked. Yes I repeat it Wicked. God made you people to occupy a fixed humble place in his universe. To strive to escape from your appointed destiny is impudent blasphemy against his holy unalterable laws. I do not wholly blame you for these foolish thoughts - your false northern friends put them into your heads when they thought by law to make you white. But it was impossible - you will always be what you are and you must reconcile yourselves to it. Your ambition ought to be to become faitful servants such as one of these girls spoke of, and humble laborers. To this end we are going next year to change this school into a more thorough industiral school. We are going to teach your children to work and not fill their heads with false notions and I want you older people who know that what I say is true,to support our efforts for your weal loyally." He paused. Robert had been ~~sitting~~ standing down on the platform before him half turned toward him,listening with bowed head and trembling hands. What would He do - what could he do? The horrible temptation of cowardice was upon him - he felt a thousand eyes upon him - the wondering eyes of his patrons,the tearful eyes of his little children,the accusing eyes of the white world. If he could sink into the floor - if he could fly into the outer air - if he could - but he could not. He must and would speak - he knew it,he felt it. He could scarce realize how he Hared and yet he knew he did dare - he knew that before these rulers of the village,before these parents and children he was going to speak the faith that was in him if it killed him; that he was going to answer the bishop. He wondered at his own voice when he heard it - it was so round and full and clear, so steady,when his whole soul was trembling and the audience was quivering with him:

1-1-14

"Reverend father in God"he said " for the thoughts this child of mine has spoken,for the ambition knitting in these dark hearts do not blame these people - blame me. I have taught I have sought to inspire them,I have ~~xxxxx~~ tried to stir them from the sluggisd depths of their lives up to the fullness of their opportunities. I have done so,and forgive me, Sir,but I shall continue to do so. So long as there is breath in this body I shall speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. I shall tell my people you are God's children - whatever destiny is open to the child of God is open to you. Withersoever men may aspire,you may aspire, for you are men. Be ambitious,try to rise,try to be just as useful, wise and great and your God given powers will let you. This I have taught my people and my children,reverend father,and this by God's grace,I will continue to teach them as long as he gives me life and strength."

He turned and stripping off his robe laid it silently at the prelate's feet and then clasping his hands priest-wise before him he walked with bowed head silently toward the door. A hush fell on the people like the trembling of a mighty hand;the rector half rose- the bishop stepped back from the mute dead robe as from a stricken thing and the blood roared in his head,while the little valedictorian bowed her head and wept.

2-1-1-14

And suddenly above the throng rose one clear voice and voices: "Sanctus spiritus" it cried,and again higher,cleared "Sanctus spiritus". The slowly moving figure of the unfrocked deacon raised his head and his eyes met the wild tear swept eyes of the singer as the third wail higher, sweet rolled aloft

"Sanctus spiritus."

And then in a great wave of music swelled and the thrilling majesty of Gounod's great prayer-song, swinging in the air as the black man walked out into the free sunshine and into Peace.

41-1-143

The people listened motionless - sighed and then the rector glancing to where the bishop sat stern and motionless,receiving his nod hesitated forward and said with low voice and raised hands:

"The peace of God,which passeth all understanding keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." And the moving host murmured slowly "Amen."

The judge was furious:"The damned impudent nigger"he hissed "he ought to be horse whipped and I've a notion to do it." Mrs Baxter too was inexpressibly shocked "To insult the bishop too - he's a dangerous pestilential fellow and must be gotten rid of - indeed, my dear Mrs.Jones,it's just such men that ruin the docility of our Negroes"but Mrs.Jones did not answer,and in her face sat a perplexed half-angry wonder - a creeping gnawing doubt.

The bishop greeted no one. He looked dreamily out the gilded colored glass until slowly the people had gone and only the quivering dust motes danced in the vestry room. The rector watched him silently with twitching face and far back in the church the black janitor watched them both. Slowly the bishop turned and saw the rector. He smiled;he said:

"I have had a vision."

The rector started to answer vaguely,but the bishop went to where the deacon's robe lay folded and picked it up and handed it to the rector And then he placed his hands on the rector's shoulders and said:

"St.George,I have seen a man!"

And the rector bowed his head and was silent.

Chapter XXV.

The Priest.

"I am going north to beg money"said Robert "It's the only way and you must run the school,little sister"and with this he went to the meeting of the advisory board. The bishop and rector were there,the judge,a rather dried up elderly man with a northern accent and the principal of the white academy. Robert bowed silently and stood until the rector brought him a chair. The dried up elderly man spoke:

"As I have said,Bishop,I am willing to devote $10,000 a year to this work during my life and to endow it liberally when I die. My only condition is that the sum be equally divided between a white and Negro school."

The bishop bowed ~~cautiously~~ courteously "We are certainly indebted to your great generosity and will endeavor to use the trust for the advancement of God's work - Mr.Patterson can you tell us of your plans?" The white principal explained at length. There was a pause. The Bishop turned "Mr.Calhoun" he said "Will you now kindly tell us of any plans you have?"

Robert started but rose and said: "I thank you but I came here merely to say that I have decided to withdraw my school from your control and to try and support it by my own efforts."

The bishop ~~frowned~~ smiled "And why?" he asked.

"Because"said Robert "my ideas of what a Negro school should be,differ so much from yours that I could not conscientiously carry out your ideas."

"Could you carry out your own?"

"I could try sir,and I'm going to try."

4-1-14

The bishop rose and Robert with a sight bent for his hat.

"Then sir"said the bishop "Try - I say frankly that I do not believe the Negro race is ready for your ideas or capable of rising to them. We may differ as to Negroes,my son,but we do not differ as to men and God forbid that I should ever place my ignorance of divine plans in the way of the aspirations of any human soul. Mr.Brown ,your other $5000 will by our advice go to Mr.Calhoun's school." And then instead of warm words of thanks,instead of a courteous speech,instead even of silent bow,Robert stood awkward and speechless and great tears gathered and rolled down his cheeks.

41-1-45

It was a year later that Robert Calhoun returned from the Theological Seminary to his school and was ordained priest of St.Benedict the Moor's and warden of the Mom Bett school. Even then it was not all a path of flowers. The white rectors snubbed him,save Mr.Tucker,and even he was forced to be distant. The church convention refused him a seat,the white community regarded him with suspicion. Yet the work prospered and into it the young man threw his soul.

Beautiful little cottages covered his broad campus ,workshop stood beside class room, and a curious ivy -covered church and rectory nestled beside "The Gates called Peace," and in sight of the sea . Little homes rose here and there and then in the surrounding land and men and women who wanted more than they had and were dissatisfied with the present, grew and walked and talked beside the school and the sea.

To the white world this seemed a dangerous unfortunate thing and they mourned the passing of the Old Time negro. Even to Robert there came a sense of hopelessness as he saw the pretty heart-hurt ~~shooting~~ barriers erected by the envious and vicious to keep back the human tide of aspiration. He saw himself forced into Jim Crow cars,subjected to veiled and open insult, judged by the worst of his fellows and not the best,and above all he saw men like St.George Tucker content to sit and allow this in cowardly half-apologetic silence. Yet he knew that God's kingdom was moving on - that his people every year were richer, better and more ambitious. Why could he not be happy and wait. He did not know but Mary did. He was heart-hungry -something was gone from his life which he yearned for in misty half dim consciousness. And Mary long knowing it, knew it now more plainly saw it more clearly with her woman's heart.

Her pain came not now in fits and flashes, to her frail body, but lingered alway there now like one low dull sickening monotone that was ever saying "Death- Death!" He did not notice it - he was too near her and leaned so fully on her woman heart that he could feel the faltering of its beating. He felt and prized all the beauty of her sweet clean spirit and chided his own heart restlessness and yet he gradually began to know and she knew even better that he was heart -hungry. Once when long years of work had rolled by and his brown face was battle scarred with Life, standing where the Moon rifted a flying veil of cloud he cried as he rememberd "For the sweet heaven of one woman's love, I thank thee O God." And far far away to northward, a woman hollow-eyed and thin lifted her head suddenly from her sewing and listened and in her heart leapt sudden gladness.

41-1-146

"Why?" She knew not, but the postman laboring up the long stairs handed her a letter and she stared: "Miss Hilda Quarles", it said and its postmark was "Beaufort, S.C." She looked at it consciously read it wonderingly and thought and thought, sitting idle over her work. It was from Mary Calhoun - How had she found her? A year of letters followed. She learned of the school, the work, the disappointment, the triumph. Then at last one day came the note:

"Hilda, Robert needs you. He scarcely realizes it, but he is waiting. His whole life is waiting, for the chord once touched by you and you alone. I am sick but he does not know it. Yet I know it. I know that the time hastens when I shall take a great journey to some fair painless land, and but for one thing I should be glad, so glad, for I am tired, Hilda. He loves you; he always has - he always will. Come to him when your task is done."

And she came, for the task was long done. A month she hesitated, a week - a day. And then suddenly a longing swept upon her like a midnight cry - she rose and stood before her glass frightened and looked upon herself - O she was so different, so different, all the witching roundness was gone, the eyes were ringed, the skin had lost its glow and gold - and yet within she felt the fully woman, the richer better soul - the larger life, and she turned toward her Man and faced the South. On crept the train. Great troops of trees marched past the windows, stark and swift, shadowy and slow but behind, the hills the everlasting hills marched on and with her The world seemed twisting backward past her, twisting in great swinging circles. Then came the mountains - that far-flying line that leapt along the sky, with peaks that rose like woman's breasts and swelled to heavenward. So they wheeled into Carolina, sweet land - sweet lovely land.

The day rose grey and grim. The wind whistled and moaned fitfully and the grey cabins sat silent and stolid. A sound of half muffled church bells rose afar, toning mournfully. The world seemed sorrowing oppressed by its cares.

She took ther little satchel and wandered slowly along the village stree. An old woman and a child walked before her and stopped as she stopped to listen to the Vesper singing of a little ivy-hidden church. Instinctively she knew it and they all went in and her heart leaped. There he stood in in the pulpit - surpliced, the old smooth face, lined and scarred, the hair thin - yet RObert, Robert and all the world held nothing else. She saw the white old woman totter out, she heard the singing and she glided away as Mary slipped down to her. Then when all was still she went round to the study door and slowly opened it.

The Service was done. Robert had greeted the people and hastened to greet the strangers, but the white haired old woman had shrunk back strangely from his outstrecthed hand and hobbled away. He rememberd it bitterly. He expected such slights - they were part of his daily life and yet they fell daily on the raw sore of soul. He knew the woman - Irma Jones - all his life he had known that proud white face and his mother had known her before him - what had she said once? Something, something but he could no remember. O the Seat of the Scornful - why must he ever linger here in its bitter shadow.

41-1-14

He cast his robe upon the chair and sitting down bowed his head and idly ~~thumbed the old testament~~ the night's sermon and read the text: "The chariot of the Lord and the horsemen thereof" he read and his head sank in his hands. He heard the wind gently open the door but still he bowed his head and his heart cried bitterly "Where are thy chariots O God, where - where?" And then he lifted up his eyes. The sun was drifting in with fading glory and there in its rays dyed gold, lithe and glorious as of old stood - stood the Woman Wonderful.

He sat still lest the vision vanish. His senses rose and whirled and sank, and sinking whirled and swooned. Then he rose dizzily and stepped forward. She stood within the lintels of the door simple and alone and said slowly "My task is done - I have come back to you Robert." He tried to speak and could not but came swiftly toward her and wound his arms about her and kissed the coiling curling of her hair, hungered into the misty depths of her tired eyes and sobbed "The chariot of the Lord and the horsemen thereof."

The western sun was dying the waters when Mary found them. "Go greet the sea" she said "and I will sit and watch you."

They turned and caressed her and she laughed and wept upon their shoulders then pushed them gently away. As she watched them shadowy through her joyful tears, suddenly a great Peace hovered over the pain and she sang softly clearly as they wandered on. He took her hand - that little roughened golden hand and together they walked down the world and toward the blazing sea. Upon the air hung soft the sister's singing; within them sang the song of bounding life, around them swelled the mighty chorus of the Sea - and all was Peace and Joy and Hope save there behind where sat a woman's startled soul staring white-faced at the white-faced sea.

84-1-1-14

Book 3 pp. 205-303

The Seat of the Scornful.

Chapter I.

~~The Coming of~~ Freedom.

All the dark lowlands were sleeping. The solemn oaks dipped to the gloomy waters and a wild bird frightened from her nest rose and shrieked in the darkness circled in the air then settled to her sleep again. But the boy whom her shrill cry had wakened, started from his dreams sat upright in his bed and turned fear struck eyes toward the sea. Within the cabin all was dark and still save a dying gleam in the fireplace and a sound of breathing. The little boy hearkened - how the sea roared like a great Voice! what was it saying? What were those little answering whispers and whence that glowing in the outer blackness? A slow dim terro r creps and trembled in his limbs; his dry lips could not speak but he strained with his eyes out the great dark door. See a flaming sat upon the midnight waters, and round it- yes, round it- rode the dark shadow of a shadowy ship, sailing swinging hurrying; and above it swirled a face, a great dark awful - "Mammy", wailed the child Mammy-mammy- mammy! he shrieked is an ecstacy of terror till two great soft arms came out of the night and held him and a voine crooned:

41-7-330

"There, honey, there; it's all a dream, nothing shall hurt mammy's child."

When the child awoke again the sun was streaming across the waters. He wakened his older sister and whispered to her and together in their scanty night gowns which scarce covered their smooth dark flesh, they stepped to the kitchen where the mother was durrying to and fro and singing softly:

"Mammy" said the boy "I dreamed Momm Bett got me, last night".

Ever and again such dreams come through long long years. But one mother Juno had paused in the doorway with a great white cloud of clothes from the Big House. They were big children then, the girl 14 and the boy 11.

"Hush" cried the mother "Hark!"

It was t he Christmas of 1862 the week of the Christ Child. Up through the chill of war on the last night of the old year and the first of the new had risen a new strang Paece anda far away along the waters and down from the rolling hills came a new song, a song of freedom. It came down through the streets of the crowded cities and all the city rushed into the streets; it echoed in the great hills and the men of the mountain hushed their voices and looked thoughtfully into the valleys below. Far down the valleys,down where the blue sea was talking and telling its world old tale,there by a thousand twinkling camp fires came the new Song and two thousand black men rose and yelled cheered again and again and cheered the echo. All through the land rang that wild cheer and the soul of a black nation awoke. Had a black man dreamed a dream of happiness? That night that dream came true. Had a black woman dreamed of a child that was hers and hers alone?that night it leaped in her breast. Had a father dared to hope toown his children? that night they were his. The girl who yesternight owned not even her body,tonight slept mistress of both body and soul. O it was a glad night,the gladdest night four millions ever saw,and ever they shouted and cired and prayed and sang and the sound of the ir sing ng was as the sounding singing of the four voiced winds.

This was the sound that Juno and her children heard that early morning of the New Year and they paused and poised themselves agog:

A man rushed running by -

"What's the matter"asked Juno.

"We'se free" cried the man.

"We'se free" shouted the surging crowd of women and girls, and an old woman hobbling painfully seaward turned toward her with streaming eyes:"We'se free."

Juno sat still and the children looked up into her face. "No"she thoaght "this was not the freedom she had dreamed of. Once she too would have welcomed freedom with songs and tears but now why should she be free since He was far away. With him would come freedom,without him,the chains hung thick and close about her soul. The day flew wildly by and at nightfall the children hung about the mother:

"Mammy who's Tom?"said Mary,the girl - Juno looked at her.

"Who told you of - Tom?" she asked.

"You just said "Tom,my Too"and at night you prays for him and in your dreams he comes and talks to you."

She looked at them thoughtfully,then gathered them close in her arms.

"Tom's your pappy"she said.

The children paused. The mother hummed an old strange tune. Then Robert said timidly:

"Mammy,where's pappy?"

Juno sang slower and more slowly-then the tears came creeping.

41-7-331

She rose quickly and went back to the ironing paused over it a moment, then grasped the irons sturdily and they flew over the white linen.

"Pappy"s gone"she said. "Pappy's gone and left us - but he'll come again some time,some long time. My God done promised me and oh - he must come."

"Why did he go mammy?"

"Shall we know him- did he look like me mammy?"

[redacted]

I was but a girl and I ran home in wild tears and Momm Bett saw me. (She fell silent and the hot irons raced across the cloth.)

"She didn't beat me that night."

"Did Momm Bett used to beat you,Mammy?"

"Yes"(with a shudder.)

"Were you a naughty girl?"

"I expect so - I expect so - but this night she looked at me with curious eyes and said abruptly'Do you want him?' You see she was a Wonder Woman andknew everything."

"Yes - yes,Mammy,we knows."

"So I crept on my knees before her and told her I wanted nothing on earth like I wanted him. That without him I would die - that I would creep to the slimy lagoon and drink death. She smiled her awful smile and then (the irons moved slowly over the clothes and beads of sweat rose on the yellow forehead)then she worked the witchery."

"How did she do it mammy?"

"How did she?"

"Hush boy"cried the woman with a frightened glance. "Hush -this night he came and sang a song before the door with his banjo. Momm Bett brought him in and married us then by the ways of her fathers with blood and salt and song. The next day we went up to the Big House and he asked Master Lloyd for me and Master Lloyd laughed and said "S "Sometime,sometime? for he did not like to have his folk marry off the place. But Momm Bett came and whispered to him then the wedding was set for the next week. It was the month of blossoms and oh,the world was beautiful. Colonel Jones had just come back from Mexico and with him - with him - Evil came, and pappy Tom beat me and ran away."

41-7-352

"Was you naughty mammy-"

"Yes - your mammy sinned -but she didn't mean to God knows she didn't and then Celia witched Tom and the witchery's still a working."

"And if you ask God to forgive you -"

"Didn't I ask - O Jesus - ain't haven't I begged you but you won't hear -but there then. Yourppappy went awy but sometime he'll come again- he must come for till he comes I can't die."

Then she and the children fell a weeping and the wind sighed in the trees and the shadows lengthened across the billowy rice fields. A wildness creeps into the mother's eyes and her fingers twitch.

"It's bed time-fshe says hurriedly.

"O mammy it's hardly dark. Let us stay up and talk more about papy." But the mother hurried them off to bed and seizing her irons again worked swiftly almost fiercely far into the night.

41-7-353

Chapter II.

Monn Bett.

A little boy sat on Colonel Jones' fence swinging his legs. He was perhaps seven years old and looked a symphony in brown - yellowish brown of face, with flying light brown hair, dirty dark brown trousers hitched up with dingy strings - a ragged neutral tinted shirt and muddy red brown feet and legs. All this coloring he was engaged in heightening with bright orang persimmon juice - devouring the luscious little golden bulbs greedily and whistling lustily between.

"Get out of there you little scamp" yelled an angry voice "I'll break your neck if I catch you in those persimoons again." The boy measured the distance of the oncoming owner warily, grabbed another handful of the fruit and dived with incredible swiftness into the underbrush, wriggling, screwing, slipping flying across the fields until with a whoop and a swing of his old felt hat he landed in the limbs of a great black oak at the edge of the cotton field. Finding that the pursuit was not pressed, he finished the persimmons, licked his hands and looked about for further adventure. Beneath this long accumulated layers of dirt his face was almost beautiful but it was spoiled by a precocious sharpness slyness and restlessness. It seemed as if the little body was tingling with pent up energy and the keen mind quivering and sparkling every minute- and over all hung a furtive watching for blows and yells, a preparedness for missiles and oaths and a mocking, mischievous sense of ability to triumph over and laught at a hostile world. No sooner had he finished his persimmons and spied the land out with his great shining black eyes, than he shook out his tangled hair and dived again to the ground and in a moment he was moving stealthily among the big green striped watermelons that lay in the field beyond the cotton. He tapped the melons carefully, cocking his head aside and had just chosen a big ripe melon ~~when~~ when he heard a furious barking and saw a big brown dog dashing across the fields. It was a long pull to the nearest tree and he measured the distance carefully. Then with the melon under one arm and a big stone in either hand he fairly flew across the field. It was a race that made the angry planter stare in astonished amusement. The dog skimmed silently with head down and in great skipping curves. The boy ran like a deer clasping the melon. Once when the dog was almost on him he turned and sent a stone straight at the brute's eyes and the dog leaped aside and started again, but before he had dodged the second stone, the boy, melon and all had wriggled like a cat up the tree and squatted on a branch. The dog rushed boldly up and the boy bent over and waited. Just as the dog was directly under him he suddenly threw the big melon straight at his head. It hit him squarely in the eyes and the astonished animal turning with a wild yelp of surprise and pain turned and flew back across the field like a streak. The boy watched and rested a bit. Then climbing cautiously down he gathered up the fragments of watermelon ate the juicy meat carefully and threw the rinds at the birds that hovered near.

41-7-355

Then he started carelessly across the fields tramping on the young cotton and whistling merrily.

"You better get out of that cotton, boy" cried a girl across the field.

"If you don't Momm Bett'll get you" added the boy.

The urchin stopped whistling and stared at Juno's two children.

"Who Momm Bett?" he asked.

"She gets bad children" answered Mary.

"Humph" said the boy "I ain't afraid of no -- "

"What's that?" said a gruff voice; they all turned and saw Uncle Caesar behind them. He was a curious bent black man, his hair white as snow and bushy, his beard scanty and scraggly. Sharp snappy black eyes twinkled in his head and his face was folded and seamed, wrinkled and forbidding. He glided ~~along~~ slowly bent half double, with great brass rings in his ears and mumbling always some ~~unintelligible~~ jargon. ~~The~~ children always half feared him and ~~shrunk~~ from him, yet he had a ~~fascination~~ and could hold ~~them~~ spellbound with his black eyes when he would. ~~Today he seemed so minded.~~ He looked at ~~them~~ sharply till they began to slide off. ~~And even the wild urchin shrank.~~ Then he chuckled and searched in his great pockets until he brought out a grimy paper and in it a great piece of striped candy. The children's eyes grew big but they hesitated.

41-1-149

"Is you good children?" he asked.

"Yes, sir."

He turned suddenly to the urchin:

"No you ain't -you name Hal -you runs away and steals and lies and if you don't watch out Momm Bett'll get you."

Hal looked uncomfortable but he asked steadily:

"Who Momm Bett?"

And the other children.

The older children looked at each other. The idea of anyone's not knowing Momm Bett! They had heard the talk from their cradle and yet it was ever wonderful - ever new.

"Tell us about Momm Bett, Uncle Caesar."

The old man eyed them.

"What you know about Momm Bett?" he asked. He always said that.

"Mammy tell us things sometimes."

"Go way- your mammy don't know nothing about Momm Beet - I knows- I knows all about her but I won't tell all, nobody could tell all. She was a Wonder Woman."

The children crept nearer. "Tell us something," they pleaded.

He crouched in the cotton patch and swayed and mumbled and this was the tale he told, only he used curious language which the writer has straightened:

"Momm Bett, Greatest of Wonder Women, came in the year of the great Comingywhen the doors were open and Africa, he Black Land poured suddenly -like upon us and Charleston harbor was black with slaves. This was the way she come. It was red night, hot red night when lights was a-flashing in the north. Just after the hot sunset come a great hailing out at sea - a sudden madfull wind went a-sweeping by with black clouds and lights flew up and down up and down in the east. Then at last the big crowds on the wharf heard a whistling and a great dark ship old, older than anything staggered around the bar from the south with torn sails aflapping, rushing like a devil fiend, and crunching and tearing as she hove up. There was a strange creeking and tearing of ropes; black coated and goopher-looking men walked about." Then Uncle Caesar rose and gesticulated and told how their master had hailed the crowd in some strange tongue that none understood. At last an old hermit from the mountain, he that was half daft and wandered about silently, heard and answered the jargon. It seems the strange folk had been making for a far off land around some goodly cape. There long beat back by eastward storms they had struck a sudden east wind which threw them violently westward till starving and thristy they had made with difficulty this harbor. All this men doubted for they had seen no storms; still when they offered a slave cheap for food ~~feed~~ and water men hurried forward to bargain. An old white bearded man with cavernous eyes brought her ashore. And Uncle Caesar said in low rapt tones: "No sooner does I see her than I knows her. She was a queen and one of the Wonder Women. I creeps upon my face. But they white folks they only saw a black woman, six feet high, willow like and straight as a pine with a mess of puffed bushed hair. A white man started toward her but she looked at him and he crept away. Another grapped her arm but she seized him quick and threw him ten feet along the docks and the crowd roared. Then her eye falls on old Master Lloyd- He was young then, scented gay and pretty, and she beckoned him. He came over luaghing and offered the old man a thousand dollars for the Wonder Woman. The grey-head looked strangely at Lloyd and took the money. The black woman smiled right into his big black eyes, waved her hand at the shadow of the ship and followed old Master into the darkness."

41-1-150

41-1-151

"Ha, ha (the old man chuckled) she was a wise woman very wise. But there were some things I knew and everybody knew and she didn't. She was so wise about big things, she didn't know nothing about lots of little things. She thought she was going to be DeCoursey Lloyd's chief wife and queen- slave of course as all wives are slaves, but chief slave and ruler by her cunning and her conjure. And indeed for a time - you better believe - she was. Far off beyond the rice fields in yonder half dead cabin, she sat and queened over the young fool and he seemed love-mad with her. It was a pretty yellowish brown child- your mammy-that came to them there and they sat aside each other and sang to it and to the sea. Then men began to talk - leastways women.

" 'It's shameful' " they said.

" 'A Lloyd of Carolina.' "

" 'He's no account and fast.' "

" 'We must save him.'"

"~~M thay xxi~~ " 'He must be married to some big white woman.'"

"So they talked and whispered until at last ~~weary of this toy and~~ when he was tired a-playing and a-feared and shameful of his life he took a pale doll from the country and made a proud wedding.

"And then ah, then, rose the real Wonder Woman. She turned on him sudden-like as a snake creeps to a toad. They says the sea that night was red and the whistling wind echoed on it. She struck him across his face - do you mind the scar of his right forehead -no, no you're all too young - well only his dodging save him that hot night. And then she sent for me. I was his man then and had dared raise eyes to her the Queen thinking to come by her as I came by his cast of-clothes. Bah!she slapped me to the earth and ~~spurned~~ glistening me and ~~then~~ glaring after I was her dog and she the Queen. It was midnight,midnight,no moon,no star when we two went out together on the shore. One of the mad storms was a muttering in the southeast and the wind was chill. We lighted a circle of fire on the black beach,till it covered her high form and waved and fanned about her. Then she led the witchery and at her feet I begun to learn the secrets of the earth -- the voice of spirits,the charm of snakes,the conjure of herbs -not all then,O no, but beginning then and after bit by bit in years and years. Then I learned but first bits and lay flat on the earth ~~in~~ scared, ~~silenna~~ still, while in the circling flame she cursed DeCoursey Lloyd and his doll and their children forever and aday. Then she cursed the land and the sea. God!it was ~~xx~~ awful - I sweats and I trembles when I remember the muttering thunder and muttering woman,the air aflashing with lightning, and hate,the darkness and the flame and the mist-ful bending woman. This land? these white folks? They can't never be nothing,they can't never prosper,they are accursed and I heard the curse. Hasn't it come true?"she said lowering his voice mysteriously "Didn't old Master live scared all his life and die of a ~~s~~trange thing,didn't his proud-faced daughter run away and marry a scamp,didn't their child"he stopped ouddenly "Listen (he said as the children's eyes widened and their breath came quicker) "Listen:the day old Lloyd doted ashrieking and ascreaming for MommBeet -that night Colonel Jones went across the rice fields to whip Momm Bett for her conjuring. He even dared to raise the snaky thing against her but before it touched her monstruos form there came awhistling tearing wind from the south and round the bar shot a big old black ship all flaming. And from it before it touched the shore a white-bearded man,old,older than the sea itself beckoned and Momm Beet was gone and she left only a red ~~glowing~~ shining on the sea."

41-1-152

The old man stopped and sat staring rapt. They watched him breathless,catching his meaning only here and there yet dreaming confused things of ships and wonderful women.

Suddenly Uncle Caesar rose and said as he always did "What you all adoing heah?" It's most noon - your mammy wants you - go."

41-7-354

They rushed away fearfully,running across the low black land until they were out of Uncle Caesar's sight. Then Hal halted:"I don't believe nothing about no Momm Bett and shadow ships"he declared stubbily But the other children drew back from the blasphemer in horror and left him standing there while they hurried from him talking rapidly,pointing gesticulating;for their world differed from his:Robert,brown and sturdy lived ever in a world of dreams, worshipping the deeds of Momm Bett, and Mary, his older sister, frailer and more delicate, lived in a wierder web of mystery striving inh her half-grown way at the curious heart of things. Ever the two children hovered over the tale of the witch woman, till it was their play and their dream, their solemn thought and the inspiration of their work, as the sea swept harder over the grey and twinkling islands and the winter mists gloomed the air.

858-7-1A

Chapter III.

The Incantation.

Juno was waiting. As the night advanced she listened, going often to the door and peering out. At last she dropped her irons wearily and paced to and from wringing her hands until she heard the shuffle of footsteps before the door and a low knocking.

"Uncle Caesar" she said looking at him in suppressed excitement. He growled gruffly and crouching by the fire relapsed into silence watching the flame. She hovered about him clasping and unclasping her dark hands.

"He's alive" he said. She gave a great sob and sank into a chair. The children turned uneasily in their sleep. The old man started. Then raising quickly he stepped to the bed and raising the sleeping boy lifted him high and held him up where the north star blazed through the little window. He peered darkly into the dark ness but the mother singing to her knees cried "The child, O God, the child" and the half awakened boy whimpered to the night. The old man shook his head.

"Nothing, nothing" he mumbled and he laid the child slowly in his cot again.

"Can't you bring him back?" wailed the woman.

"He's with Celia" he said.

"Kill her" she cried fiercely starting up. "Kill her, conjure her, he's mine" and her voice wailed away into tears. He said nothing but crouched again on the hearth. She bent fearfully over him and saw before him a little waken figure, black and misshapen. He threw an evil glance over his shoulder.

"She is sick" he said.

"Kill her" came the bitter answer.

He drew a long sharp needle from his coat and heated it in the flame. Then he began to murmur - a faint low mumbling noise - like the crooning of some vast and wandering soul far far away - wierdly and mysteriously chanting its ancient mysteries.

He stuck the needle into the wax and drew it out poising his head and listening.

"Did you hear it?" he asked.

"No" she whispered. "Again, again, deep!"

He muttered long and waved his arms and then again he plunged the needle deep into the wax and whirled it.

41-7-337

A low moan seemed to drift down the wide fireplace. She laughed low and wildly and urged him on.

"Hurt her "she panted "Hurt her to death."

He leaped to his feet and bared his withered black arm.

"Her blood's on you and over you" he growled and bending raised the red hot needle, plunged it way through the wax, twisted it and turned it. The woman danced and quivered. He paused again.

"Kill her" she cried with a half stifled scream that started the children in their dreaming. Muttering low and waving his hands he kept plunging the hot needle into the softened wax and whirling it and working it till the black mass quivered and settled and spread into a dark splotch on the stone hearth, and as it flattened and froze the door flew suddenly open and there drifted in a faint sharp cry as from afar.

VI-7-32

Whence came the cry? Surely from the northward. Perhaps from up yonder where the pink curlews were circling on the dim coast; perhaps it echoed further from the rolling highlands of the north state or from the high walled valleys or even drifted with the silences of the night far down Virginian vales, perhaps. But the strange old man whispered in after years that the death cry came from a thousand miles away, far up there where a great dark city slept in its great thick walls. Away down where the walls were many and the spaces dark lay in a great many windowed house a gaunt woman, and a great dark bodied man bent over her. Suddenly the woman gave a sharp cry of pain, and the man raising his head listened and heard a faint low rumbling - like the crooning of some vast and wandering soul far far away - wierdly and mysteriously chanting its ancient mysteries. The woman shrank toward him.

Three times she cried, while without the great inhuman voice swelled and roared, shattering itself into a pounding of feet, a babel of voices and rushing of men.

Then in the long corridor came the patter of little frightened foot steps and the great cry "Fire!" he seized the woman in his arms and staggered toward the stairs. What happened then he never knew clearly. He remembered vaguely her dark head face, the prancing horses and the dray. He remembered the ride with Martha and Silena to the wharves, the whirling through the streets; he remembered the glinging and gleaming of the sunlight on the great glass windows; the hoarse roar of voices, the swinging of great doors and then - and then when day broke pale above the riotous city, he had staggered out among the charred ruins, aching & fevered. He remembered

What had happened? A great drowsiness,a half misty consciousness lay on him and the bed where he lay seemed rising and falling. The room how strange it was,so small so - then he fell to dreaming. He awoke again in the darkness and the words of Celia were ringing in his ears. O if she could have seen his riven soul. He had loved Juno in all the wild untrained strength of his young manhood. He had worshipped her from afar,watching her twirling feet and her proud young curled crowned head. When she passed by,his heart was still. And then in his diffidence and despair came her wierd strange mother,saying:"Go to her,she loves you!" Ay,for one short year the world grew rich and glorious,wanton in flower and fruit. He remembered afterward that sometimes in their mad happiness her eyes grew fear-struck and she clung to him terrified - the shadow of wanton weakness,he had said in his awful bitterness. The child was born, the bonnie nut brown girl that cooed and called to him. And then - then what was it? How the roomm rolls and that - why that was like the breath of the sea.- Yes they sent him away on the far off sea islands with a gang of men. He could not take his wife and baby. They were not his, they belonged to Colonel Jones. But they promised to buy their freedom while he was away and then they could live together on one plantation. Blithely he had rushed back from the sea. It was long after midnight but he ran across fields to his wife and baby and hurrying on he had met Celia and her devil's tale. He had thrown her from him with a curse and rushed blindly on. He had burst in to the cabin. Juno rushed to him with a glad cry and a new-born child in her arms, a dark brown boy but he cursed her and she shrank crouching, trembling before his awful face. The words were drowned in his blazing anger and she, what had she said cowering there is ashen trembling - "I -I couldn't help it - I didn't know - He was my master." No!no! Celia had told the truth, it must have been the truth. God, how he struck her till the babies shrieked and the woman had sat dumb and speechless. The overseer rushed on him but Tom, he remembered how he had thrown out his hand and with a sickening crackle of bones the slave driver went to his long home. Then blindly he turned toward the fields and ran whither - he knew not, cared not. The fresh dew of morning fell like gentle balm on his parched and glowing skin. He sped across the fields in a great circle bending low and running easily in great long strides with his head thrust forward like a hound's . And the cry of hounds rose behind him faintly, surely nearer and nearer, his breath came in great gasps. No he could run no further. Beyond him swayed a woman and two little children. He would call her - no it looked like Juno - was it she or her spirit? An old bridge sat beneath the oaks and above a silent black stream, he dodged under it, ran up the waters a bit to throw the scent and then quickly with al last spurt doubled back on the Beaufort road. In vain a white horseman sat on the road and with a crash he fell headlong in the under brush. and lay panting as the hounds and horse men swept by.

41-7-334

41-7-35

The sea air - the wild sweet air, how sweet it was and how plain that face, the face of the silent staring horseman in the road. It was an interesting face - a sharp face - a vacillating face but not a good face.. But there was a good face beside it in after years - a face of sorrow and timide dread of goodness, pure goodness, sweet like the great fair hills where it was born. He turned uneasily and felt the twinge in his side, and looked dreamily into Martha's face. Strange that she should be here and where was Here - was he dreaming - why.-

"There, Tom, you're better now don't try to move lie quietly."

"Where am I" he asked vaguely "I'se been dreaming of the South and the sea and the days, the black days of long ago - I - I smell the sea- surely I smell the sea."

"Yes, Tom we're on the water."

"On the water, on ship board - how did?"

"You were hurt in the riot Tom."

"O yes, yes, I remember now - I remember , poor Celia."

"O heavens Tom, is she left behind?"

"No, she went first, she's dead - where are we going?"

"To South Carolina, Tom, to Wilton Point."

"Wilton Point -Beaufort - He half rose in excitement then fell back and closed his eyes with a sigh. "Wilton Point" he murmured. "Wilton Point."

41-7-336

Chapter IV.

War. ~~Fort Wagner.~~

"We want no green recruits" said the captain.

"I know the manual" answered Tom. "I drilled with a squad ~~at Yonkes~~ on New York

"Fall in" came the command and Tom Calhoun joined the black regiment on James Island where the boat first hove to . It was the morn of the sixteenth of July, 1863 and the black soldiers were already stirring as the new recruits marched into camp.

An eager spirit of expectation and unrest lay on the camp. Already they had waited years and days for this opportunity. Last night they had stepped forward with their pickets peering in the gloom and then fell slowly backward. But today, this very night the movement was to begin. Charleston lies by a cluster of islands and waters forme by the great harbor and by that old ~~the~~ Stone river where Cato of Stono, the first black rebel, lived. Here Carolina like a great mouth bites the eastern seas. Above the tip of her tongue lies Charleston ; ~~itself.~~ In her great upper jaw is Fort Moultrie, ~~and~~ white between its teeth is fateful Sumter, while its heavy lower jaw make James Island. Over the jaw like lips slip Folly and Morris Islands. On Morris Island lay a fort, a low black heavy fort, Fort Wagner, and thither ward the black mass waiting on James Island ~~was to go in force~~ looked in grim longing. The night was drifting slowly out to sea when six thousand shadows moved across the ugly marshes of James Island; great sloughs of mud yawned before them, sullen dark waters, rushing swollen streams and broken dykes. Thick sombre trees watched them silently and dipped their moss swept limbs deep into the mysterious black water. Serpents hissed and twined beneath their feet and wild birds screamed; yet all the long night, voiceless, breathless they slipped and struggled toward the sea. Just as the faint grey dawn tinged the lowering hurrying clouds, they stepped on Morris Island. Afar lay the grey dull walls of Fort Wagner sleeping silently.

41-7-337

As the soldiers halted suddenly the air grew thin and chill, the far off muttering of thunder shook the morning hush, and the sea flashed and roared and foamed. It was as if nature hesitated to let these black men go, even as their leaders hesitated and whispered and glanced. The storm started from the face of the sea like passion sweeping a soul, screamed and panted, yelled and roared, while the black rain streamed and beat upon the sea and land. The soldiers crouched in the misery and hunger of wet waiting six endless hours and then above the voice of the dying story rose the thunder of mighty guns. East, west, and south they flashed, and the iron and lead pounded into the stone and sand of Fort Wagner. Far out at sea the gunboats hissed and crashed and the air was thick with the whirring of death from noon till shadowy night. No sooner had the death lulled than again the storm clouds boiled over sea and land, the lightning flashed the purple clouds and the low tense chiding and chasing of the thunder knelled on the ears of the crouching, dripping soldiery. It was dinner time but there was no dinner; it was suppertime but there was no time to eat. Five thousand white men swung suddenly into line facing the fort, but in front and ahead of them stood a thousand black men. They paused. A young white man rose and stood before them. He was pale and thin. His high cheek bones stood out beneath the burning beauty of his eyes. His tones swelled like a benediction over the dark faced men and they took one word - "The eyes of the world are on you black men this day." They made no answer but when the order came moved like a tidal wave against the gloomy fortress that peered dimly above the shadows of the falling night. From Sumter, from Wagner, from Cummings Point the roar of artillery pouring into the massed ranks of their black men shook the very sands beneath their feet. Yet the machine-like fall of their feet oozed and splashed across the black island. Up tore the murderous rattle and crash of rifles. The dark mass shavered but swept on. Across the trenches they leaped, up the side of the angry frantic fort. For a moment the coiling flag waved from the very parapet - a moment, then the black mass wavered, staggered, parted recoiled, Again they rushed forward; again and yet again. The very fires of hell were bursting in their vitals. The white face of the young colonel flashed a moment clear in the red light and then his thin hand clutched the black air and he fell beside Tom Calhoun. Tom raised him tenderly and staggered backward and then - how sweet and cool the air was, filled with the scent of jessamine and the voice of the little girl singing softly in the sweet fair sunshine rose like some new incense over the blood and dust of his torn life.

41-7-338

He lay and listened. His little girl must be as old as that and his boy the size of yonder lad sturdily splitting wood and then he turned and his eyes met the eyes of the woman bending over him. It was Juno. And his heart leaped and was still.

Long days he lay there nursing the remains of his stricken arm, calling back the strength of his sorely strained body. The children hovered about him singing and whispering. And ever sleeping or waking the woman's great sad eyes were bent upon him but she said no word, only lingered there serving him with her soft hands and quick thought. Ten days he lay there and then one day in the noontide silence, when the children were afar, he turned and looked into her eyes. "Juno" he faltered. She dropped on her knees and groped toward him.

"Tom" she sobbed "Tom for God's sake listen to me, listen Tom while I tells you." Silently he stretched out his one whole hand but he turned his face to the wall. She covered the hand with tears and kisses and stroking it softly knelt beside the bed and spoke.

"I never had no one to teach me Tom, I came up wild-like as a weed. The other children was afraid of me for my mammy was a witch and I wandered half dressed in the bushes and stared at folks. My mammy didn't lowe me-she almost hated me and beat sme frightfully, spat on me and drove me out to wander under the trees late of nights. What could I know - what could I learn? Once when people was sick in the cabins,Mistress Irma came down to help. I worked for her and wondered at her paleness and her clothes till she noticed me and took me with her up to the Big House to wait on her. I was waiting on her when I first saw you,honey,a-standing in the cotton field the day of the hunt. And that was the first day I saw Colonel Jones,but not,O God,the last.

"While I was aloving you Miss Irma got sudden an gered at me and Old Master sold me to Colonel Jones. He gave me a new cabin and rode down there the very day I came and looked at me till I shrank before him for his eye was evil and I was glad when he went suddenly to war. All of us black folk then came back to Master Lloyd ;we were married,you and me,Tom and then came my year of happiness,my one sweet wonderful year. Perhaps I was so happy God took it hard. You were living over on Master Coles place when Colonel Jones came home.

41-7-339

"One day I met him riding. His face was red and black with liquor and he flung me a wicked look;bending to,he seized and fingered me by the arm. 'Where do you live?'he asked. I told him faltingly and he leered and laughed. That very afternoon he rode by our door but you were there. I noted the dark[redacted] of his face but you never saw nothing. The very next day you were sent for a month way down on the sea islands in charge of a gang of slaves from Master Coles plantation and from ours.

"Yet I dreamed of no harm,I thought only of my little cabin and my baby and my husband. You were far away but I knew you'd come soon and O,I was so happy when I lay down that night to sleep. I was dreaming of great green fields and singing trees of birds and dark red flowers,when suddenly I heard a knocking,a low strange knocking in the night. I started up in terror"Who's there?" I cried then I thought of you "Tom- Tom" I whispered. "Is it you honey?' I flew to the door and as I laid my hand upon it,a great fear came upon me all alone in the grim blackness of the night. Again came the strange knocking at the door. 'O God, who is it - go away, go away." I half screamed and then came his voice, the voice of Colonel Jsnes ' Don't be afraid, Juno, it's me, I've got a message for you." I quickly threw a blanket about me and without thought or fear opened the door. And then - O God, Tom, don't judge me harshly. I did not struggle - I did not refuse - I did not dare refuse - I did not know I could resist. He was my master. All my life I had drunk bowing from the air - no one had taught me different, no one had whispered fight. I crouched before him in dumb helplessness and when he slunk away I lay on the floor like the bruised stolen thing that I was, a sobbing and trembling in utter misery. And when I woke to morning - what could I do - what could I say - who could I tell - you? I was afeared with shameful fear. My mammy? She would have beaten me or laughed in my face or killed me. For long months you could not come to me - do you remember? O I was weak in yielding, Tom, I know it now, I know it but I did not know then. I ought to have died afighting the great red brute, but I thought even then that I had no right to - that God and the law commanded me to obey my master - Tom, O Tom is there no forgiveness for the poor woman who sins? Can everything hope for heaven but me? O, it is wrong Tom, it is damnable, it's devil's judgment and not God's -but I have not told all yet, Tom, do not turn from me Tom, my Tom, listen. I found myself going to have a child - whose I didn't know: yours or his. You came back once then went away again uor six months to the dark sea islands. I felt it was our last parting and I clung to you and kissed you and wept wildly like on your neck, do you remember Tom? Then in fear and despair I went to my mother's cabin and told her all. She kept me there a smiling stranger and waving her hands above as I slept and when once Henry Jones came she sneered in his face and whispered and he went sullenly away. Then the birth-night came: It was brown, dark sweet brown, a man child and I wept aloud for joy, but even then the birth pains seized me again and, may Christ be my witness, a white faced twin leapt from my dead heart to join its dark brother. Tom, Tom, for God's sake believe. I am telling the truth, by my soul's salvation: a child to you and to him were both born that red night. How the ~~unholy~~ awful thing happened God only knows but it is true. Perhaps it was the accursed witchery of my mother, perhaps it was the damning of God, perhaps a wild ~~freak~~ laugh of nature, but I looked into the faces of the misbegotten twain and groaned and fainted.

41-7-340

"When I came to the children lay beside me - the darker one I seized. The other I hated - I could have killed it but I dare not; yet I said nothing - I was glad when Mom Bett seized it, rolled it in a blanket and took it away. Three days I watched her furtively and knew what she meant - she meant blood sacrifice. It was the Great witchery of her dark religion, the killing of a manchild of the dated race in the full moon. On the night of the full moon she painted her face and looking at me long and strangely started away and I heard her swift steps running. Then I thought and thought - why di she take this child - it was not full white? Why did she go from and not toward the sea? Then of a flash I knew. Miss Irma's child had come the same night with mine and Momm Bett was bent on mischief - unholy mischief The devil tempted me but I left my baby, leapt and ran after her in the night, weak and tottering from childbirth and hearing the wail of my own ~~babies~~ child in the deserted cabin behind. I saw her slipping on ahead between the ghostly trees. I saw her enter the house and I crept after her.—— ~~wash?~~ Forgive, forgive me, Tom, take me back to you - take my babies, you r babies - O Tom, Tom forgive me or kill me, kill me or forgive me."

All the while he had lain still his face toward the wall, but now slowly he lifted his hand, his one thin hand and laid it reverently on her bowed head. The children crept out of the glooming day and knelt beside her; and a great silence fell.

Chapter V.

Peace

41-7-354a

A vast unrest lay upon the land. Men looked at each other furtively, uneasily and the world hearkened. Groups stood at the corners, idle; blue clothed soldiers lounged along, curious wide emed black men stared at land and sea. Peace was come at last, peace with emancipation and men wondered what it meant. Then came the tattered stragglers in grey; now riding in rapidly on horseback with hard set faces, now s itting listlessly peering out of the win dows of creeping screaming trains, now walking at twilight along the weary dusty road with bowed heads. Waste, ruin, poverty sat grinning on the f ace of the land, save here and there where former slaves were d hoeing and digging. Unrest, hesitation, speculation, curious wonder sat upon the housetops and whispered in the winds and John Reynolds who had at this time just begun his Reconstruction career was standing on the pillared verandah looking in perplexity through the vista of magnolias out into the white cot-

41-7-359

Chapter V

~~The~~ Murder.

Little Hal was just creeping home with the twilight. It was down in one of the oldest and dreariest cabins of the Jones plantation - a dirty cheerless place. No one was there and hunting about for a piece of musty corn-bread, he curled hicself in the corner and fell fast asleep. It was ten oclock at night before anyone came. Then the door opened and a little ragged girl came in. Her face was sweet and innocent and strange and unusual beauty- the same wonderful symphony of brown as in the boy but softennd and with the sharpness and restlessness absent. She was tired but first she looked about for her brother. "Buddy, buddy?" she cried, then listened and heard his breathing and lying down beside him, she slept. Some time later in the night a man came in. It was the father Jim Quarles a yellow man with crisp hair and a sullen expression. He did not go to bed but sat quietly in the corner watching. At last he started forward. The were steps and whisperings without as a beautiful weak-faced colored woman, slouched around the house in her ragged clothes talking to a white man, the brown man crept out. There was a moment's silence, a wild scream, the sound of swift steps and silence. Slowly the man returned to the cabin and throwing himself carelessly in the corner slept heavily. Just before day-break he stretched himself and called "Hilda -Hilda- breakfast." Hilda rose and hurried about - cooked a bit of bacon and made corn bread and black coffee. He stood and ate it ravenously and ran out putting on his coat and Hilda leaving the dishes on the dirty table took a needle and tried to pull together the widest rents in her little brother's trousers as he lay in them; but he slept on. It was a curious sight; without lay the dead body of the mother, unknown to the children, surrounded by a silent curious group of black folk; within was the dingy dirty room, the sleeping boy, the brown girl bending over him in her rags and softly curling hair. Silena Smith looking in at the door caught her breath and stood there till the girl turned her head and started up in mute apology, yet with something of reserve in her childish air despite her squalid surroundings.

41-7-360

41-7-361

Silena sat down, striving not to scare the children, yet listening to the noises without as they raised the body and bore it away. Then she turned toward the children.

"I'm a school teacher"! she said "and I'm looking for pupils."

Something eager lighted in the girl's eyes, and the boy awaking suddenly sat up and stared.

"Have you ever been to school?" asked Silena.

"No, Missus."

"Would you like to go?"

"O yes, Missus."

"I wouldn't " sang the boy "Id ruther drive mules" and he dived ~~dove~~ toward the table.

Silena rose and pulled the little g irl gently to her.

"How old are you?"

"I was born the second crop after the storm, mammy says."

"That makes you about seven, I guess - and what did -does mammy do?"

"She's nursing for the white folks up at Colonel Blakesley's and I helps in the kitchen and pappy is coachman."

"And who takes care of little brother?"

"I takes care of myself" volunteered the boy as he gathered up the last of the breakfast crumbs.

Silena said slowly:

"Children your mammy has gone away - forever, and your pappy for - a long time, and you're both coming to live with me and work and learn and be good children."

The girl's face lighted but the boy frowned.

Chapter VI

The Hunted ~~The Arrest.~~

On Tom Calhoun, who had bought a little farm with his bounty money the sun still shone. As he looked across his forty acres and saw the neat cabin and the nodding crops, heard the happy song of the mother forking and half listened to the talk of his daughter, he suddenly realized that never before had he lived. At last he was a freeman - free, free as the air which filled his great lungs. He was his own master and his own man; no one had the right to command him, to drive him, to order him about as one with his cattle and his dogs. His wife was his and his alone, his were his children. He raised the stricken stump of his arm aloft - God! was it not worth a right arm - a body a life to be free! The boy came racing toward him across the field--"supper's ready" and the three hurried home, the girl singing, the boy romping round them and the dog leaping and barking. Once home, the mother came to kiss all three, chiding them for being late and spoiling the biscuit They sat down in the kitchen and ate - crisp fried ham, biscuit, white flake rice, golden molasses - ah, it was good! Then came the twilight. The mother sang over the clinking dishes; and the father and the children - first they played games, then they sang the old folk songs and then came a story of Brer Rabbit - the African hero of the weak against the strong.

41-7-361

The next day was Sunday. They slept late and rising from a hurried breakfast they dressed and went to church, riding in a wagon drawn by two fat mules -Juno in a blue gown that reddened her brown face, Mary in a wonderful red calico and the man and boy in smooth dusted black. Other wagons and buggies and wayfarers met them along the road and they greeted them all joyfully.

"Howdy, Good mawnin."

"How's all" "How you all?"

"Tolerable" "All up?"

And gay laughter and frolic filled the air, along with rough banter and noise. Sometimes great carriages filled with white folk passed them casting the dust on the walkers and the humble wagons; some laughed at the gay costumes and some cursed at the dark faces. At the cross roads sat the church - a great square board house, rough and plain. There were benches within and the sound of singing and without rows of mules and crowds of wagons and throngs of girls and boys and knots of men and women. All the colors of man had met there: there were a few pink and golden haired girls, many black and white haired old men, young bronzen giants and soft brown cheeked maidens; there were olive hued men and women, girls golden faced and freckled brown and every hue and shade of the wondrous changing human color from pole to circle but all set and shaded in a great background of unshaed black and brown. Next their color, strangers would have seen their hair; with a few it flowed in yellow brown and black; most of it curled and crumped and twisted itself, some so minutely and crisply that it lay in hard grey black masses, immobile and thick. On others it bushed itself to a dark mass of piling cloud or was tied stiffly in spreading spikelets and then again it curled and waved and wantoned in tiny kissing ringlets or great midnight curls touched with gold. They were not beautiful as the white world counts beauty, but they had faces of interest and strength and lovableness that could easily grow in one's ideals and dreams, and then too a certain untrained and unfathomed depth of thought and doing - a new world peasantry with the dirt and roughness and ignorance of primitive man and the promise and aspiration and hidden beauty of all humanity. An old man was preaching when Tom and his family entered the church. He was unlettered, unattractive and slovenly. And yet the burning earnestness of his talk, the half barbaric splendor of his native imagery and the wonder of his subject held his hearers in breathless startled attention. They were a primitive folk and their feelings sat naked and unashamed upon their faces, clothed in streaming tears, incensed with groans low rapt wails and deep Amens. And why not? Was he not talking of freedom. Of how God let his children toil in the ~~black~~ mud of Egypt and then in his good time let them go?

The sermon was a great chorus and the preacher was chorister. He intoned the strophe and the swaying chorus beneath him, standing, sitting bowing and on bended knee sang the wild anti-strophe, in moan and cry and praise and loud "Amenp"

"O my brethren and my little sisters, dark was that day (m'm'm'm'") sighed

the people). The sun was hot in the cotton fields, the waters boiled in the seas. (The seas boiled, O Lord" answered the people.) Way over in the Egypt land, the children of God lost faith, my brothers, just as in the dark days of yesterday you lost faith. (Preach it, Father" sobbed the women.) They sinned and cursed God, my sisters and hung over Hell on a single thread. And then my God was pitiful - O he's a pityful God, my sisters (Hallelujah" shrieked a soul) and the hot tears of his children dropped on his heart and melted it. And he lifted up his voice (Glory to God" they chorused) and stretched out his great black arm. Let them go Pharoah-I say! Oh, Pharoah, let ~~them~~ my children go. (Let them go, Let my children go" came the great full voiced echo.) But ole Pharoah, the old slave driver shook his head like a mule and said No, keep them slaves, work them, kill them, (m'm'm'm sighed the men) hoe that cotton Nigger - but the Lord rose up and shook himself, (Rise up Lord" cried the old men) and he screamed again till the mountain trembled and the sea got afeared and he say, says he - " A quick swaying and whispering, the crashing of falling benches and the sound of an oath broke abruptly upon the worshippers and the old man was suddenly silent.

41-7-363

The audience rose tumultuously in fear. Tom turned and saw the white sheriff advancing up the aisle: the folks behind rising quickly had overturned the benches and were whispering angrily, the forward sat in sullen silence half, fear, for they were but a step from slavery and the spell of the white face was heavy upon them, but as the officer strode up the aisle he pushed a black soldier's wife roughly aside and in a moment a hundred men had leaped to their feet amid the crash of overturning benches and the screaming of children Tom pushed quickly forward and quickly put his great form between the sheriff and the surging crowd. "Quiet brothers, quiet" he said "this is an officer of the law and we are peaceful citizens". The sheriff had his pistol in his hands and handcuffs. He turned quickly toward Tom.

"I'm after Jim Quarles - you know him, he used to be Colonel Jones body servant and then was sold to the Quarleses."

"What's he wanted for?"

"For killing his wife and he came in this church this morning - 'there he is;" the sheriff started toward the ~~brown~~ man in the corner and Tom nodded reassuringly. "It's all right boys, I'll straighten this out" he said. "Let us go by." They slowly fell back and the sheriff got bolder. "I've half a notion to take a dosen of you Niggers along for resisting an -" he did not finish for somehow, somewhere a great black arm shot out from the crowd and when the sheriff came too he was lying alone beside the road and the church was empty.

Afar across the fields next night in the darkness a boy went slippi with a bundle in his arms. It was Tom's son Robert and he was hurrying toward the swamp. On his way he passed a long lean white man, yellowish and haggard. He knew it was Boggs, the Sheriff, and without a word the boy dropped into the shadows of the hedge. The sheriff was mad and was not noticing shadows; he stamped down the road and into the hardware store.

"I want a gun" he said.

Now a sheriff without a "gun" being unheard of, the proprietor and his loafers expressed very great surprise and by degrees elicited the following story: The sheriff after his unsuccessful attempt to arrest Quarles at the church had returned home. Martha his wife was up-country for the day but had left his supper prepared. When the tired and hungry Mr.Boggs arrived about sundown, what did he find but the door ajar, and a bright light. He ppeped in astonished.

"And damned if there wasn't the very Nigger I was looking for, that big yellow kinky-haired Quarles a-setting there finishing off that there ham-bone and all of them pones."

Naturally Mr.Boggs was both irritated and elated. He reached for his pistol -but lo! it was gone, having probably been left near the church where, as Mr.Boggs explained, he "taken a nap!" Nevertheless Mr.Boggs rushed forward especially as the ham was rapidly disappearing. In fact as he expressed it:

"I was so damn mad I could hardly talk. Bet out of there" says I "you—" and Mr.Boggs ussd a stock of expletives which was rich and varied. The Negro continued to sit there eating quietly and eyeing Mr.Boggs, until that gentleman's patience gave quite way and he rushed madly at the colored man.

Being excited at the time Mr.Boggs' testimony cannot be absolutely relied upon at this point to the inch, but be that as it may, he solemnly avers that the Negro reached down into his hindermost pockets and produced a gun at least 4 feet in length and big proportionately. It stands to reason that Mr.Boggs stopped. It is also reasonable to suppose that he diddnot at first comprehend the simple remark, which the Negro thereupon made:

"Dance!"

"Dance? what me?"

"Dance and damn quick."

Now Mr.Boggs was not particularly graceful nor did he feel unusually agile or hilarious. Nevertheless he danced, and danced considerably - as he figured it he danced 30 minutes.

"But what did he want you to dance for?asked a bystander.

Mr.Boggs snorted. "After a man has capered on one foot an hour or so he aint liable to go chasing a Nigger across a swamp is he? Specially if he's got no gun. I fell over on the bed and he just naturally walked off" And continuing his remarks he said:

"I want a pocket gun - I want the damndest biggest pocket gun there is in this whole plantation and if I ever catch that nigger."-

He went out and looked over a crowd of blacks loafing near and finding no one that he recognized, kicked an unoffending pickaninny for luck, and walked off again toward the swamp fingering his revolver. He was gone all night and his wife was worried, but late the next afternoon one might have seen Mr.Boggs making his way out of the swamp with a satisfied smile on his face. Every few rods he raised a large bottle to his lips chuckled audibly and hurried on taking a well-known path homeward.

The full moon rose in the east and the red sun dropped lazily westward. Mr.Boggs took a long and loving pull at the green bottle, and looked about him. There was the familiar long shadow of himself cast by his friend the sun, stretching down to the right. He knew its length well and often told time by it. And by it now it was full time for supper. So he started along the path. Then he espied something: on the left was another fainter but well-defined shadow which Mr.Boggs could not rightly understand. He balanced himself and eyed it suspiciously until his ear caught a faint rustle of the leaves -ha! he comprehended - he was followed. The sweat started on his brow. He glanced about carelessly and stepped firmly along the road. It was as he had suspected - the strange shaddw followed almost noiselessly. Mr.Boggs walked swiftly. So did the shadow. He broke into a gentle trot and with a perceptible rattle of the leaves the shadow trotted too. Mr.Boggs accelerated his pace, he ran and ran faster-in fact he came ~~down~~ up the gentle incline to his cabin at a rate which few sprinters have equalled and none perhaps surpassed; and yet as he fell panting against the house it was with full presence of mind. He straightened himself up, whistled carelessly and would not look round but kept the shadow in the tail of his eye as he called carelessly:

"Marthy, Marthy!"

" "What? why is that you Hash? What on-"said Mrs.Boggs aloud, but he added "sh" with his eyes and remarked "It's a damn fine night!" and then under his breath:

41-7-365

[redacted] don't get scared" and He whistled vociferously -whispering between strains" now come here - do you see anything behind me in the bushes?"

"No."

Mr.Boggs turned warily "that shadow" he whispered.

"What shadow?"

"That there."

"That's your shadow."

"No - on the right."

"Course - aint the moon up? Hash Boggs,you drunken loafer,do you mean to say-"

"Marthy,go to hell - get me some supper." And seating himself in the doorway Mr.Boggs rested from his labors.

Down in the swamp by the red radiance of pine knots sat a dozen black men talking- and the boy Robert with his bundle of food.

"I killed her because she was bothering with that white man - and I'm going to kill him too." Quarles was saying

"I knowed it"said Tom"and that's why I knocked him down to let you get away. I'm sorry you did it,Jim,I'm sorry you killed the poor weak woman, she didn't know no better,poor thing." Then his face hardened. "And I'm sorry you didn't kill him then and there. But it's too late now, Jim -no more killing now for it will hurt us all.Where's the sheriff?"

"[redacted]

"Gone home" said Robert "he's been scouring the swamp up east" Quarles ate ravenously: [redacted] -Well good bye boys-I'm off . Take care of yourselves" and the fugitive slipped away into the dark forest.

Chapter VII

Hilda.

Hal and Hilda were not Miss Silena's first boarding pupils for she had early found that her school must be a home as well as a school and a her friend had sent her money for a large brick building where they were housed. Hal was not happy. He was not a bad boy- indeed there was a peculiar cleanness of soul and honesty beneath his sharpness and restlessness and mischief. Under Miss Silena's care he grew a shade cleaner and tamer. than before but not tamed. On the whole he despised the school life and longed for the freedom of fields and waters and trees. Some things to be sure, were fairly interesting - singing, errands, sweeping the big halls in clouds of dust, and driving old Jim the mule; the fire too had been glorious and he had romped and yelled and worked and enjoyed himself hugely. But books and lessons and long hours of squirming and gigling and frowning which were called "study hours" these things he hated with perfect hatred and the sharp restless look grew beneath his tangled hair and lay plainly in sight this morning. He wheeled round the corner in his usual half-run, half skip, and met a white boy somewhat larger than himself stiffly dressed and feeling important. The boys' eyes met ~~each other~~ "Get out of my way" demanded the white one; "I won't" retorted the yellow one and then before Miss Silena could realize it the boys were rolling in the dirt, fighting and ~~calmoring~~ clawing like animals. A fight between two small boys in most lands is a thing for laughing, chiding and waihing - it is the same in the south if the boys are both white ~~and~~ or both black, but when one is of one color and the other of another, and when the darker boy bids fair to give the lighter one a good drubbing, then there as food for mobs and riots. A crowd of white men and boys gathered suddenly and seized Hal Quarles and while another crowd of colored people edged near. A policeman hurried up, the crowd began to jostle and curse and Hal saw his danger. His eyes danced with mingled anger and merriment and diving suddenly he upset his captor, slipped between the legs of the policeman, wriggled twisted and dodged and was soon running like a deer with a long string of halloing cursing men after him.

41-7-367

Of course they did not catch the boy; he was fleet as a hare and knew every nook of the city and country. But where would he go and where could Miss Silena find him? That was the problem. All next day ~~she~~ Robert Calhoun had one of her ~~son~~ husband's men searching and all night. There was no record of him at the police station and ~~she~~ Robert was in despair as ~~she~~ he started out the second morning when to ~~her~~ his absolute amazement there sat Hal on the fence not two hundred yards from the school swinging his legs and peering narrowly down the street. ~~She~~ He stopped and leande against the fence in the sheer weakness of her surprise.

"Hal" ~~she~~ he gasped "What in heaven's name are you doing here?"

"Waiting" said the boy grimly "I'm going to finish lickin' that kid he comes by here every morning." Without another word ~~Robert~~ he seized the struggling protesting boy and slipping round the back way carried him to Miss Silena's cottage. A little council of war was held for ~~[illegible] cottage. A little council was held~~ and to Hal's great delight it was decided to send him out in the country nearby to work on a farm, near enough for his sister to visit him regularly and see after him.

To Hilda the new school life was a veritable opening of the heavens. She was in her every instinct a lady born to caste and rags -some ancestor whether Zulu chieftain or Virginian aristocrat had bequeathed to her a poise and delicacy, a pride and beauty which made her rise to her new life with a naturalness and lack of affectation that seemed wonder ful when Miss Silena remembered that morning in the dirty cabin. Then too she blossomed like a rose - in a certain tropical magnificence mingled with a great innocence and simplicity of soul and a yearning for life and the beautiful things of life. She grew ashamed of her squalid past - yet it was a good solid shame - a shame that was an incentive and not a temptation- a source of loving and striving and doing and not of hating and repining and waiting. By such shames the world ~~pieces and~~ rises upward from cloud to cloud. She was religious by nature but had a certain fine paganism, a Greek love of form and fitness, an African sense of song and color, an Italian longing for pure beauty. Having known poverty and squalor and dirt and hunger in childhood she leapt from the old dark chrysalis gay-winged and gorgeous in spirit, sensing a new world, looking for daily miracles and knowing few metes and bounds. The things she had suffered she thought due wholly to her position and not to anything in herself- she had been a servant and therefore took the slights that rained on servants, but now she was to be a lady, why not? Was not the face that looked out upon her from a little mirror bewilderingly beautiful and framed in pride and sensitiveness, she seat out toward the great sky- all she touched grew beautiful- the plain print frocks took to frills and touches of color, the dats flashed with bits of ribbon and the flowers of the field came willingly to garnish her toilets. Yet with all this there was notthing sordid and selfish. The beauty of her new world was a beauty for all- not just for hernelf; her joyousness and song lightened every one it touched and Miss Silena loved the girl as a strange new flower of the deep forest- strange because so utterly different from herself.

The new world soon had its touches of targedy and sorrow. The memory of the half-known mother came now and then with her weak face and faltering words and then Hilda's eyes would fill witd sudden tears- why, she hardly knew and she would stroke Miss Silena's hand and kiss her timidly for Hilda had known but little kissing in her babyhood. Then gradually as she grew, out from the blue cloud-kissed roof of her new world dipped the shadow of her race. It startled and bewildered her on street, in newspapers and in talk and thought. Why should there be these curious saddening distinctions whene there was neither ignorance nor dirt nor slavery to base them on? And sitting one day in a cabin, looking on the setting sun she suddenly said to Miss Silena:

41-7-368

"Isn't God queer?"

"Why - I - that is -" n one of these thoughts seemed to fit, so Miss Silena compromised:

"Why Hilda!"

But Hilda shook her head and laughed and then started on her weekly visit to the country to clean Hal's cabin as was her wont. Yet this visit always saddened her- everything was so sordid and dirty. Could she ever have lived like this in narrowness and dirt and discomfort? could a cabin like this have been home - this sordid mass of ill-smelling discomfort? A sense of utter misery overwhelmed her. Why? Why? why? she wailed must this be in so beautiful a world and then rolling up her sleeves and girding up her skirt she began -sweeping, dreaming, working on until a gruff voice called in at the door.

41-7-369

"Is Hal Quarles here?"

She looked up at the sheriff in surprise.

"No, sir" then her heart jumped "what do you want him for?" but Boggs stood staring frankly and boldly at her rumpled beauty, and her cheeks burned as she raised her head haughtily and saying "Search if you want to," she walked out, listened and then ran swiftly up toward the great wood, looking over her shoulder as she ran, and calling softly "Hal? Hal?"

Chapter XVIII

Edith & Hilda

Robert Calhoun was walking in the great woods that run from Wilton Point back toward the rolling inland. The world was very bright to Robert that morning and he hurried along in pleased pride dreaming. Up into the deep woods he went listening to the birds and whistling and singing: perhaps he would be a representative some day and then a senator; he would stand like this and throw his hands and the men would gape at him. He'd have a fine house painted green like Colonel Jones' and then he dropped his dreaming fith a laugh and throwing back his head sang a merry rollicking work song such as he had heard the wharf hands sing on the Charleston docks

In the midst of his song a faint "Hallo" struck his ears. He stopped abruptly ly and listened till he heard the voice again. Breaking through the under brush he approached the river and came into an opening. A tall white girl stood there. Her dress was frayed with clamoring through the wood, and in her arms were an easel and sketch book. She had evidently lost her way but she started back when she saw the black boy. Then catching herself she drew herself up and said imperiously "Show me the way to the road." He smiled at her ~~haughty~~ haughty air for she was not over 15 and he said cheerily:

"Which road?"

His air and smile reassured her and there was unspoken apology in her tones as she answered:

"The road to Wilton Point- I wandered away sketching and lost my bearings."

He turned without a word and she followed. Then he noticed that the path was hard to follow with the easel and he quietly took it and went on ahead. As they proceeded she felt more and more uncomfortable at her manner and she walked a little faster.

"Do you live at Wilton Point"she asked.

"Yes" he answered and then, as his dreams returned "but I'm going to Columbia."

"So am I" she said "My father is in the legislature."

"So is mine, and I'm a page."

She looked at him in surprise for she knew another page up there only he was different- so different that she found herself saying suddenly:

"Are you sorry to be black?" She had not meant to say this but her thought spoke itself before she could stay it, and then, beside, she had longed to talk of this frankly to someone.

"Sorry, No! Why?" he answered looking at her in amusement. They were walking side by side and the river was rippling near.

"It must be - awful-"

"It isn't a bit - I laugh, and talk and eat and drink just as you do" with a perplexed wrinkling of his forehead.

"But - black people are not- pretty."

"Neither are white people, always, and beside looks are not all."

"No, but they're lots."

"That's so, and I like good looking black folk; they can be fine in form

41-7-870

and face to my thinking."

"Ye -es- but their hair and they, well they can't blush" she said blushing frankly.

"No," he said feeling a flush in his own dark face and feeling too a sort of unreasoning anger in his heart -they can't" and then disdainfully "what's the use of it - as for hair I don't like straight hair- I think brown curly haired people prettier than dead white folks with strings flying."

"But - but most black people seem so dirty and - "

"That's because they've been slaves and haven't had time to be clean like white people."

"And now that they're free do they expect to become like white people?"

"No but they expect to be people in their way just as you are in yours."

She looked at him -"but white folks can go with such people as they like and visit them and- and marry them."

"Yes, but I suppose that means you go with yourselves and visit yourselves and marry yourselves - all right we'll do the same, go with ourselves, visit ourselves and marry ourselvesp" she said, repeating a phrase she had often heard.

"But there'll have to be laws always to keep the two races apart."

"Why?" he asked defiantly.

"Why because you or some of you would want to go with white folks- and we are proud of our blood and have a right to be."

"And do you think we want your old blood" he said. "Do you think I'd want a friend or an acquaintance or a -wife who didn't want me?"

"Why no, I suppose not."

"Well then, if we didn't want each other we shouldn't need laws to keep us apart."

She looked puzzled. "But if some did want each other?"

"Then laws would be no good."

"But they've got no business to want each other," she cried, and then suddenly she caught sight of the road and the little town before her. She started and a sense of indiscretion, of vague wrong came over her. She had been talking almost familiarly with a Negro, not as she talked to the servants but with a new feeling of human fellowship. She took her things from him quickly. "Thank you" she said coldly and started away, and then she turned back quickly and searching in her tittle knit purse found a last bright silver quarter -"Thnak you" she said again and with a smile "I am Edith Coles, Harrison Coles' daughter -here". But the young man had turned his back suddenly and was walking back into the woods. She stood in surprise and looked after him thoughtfully, holding the money in her hand. Then she turned slowly away but looked back. He was gone. She felt a vague discomfort, a feeling of anger, disappointment, curiosity and regret all mingled and softened into something disquieting and wavering.

41-7-371

Robert walked on with a new thoughtfulness a new wonder in his heart, for the girl's questions had awakened new thoughts and questionings. He had hitherto received the differing colors of men in something the same way as the differing colors of earth and sky and sea - as interesting facts, differieg orders, but not warring, jealous unadjustable things. To be sure, he had instinctive y felt differences and gaps and limits, but he had viewed them curiously as from afar, or looked upon them as in the course of nature or thought of them as relics of slavery. Himself he never found strange to himself nor realized that othero ididd. He held out his hands; they were dark grown, the color of the good brown earth, deep rilh and warm; ouch was the color of primal man. So was Adam hued when his dark body trudged doubtingly together at the bidding of his soul. So once peered all mankind, till they were paled with hiding from thn sun and their sharp faces bleached with haunting midnaghts of sin. To the awakening man this color of his hands seemed far more natural than any other; there was to him a sharp hard gleam about a white skin that struck him coldly, while darker hues seemed warmer, homelier, nearer, and then the other things, the hair, differing kinds of comeliness, the mingling and marrying - he had never thought of these things definitely or lingeringly as he could remember. He groped in his mind for his past thoughts - but found none. When in his dreams he had married, it had always been of course some brown maiden like his sister Mary; it seemed strange and unreal to think of any one else or feel any affection for them, or any fellowship or nearness; then it suddenly occurred to him that they of the uncolored world perhaps felt the same but he laughed at the discovery and thought it natural. So it was that Robert Calhoun entered the portals of a new world.

It was a vast world - a puzzling world; a world half-hateful, half-alluring At times a fiere joy surged in his veins, and the lust of battle burned in his eyes, and then a low dull unreasoning anger glowed sullenly- an anger at that proud white-faced girl who despised him. What was she? And he beat the shy little violets cruelly with his switch, and pushed through the white clouds of dogwood and entered the portals of a new world.

41-7-372

~~four~~ Two years past by- years of strife and turmoil, of intrigue and bloodshed that made the boy more sober and thoughtful as he gazed upon the world. Again he walked in that same great glowing wood and he remembered the scene vividly. A bitterness crept into his heart as he neared the place of the meeting. He remembered the faint "Hallo"! that had greeted his ~~xxx~~ whistling, and half laughing he whistled again the wild merry tune that seemed so beautiful then - so trivial ~~then~~ now, and -hark! a low hallo! greeted him and then the vision burst again.

41-7-373

A girl stood before him, but she was not white: a girl just there where the thick wood clearing formed a great glorious frame of green and ~~gold~~ black - a girl just bursting to womanhood - a girl- was it a girl or was it some vision glorious, standing startled there in the evening sun, some woman wonderful? her face was burnished gold and her hair the wavering brilliant changing brown of bronze. All her soul seemed to stream and quicken and quiver thru her little limbs. Her eyes were little pools, dark liquid pools that stand of a summer's day in forests' fastness, no rather they were fires that leap in dark mountains - they were depths of mighty night all starry and meteored with threading light; and now they were lightning gleams, shuddering on the eternal halls. Her hands were blue and red beneath the gold. Her hair did not string lankly to the ground, but curled and hesitated, coiling in a thousand shivering ringlets, soft and glistening like a summer sea. Her head was poised proudly on a slender neck, and her little bosom burst above a waist that was all rythm and movement. She did not blush but went red gold from cheek to ear and glowed darkly like a summer sunset ~~kind~~ soft and silent, on a brown and silent sea. Ah, she was woman wonderful.

He stood before the vision rapt and silent, till her voice, the tenor and pleading of her voice startled him out of dreamland.

"Hal" she cried "I -I thought you were Hal- Have you seen Hal - the sheriff is ~~police are~~ coming - Can't you help me find Hal?"

Then he came to himself again . It was little Hilda Quarles - he had not seen her these ~~four~~ two years - he had never noticed her before, what had happened in ~~four~~ two years - ~~four~~ two little years - then he hastened toward her half reverently and said softly:

"Don't you know me, Hilda? Don't worry, we'll find him."

Hand in hand they hastened back through the forest seeking, calling until at last they came upon him - a fawn-colored boy of 16, with brown tangled hair, haughing mouth and dare-devil eye.

"Oh Hal," she cahokd "what did you do? the sheriff came to the cabin after you" and I'verun every step." What have you been doing, Hal?" she wailed.

"Nothing" said Hal laughing sardonically and balancing himself on an old stump.

"Come Hal, tell us, how was it?" asked Robert.

"Well I've been working ~~for Col. Blakesley~~ on Col. Jones' place now for a year and he hasn't paid me. So this morning I walked over and helped myself to a bag of cotton on account - just exactly 108 pounds-52 weeks at 25c a week."

Robert laughed. "You oughtn't to have done that Hal and you must take at back."

"He didn't intend to pay me."

"Well sue him then."

"We sue a white man? Hell! what with?"

"Well at any rate Hal there's just one thing for you to do and that is to carry this cotton back."

Hal was sulky but the determination of Robert and the tears of Hilda prevailed. Sending Hilda on ahead they took the cotton back to ~~Col. Blakesley~~ the Jones plantation, but the ~~Colonel~~ overseer said not a word to Robert's explanation, only slammed the door in their faces and Hal went back to Miss Silena's. The next day the sheriff appeared at the ~~school~~ cabin as Robert had half expected and arrested Hal for stealing.

"It will be all right". Robert assured Miss Silena, but Hilda insisted on going to the court room with them. And so they went down the village street Hal swinging freely along hand cuffed to the gruff sheriff and Robert and Hilda behind.

A moment on the threshold of the dirty court room she wavered- a hundred eyes were on her, a dozen loafers discussed half audibly her hair, her face, her limbs. The blood rose dizzily to her head but she walked in and sat down and slipped her arm about her brother's shoulders. The judge was a coarse heavy faced man smeared with tobacco juice and the air was heavy with smoke and odors of liquor. She did not dare turn round but sat staring blindly at the desk and the lawyers until she realised that one big red faced man was staring persistently at her. She turned and looking out the dirty window and hot blinding tears welled in her eyes. She scarcely heard what was said until her brother rose and his sturdy defiant voice rang out. The answer stunned her and it stunned Robert -12 months? 12 months?her own brother to live a year among the depraved and manacled like a slave. O God,a osbbing shook her and stifled her;she tried to speak - to plead but what she said she knew not. Some one came up and said pleasantly "Come to my office and we'll try to get him out"-she thanked him hysterically and took his card and then it seemed so natural to look up and find Robert's grave face to put her little hands in his and let him lead her silently away.

41-7-374

41-2-375

Robert had seen the lawyer speak to her and a fear shot through his heart:it was Roland Reynolds,formerly page with him in the legislature;they did not speak but when Hilda was out on the sidewalk she told Robert what he said. He was skeptical and tried to dissuade her from going but she plead so hard that at last he went with her to the railway offices where Reynolds had his headquarters and was directing his father's interests. As they entered Roland looked up.

"Hello Bob"he said carelessly.

"Good morning,Mr.Reynolds."

"What can I do for you?"

"I came with Miss Qurales - to see about her brother.-"

He waited and fumbled his pen but Calhoun sat down quietly and the girl waited.

"What's your name?" he asked.

"Hilda Quarles.!

Still he fidgeted and Calhoun waited.

"You can go,Calhoun-"at last said Roland. "I'll transact this business with - wi th Hilda."

Calhoun rose. "Have you anything to say to her that I cannot hear?he said.

"Well- suppose I have?" said Reynolds irritably looking him full in the face.

"Then" said Calhoun quietly" she cannot hear it."and he lead her out.

But she did not understand - it seemed like giving up the last chance to save her brother. She must go back.

"Robert" she said pleadingly "just - a moment- I must-" and she turned and flew back up the stairs. A sickening suspicion rose in Robert's heart - how could he help it - he knew what a pretty colored girl faced in the south, and he did not know how innocent her heart was. One-two-ffive-ten minutes he waited and then he heard her step on the stair. A slow faltering step. Her face was ashen, they did not speak to each other, they did not look— but within their worlds were whirling-her faith in God and His universe was ~~tempting~~ trembling- his faith in Love and Truth was tottering.

41-7-376

Silently they hurried to the jail. It was twilight when they bade little Hal good-bye. He choked a bit but kept his old defiant look.

"O I'll get on all right, Sis-I'll -O yes, I'll try and be good - You ought to have some one to protect you, tho' Sis I - I saw them fellows ~~a~~ staring at you - but you just tie to Bob -he's the best fellow I know— and he loves you" and then he was gone. She stood bent forward her hands upon her breasts, her head turned away from Robert, startled, mystified, self-revealed. The message had rung on her heart like summer thunders, new yet old, so old, so unnatural. It was as though ~~her eyes~~ he upon some ashen waste had struck a sudden sunlight and a bloom. She turned slowly and looked at him in deepening wonder, wide-eyed as though her soul new born unclothed itself to him alone and then as the prison doors (closed upon Hal) ~~closed~~ ~~glided~~ she half lifted her little arms as if to ~~and~~ stretched them ~~boringly~~ toward Robert's ~~his~~ great shoulders. He looked into her eyes- her great dark eyes and therewithin saw black and endless depths -upon those depths slept other depths as deep and dark again - deep calling unto deep. Beneath the deep flowed flame and in the flame burned Love ~~forever~~ but he did not see it. He could not see it. A chill had frozen his heart. The face of Roland Reynolds swam in his eyes and he stepped slowly back. She saw the movement - she faintly divined the cause and with a ~~cry like a hurt animal~~ stifled sob she turned and disappeared.

A wave of revulsion shook his soul. He started to run after her- but just then a messenger boy called him & thrust a telegram in his hand and it said:

"Come immediately and prepare for the election.'

"Mary."

He hurried to the depot.

Chapter IX.

The Lynching.

The critical election of 1876 was approaching and Tom Calhoun was working eagerly to unite his followers with the best elements of the Southern whites. The demagogue Sands, while secretly playing the spy and informing the radical southerners was openly espousing the cause of the old ring whose thefts were ruining the state.

As the election approached Tom took the stump against the old ring which was supporting Sands. A great mass meeting was held at Beaufort and Sands spoke. He was an imposing man and his argument was shrewd.

41-7-377

"Gentlemen" he said in conclusion "these men are the ones that first recognized you as men and voters; they organized a government of and by the people. They have made mistakes, perhaps been extravagant and not done much that they might have but I tell you they never held you in slavery or sold your children or drove you with a lash through the cotton fields." Loud applause greeted the speech and Tom went valiantly to the attack. A great black and brown mass of humanity filled the hall. The air was stifling with smoke and sweat. The wind sang without and a murmur and roll of voices rose and fell within. Yet Tom talked the calm direct speech of the folk: "I tell you, men," he said " it pays to be honest and Joe Sands is not honest. I've worked for a year to get land for us poor people and he stole and gave it away for an office. Ever since you put him in the state house by your votes he has been bartering away your rights. He has flattered and lied and deceived on the theory that the only way to win in this world is to fool somebody. Today men, we face two roads: by the one we must stand up independently and honestly for our rights, uniting in self-defence and for self-protection and voting for honest men and honest measures. The other road is pointed out to you by Sands and it leads to slavery, trickery, stealing and bowing-down. I don't know what you are going to do about it but i'm going to vote against Sands and everything he stands for." The effect of the speech was tremendous both from its simplicity, its well -known truth and the honesty of Tom. Sands was furious.

"You promised to support me and I can prove it" he yelled.

"I did promise to support you, if you'd do one honest deed" retorted Tom. "and you did it but it turned out to be the biggest piece of thieving of the lot - the land steal. For that reason, I didn't keep my promise and I won't -would you?" he cried turning to the people. The answering yell shook the sea:

"No!" they cried, and Sands turned to the door.

As the time of the election approached evidence of organized effort to intimidate the Negroes and break their power was daily manifest, and Tom Calhoun set his teeth grimly. "Fight the devil with fire" he cried and he called meetings secretly of the leading black men. But Sands was watching him and what Sands found out came quickly to the ears of Colonel Jones.

41-7-378

It was a bright balmy night. In the sombre home at the head of High stood two women. One was tall and erect-her face pale and finely cut, touched with age and wreathed with whitening hair. She stood with her hand on the door knob of the front door - she was just opening it- it was already partly ajar when she heard her name called and threw her head back to catch the meaning of the sudden call. Without the great partially opened front door in the arched corridor stood another woman, -rather a girl, slender and lithe, with smooth dark brown face, thick clinging hair and a full lovable mouth. She seemed very happy standing there, her head half turned backward toward the scented magnolias, and a faint love light in her eyes like moon-rise. She had rung the bell and stood with a little note in her hand from her father Tom Calhoun to Colonel Jones and she had not noticed that the door had begun to open. As she stood she crooned half consciously a melody- a song without words in deep low tones of infinite sweetness, that seemed every about to escape into wondrous melody yet ever fell away into some tearful minor cadence;- the woman within, the tall old woman with her hand lingering on the door knob heard two sounds - a sound of singing - low sweet singing, distant beautiful, and from behind a sudden quick whisper-"Irma-my cloak and mask we're after that Calhoun Nigger tonight."

The song on the heart of the girl choked in her throat; the note fell to the floor, she saw the door half ajar, she heard the words, she whirled and swayed and fled like a fawn. Past street and lamp she flew, silent swift as a cat; past the pale half lighted stores of Broad Street, through the dim alley of Sixth, down Sixth. A horseman reined up just to see her flit across his mare's forelegs; a dog snapped furiously after her, a watchman hailed her gruffly, but ere he turned she was gone. Slowly a dull red light spread above and about her. A murmur of voices and crackle of flames rose clearer and clearer down where the First African Church used to stand, but she heeded nothing until the roar of the fire and the shout of the mob flared full upon her as she turned into Cedar. Pausing suddenly she stood like a bronzen statue, slight and still. The flaring building threw a crimson glory on the rising street and behind loomed the great city, dark and dead. Against this awful shadow the slight figure of the lone black girl stood for a moment glorified and the mob swept straight toward her, grim and hoarsely shouting -naked men red-shirted or blacd cloaked, with long glistening ropes: tall lank mountaineers with shot guns and pistols, slight youths in fantastic headdresses, drunk and blasphemous.

41-7-379

A second the girl looked on the the ~~hind~~ horsemen with widened eyes, then turning darted like a deer back through the alley to the left.

"Stop the wench" cried a voice.

"Stop Hell! March on!" came a low stern command.

At the edge of the city where the city street, free at last bounds into the ~~rolling~~ smooth black country side, where straggling dim-lighted cabins sit lonesome here and there, a panting girl still fled to the west. Up the low knoll she flew, past tree and cabin, until all sweat and mud, she had left the last house of the red city behind, and there rose before her Smith's ~~hill~~ woods and the dark sentinel oak spreading its black limbs.

With dizzy eyes s he peered into the gloom as she dashed along, until at last she seemed to see a tall dark form silently rise beneath the swaying tree. An awful gladness clutched her heart. The earth rose, reeled, and staggered beneath her feet - the hot blood pounded in her ears.

Then a terror crept slowly on her. She slipped and stumbled, rose and wavered on. Why did he stand so still? Why did he look so strangely tall? His hands seemed -my God! his feet were swinging in the air! !

She bounded toward him "Father!" she shrieked. The tree moaned softly and the red light of the city fell full upon the dull ~~hillside~~ (the black + moaning forest. forest.

"Pappy!"she wailed and shivering crept beneath the swinging body, stretched her frail form upon the dank, red earth and writhed.

Chapter X~~I~~.

The Mourning.

Robert stepped hurriedly from the train "Hello Isis"he cried "Is any thing wrong-are the chances of beating them good?"

"Yes."

He brightened. "Has anything happened to you."

"Nothing."

"My, but your message scared me -how's ma?"

"I don't know."

"Don't know -why?"

"I haven't been Home."

He looked up at her with a start and a great lump hardened in his throat.

"Sister - sister?"he cried.

She put her arms about him and in the depths of her clear ~~sweet~~ eyes stood neither tear nor fear, but the shadow of supreme sacrifice, and she pulled his head down gently and whispered in his ear; and whispered again and said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

When they came forth into the street, sister and brother, hand in hand, the shadows were streaming upward from the moaning river, and in the boy's face God had carven two straight lines, downward through the cheeks to ~~mark~~ mark the begining of the hours of the days of his manhood.

As they came to the home he put her gently back and behind the shelter of the gate she kneeled and waited.

Juno saw him from the door-"Where's-sister" she cried "she did not come home last night."

"She's safe - mother-safe - I kept her helping me."

She looked at him.

He came and stood silent within the lintels of the door and she went all a-tremble.

41-7-380

"Will it - rain, honey, "she said.

"No mother the sun is all ashining."

"The cow -"she said "the cow hasn't - isn't "

"The cow, dear mother, is in the stable yonder."

The trembling crept into her voice-"is the place at old Wilton— then they've taken the house and lot -yes, yes."

"No ,mother."

"Yes, O God, it is -it is the place, tell me it's the house, Oh, it must be -Rob- O God -Rob? Is he dead?"

"Dead -dead- long dead."

Of a sudden the trembling ceased. She put out her hand vaguely and spread another garment of the week's ironing on the board, dampened it carefully and ironed it, swiftly, steadily. Another and another followed. Into the back door four men staggered with an awful burden. Still the woman ironed moving neither fast nor slow but evenly. The girl came silently in and replenished the fire. "Mother will you not rest?she asked. Juno looked at her with strange eyes. "No, I must work or die"and all night the girl sat feeding the fire and the mother stood ironing and re-ironing the clothes.

41-7-381

Then in the great blue morning, she turned slowly, wearily away and donned her black dress. She stepped to the dark kitchen door. The boy and girl made as if to follow; but she motioned them away and entering closed the door.

The murder of Tom Calhoun fell like a northern blast upon the Negroes of Wilton Point. They bent and bowed before it as before the cruel storm, that swept their low lying islands in December. Not that murder was a new thing to them. Human life was ever cheap in Carolina and the lives of black men cheapest of the cheap. But this death was the End of Something and the Beginning. The end of the vast dream of Freedom toward which they stretched in sudden and sweet awakening, January 1, 1863. The beginning of that second nightmare of slavery that holds them bound and crushed this day. They came then to bury a Dream - to weep over an Ideal for which their dark and bleeding hearts had striven piteously, if blindly, earnestly if in vain. The burial had been quick, secret, and at night, but the funeral was preached a month later, according to slave custom.

They came in droves to the crossroads church, Siloam, and sats before the preacher in great rows of silence and the voice of the preacher faltered and broke in the midst of his sermon; then gathering strength swept onward and upward in hope and faith and wild exultation and the audience crept after him but faltered by the wayside. There came a hush and a thousand eyes were strained towards the silent bended figure that sat between the tall son and slight daughter.

Then Juno rose and turning toward the upturned faces stretched her arms and moaned before the Lord, even as her mother had moaned and her mother's fathers had moaned in the presence of their dead a hundred and a thousand years agone: stark and straight she stood with closed eyes and swaying body waving her arms rythmically, chanting wierdly in tones that rose, fell, wavered and almost sang: and all the host bowed, bent, and slipped to their knees murmuring in one low minor monotone "Hear her, Lord, Hold up her hands, O weeping Jesus - Amen and Amen." And these were the words of her death song: "O Tom, Tom, where is you Tom, my Tom" she muttered and then -full-voiced, "God has taken my man and reached him up on high; why did you to it, God?- didn't you know I loved him, Jesus, -didn't you feel my heart apulling when you called him in the night, the dark cruel night. I love you God- yes- but O God your ways are hard and dark to poor old Juno. Reach out and smooth my soul. You give him to me God, and now you's took again, blessed be you God and blessed be your ~~son~~ Jesus' SON. O Tom was a marvel man, so strong and high and pretty when first these old eyes lighted on him. I loved him with my life even when I sinned against him. I had rather adied than sinned against my Tom. I did die, long years I was dead and then dear God you brought him to me again and I woke." She opened her eyes, streaming with tears and stretched her hands straight upward while the host sank lower and wept and wailed "Blessed be God, the God of black folk who brought again my husband from the dead. Forgive his enemies, Great God, but when they come to the dark river show them my twisted murdered man. There's no more moaning now Tom, no more mourning" and she sank quivering against the altar in one dark bowed mass -"I'm just awaiting, Tom, just awaiting." The sobbing of the bowed multitude fell to moaning and the moaning to murmuring and the murmuring spread like a great wide wave and the wave swept into song. Far down the coast and across the islands and across the waters of the purple sea men stopped and listened to these thousand voices raised in death-song:

"Were you there when they crucified my Lord?"

41-7-382

Chapter XI.

The ~~Temptation~~ Tempting

Hilda was wandering down near the gates of despair. Where was the use of trying, what was the use of striving. All her love of the world beautiful was slipping from her. She saw her own wonderful face now with growing terror, for since that ten minutes alone before the face of Roland Reynolds the scales had dropped from her eyes. She was alone and helpless-a chartiy burden on the slender purse of poor busy worried Miss Silena. What could she do - what could she do -What faced any colored woman in the South: shame, drudgery, or ~~sx~~ teaching. She could not teach - she did not know enough - o yes, there were scores o f black teachers who knew less, but was that excouse for her, who was ignorant and knew she was ignorant? Drudgery? All her little body quivered and shrunk from the coarse hard toil of field and kitchen and besides with its taunts and insults and oppression how did it differ from open shame? Shame- the glances of the street no longer warmed her merry innocent heart. She saw in them all now the glance of Roland Reynolds. She saw too that she could not escape them - there was no protection. Any insult of look, whisper, note, ~~jobbity~~ - any insult could be offered her in public and there was no escape no redress. In the strong arms of one man she might have found refuge, but he had dared to distrust her in her childish innocency and she hated him for it. She had no one to tell- no one to confide in. Poor Miss Silena knew nothing of the world thus shadowing her and had for such things but a few weak New England wisesaws, fathered in ice and snow, and mothered in law and plenty. Then two shadows haunted the growing girl whithersoever she turned. On the street, in the yard even in the school, it was the shadow of Roland Reynolds- he always met her, spoke lowly when no one was near, came on errands to the school and spoke softly to Miss Silena, sent notes innocent yet meaningful. She could not escape him- he was everywhere silent resourceful and with money, money, money. She ran from him, flew at him in white anger, ignored him, listened in dumb helplessness. And then when she escaped him and stood alone in her narrow room then came the other shadow- the shadow of herself. She began to doubt herself, to question, to wonder. She had heard the tales of her weak mother, her shame and her awful death. Had her mother's spirit leapt to her- was it this that made her prayers empty mockery- was it this that sapped her faith in all good - was it this that kept whispering, whispering -"No use- no use- give up the struggle yield and be comfortable-shame? What is shame but the unconventional deed?" Then as these thoughts strove to form themselves she would fly from herself, loose herself in a frenzy of passionate weeping, stretch her arms toward God and cry to the dumb heavens. So she lived until the awful day when she rose and found poor Miss Silena cold and white and dead. The creditors lounged in the halls, the childrenn cried. At last Hilda stood naked to the world unprotected and pnniless. The door-bell knelled solemnly and she went hesitatingly. Roland Reynolds stood facing her.

41-7-383

and opened the door

Chapter XII

The Chain-gang.

A few days earlier ~~than this then~~, miles away, lay a long low row of filthy huts surrounded by a great stubborn fence. Two or three fat lazy looking white men with rifles, guarded the palisade and drank and laughed and talked. At last one arose looking at his watch. "Well I guess I'll take a last look at the niggers" he said and he strode to the huts. Kicking up the doors of the first he entered uncerimoniously It was a dark illsmelling place with one smoky lanters. A couple of dozen half-dressed women were strewn about the floor. Some were sleeping heavily on dirty straw with bits of bagging or mats over themor lying hin half naked abandon, the great dark limbs stretched out or their half saked breasts showing. Others were disrobing - some hastily concealing theio nakedness as the guard entered and others stood in b utish impudent abandon and leared. "Well girls, all here" said the guard good naturedny and he walked carelessly among them, stepping over their limbs, slapping one woman's flesh familiarly and chatting and joking. "Where's Susie" he said at last peering around. A dark half dressed girl, comely and sullen stood up. He crossed over to her and took her by the arm and she crouched trembling as he whispered something to her. A half-dozen others laughed loudly. Passing he caught at the foot of another woman and she struck at him fiercely. He scowled. "We'll train you ye, Sadie" he said and "Well get to bed" and blowing out the light he left looking the door securely on the female section of the Beaufort city chain gang. The men's huts were even filthier and the blaog bodes lay packed together closely save in the last section where a ceowd were massed together and cries and curses rang. Some were on their knnes around a circle while others bent and crowded over them.

"Seven come 'leven" cried a voice. "Ha!" - it was a peculiar half fierce explosion of breath that accompanied the wave of his hand and he dashed them down.

"Gamblin' again, you black rascals" laughed the guard and he came and stood over them. "Come it's time to quit". "Just a minute, just a minute captaintill I skin this nigger" cried one of the gamblerm. The other one seized the dirty yellowy dice. It was Hal Quarles with drawn face, and blood shot eyes and clothed in rags; the shackles clanked on his ankles as he threw the dice three times. He was pale with excitement.

"Six come seven -ha?"

J1-7-384

"Seven come twelve-ha?"

"Two come eleven-ha! Hell! -take it and be damned!"and he threw the last greasy coin to the other and the crowd yelled and jeered.

"How much did he lose?"asked the guard.

"Five dollars!"

"God!his lady is keeping him rich!"

"Yep-he gets a fiver every week or so."

"Huh-and Ned gits it nex' day."

The lights flickered and went ou ,the hars voice of the guard yelled "Get to bed" and quiet settled on the quarters. Hal turned restlessly. "Sam any more of that whiskey?"he whispered. A bottle was passed and he drank silently,greedily,and then lay there burning and tossing

Some one touched him "Come on Hal."

"WHere?"

"Over cross the way."

"Another game?will you loan me a quarter?"

The fellow chuckled and Hal followed eagerly. Out through a hole in the rotten cabin three of them wriggled,across a dark space to another building. One of them rapped and listened while Hal took another drink of the raw whiskey till his brain flamed and whirled. Soon a bit of plank was pushed aside and they crept in. It was pitch dark. "How can we see here?"growled Hal fiercely. The other men laughed and crept away - he put out his hand and touched warm flesh and heard a woman's low bold laugh and the lad sank down in wild confusion and half shame.

41-7-385

Chapter XIII

Vengeance.

Robert Calhoun was fighting the battle of his life,and within his mother lay wasting agay. He tried to listen to Mary as she hovered over him:

"Don't think of it Robert - it won't do - it isn't right."

"An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"he muttered.

"But it is useless fighting against the strong,the powerful and the rich."

"Honest resistance is never useless."

"But it may be impolitic,and certainly is today when the times are so fearful."

"For just that reason perhaps a blow in revenge would be heeded."

"But why meet lawlessness with lawlessness."

"Because it can be met no other way."

"Let God meet it - let God do his own work in his own time."

"Well why don't he do it - haven't we waited 200 years?"

"Think of the work you could do for your people if you but put away these bloody thoughts."

"Nothing I could do could be greater than a deed teaching white folk to keep violent hands off of innocent black men."

"Yes,yes Robert one thing we black folk may do greater than any deed of retaliation:forgive our enemies, do good - "

He rose in anger -"Will that sort of stuff impress brute beasts- will you try gentle sermons and sweet deeds on hounds and murderers? No — kill them."

"Who are you Robert,to judge God and his plans. Let us humbly bow-"

"We have bowed humbly too long now,sister-

"But Robert will you leave me and mother alone and unprotected?

"No,Mary,No - and that thought alone holds me back"-"Is it that or am I a coward!" and he rose and paced moodily before the door.

them more often to himself

A stranger passed and stopping leaned over the fence.

"Who owns this place"he asked looking over the land.

"My mother does"answered Robert.

"Is she in?"

"She is sick and can see no one but I do all her business for her."

"Got about 80 acres here haven't you?"

"Forty."

The stranger looked at it critically and turned as if to saunter away.

"Mighty poor land" he said "I'd been thinking of buying up some land here but - "

Robert said nothing.

"What would you sell this place for?"

"We don't want to sell."

"Pshaw!anybody wants to sell if they can get their price." And the stranger moved off. At the gate he pasued again. "I'll give you $2100 for the whole thing" he said,but Robert shook his head and he went on.

~~But~~ Robert sat long in the night and dreamed and in the dream was blood but behind it hovered a girl's sweet face,the wanderful witching beauty of one dark golden face.

"Did you sell the place,Rob?"asked his neighbor over the fence next morning.

41-7-386

"No" said Robert.

"I did - got $150."

"What's he buying for?"

"I hear they're putting cotton mills and a railroad through here."

"Well, I won't sell my father's place" said Robert.

"You'd better- they'll buy you out or cheat you out."

"O, I reckon not."

He turned back to the house and met the land agent again.

"I want to buy this place" he said and "I'll give you $150 which is about twice as much as it is worth."

"I won't sell" said Robert shortly. Two or three times during the next week the agent importuned him until he had offered $200. But Robert was obdurate and the agent went angrily away. Robert thought little of the matter for gradually his calmer self was returning and he was beginning to plan his life. Where was Hilda, he wondered, poor little Hilda and a pang shot through his heart and then a pain for toward him came Roland Reynolds riding and beside him the land agent. Robert could not meet them; his heart was suffocating and he turned aside into the thick forest. They did not see him but rode close to where he sat, talking loudly:

41-7-387

"Do you suppose it's spite against your father for lynching old Tom?" the agent was saying.

"O no, he's been in my office since that - these Niggers haven't much family affection - no it is stubbornness and the only thing to do as I told you is to attach-" and they rode on out of ear shot.

The blood was roaring Robert's ears and the thrill for bitter vengeance for his father's brutal murder rose as wild and insistent as on that awful night when Mary whispered in his ears. He hurried to town and straight to the home of John Epps, an old colored friend of his father. "Uncle John" he said "what did John Reynolds have to do with killing my father?"

"Well, buddy, he was in the mob you know and they say that it was him that lead them to Frazier's woods."

"A traitor and a murderer" said Robert.

"And a white man" added John Epps. "Now see here buddy, don't be a fool. This is a hard world and God knows hardest for black people- so hard that you can't afford to make it harder. If a white man comes at you buddy, kill him if it takes your last drop of blood. But don't go calling up old quarrels and rightsing all the wrong that's head and gone -there's too many - your pappy's only one in a thousand. Let God tend to that -you know what the good book says about revenging -how isit?

And Robert repaeted at mechanically "Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord."

"That's it - that's it."

"Yes," said Robert wearily "that's it - the refuge of cowards since the world began."

But the old man put his hands on his shoulder "There's braver things than dying in this world, son, and one of them is living". Robert walked away in silence.

But once out in the air, like the whirling of hell came wild fierce bitter anger rushing tumultuously over the little whisperings, the calm warning, the old excuses - the "damned dirty cowardice" he hissed and muttered.

"O I am a coward, a cringing pityful coward. I have bent and called it Sacrifice, bowed and named it Duty - I have shuffled and sweated and let men kick me like a dog because I was afraid - afraid - a miserable rabbit - by - " He set his teeth and glided, ran, rushed down the road, kindling the fires of hate and vengeance as he ran, stifling the little whisperings, the little visions - the vision and the whisper: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." In a half hour he had it - the long shining rifle of his father. "Yes - no - a fox, I think!" he muttered at the house, and his sister Mary looked at him curiously as he ran leaping toward the dark and giant oaks to the westward. For a moment he wavered as the shadows closed on him, and the long low plaint of the owl went shivering through the darkness; the whispering of his heart ~~climbed~~ rose and clambered, but he forced them back furiously and strained his eyes till slowly, doggedly he fetched it up from the ~~gravel~~ sands - up till it shone red among the trees, the great black twisted face, the lived neck stretched sideways - the nasty dark crimson gash that wound up into the clotted hair - the oozing dripping brains. "Ah" - he screamed lowly fiercely, with the horror of his own dream, seized the gun and panting, sweating, weeping, crept stealthily onward - across the lagoon, up the creek, over the cotton fields and behind the rows of shadowy houses: raising himself he peered into one - a dining room softly lighted - a woman sewing, a cat dozing and supper laid. Yes, John Reynolds had come down from Columbia and was living in his new house, but he was not home now, he had not come in yet, so Robert crept and writhed back beside the field path and lying prone with the gleaming rifle cocked, waited waited - waited. A rabbit leaped over him and fled in terror; a toad croaked in his ear. There came footsteps and he grew tense and fingered the trigger - no, it was young Roland Reynolds riding back. The father had not come yet, ~~Still~~ he lay and waited - waited, with whirling brain and pounding heart but grim set purpose - waited minutes, hours -long awful years with the wraith of the fearful - hist! He came walking along the road bowed bent with hanging head and listless hands, his gray hair gleamed in the star light; as he came opposite the black man rose silently with levelled gun. John Reynolds saw him, dim ind indistinct "Tom ,Tom" he cried -the rifle flashed in one keen crash of sound and John Reynolds fell prone in the path.

Why not kill the cub too? no, no, the Murderer only and

41-7-38

On, on the boy ran, silently warily holding the rifle well forward and cocked, glancing keenly right and left. Down that same path his father had run red-handed 30 years before - down the same path under the same dark brigge and singing water and crept fainting into the same underbrush Long hours he lay there - till Orion girded his sword from far east to far west. It was done - the deed was done and he was glad. There sat a fearful peace upon his s oul as one by one the pale stars slept before the sun and the crimson and gold of a new day played in the darkened east As the day brightened he rose and sat upon an old stump. A red fox walked past. He shot him, watched him writhe to death; then reloading and throwing the carcass across his shoulder stepped bodly out into the highway and walked careless homeward. A murderer - he shuddered but became suddenly cold and alert as he saw two horsemen approaching. He chose his path carefully and measured his step so as to meet them by the great oak. They greeted him pleasantly "a fine brush ." And rode on. He leaned against the tree. They had not heard yet - they had not heard; they did not k ow that he was a murderer. He turned to enter the wood and cut across toward home, when a sudden trembling seized him. He looked a t his hands in horror - they were red, dripping red and all down his back crept slimy blood. He gave a low cry of fear then remembered that it was only the blood of the fox. Yet and yet - he was a murderer - he had taken human life and his soul was red as his hands - O it was awful - awful - why had God planned it so, why -why? and the shadows danced and the birds screamed as he stepped into the wood and wandered. ~~and wandered.~~

The wood was horror. Dark slimy ooze swished about his feet. A long black snake slipped hissing by and the cold trembling shook all his limbs. He was a hunted beast - an outlaw, a red-handed Cain. Before his feverish gaze the trees shaped themselves as like black gallowses and dark noosed vines looped themselves and swung above him. He could not stay longer in the wood - he dared not. A shriek struggled and fought in his throat and hurling the gun and the bloody carcass of the fox from him he turned and dashed out into the highway. It was already late afternoon. A black coach with prancing horses swept slowly by just as he peered wildly from the forest. And in the polished seat - he looked-he started - he stared - great God! in the polished seat sitting alone and bent forward gazing wearily at the world was John Reynolds- John Reynolds-tall, alive and well. Silently Robert slipped back into the wood-lurched, swayed and fell prone into the black mud.

41-7-389

"Why Robert-Robert- a twenty four hour hunt and only one poor little fox? Why Bob how bad you look. Have you hurt youroelf -didn't you get any other shot?"

Robert caressed his sister's eager face, and turned his away, muttering carelessly:

"I - shot - at - an old wolf -but missed him -thank God!"

"It's a shame to kill them isn't it?but a wolf?a wolf? How strange I never heard of wolves about here."

But Robert was stumbling, crawling, groping up the dark little attic stair and as he went he still murmured -"Thank God-O thank God?" And then barring the door he shook his bloody hands, hurled the stained coat across the floor, weeping laughing, trembling and singing.

41-7-390

Chapter XIVI.

The [redacted] Changeling

It was a day of death and marriage. Up in Harrison Coles' country home, Lloyd Jones was marrying his daughter Edith and all the aristocratic clans of Carolina were celebrating the Revolution of 1876. Down by the restless sea that was ever calling, Juno Calhoun was dying and calling for Henry Jones. Robert hesitated at this whim of his mother, but Mary donned her cloak -he stopped her "I will go" he said and turning seized his hat and went rushing up the street. Colonel Jones was not at home -"Didn't you know this was his son's wedding night?"they asked him in surprise.

He hurried over ts Harrison Coles'house and saw with strange feelings the glare of light and gaiety. It was long before he could get the ear of Colonel Jones and even then he was with great difficulty persuaded to come, but at last he came against his wife's protest and stood bending over the dying woman and his long white hair flew in the night breeze.

She struggled to whisper to him. Her voice came in great gasps- she raised herself on her elbow and her clinging, twisting coils of grey brown hair framed her strickend aged face.

"That night - that night-"

Colonel Jones glanced keenly about "Yes" he said harshly, bending down-

"I - I, Master Jones - did you know what I lost that night - I lost something, I lost something that night."

"What was it" he asked ~~roughly~~ fearfully.

She struggled to rise and he half held her.

"I lost - your baby."

He dropped her and straightened up.

"My baby?"

"Yes, your baby, but whether it was mine or Miss Irma's I don't know". She struggled up again but he shrank back from her as she whispered "Celia found it - and gave it to Henry Reynolds -it's Roland and" her voice came in great gasps of sound "Master Jones, Roland and Lloyd are both your sons and one is mine but which only God ---" and then she sighed and waved her hands wearily and lay back dead.

Colonel Henry Jones passed silently out the door and walked down the beach, and a shadow walked before him. Did he know it? Yes -"Reynolds John Reynolds" he cried and Reynolds paused and listened. Colonel Jones came and put his hands on his shoulders and laughed. It was a great harsh echoing laugh- a mirthless laugh, a laugh that lay before great hardened masses of tears.

41-7-391

"Do you know Celia Jones?"

"Celia" said Reynolds vaguely "Why Celia brought Roland" - then he stopped, but Colonel Jones pushed him roughly backward, passed his hands wildly through his hair and screamed in Reynolds ears above the screaming of the Sea!

"Reynolds -there's a Nigger in my family or in yours and only God knows which" but the mists rose in the mind of John Reynolds and grope as he would he could not understand.

The morning dawned grey and cold and the clouds lingered low above the leaden waters. Within upon a bed white-shrouded was stretched the form of Juno Calhoun -thin, haggard and dead. Beside her stood her children

"It's no use - no use" said Robert "the hand of God is against us."

But Mary lifted her eyes up to him and said "Shame on you, Robert shame! here in the morning of life, in health and strength with the memory our our dear old mammy before us, to falter and hesitate because God has not made our way roses or our paths peace. Shame on you Robert" - and then slowly they fell upon their knees and with bowed heads and trembling words searched for God in the great misty morning and stretched doubtful hands up to the shining armposts of His throne, and without the dog crept in the ~~clay~~ clay and weeds and howled to the sea. Then she continued:

"Robert, I have a plan."

"What is it, sister?"

"We will sell this house,we might as well or they'll cheat us out of it. I will go and live with Uncle Caesar and teach school."

"Teach school?"

"It does sound queer Robert,I know so little but I went to the school commissioner."

"Who is he?"

"Harrison Coles,and he gave me the school of this district and $40 a month."

"Splendid."

"After we pay our debts we'll have $100 left. You will take that and go up to Columbia and take the college course,and I can keep you there with my savings."

His heart beat faster at this spoken echo of an unspoken almost unconscious dream.

"Nonsense"he said shortly. But she was in deadly earnest. "Robert" she said "you must. It is'nt merely land or money or even knowledge that our people need,Robert,it is Vsion and Sacrifice. We must know what the world was and in and what men have thought. I have gotten in my years at Miss Silena's as it seems to me a faint gleam of the meaning of life. I have stood on the foot hills and glimpsed the peaks of the world. And yet you see I know so little - so little."

"But you know,Sis,I wanted you to study more."

"Yes - yes-but I know that but one of us could afford that and it would far better be you because you will have larger and better opportunity to use the things you will see and know. And so for four years you must go up into the hills of God and sit before the vision and then come down and lead us to the Promised Land" and she smiled into his eyes through her tears.

41-7-392

Chapter XV.
The School.

The day of parting came. Mary stood at the depot and smiled brightly and joyously into Robert's face as he boarded the train for Columbia;she waved her handkerchief cheerily as far as he could see but as the train faded away,her eyes grew misty and when at last it was gone and the sense of utter loneliness sank on the brave girl,the great hot tears came rolling unheeded down her face. She was ever a girl older than her years;sensitive as a flower and deeply sympathetic she felt the sorrows an d troubles of others almost before they came and her perfect wonderful usselfishness brought her,so quickly to aid that people came easily to expect it of her. Her spirit of sacrifice was perfectly simple and sincere and attracted no notice to herself. Indeed she was at first glance to all,and ever to the ordinary eye,an unattractive girl,scarcely noticeable alone,quite unnoticed in a throng She was slight almost frail in build,dark brown in color with short greyish crinkled hair,which was always neatly piled in rounded motionless cones,deftly inbraided and twisted. To those whose eyes were trained only to the more glaring flashes of light and ~~shade~~ color on white faces,the softer shadowings of her sensitive countenance were all unheeded and unknown,and her soul looked out from the liquid depths of her eyes dead and unmoved. But those who came to know Mary Calhoun better knew the depths of passionful striving,the low tense yearning for goodness,the great brave feeling that for the good of others no giving of herself was toog great - too exhausting. All the mystic and wierd wanderings of her mother's and grandmother's souls,had in her,through the strong barlane and sense of her father become transmitted into a great vivid passion for spiritual purity. She wanted to be good and true,she wanted the world to be good and true and she wanted this with a fervor so intense and burning that all else paled before this flaming zeal for souls. Long years before when she was but a child she had sat very still in that great reeking revival and then suddenly had risen and stretched her little arms toward God and said clearly,calmly "I am free!" They called this her conversion and on its testimony took her into the church although some who believed in visions shook theio heads The freedom into which she had stepped that day she never left. Ever after she was free - free from all the littleness of life,all its baser passion,all its jealousy,envy and strife,and into her clear eyes came and grew the spirit of endless sacrifice,the sweet lovableness and tender pity - all this,but veiled and unknown to most men because it was shrouded in a dark skin.

41-7-393

Perhaps her greatest physical gift was her voice - a low wonderful contralto that came tumultuously welling upward as from h ills of tears and fell upon her auditor in sudden over-powering sweetnes. Today she hurried quickly from the depot and wandered homeward under the great oaks and sang as she walked the wierd old songs of the far off motherland:

"You may bury me in the east,
You may bury me in the west
But I'll hear the turmpet sound
In that morning."

41-7-394

The low winds crooned with her and at last she found herself weeping again with that sense of perfect loneliness that comes with song. All had gone - her dear old mother,her new found father and now,today, Robert. Tomorrow she must face life and face it alone and if life be hard and puzzling to men,how much harder,narrower,bewildering to a woman? And if bewildering to a woman,what is it not to a black woman in a land that despises them and leaves them naked to their enemies? She felt with sudden dismay all that she must face:they would call her by her first name as they called their slaves and servants;they would couple her with strumpets by refusing to call her "Miss". They would leer at her in secret,take open liberties with her sense of modesty and decency, and regard her ruin by force or wile as the lawful pastime of a gentleman. And iu anywhere,at any time she protested or rebelled,they would laugh at her anger,sneer at her airs,mock at her chastity or slap her face- O God- could she stand this,could she go through it? She lifetd her eyes toward the grey sky and stretched her hands,then dropped them in sudden shame and contrition,sank upon her knees by the great gnarled roots of a black ivy oak;the birds sang above her and when she rose it was with the old sweet look of gladness and sympathy and sacrifice.

The school was to be held in the church for there was no school house and the committee refused to build one. Which church then should be chosen. To Mary the new board Methodist church just built seemed cosiest and better sheltered than the great hulk of old Siloam at the crossroads. But no sooner was her choice known than the whole black community was rent in twain. "What?"said the Baptists "in a Methodist church?" "What?"screamed the old pastor of Siloam "going to that new darky's shanty with his stuck up wayn,No,Sir!" Mary hesitated in dismay and went to consult the Superintendent. He was too bu sy to look at her. "Who?"he asked "Mary Calhoun? O yes,well Mary,you Niggers settle that yourselves,if you can't get5 50 scholars why give the thing up. Now Johnson " and he plunged into his figures. Mary took her usual direct and simple way out of the difficulty. She called a meeting of the patrons and conquering her timidity told them in a straightforward way the situation:"If you want a good school you must have it in the best place;Siloam church is big,the benches have no backs and it leaks; the Zion church is new,tight and small and has good benches. I'm ready to teach in either place - which will you have?" Theyc chose Siloam church but they fixed her some new lbenches and patched the roof. On the opening hay of the first regular free school in the lommunity,125 children sf all ages,sizes and conditions crowded i n. Mary was thoroughly frightened at the row upon row of solemn faces and prospects of teaching them single-handed. The first few days they were interesting,they sang with vigor,looked a t the pictures in the books and wrote on the limited black boards. But the books werefew in number-one to every three or ofur .- the sitting still became irksome and then the mischief makes began to appear. Paper wads flew,bent pins brought agnnized yelps and he whispering made reciting difficult. But the big boys mistook their mild faced little teacher. She stood the hutbut and disorder several days pleading with them and warning them. And then suddenly one morning she sent a troublesome girl home and whipped a half dozen little boys so vigorously that they alarmed the neighborhood. The next morning as she approached the school house she f found a great fat yellow woman with towselled hair and angry mien planted squarely in the door way with one of her victims of yesterday. Affairs certainly looked warlike and Mary felt a chill down her back;but she came straight on.

41-7-395

"I'm so glad you came Mrs.Johnson"she said sweetly - "I wanted to talk to you about Jimmie - come right in and sit down- and here's Aunt Jane too,move right in,there we've quite a family party. Now children we've got two visitors this morning Jimmie's mother and Willie and Tom and Sarah's,who've come to see if this school can't behave just as well as any." The visitors who had not been able to get in a word as yet,straightened up now with sense of importance and the school dam began. Four children,it is needless to say outdid themselves in studiousness and exemplary condult. One small incorrigible in a far corner strated in with a paper wad ~~kkk~~ while the second reader class was reading a story that astonished Aunt Jemima very much,about a gentleman named Alladin. The ensuing snicker disturbed Aunt Jemima and she spoke right out.

"You Jim Banks over thar - if you throws another one of them, I just goin'to wear you to a frazzle - you know your mammy don't allow no such cuttin'up. " And James Banks subsided for the day.

It took but a few experiences of this sort to make Mary full mistress of her school,while her never faling courtesy and kindness with the ignorant but well-meaning patrons disarmed most of their hostility. Still even that did not make the children come to school regularly or continuously. The ~~xxxxxx~~ school dwindled to 100,75,50,25 and the school committee promptly warned the little teacher that she must close unless the average was kept up to fifty. She was very tired nights after school but she started now regular visiting and it opened her eyes. She found that she had had no idea of the difficulties,the sorrows,the slovenly habits of her community. Here in filthy rags and vermin infected hut lay a sick mother with a new baby "Sarah has to stay and tend me and Josie gets the meals." Here was a father struggling in a fearful battle with debt. "I needs the boys to help me right now,Miss Mary - I'se mighty sorry,but we must live". Yonder she met sloven indifference "O they can go if they want to - but what's the use - white folks got every thing and going to keep it, I 'spect-no use no Nigger trying to be anybody." Into this slough the little woman threw herself with sympathy,kindliness and unwavering determination. She helped nurse the sick,strove to systematize work and accounts,spoke a word of cheer and encouragement; made the girls mend their clothes, hunted jobs for the boys untill the school became a centrs of love as well as learning,of work and play,of striving and sacrifice.

41-7-396.

Another year started in and it brought new troubles. This time it came from the white planters and employers roun d about. They had at first, looked on Negro schools as non-sensical experiments bound to fail on account of the sheer stupidity of the children. Then when they prospered they begrudged them the public monies. At last there came a new and more sinister plaint - the scarcity of labor. It was a new thing - unknown in its present form in slavery times and the planters attributed it to the deviltry and laziness of the freedmen.

"There are a dozen good cotton hands down at that Nigger school"said the sheriff ~~Mr.John son~~ Boggs to the loafers in his store "and a couple of dozen half-hands -it's bad enough to keep these Niggers idle without teaching them all to shun work or making them impudent. By God they' ll think they're good as fhite folks in a year or so." Thus the white community grumbled Now was the black world altogether satisfied.

"Miss Mary's a good teacher but she's had her share of the school money now and she ought to let somebody else have a little now"suggested Sands cautiously.

"She don't pay any attention to my children, it's only the smart ones she cares for" growled another.

And so the leaven of criticism and discontent grew about the unconscious hard working girl, until the day of the new election came and Harrison Coles was replaced on the board by Roland Reynolds.

He saw the name of Mary Calhoun on the pay roll and remembered something.

"Is this Bob Calhoun's sister" he asked.

"Yes, sir" said the colored porter.

"Where's Bob -"

"He's up to Columbia at school."

"And she's supporting him, I suppose."

"Yes, sir, I guess so."

" Johnson, dismiss her. We'll give that school to Sands' daughter. He's a good Nigger."

41-7-397

Chapter XVI.

The Servant.

She went into her little room in the cabin and lay down on the bed and thought it all out. Next year was Robert's last year in college- it would ae awful to have him s top now, he must not stop. He had worked in Columbia last year and in the long summer months had saved $75. His scholarship had added $50 to this and she had sent $150 from her salary. This year would cost him a little more and then too he might not be able to make much in the summer. The wave of misery overwhelmed her and she wept and wept and sobbed until the shadows rose from the sea and Uncle Caesar's querulous voice called her to make supper ready. She rose and smoothed her dress and washed her face and came out to him with her old sweet way- cooked a pone of corn bread, made him some coffee asd sent him mumbling off to bed. Then she went to her room again and took down her little bank book. She had taught three years, six months in each year at $40 a month -let's see that was $720. Of this $475 had gone to Robert -$200 the first year, $125 the second and $150 the third. That left $230. It had cost her and Uncle Caesar but little to live and they raised their own vegetables and chickens and had a bale or so of cotton each year; still she had only $75 left in the bank and it looked very, very small. She wrote a cheerful letter to Robert saying nothing of the school but urging him not to come home in vacation - "stay and work in Columbia and perhaps I'll run up and see you, if I'm lucky. Uncle Caesar is well and so am I. How sweet it is to and work, Dear Robert - Lovingly, your sister Mary" and carefully blotting off the tear, she sealed it. Then she sat down to contrive and think - a county school? it was too late this summer and they did not run in winter and she could not wait for next summer - and even then it would have to be very near for how could she leave Uncle Caesar alone? She thought of sewing - now there was a chance - she had often in summer done fine needlework - but O, it paid so little; she thought of private lessons but so few, so very few of the colored people could afford to pay. Then she turned and faced it - faced that which was ever there but from which she shrank in nameless repulsion - house-service. Why not? Why not? she said bravely and resolutely and yet she knew why not; because it was the sign of the slavery out of which she and her people were creeping - because it was wasting her talent in doing what a thousand others less fortunate than she could do as well and often better. And yet that was not all - the chief and greatest reason was that it held the raw sore of her sensitiveness at slights, jibes and discrimination open to the careless, the scornful and the harsh. Her very soul revolted against the semblance of bondage. Her mother and father had shielded her from it and although she was ready to do almost any honest work, yet her whole being recoiled at this step - and yet, and yet, her soul whispered perhaps this last sacrifice is what God asks - perhaps this is that dark valley of Humiliation through which all true souls travel. Was it the drudgery she feared, was it mere pride that bound her? She hesitated, walked to the wall and threw back the wooden shutter and drank in the night air. A silent figure passed along the road and sudden fear shot through her. She remembered a remark of Robert's about colored women's work: "Drudgery and shame and perhaps both." Suppose she should go into some home and fall into wanton treacherous hands - what was there to protect colored girls: Tradition? God save the mark! Chivalry? there is no chivalry for helpless black women. Christianity? was not the Christian south mottled with the bastards of white fathers? Her hands gripped the flesh till it bled and fierce hot anger rose in her throat - but she turned - shut the window and slipped to her knees beside the little bed and strove with her wavering soul to think how 2000 years before another heart, upon which lay the sin and burden of a hunted people, bowed alone in a great shadowy garden and prayed "Let this cup pass from me."

41-7-298

She had scarcely finished the breakfast dishes next morning and tidied the cabin when she saw the shadow of a woman at the door. She went forward and greeted her pleasantly, trying in vain to remember where she had seen her before.

"It's getting real warm"she said "won't you come in and sit here in this chair. It just catches the breeze from door and window and Uncle Caesar says it's the coolest spot on the coast."

The lady seated herself thankfully. She was a short fat woman, with smooth brown hair parted in the middle,and a worried kindly face

"I thought I'd come and see you"she said "John told me that - is, O I meant to say I am Martha Reynolds,John Reynolds wife. I was so sorry when you lost the school and I told Roland and he said — well,at any rate,I do wish I could get you to come and work for us. I've heard of your school and I heard you sing once,and my heart sort of went out to you. I never had any children myself- that is, except Roland -and he,you know — . And I thought that you'd like a good home. There are only three of us and my husband is not well but there won't be much to do,although just now we are expecting company from the north,Mrs.Grimes and - but of course you don't know her-they're in Columbia now. These girls I've been having are so trifling and dirty and somehow I can't aet hold of the decent tidy-looking colored girls I- I don't see why: I'm sure I try to treat them right and pay them good w ages.- won't you come?"

41-7-399

Mary's heart rose to her mouth and she stammered. She meant to say "No,no"I can't "but she said vaguely?

"How much do you pay?"

'We've been paying $5 a month but I'd give you ten gladly if you'd come - only of course you mustn't mention it - John is so close."

Mary sat wiah her arms in her lap staring out doors and almost forgetting her visitor - $10 a month and that included board. She could work 11 months before John's graduation -$ 110. This with the $75 in the bank would make the $175 for him and $10 over. Could she live on $1 a month outside her board? What would the colored people say who had known her as teacher,and with this thought came trooping tumultuously all the throng of doubts and fears and pains -but she thrust them aside with one great sweep and rose. "I'll come"she said "tomorrow."

And Martha Reynolds rose and took her hand. The two women looked into each other's eyes and saw something of each other reflected there,each in each,something deeper and nearer than money and color and years. And Martha's voice faltered "We'll be good friends,Mary."

"We'll be good friends Mrs.Reynolds"said Mary in quick understanding and then speeding her guest,she went slowly into her little room and shut the door.

It was busy times at the Reynolds' for the wedding day o f Roland Reynolds and Alicia Grimes was coming soon. "I don't see what I ever should do without you Mary"said Martha plunging her arms into the white dough. Mary had just slipped a cake into the oven door and she was humming to herself for Robert's last letter was blithe and hopeful. "I am glad I came"she said as she cleaned up the dishes and hung up the clothes. "There now,my p art of the baking is done - what next?"

"I guess that's all" said Martha "and you'd better go home and see to Uncle Caesar and take him something good to eat. Now tomrrow you'll only have the windows to wash. and then all will be ready. John and I start for Columbia tonight and Roland will come tomorrow. Why you haven't seen him have you? He hasn't been back since you came -well he's a good boy. He'll find his clothes all laid out" And away Martha hurried up stairs.

41-7-404

The house was empty when Mary came next morning. She went blithely about her work for she liked it. Withall its drudgery and long hours and endless repetition,there was something fascinating in the keeping of a home. It grew to feel like some old quiet friend,lovingly sympathetic with its great broad bosom,its moods and tempers,its many sided character - it was very pleasant to move in a great ric h cozy place like this and care for it tenderly and know that one's duty lay here - safeguarded from the cold hard hurrying world without. She put the bread carefully in the oven and then took Robert's letter from her b osom and sitting on the stairs with duster,pail and wash cloths,read it again and laughed and cried a little. Hilda was there - little Hilda - how strange -she must have grows into a nice big girl and Robert seemed to mention her often. She wondered-but she laughed at the thought and started up the stairs. She had not told Robert yet of her new work. He thought her still teaching. It was hard to write it and make him ill at ease. She went to Roland Reynold's room first and dusted it and put it in order and washed the window. Then she w ent into Mrs.Reynolds room. She looked out of the window - a bed of great white lillies grew beneath and she bent far out to catch the fragrance and felt for a moment like plunging down into them. A man with a satchel came rapidly up the street - a tall broad shouldered red faced young fellow and turned quickly in at the gate,glancing up toward her. She saw that it was Roland Reynolds and drawing back went rapidly on with her work. She made the bed,swept and dusted,hearing him stamping up the stairs whistling and banging the doors. She had started to the window and had begun to wash it,sn iffing the lillies. Suddenly she heard the door behind her open quickly and Roland Reynolds looked in. He was dressing and ha dneither coat,vest nor collar and his hair was rumpled. He always liked to jok e and skylark with the domestics and this one to his mind seemed unusually clean and comely fawr a black girl.

"Hello"he said cheerily.

"Good morning"she answered in a low voice quickly gathering up her utensils.

He looked at her curiously. She certainly was a well built thing "Can't you talk?"he said -"what's your name? You'd better get on with me,or Ma will fire you" and he laughed pleasantly and reached out his hand. She shrunk back to the window in sudden fear. He jeered at her.

"Stuck up are you?"he said suddenly bolting the door. She staggered backward with a scared look,as she saw the gathering sneer on his red face and the swing of his great bare white arms. Her hands shook and she falthered twisting her apron and whispering to herself "He will not - of course he will not - he is a gentleman -he would -then he tossed the towel away and stepped confidently carelessly toward her,ohe raised herself erect in sudden hot fury that battled with the whelming sense of utter helplessness God would not leave her thus alose and unprotected in this great dark empty house - God -Oh! and then she caught suddenly the scent of lillies and the rush of the wind. Like a flash she wheeled,never faltering,never doubting, with one light bound she was on the window - the man cried out in horror -but she leaned upon the air,the trees and house whirled upward, the skies flew,she felt her body wheeling twisting downward;up roared the good sweet air and the great fragrance of lillies - nearer,nearer- falling,falling - and she closed her eyes and slept.

107-7-14

M. CA. 14

Chapter ~~XVII~~
Hilda and Hal.

Like some full plumaged bird that flutters before the nest of the tempter until wounded and broken winged it drops and looks at him helplessly in dumb and terrified submisson,so Hilda stood silently staring at Roland Reynolds. He hesitated and flushed, and behind him she saw a shadow. It was a little thing. She remembered that shadow long ago when poor little mischievous Hal would creep along the inside of the fence - she thought of Hal,she thought of his home-coming-she must be here to help him- she was all he had,she - and then in swift horrible revulsion of feeling she leapt forward toward the tempter. The shadow moved again and she knew it:

"Hal"she cried "Hal,my Hal"and she threw herself into the arms of the returned convict,while Reynolds vaulted the fence and disappeared. Hal hung his head - he had not dreamed of so loving a greeting and it shamed him-

"Don't sis,"he said "don't - I aint fit."

But she would not let him speak. "Hal" she cried "Have you any money?" He drew out a five dollar bill. "Come"she said "Let's go -anywhere,anywhere".

And early next morning they landed in Columbia with a satchel and a tiny trunk. The sudden responsibility and the tale which his sister had poured into his ears strengthened all the good in Hal . He sent her straight over to the Negro College.

"But what shall I say,Hal?"

"Never mind,I'll arrange"he said. "Just say that I'll be up this afternoon." And then once shae was gone and h e slipping about had seen the great doors close on her,he stood and stared at himself in dismay:

A boy of 19 just out of jail,with little education,no skill,no friends, not a cent of money,and a sister to save from starvation and shame,not to mention his own needs,for he was dungry,dirty and in rags -what could he do?

He whistled.

Then he came rapidly to a conclusion. There was just one way out of it:nobody would give him money;he couldn't borrow it;no matter how hard he worked he could not expect pay for a week or more:therefore he must steal. He simply must steal for a start and then afterward he would work and be honest,for he intended to be honest. After experience he thought thatthe best policy. Now however he must steal,and what? It was so easy that he was surprissd. Two ladies descended from a carriage as he looked by.

One was an elderly lady,the other evidently her daughter.

"Why Mrs.Glennworth"said a gentleman rushing up.

"That was"said the lady smiling"Mrs.Grimes now -my daughter Alicia" and the pale thin girl bowed and fingered her silver mounted purse. "We are on our way to Charleston - they passed in but the pale girl lingered. It was then that Hal laid his thin hand gently on that silver mounted purse and disappeared down the alley.

Five new ten dollar bills lay in his hand. He bought a ten dollar suit of clothes. Hired a room and washed and dressed. It was nearly five o'clock and he almost ran to the school. Hilda was sitting uncomfortably in the parlor and she rose joyfully to greet him. He did not say much. But But paid two months' board in advance,gave Hilda $10 and started to go.

"Have you got work so soon Hal?"

"Yes - and you're to stay here in school."

204-7-14

"Will you come and see me often?"

"Well -once a week,perhaps -Good bye."

And he was gone.

And so Hal started,staggered out into the world. The burning throb for alcohol raged in his blood but he fought it grimly;the old wild wanderlust called him but he remembered Hilda and his home. Beneath the slights and curses and petty discriminations of a despised class he writhed in dumb fury -striving to hold hand and tongue and stay the impetuous fury of his blood;the lure of the gambler tempted him at every corner when he heard the half-hissed "Ha" of the dice thrower,or saw the urchins filthy pennies,or the horse racing;and then in the still nights when he wandered wearily home from fruitless searching for work- he heard the voices of sirens and saw their beckoning hands,but he cried"Hilda,Hilha!" and ran home sweating in the darkness.

41-7-403

But it was hard -bitter hard. What could he find to do? He went to work in a restaurant but they served liquors and the smell was maddening so he left;he became porter in a store,but the headclerk cursed dim for his slowness and called him a "Damned Nigger". Nor ever knew how near he was to murder and death that day. He got a dray to drive,but he cursed at the white children who were stealing a ride and lashed them and a policeman arrested him. His employer bailed him out after a few hours detention but he gave up the job. Then he found a place in a private family as butler. It was quiet and they seemed kind honest people. "God help me to stay - if I fail here" but the woman looked at him narrowly and suddenly asked him "Were you ever in jail?and he answered boldly -"Yes, 12 months"and she discharged him immediately. The frenzy of that night! he had hardly earned $10 in two months of his ~~recovery~~ trying;he knew that Hilda's board was due and he had nothing. The physical and mental strain was telling on him and the thirst for relaxation,company,carousal was driving him to frenzy. Why should he try to work?stealing was far easier. That night he slipped out noiselessly at midnight. Hark!

"Seven come Eleven.-Ha"

He stopped. He had $5 - a week's wages in his pocket. He rushed into the dark alley and into the house. The gamblers leapt up but he growled at them and flourished his money. Long into the night they gambled. "Whiskey" he kept crying as he threw his dice.

"Ha!"and the fiery hell burned through his body. It took but a few hours. At ten he had sixteen dollars and his brain was blazing an his laughter and curses filled the room and the alley;at 11 o'clock he had not a single cent and neither coat nor hat,and his brain was mad with liquor and poison. Up the alley,up the street,up the broad cool avenue he lurched. A gentleman and lady were coming toward him and he staggered sullenly to the right. This however was the inner side of the broad side walk and the ~~turd~~ white man determined to make him take the curb. "Turn out there, Nigger" he commanded holding the lady closely and reaching quickly to his right hip pocket. But Hal raised his blood shot eyes and with a fearful oath leapt straight at the man's throat. There was a pistol shot, the flash and crunch of steal against the bone and the pale-faced man sank bleeding to the ground

Chapter XVIII
Robert and Hilda.

41-7-404

When Robert Calhoun went up to Columbia this time it was like some strong swimmer rising to breath on the curving sea, like the intaking of a great sweet new breath of a morning, like a new baptism of faith and love for the good old world. He was vut twenty five and felt himself an old young man, for his life had swept the vast limits ou human feeling - joy and sorrow, hope and despair, life and death, birth and burial. The blood bounded too bounteously in his veins to let him even sicken of the joy of living and yet just now he needed inspiration and breath and vision - new dimensions ot his narrow and marrowing world, new sources of joy, new and greater ideals. Born to the common lot rf men,he could have live d a little life and made much of it,but crowded to a life narrower than his soul he needed new and large dimensions - a breadth of vision and upward lifting of ideal which should compensate in greater ways the loss and theft of th lommon goodness of living.

And so he came to college not as his paler brothers northward, in budding half green manhood,serious in little and realizing only a bit of the riches round them before they pass quickly beyond the college green. Robert came on the contrary to know,serious beyond his years,eager with all the halfused eagerness of youth to explore and sound and measure the meaning of life. He brsught with him too his measuring rod- his grim hard experience at making a living and meeting men and doing things. He grasped his new books curiously,read and re-read them. Pored over them with a t hhughtfulness that delighted the older teachers and worried the younger ones. His was a quick bright mind that leapt and flew where others walked,that saw at times with faerful clearness s traight across the world and at other times was dull from very over-richness.

Yet in all and about all his new world of wonder,his passion for knowing and understanding dwelt a deep strange loss. The shadow of some far-off dream of wonderful happiness that had fled. He remembered ever one face and always when he remembered,the day how dark so ever, glowed;the drizzling rain sang,the blasing noonday whispered and rang. He had never forgotten little Hilda - he had never ceased to chide himself for losing her,yet when the tragedy of his life had let him seek her she was gone and no one knew whither. The awful suspicion returned to him but he was ashamed of it now. To day when hewwalked into the long dining room and saw its host of faces - its wonderful rainbow of faces somehow it seemed as though her face must be there because he wanted it there. Then he smiled and sighed at so ~~xxxxxx~~ foolish a thought and drank in the scene before him in half embarrassed wonder - a little startled at the white faces of teachers sitting here and there among the darker students,a little troubled at his table manners and yet always conscious that he was waiting for a vision that had not yet come and perhaps wound never come again. A bell tinkled faintly and a quick silence came. A neighbor nudged him to stop eating and he put down his knife and fork and raised his head and then his heart leaped and the blood sang in his ears - he heard faintly and from afar the voice of the white haired little woman reading of the blessed feet of Him that bringeth good tidings that publisheth peace - he doined in the prayer that asked and gave forgiveness but all this was faint and from afar,for in front of him and at the table beyond sat Hilda Quarles.

504-7-41

In the days that followed he saw little of her and if she had noticed him at all, she gave no sign of it. Yet this seemed nou unnatural to him. He knew he had forgotten all right. he her and yet as he saw this tall grave beautiful young woman moving among the others so gently and ~~silently~~ gracefully a bitterness and a determination seized him and he asked leave to call on her. She came to him in the parlor without delay or excuse and went to him with extended hand looking him frankly in the eyes.

"I am glad to see you, Mr. Calhoun" she said "I never have had a chance to thank you for your kindness to my brother."

He could have met anything but this frank openness

"It-a- was nothing" he stammered. "I thought" but she went on.

"Hal is working not steadily and keeping me in school."

"I am very glad."

"How is your sister?"

"She is doing the same" he said with a certain sense of shame" "working and keeping me in school."

"How good-I only wish Hal would study. I would work my hands off for him."

"Hilda" he burst out " I hope you have forgiven me?"

But she rose "Forgiven you? Why I had nothing to forgive. I shall always be thankful for your goodness."

"And if you need me will you call on me - freely?" he said.

She hesitated andthen she thought of Hal.

"Yes, certinly" she said "good bye."

She went to her room -swiftly up the first flight then slowly, pausing in the reading room to turn the leaves of the paper - a line caught her eyes "Murder- Mr. Roland Reynolds who married Miss Alicia Grimes a few ~~nights~~ months ago and was spending his honeymoon ~~xx~~ x in the capital was stabbed last night on the streets by a Negro and died within an hour. He described his assailant and a posse of citizens are hot on his trail."

A fierce gladness struggled in her heart and then a sense of shame. Slowly she went up to her room. A letter lay under her door- a grim ~~burly~~ acquired letter. She opened it, ~~a bank book~~ and a scrap of paper fell out - she read it - read it again and turning, threw herself across the bed and shook with sobs. stared blankly out of the window & at last

Then she rose quickly bathed her face and ran down stairs. Robert was still standing by the parlor window and he turned to her eager-faced as she stretched the crumpled note toward him; he read:

904-7-14

"Dear Sis:-

~~Here's your bank book with enough hoest money to school you.~~ I've killed a white man - Roland Reynolds. It wasn't my fault, except that I was drunk, but I'm no good no how. Good bye, you'll never see me again. Be a good girl.

Hal.

Robert read the letter and looked up. She stood leaning aganist the wall, pale shrunken together, with glowing tangled hair and shadows beneath her eyes. He stretched his arms, she shrank back, and said " I must ~~go~~ find him - I must go to his room and search for him - I must -" she looked at him.

"Wait" he said. He went up stairs and got his pistols put them in a satchel and came down and after a short talk with the matron together they hurried through the streets.

The room down in the squalid Negro quarter was dark. They pried open the door: it was empty but in the fire place lay a half burned bundle of dark stained clothes. They were still searching, when

"Hark;"cried Hilda.

There was the sound of hurrying men, clattering footsteps of horses and the low roar of mingled shouting. Robert sprang to the ~~window~~ and opened it. The old cabin fronted a narrow alley and up the alley the mob was making straight toward the house. Quickly Robert barred the door and half closed the rickety shutter of the one window; then opening the satchel gave her one of the pistols, and took the other. She understood and stood tall and lithe, with her bronzen hair half shaken about her face, like some great golden madonna. On came the mob - she looked at him with the old sweet smile and he bending kissed her forehead as she murmured "At last, O Death."

Then they listened. They've got him - they've got the Nigger" yelled the boys along the street, and Robert and Hilda started in dismay. Then quickly he rose, pushed back the shutter and leaned out:

"I will kill him as he passes" he whispered. She crouched ~~kneeled~~ beside him on her knees. "And then?" she cried fingering the cold fatal steel -"and then! he answered with set face;- click! click! went the revolvers. On came the crowd - the dirty grimy crowd - the policeman dragging a bound man, the hatless, coatless followers, the wild-eyed men - the pistols, rifles and oaths - they swept on - but they did not stop. They did not stop at the little home, they did not even look - on they went like a mad whirlpool.

"Burn him! burn him" they yelled and the eyes of the prisoner turned for a moment toward Robert; and Hilda screamed and R obert dropped the pistol and gasped. It was not Hal. Quarles whom they saw.

41-7-14 704-407

The roar of the mob passed into silence. She stood against the wall with outstretched hands like a crucifix, with hunted eyes. He stood with folded hands looking at the bloody bundle.

"I ~~-~~ " she faltered and stopped.

"We - " he hesitated.

She dropped her arms wearily. "Yes - we must - save him, even - even if it it means Hal's - O it's cruel Robert, cruel."

"But just " he said slowly "perhaps - perhaps Hal has escaped - at any rate we must save this innocent man."

She roused herself - "yes - go!" she cried.

A moment he paused before her swimming eyes - a moment, an eternity - then he turned and his footsteps rang on the pavement. He flew

~~He ran swiftly~~ through the streets and winding and turning came breathless to the police station. Only one officer was there.

"Is the prisoner here?"

"What prisoner?"

"The Negro nharged with Mr.Reynolds' murder."

The man smiled grimly "I reckon he's in hell by this time" he said.

"But they've got the wrong man" panted Robert. The officer looked at him.

"At any rate he's a nigger! he said "and I reckon he'll do."

Rsbert rushed out with his bundle and hurried down the street.

"Which way did the mob go?" he asked of an old black man; the man pointed silently and Robert ran. He ran silently, swiftly, in great sweeping strides bending his head forward like a hound with widened panting nostrils. As he rose to a hilltop he saw them in the full noon day glare, heard the hoarse ravenous grating of their shouting and shifting the bundle he ran till it seemed his heart would break - before him he saw the column of smoke and flame and heard the yelling of men and then as his feet otruck the bridge that spanned the Congaree, the crowd broke and staggered toward him; bleaving the ~~xxxxx~~ thin curling smoke and the ashes. He leaned sick and weary against the bridge and his heart hammered pitifully.

"Too late, too late" he muttered. The crowd began to straggle by him - the older men silent with set faces, the younger flushed with liquor. Robert raised his bundle silently and balanced it on the rail. A half grown boy rushed by -"This is his finger, Nigger" he yelled truculently and thrust a little scorched bone before Robert's sweaty boiling face. Robert made no answer but he pushed the little bundle. It fell with a splash into the water and went bobbing and whirling down the swift current.

"An innocent man has died a shameful death" he whispered "and I have hidden the guilt of the guilty." And he turned wearily back toward the sullen angry city.

41-7-408

Chapter ~~XXXXXIX~~
The Pain .

Mary Calhoun lay before a wide window gazing dreamily out upon the sky - great clouds, grey and silver and white, sailed silently, majestically by as if on long and mighty missions to some blue and unknown land afar, thrones and kings rolled on in gleaming splendor and changed and grew and altered as they rolled. She turned away; why was it - ah- ah- God, the Pain, the dull deep massive pain,- the grinding pressing sickening pain! the beads of sweat bubbled on her forehead and she sank back with a sigh as Martha bent over her.

"Poor dear, poor dear!" she murmured "there don't move - you mustn't move - is it easier now?"

"Yes - yes - I - I want to write - I must write."

"To your brother - I'm writing now, dear - "

"You must not write I - no - no - yes I am strong enough quite (ah the Pain the deep tingling bitter pain - ah, ah) there, yes, yes, get me a pencil and I'll tell him all - thank you - yes, I'm quite easy now - quite - ah - well."

She seized the pen and wrote:

"Dearest Robert:-

Is no this sweet weather? this glorious [oh, the pain, the pain, the bitter pain] summer time? The sun is tender to us here and sends us [ah, dear God!] kissing cooing winds. I am sitting, no lying -(am I not lazy Rob!) here and watching the great whte clouds fly- they seem like God's great waving banners marching always marching so silently and swiftly on. I am as well as can be - I hope you're in good health. Work and study hard next year - I shall send you $150 for the year - it won't pinch me at all. My [the pain, the awful whirring pulsing pain- I cannot bear it, dear God - ah] love to ~~[illegible]~~ all your friends [ah it comes again, dagger-like] ~~and strikes my hand~~ - a blot, how careless - my finger slipped. Goodbye, dear Rob, Good bye,

Mary."

"There - there" she whispered faintly "now the envelope no, no I'll back it - there then now you won't write, you won't -" and she fainted away.

Long days she lay there watching the sky. Now in deep peace now wracked with paroxisms of pain.

"What, what is broken" she asked once.

"Your hip is crushed dear."

"Will it ever get well?"

"O, it will get much better?"

"So I can work - so I -" she began eagerly.

604-7-14

"You are working now and here are your first month's wages"said Martha. Mary took the little envelope and opened it and there was a hundred dollar bill.

"O no" she said quickly " no !"

But Martha was knseling by the bed sobbing. "You were hunt working for me and this is my own money,my own savings,if you do not take it I shall never forgive myself."

Mary looked at her and lay back with a sigh -

"Thank you" she said "thank you veryvery much .-"

But Martha still knelt.

"Mary" she said and her voice came dry and harsh -"Mary did you - fall out the window?"

For a moment their eyes met but Mary closed hers quickly.

"Yes,Mrs.Reynolds"she said.

"O thank God - thank God "murmured the woman "O no,no,I don't mean that Mary - I -""but Mary put out her hands and slipped them about the woman's neck and kissed her.

"Can you not give me some needle and cloth. I think I will try to embroider a bit" said Mary one day,and lying there she wove a figured mat with flaming border and waving lillies strewn without and Martha took it out and sold it for her. Many of these she made (yet the pain, the low grinding pain,lived ever with her) and then at last obedient to her begging they moved her to Uncle Caesars cabin and put her in her little neat room where half sitaing,half lying,she sewed and wrought and sang. (The pain the cruel pain,it wrought and sang there too.) One day a child came in for help on its lesson. She eagerly turned to her books and helped it and in after days others came and others and though they wondered to see her pause now and then,and closing eyes and teeth,drip silent sweat,yet the class grew and the black parents came in and hovered over her and paid her little sums as they could. Thus so that soon she found herself earning $3 and $4 a week with her sewing and teaching and she was glad and brave and happy. One day a letter came and she opened it. There was a long blue check and a card. The blue check said $500 - the card said "HenryxxReyx "Roland Reynolds - Real Estate." She sat and held it. Wild anger,cold contempt,calm resignation strove in her heart. Would it not be right to use this for Robert's train ing,for the poor about her,for the school? Then she sighed. No,it was the price of shame,and the next day Henry Reynolds received back his check and card.

She wrote long letters to Robert filled with cheer,and cautioned all the neighbors lest they worry him with gossip.

"He knows all he needs to know"she said sweetly. "He's hard at work,

41-7-14

dear boy,and does not need to be troubled with little things. Yet it was hard as commencement approached. "When are you coming?"he kept writing and she hobbling about on her crutches and knowing that the Limp and the Pain had married her body for all this life kept putting him off and at last said:"Dear Brother - I have met with a little loss and I cannot come to see you graduate. God only knows how I am disappointed at this." The next mail brought money but she sent it back saying "When you come,I will tell you all dear Robert - I cannot come." There came no answer. She knew how deep was his disappointment and hers? Ah - the bitter,bitter Pain then slow hot pain. She put away her crutches and hobbled to her little chair before the door and waited. In a few hours he would come. She draped her skirts so as to hide the sick bones and glanced at her face in the little mirror poor little thin,lined mask of deep brown. She sat back with a sigh and waited - waited .

The days flew until the Day of days came

41-7-411

Chapter ~~XXX~~
~~The Lovers.~~ Illumination

Never again did Hilda see her brother. Whither he went and what his final fate was she never knew,and the story of his crime lay locked in hers and Robert's hearts. And in their hearts too lay something else. She shrank from it. All these years of her imagined hating stood now revealed to her as the deep and lower tides of love. Yet she kept saying "No , no." She seemedto herself twice to have thrown herself at him in unmaidenly abandon. She was ashamed and shut herself in her room -would not come when he sent for her and rehearsed again and again the words she must say when they met again:"Robert you surely will not misinterpret my excitement - no I do not love you" or "Robert, yes I love you but we can never be more to each"-"Robert - "-and then he came, ~~in the flesh~~.

He met her on the great front path just beyond the shadow of the trees. He said nothing and she started to falter the set words - then remembered that he had not yet spoken.

He hesitated,then bent forward toward her and she swayed to him, as two wild flowers curl together on a windy moor- his lips found hers and all the world went singing,her eyes found his and all the sky blushed crimson to the sun. And then at last she knew. Then at last the great aching void of her life was full. The sense of loneliness flew,the fear at lack of protection - a strength and joy crept through her limbs and she sobbed and laughed and whispered in his arms,until she woke to life with the great clear ringing of the night bell.

He turned and parted lingeringly glancing back to where the maiden marvellous stood darkly silhouetted in silvery golden light,with outstretched arms; then he walked on again face forward and there were the once giant gateposts stood stalwart and stone, stood now white satined heralds and they cried to the thousand ears of Night "The King -long live the King", while unseen silent hands brushed back the curtains of the night that hang before the stars. And Hilda above in the arched doorway standing still in the radiant ~~fulness~~ fullness of her ~~dawning~~ womanhood watched him swaying onward and saw him last turn backward at the gate. She kissed her hands to him- kissed all ten tiny finger tips and stretched them toward him benedictionwise, till he was gone. Then turning with a great Joy upon her heart, she mounted the broad stair case, walking as on piling cloud or thick green meadows - up, up, bounding up, slipping through bright clear air; she laughed lowand shook out the silky curling of her hair till it haloed her dark beauty splendidly, she heard the tinkling music of little far off bells, the eager gates of paradise flew back and lo! her room, her room-mate and her little bed.

Wither walk the feet of them that newly love? In green and flowered ways, in paths all sweet and golden with sunny shadows and shadowy shine. Up far up the great and glowing mountains to the gates of Revelation - ~~her~~ happy the man to whom those gates lie open and the woman who finds them wide un-barred- she is of maidens thrice time blessed, the film-fledged ~~fairy~~ fairy of God's one wonder world. To Robert and Hilda, these dark children of a darkened world, veil-swept before the burning glory of the sun, came insomuch the larger fuller and more splendid Love new from untainted untouched herats, great from all-believing souls, wide with the width of all the world they knew. Within the gates of Revelation they walked reverently with bowed heads, and half veiled eyes, with midnight prayer, orisons and madrigals, little silent tremblings, timid touchings of hands, and great flashes of utter whelming happiness such as men may not taste often on earth lest earth be heaven.

41-7-42

They did not talk of Love - they lived it and talked of Life- of the wonderful world of tree and sky and cloud and creeping thing and how God made them, of men and the thoughts of men, of the glory of doing and the duty of deeds. Together they sat in humid twilights with light clasped timorous hands and wandering misty eyes and sang, sang the sorrow songs, the old sweet heart songs of their fathers and set what thoughts they could to the little words and winding music.

Then gradually subtly a new note came. The sudden revelation of life to them was so wonderful why could it not be more wonderful- independent, freer, broader, better? They talked of Hal and the world's injustice toward him and a bitterness and complaint grew in her tones and talk. Again and again she whispered to Robert:

"I cannot breathe the air here in the south it burns me "-

Since Hal's disappearance Hilda had been living on the Charity of the school for the authorities begged her to stay. Yet the thought of dependence galled her and him

"I cannot live in this choked slavery hanated place-"

"You do not - you cannot know what a colored girl must suffer- the heart hurting blows, the slurs upon her womandhood, the petty dirty insults which every white thing - loafer or gentleman considers it his right and duty to heap on us - O I should die a living death here- Robert could you marry a wife here knowing that you were powerless to protect her even with your life? Robert as you never knew that that very Reynolds whom Hal killed followed me after that awful day and persecuted and insulted me in every way possible and that I dare not tell and could not complain could not even have told you had you been there lest you stand where Hal stands or lie a heap of moldering ashes? O darling, darling, would we dare bring children into such a world, with such a destiny? Robert we must go nowth and loose ourselves from this hateful world."

At first he resisted the liberty cry even of his own heart.

"These white folk are but erring human beings, dear - they do not realize the wrong they do us, they do not realize that we have hearts as sensitive as theirs -" he would say.

"They may not realize all that" she would answer "but they are not fools or babies and they know well enough that lying and stealing and cowardice are wrong even toward animals. And yet they lie about us, they steal our labor, attack us not man to man, but armed mob to helpless outcast."

"Yet Hilda, all the south is not thus, all of our neighboss are not to blame."

"Robert they are, and that is the thing that sickens me of the south I could stand the sin riot and brutality of ignorance, but I cannot stand that of intelligent men who know better and yet who do and wink at wrong."

"Many of them feel our wrongs keenly and have told me so."

"Yes, dear, whispered it to you alone, glancing furtively about, lest some ears hear their confessing and yet persist in their oppression when the mob calls -"

"But they are also generous and kind in many ways."

"O they give us old clothes."

"And their wrong actions are but a few among many good ones."

"Yes, yes - but a man continually guilty of one mean low kind of deed, stamps meanness so thoroughly on his soul that he becomes mean throughout and forever. I cannot picture their thought to myself Robert -I cannot realize their way of looking at injustice: how can grown strong intelligent beings look us in the face unblushing and know that the y are cheating, defrauding humiliating and crushing a human soul and then add to the wrong ind insult, the impudence of telling us our duty -

41-7-413

O Robert they are not men, they are devils."

"Even granted all this Hilda, paint the situation in the south as black as you will: doesn't it call all the more for intelligenme and sacrifice to fight it - to you and me to work right here and now?"

"Why we? Why must we grind the soul out of life in heart sickening hurts and the rest of the world go free? Why is it any more our duty than the duty of a million of others white as well as black? Why we Robert who can be so happy - to whom life means so much - who have seen the vision of the Blessed?"

He laid his hands reverently on her hair and stroked it gently saying slowly: "Perhaps it is not simply duty, my little girl - perhaps it is a great privilege, the privilege of Life, perhaps Life is work and work sacrifice and sacrifice not simply the ~~sight~~ vision of the blessed but blessedness itself."

"Nay, Robert" she answered "Life is Love and Love is Joy, and Work is the lowly handmaid of greater and greater Joy. Sacrifice is evil- necessary perhaps at times but ever evil. And of all evils useless sacrifice is the worst, — it is foolishness; and the sacrifice of black people in the south to convert Southern white people to Christian decency is useless for it's fighting unreason."

"There is no Unreason, Hilda, for the world is God and God is reason."

But Hilda stamped her little foot.

"What does God care for black people?" she cried as she clasped her arms about his neck.

Then Robert hushed the rebellious heart -and soothed her and whispered into her ears and kissed her dark and softening eyes. And so it ever ended.

And so too the battle of Love and Hate in Hilda's soul and the battle of Work and Love in Robert's found ever no abiding victory. The realness of their great new love was ever before them and the strange new happiness, and yet - yet in his soul Robert sometimes wondered if deep as was her love for him, her hate for the south was not deeper: and then he would search his own heart and say was his case any better? Deep as was his love for her was not his love for his life-work greater? Was it? Was it not? He scarcely knew. It depended on the day, the sun, the place. A glance at two tear-filled eyes made the world hold but one dear woman- nothing else. A walk through the alleys and hovels made the world all one great beckoning duty. And so in that last school year the battle surged now up, now down, till at last with him all-conquering love began to conquer and the more so because of Mary's strange behavior. He could not understand his sister. She suddenly did not want him to come home in vacation time. Her letters had a queer strained sound and she did not come to him - would not even come to his graduation - she was -"too busy",thinking only of herself and her school. Yet he hesitated - it was not easy to give up a life dream- a life duty,even for love:even though the sister who was his inspiration has forgotten him,but gradually,easily,eagerly he slipped into new ways of thinking and dreaming and a great hunger for freedom possessed him and the love of one woman filled his life.

H-7-41

Then came the curious change.

It happened that Letty Sands the teacher who succeeded Mary in the colored schools of Wilton Point came up to Columbia visiting. Hilda was sitting in the yard embroidering when bits of conversation were wafted to her.

41-7-415

"Roland Reynolds"-she lifted her head -"awful man - yes he did and she jumped out the window and broke her hip - nice girl too,only mooney- o sure he knows it - he must know it - Hilda Quarles?"- oh! -well poor Mary Calhoun -" Hilda rose quickly. She walked around and finally managed to get hold of the talkative girl and hear the whole story. This then explained Mary's behavior and Robert did not dream of it! A curious ~~doubt~~ a vague vision of devotion and sacrifice ~~of~~ which she had not known Hilda. seized. She must see Mary. She pledged Betty's confidante to silence and took Letty herself in charge. Then she told Robert of a necessary journey to Wilton Point. He demurred and wanted to go with her but she reminded him of the nearness of graduation and his work. She arranged to travel with Letty and to return with one of the teachers who would be coming from Charleston.

Hilda came to seek a querulous bitter vision of wrong;she found a sweet faced girl,bright,sunny and triumphant,filled with the one all-pervading thought:"Robert!"

She clasped Hilda's hands and held them: "Do you know him? Is he well? Does he look worried - or thin? Is he working too hard?"

Then she told her great secret. The Episcopal church ~~had~~ was talking of taking Miss Silena's school and ~~were going to give it~~ giving to Robert when he graduated. Perhaps he would study for orders and some great day be priest in a little chapel. Then she got her crutches and showed Hilda the world - her world. The struggling suffering laughing masses of women and men - in and out the homes she crept with her crooked body and sunshine face and ever before and around and about her crept Love. Down,down,deep down fell Hilda's heart. The vision of her own narrow selfishness ~~blinded~~ shamed her,a vision of the glory of work and the endless beauty of Sacrifice silenced her. Who was she her heart cried "that had dared to come between this woman and her dream?

Then she wondered if perhaps in all this there was a place - some little place for her. She tried to mention it carelessly—that "Robert - er - liked one of the girls", but Mary's face turned grey and the hope fled from Hilda's heart.

"Robert is so young" faltered the sister, looking about helplessly as though her kingdom were crumbling. Probably the thought of Robert's loving and marrying had never come to her before and and Hilda hastened to speak:

"O it is nothing - he - he loves her face - perhaps."

"O it is wicked" cried Mary "for girls with pretty faces to lure boys from their life work and duty - tell me of this girl - do you know her-"

"Yes, yes - I " then more slowly "No-I do not know her thoroughly, I would God I did."

"Is she good - true - unselfish?"

"O she is selfish, selfish - selfish above women - she wanted Robert for her own to worship her alone - but don't worry, dear, don't worry - he is taken-only-perhaps-with her comely face."

"The lust of the eyes - the pride of the flesh?" murmured Mary.

"Mary" and Hilda came close to the girl and looked into her starry eyes" "Mary, does God help a poor woman - a poor untaught woman who wants to do right and knows not how?"

"Yes O, Yes Hilda God is an ever present help in trouble"

"And Mary would God help me - and strengthen me - for a great sacrifice?"

"Yes, Hilda."

"And Mary will - you ask him - now -?"

And the crooked woman took Hilda's face and layed it on her knees and lifted up her clear voice there in the little lonely cabin- "O God, my God who brought men out of darkness and the shadow of death look upon this thy daughter. Defend her O God from the wiles of the devil, set her affections on high and make her noble and true and good. Amen." and Hilda said solemnly "Amen."

Then she rose and they sat silently hand in hand:

"Do you see the shadow ship" asked Mary pointing to the dark clouds that rode the eastern waters, and then she told Hilda the old tale and told her of her childish wanderings and of Roberts, of their mother and of Robert - RObert- Robert- and then the anxiety crept back into her voice.

"Hilda - Hilda, do you thing he cares more for this girl than for God's work?"

41-7-416

"No no - he likes the sheen of her hair, her pretty eyes - and she is but a child."

"I think" said Mary "that such unions are wicked. I think a man and woman who marry should marry some great work of God and be wife and husband to it. And what can be holier marriage than the soul bond of brother and sister working for their race.?"

"Nothing, Mary - and listen sister, let me call you sister, I think - I am sure I can separate these two and bring Robert back to his duty."

"But, but I would not like to hurt her, or -"

"No, no she is a slight - a - frivolous thing."

"Save him then for God's sake and mine."

"With God's help, I will."

And all the way back on the train the cry rang in her ears" "Save him for God's sake and mine" and the answer came firmer and firmer "With God's help I will."

A new comprehension sat on Hilda's spirit - she had degraded Robert, lowered his ideals, and made them love a selfish self-centred thing. She must atone, for it. Down by the sea a dark angel awaited him. He must go to her work with her, fill her life. To take from her one ounce of his entire devotion was sacrilege, blasphemy.

Once she tested him - only once did she trust herself - he had come to the parlor to call and was just going. She held him back a moment -

"We want happiness Robert" she said searching him with her eyes.

"Yes" he said "happiness" looking at her shining hair.

"And freedom, the right to go and come unlet "

"Yes freedom - wide good freedom."

"And money to buy a tiny home, and books and papers, and soft rolling chairs and hangings and pictures, and - and - "

"O such a home with you" he cried in ecstacy.

She panted between tears and laughter and put her hands on his shoulders.

"And Joy" he cried "the joy of life, the utter pleasure and joy of living."

The wildness of her mad beauty set all his nerves atremble.

He sank to his knees and seized her hands.

"Joy" he cried " O Hilda, joy" but she drew back slowly with a little choking cry. He looked at her in wonder

The great bell knelled; and he turned lingered and went down the steps slowly.

"Joy" she cried to his going, standing like some mirth-mad maenad ,with heaving breast.

41-7-14

"Joy!"he echoed as he ~~staggered~~ shed love-swept down the way.

"Joy!"she wailed and ~~dropped~~ swayed like a wounded bird.

From that day her mind was made up. She received an offer to learn dressmaking through an old friend of Miss Silena in the North. She determined to go immediately and take it. In vain he urged her to stay until commencement. No! No! she was tired, ^ of chaunty, tired of the south ,she said. She would go and prepare the way and then he could come and they would live there alway. But first he must graduate and go and see Mary. She said to herself,if he can look on that sacrifice and desert herfor me,then I will marry him but always despise him. If he gives me up for the greater duty and the purer soul,then I will always watch over him and when he needs me , I will come.

Thus they parted,standing where the great dark hall did slow and vast obeisance to the moon,while all about lay the soft sheen of velvet darkness. Lowly,slowly they spoke,nakedly,soul unclothed to soul. He took her face between his hands and whispered "O I have loved you so long - so unutterably long -~~since that first hour~~- for the endless ages of hours and days and the minutes of endless years." And she answered creeping ~~up~~ close to him :

"Before you came I did not live, and when you go I shall die — Not suddenly and frantically but slowly - Oh slowly in long weary-leaden years. O Robert,Robert,in after years remember always,I love you."

So he graduated alone. The dear old school sat back among magnolia trees,a little green oasis among the low close crowded cabins of the Negro quarter. The building itself was bare red brick but today trimmed with humanity - a great dark cloud of mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers and he spoke to them clearly and confidently of "William Lloyd Garrison". Then he took his diploma, boarded the train and started homeward after four years. How soon should he go north to Hilda? This summer: Why not? he argued. Mary was satisfied alone- he had not see n her in years - nor she him and yet she was cheerful and busy - so "busy" he said impaitently. It was hard to work here,and hopeless. There was no peace - no beauty, no upper air. Everywhere was the mob or the making of the mob, harsh words,epithets,ugliness,ignorance. The world was tight, narrow - hemmed in. Above,below - he gasped for air as Hilda gasped. Hilda? She rose before his vision glorified - beautiful as some dark eastern dream,touched with deep yearning sadness,he saw the changing gleaming bronze gold of her curly hair,he felt the soft fair heaving of her breasts and saw the ^ subtle, half hidden curve of her ~~little~~ lithe limbs- he closed his eyes. Hilda,Hilda,he murmured and out from hershadowy eyes stepped her soul - her silent striving soul, her panting wounded soul and her voice blew upon his waiting ears as the voice of sighing singing waters -

817-7-11

"Beaufort - Beaufort - all change!" He grabbed his valise and stepped into the street. Mary was not there. A fierce anger shot through him. Miss Sands simpered up - "Why Mr. Calhoun? So glad to see you. I er - I've been wanting to see you a long time and meant to see you in Columbia but .- well you know we ladies must be so careful" and she gigled aimlessly "How's Mary?" she said. "Very well" he answered coldly. "So glad, I hated it so after her awful accident." Robert stared in amazement but Miss Sands did not notice "about her losing the school." Robert dropped his umbrella and fumbled for it tremblingly and a great light crept through his darkened mind. - "I suppose" continued Miss Sands rapidly and confidently "that she thinks it was my doings but it wasn't, honest, I hate it - it was all Pa's work and I could a cried when I found I had to teach all those nasty little dirty children - "

She stopped breathlessly and picked her handkerchief "I wish I could come to see Mary - I know she can't walk" but Robert muttered something and hurried away.

"Accident - lost the school - cannot walk" was he dreaming? He hurried almost ran down the street to the ferry and out into the island country side. The shadows hung over the black disk of the sea, and the groaning of the waters struck wildly on the gathering twilight. Uncle Caesar's cabin gazed darkly out upon the road and swelling waters. Robert stopped and steadied himself, and then with hammering heart opened the gate and walked up the path. A little light shone within up the dim form of Mary where she sat awaiting. He rushed forward with glad cry, but just as he reached the threshold, she rose twisted misshapen and limped and hobbled forward, with greyish face and great dark burning eyes. He strode in and snatched her lightly tenderly in his arms and groaned:

"Sister, O my sister."

41-7-419

Chapter XXIV

The McCan Bett School.

The Rector was surprised. He was a slim precise man, clean shaven, in clerical dress and with that aggressive, all-judging face that seems its natural accompaniment. There stood the quaint beautiful old cabins, low long and wide built of fragrant yellow pine logs. All about were rounded Palmettos and the odor of the azalea and jessamine and all the front of the three dark cabins was riotous with color and perfume, while behind lay black green cotton and tossing corn, and to the side low billowy rice. A fence of crooked crinkled vines ran round the wold, two cows stood ~~munching~~ mincing ~~grazing~~ gravely and above where a tiny gate stood gaping arched in crimson glory, dead sweet and languorous in the hot still morning was a legend in white shell and it read "The Gates called Peace." A gleaming white path of spotless sea stone lay up to the cabin and the rector entered. He wandered on, and then where a little bower, blue garlanded with flowers, guarded a simple bench he sat down, half hidden, removing his hat, musing, wondering, knitting his brow in surprise as the voice of children came to him. He looked and saw that a colored woman twisted and limping was coming out the door and with a troop of little girls - dark vari-colored girls romping and laughing about her. They turned toward the little cabin to the right and ran and raced.

024-C-47

Then came from the other side the voices of shouting boys and a tall young brown man walked after them. The rector hesitated. He wanted to ask about the school - to know more of this strangely attractice place; but somehow it was difficult to ask. He could have apologized politely and enquired had the persons been white as he had supposed they were of course when he entered the gate. If the place had been a dirty hovel of black folk he would have entered as some being from above and received homage and given advise and censure. But these folks - these surroundings? he rose half vexed at his hesitation, and then something occurred to him - of course he argued relieved, there must be white northerners at the head and these were under teachers or monitors; he did not like to even approach those officious Yankees but perhaps it was his duty - he stepped along the path raised his shoulders, looked about with his gold eyeglass and coughed slightly. Robert turned and seeing him came to him.

"Good morning, Sir, can I be of any service?"

"Ah, thank you, young man, I was lookinug for the - er - principal or head of this - er - establishment."

"I am he" said Robert.

"But who has charge, oversight?"

"No one beside myself."

"Who owns the property?"

"I do - that is I and my sister."

The rector stared "But I never heard of the - "

"The Momm Bett School?"

"Oh, why - yes but I thought that was -" he stopped. He was about to say that he thought it was a Negro enterprise and to his mind

"Negro" meant oh,it meant so many things - first of all Negro was synonymous with dirt and this place was clean;"Negro" meant badly mananged or not managed at all while this looked orderly ("tho of course one could not tell") ; Negro meant silly,inconsequential childish imitative - everything low,laughable and wrong,while this - he spoke slowly

"I thought it was a more unpretentious affair-"

"This is very simple - let me show you."

They walked together over the little place. Peeped into the neat cottages,saw the school,saw the children at dinner. The rector kept alternately thawing and freezing. He liked the place but he could not rid himself of the uncomfortable feeling. He felt like ~~xxxxxx~~ tipping his hat to Mary and then reddened at the memory of the impulse.

Yet as he walked slowly,toward the rectory his mind and heart were busy. He began to see a faint light in one dark corner of his soul where there had long lain an unwelcome heaviness. He did not read the passage often but when he didhe felt ashamed:"Insomuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren,ye did it unto Me." and had he imagined it?~~w~~was there not at such times an uncomfortable flutter in the well-bred pews of St. ~~Andrews~~ Luke's?

41-7-421

Chapter XXIII.
Mission Work.

It was Wednesday evening,the service had ended and there had been a very fair attendance. Mr. and Mrs.Harrison Coles were out - he a bent and feeble old man of seventy and she a fussy prim little lady of fifty-five,well-preserved and complacent. Her daughter was there too,Mrs.Lloyd-Coles-Jones,a tallfair goddess visiting from New York where her artist husband was ~~struggling~~ working on a great magazine: then there was ~~the~~ John and Martha Reynolds and their young widowed ~~Mrs.Reynolds~~ daughter-in-law, the Misses Cox,the dowager Blakesley,Budge Boggs and one or two gentlemen. Yes and back,half hidden by a great shadowy pillar ~~sat~~ , and on either side of it,sat two other persons- one was a tall and stately woman,her face rouged dead white,her thin white hair piled high and her dark eyes dreaming beyond the walls, beyond the sea:" Mrs.Irma Lloyd Jones - one of the Abbeville Lloyds married the late Colonel Jones - you know the story"whispered Miss Adelle Cox,and her guest Miss Cobb of Savannah bent eagerly forward but shrank to find the haughty eyes ~~blazing~~ toward her:

"And does Miss Cobb approve of such attempts at educating Negroes?" Mrs Jones was asking coldly. Miss Cobb recovered herself hastily and groped for the thread of the doings. The chest tones of the immaculate rector came to her rescue.

He had called a little after assembly

"For the purpose :- ah- of considering two missionary enterprises. One was the matter of sending aid to a promising mission in Angola, West Africa. The mission had been very successful during the year. There had been twelve converts, a little church had been built and it sorely needed a bell. With some desultory comment $200 of mission money had been devoted to bell and maintenance. Then it was that the rector had cleared his throat and said: "The other matter lies nearer" he ha thought to say "to our hearts" but thought better and said "to us. It concerns our own colored population" and then heaving a faint warning rattle, he hurried on talking rapidly "after all we owe these people aid and guidance. They are ours; their mistaken emancipation was not their fault but misfortune. If we do not take their training in hand how can we complain if they are mistrained and filled with absurd ambitions and thoughts. My friends the welfare of these dark brothers of ours - for they are our brothers - has long weighed heavily on my soul. Yesterday by accident or by divine guidance I visited the colored school kept by Robert and Mary Calhoun. I was favorably impressed by it and want to help it. I happened to be speaking to my young friend Miss ~~Wolf~~ Cobb of Savannah and she was telling me of a similar enterprise in her city-"

"And does Miss Cobb approve of such attempts at educating Negroes?" asked the cold voice of Mrs. Jones.

The Rector scented danger and hastened to explain "Training - training, I should say, rather than education, my dear Mrs. Jones and perhaps I should explain my reference to Miss ~~Wolf~~ Cobb. We all know how poorly trained our servants are since the paternal system has been broken. In Savannah as I understaed there is a school supported by the church which is supplying this need of training." Miss ~~Wolf~~ Cobb nodded gently.

"And who will see that the money is properly expended and the teachig properly done?" asked Judge Boggs, with rather labored preciseness of speech.

"Well, eventually we should of course have a board of trustees and I had hoped that some of our ladies might help in the teaching at times. The bulk of the routine work would be done by colored teachers."

"Bht wouldn't that involve the training of colored teachers?"

The speaker was a stranger - an old white-bearded man, bald, with cavernous eyes, and he sat on the side of the pillar opposite Irma Jones. The rector ignored him and after some demur induced the mission society to give $100 to the school on condition that as soon as practical the school be turned over to a board of trustees who would conduct it.

Robert looked at the rector with a puzzled smile as he explained next day. "I was disappointed when you did not take the Smith School" he said — "this ~~"But our~~ property here is worth at least $500" ~~he said~~.

"Yes - I should say so."

We had talked of taking over the Smith School but the project failed. Our duty still awaits us

224-7-14

"And it has cost us $500 a year to run it."

"$500!" said the rector "why - why where did you get it?"

"The boarding children pay a dollar a month - all except a few - and the day children pay 25¢ - that amounts to about $300 - the other $200 come from the crops."

"That is better than I expected" said the rector.

"And of course" continued Robert "I should hardly think it fair to transfer to others the title and control of my own property for the sake of small - pardon me - and not altogether certain support."

The rector was silent and half embarrassed but Robert continued:

"Could we not arrange it this way? Suppose you and two members constitute a committee for the expenditure of such sums as the church contributes and that I expend them as your agent reporting carefully to you, and being at all times under your inspection so far as the spending of the money is concerned?"

41-7-423

The rector readily assented, and thus it was that the Rev. St. George Tucker and Robert Calhoun began their friendship. And when two men find each other, and walk together in the golden day and talk amid the shadows of evening, they come to know each other, soul and soul, despite all the piling barriers men place between. The church stipend gradually increased until it was $500 a year; Robert read the Episcopal service in the school and gradually by studying a few months in the year was raised to the diaconate, and built a tiny log church at the edge of the oaks and near the song of the sea.

But there were those that watched all this jealousy and did not understand, so that when the Bishop dined with Mrs. Irma Lloyd Jones the subject came up:

"You do not mean to say that a Tucker can so far forget himelf as to ~~give~~ receive a Negro as an equal!" gasped the Bishop.

"He certainly is giving some ground for the suspicion" said the young Mrs. Reynolds.

The Bishop frowned. "I will speak to him" said he "how about the school?"

"I wish you would go see the school" said Mrs. Jones. "my opinion is that much of their time is being given to book study and very little to the training of domestics."

"Suppose we go now" said the Bishop and in a half hour the horses were at the door.

There were seven in Mary's little Latin class. Two were bright quick students - "John they ought to - they must go up to Columbia to college" she had said that morning. Two others were fair students, earnest pleaders. The other three were poor and one of them - O he was stupid and Mary was in despair over him; he ought not to study more, but it was hard to discourage him. So Mary sat that morning giving him more of the class time than he deserved and trying O so hard to make him understand, when the door behind opened authoritatively, and Mary knew by the widening eyes of the children that dignitaries were come. She rose with a limp [Oh, the dull grinding pain] and started to ask them to be seated when the Bishop waved his hand "What class is this?" he demanded.

"They are the Seniors- they are having six months of beginners' Latin."

"Latin!"

"Yes, sir."

Mrs. Lloyd Jones smiled "Let us hear this fellow recite" she said. If John's recitation had been bad before, in his perturbation now it was simply awful. His Latin flew and his English took after it. Mary quickly called one of the brightest students, a bright eyed little black girl of 14 - but the great eyes of the bishop were too much for her and she stammered, looked at Mary in tearful appeal and sat down. Mrs. Jones smiled again. "Is this what we're spending our money for, Robert" she said sharply "to spoil plow boys and serving girls with Latin?"

41-7-424

"I do not think you can judge the school fairly yet" he said quietly "let me call -"

"I want to see the industrial work" said the Bishop peremptorily. They found some girls sewing in the girls' cottage. "How much do you sew a day?" asked Irma.

"An hour Ma'am."

"And the rest of the day?"

"One hour helping in the dining room and kitchen and six hours on our lessons."

"The old lady glanced at the bishop - "Two against six," she said.

"It shall be six and two next year" he said decidedly and Robert heard

He found the rector gloomy and taciturn that night when he called and the usual cup of tea was not served.

"I'm afraid that Latin class of yours has played the mischief, Calhoun." It had grown to be "Mr." Calhoun for a year or more back, but now it changed again.

"I am sorry."

"You had better give it up."

"Why?"

"The bishop is determined upon it."

"But you advised it and you have seen the need of the training."

"O I am not criticising the work - only others do not know it as we do."

"Then let them study it and not judge it from a five minutes' look." The rector shrugged his shoulders and said Goodbye coldly when Robert left.

Chapter XXIII.

The ~~Trial~~ Temptation. Challenge

It was the morning of Exhibition day, when the Momm Bett School was to close for the year. Robert was nervous, for this year there was to be a very distinguished audience. The bishop was to be there, and the white dignitaries of the town were to sit in reserved seats in front. Behind would be banked the darker patrons of the school. The graduating class of five sat on the platform of the vestry, but the rest of the school sat banked aloft in the back gallery, whence their clear young voices came rolling down in sweet song upon the audience.

"They will want to hear the slave songs, Mary, pick out the best and wierdest."

"They?" answered Mary.

"I mean the white folks."

"Yes but our people want also a glimpse of something else, they yearn for music and they can hardly appreciate their own till they hear some of the world's harmony - I'll tell you what I want to do, Rob - at the end when all is through I want to sing Gounod's Sanctus Spiritus with a small chorus of girls - surely no one lan complain of that and the children want to so."

41-7-425

"Well, all right" said Robert doubtfully "but don't forget plenty of our own slave songs."

So it happened that all came - the white aristocracy of St.Luke's in half curious patronage led by the Bishop and Mrs.Jones, and followed by John Reynolds and Martha. The black village in proud wonder, decked gorgeously, and happy; and the children dark fluttering with giggle and whisper and solemn stare. The graduates sat in one half frightened row below the reading stand and beside them to the left sat Robert in his new deacon's robes. Tears of great happiness were in Mary's eyes as she watched him from the thronged gallery opposite where she had marshaled her little host On the platform sat the Bishop the rector and Judge Boggs and they whispered together glancing at the black faces.

First there was a slave song "Bright Sparkles." Then the rector prayed for "the least of these our brethren" and there came another slave song. Then a tall boy, brown and slim arose and recited "The Slave that saved St.Mich aels": the black audience applauded lowly, the white scatteringly. A girl then read an essay on "Napoleon" which smacked of the encyclopedia and made the whites smile and the blacks look mystified. After a simple part song, in which all applauded, another girl read an essay on "The Faithful Slaves" which the whites applauded generously and the Negroes half-heartedly. A boy talked on the "Value of Work" while the Bishop yawned and then came the valedictory. She was the little black girl of the Latin class, small bright eyed and intelligent and her shrill clear tones roused

and

held the house. The blacks bent forward breathless, clutching the seats. The children back aloft sat silent and wide-eyed, and the whites roused themselves, grew tense rustled in their seats and whispered. The rector looked uncomfortable, the judge watched the Bishop covertly and seemed amused, but the bishop was angry. It was an essay on "Ambition" - a school girl's effort with many of the usual platitudes and echoes of greater thought, but singularly clear and straight forward. In a white girl's mouth it would have been applauded and expected, but what did this audience think to be told that black boys and girls must "aspire to the highest" that "all things come to those who wait" that "labor conquers all things" that "they should never be content to be mere servants and menials but should aspire to the great things of earth in this land of freedom and opportunity."

"Let us then be up and doing
With a heart for any fate
Still achieving, still pursuing
Learn to labor and to wait"

The still clear little voice of the dark white-frocked girl ceased amid a thunder of applause from the black world and absolute silence from the white. Robert arose with the little bundle of diplomas, but the Bishop strode forward. "I have wanted to say a word to you black people" he said in sharp forceful tones "and this seems just the place to say it. You have heard this girl's talk and you have foolishly applauded it. Net me tell you plainly that such talk is silly, wrong and wicked. Yes I repeat it, Wicked. God made you people to occupy a fixed humble place in his universe. To strive to escape from your appointed destiny is impudent blasphemy against his holy unalterable laws. I do not wholly blame you for these foolish thoughts - your false northern friends put them into your heads when they thought by law to make you white. But it was impossible - you will always be what you are and you must reconcile yourselves to it. Your ambition ought to be to become faithful servants such as one of these girls spoke of, and humble laborers. To this end we are going next year to change this school into a more thorough industrial school. We are going to teach your children to work and not fill their heads with false notions and I want you older people who know that what I say is true, to support our efforts for your weal loyally." He paused. Robert has been sitting on the platform before him, half turned toward him, listening with bowed head and trembling hands. What would he do - what could he do? The horrible temptation of cowardice was upon him - he felt a thousand eyes upon him - the wondering eyes of his patrons, the tearful eyes of his little children, the accusing eyes of the white world. If he could sink into the floor -

924-7-16

if he could fly into the outer air - if he could -but he could not. He must and would speak - he knew it,he felt it. He could scarce realize how he dared and yet he knew he did dare - he knew that before these rulers of the village,before these parents and children he was going tto speak the faith that was in him if it killed him;that he was going to answer the Bishop. He wondered at his own voice when he h eard it - it was so round and full and clear,no steady,when his whole soul was trembling and the audience was qiuvering with him:

"Reverend father in God"he said "for the thoughts this child of mine has spoken ,for the ambition knitting in these dark heart do not blame these people - blame me. I have taught,I have sought to inspire them, I have tried to stir them from the sluggish depths of their lives up to the fullness of their opportunities. I have done so,and forgive me,Sir, but I shall continue to do so. so long as there is breath in this body I shall speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. I shall tell my people;you are God's children - whatever men may aspire to, you may aspire to for you are men. Be ambitious,try to rise,try to be just as useful,wise and great as your God -given powers will let you. This I have taught my people and my children, reverend father,and this by God's grace,I will continue to teach them as long as he gives me life and strength."

He turned and stripping off his robe laid it silently at the prelates feet and then clasping his hands priest-wise before him he walekd with bowed head silently toward the door. A hush fell on the people like the trembling of a mighty hand;the rector half arose -the bishop stepped back from the mute dead robe and from a stricken thing and the blood roared in his head,while the little valedictorian bowe d her head and wept.

And suddenly above the throng rose one clear voice and voices:"Sanctus Spiritus" it cried,and again higher ,clearer "Sanctus spiritus". The slowly moving figure of the unfrocked deacon raised his head and his eyes met the wild tear swept eyes of the singer as the third wail higher sweeter rolled aloft

"Sanctus spiritus."

And then in a great wave of music swelled and the thrilling majesty of Gounod's great prayer-song,swinging in the air as the black man walked out into the free sunshine and into Peace.

The people listened motionless-sighed,and then the rector glancing toward the Bishop's vacant chair heistated forward and said with low voice and raised hands:

"The peace of God,which passeth all understanding keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." And the moving host murmured slowly "Amen."

The Judge Boggs thought & hoped to be furious: "The damned impudent nigger"he hissed "he ought to be horse whipped and I've a notion to do it." Mrs. Baxter too was inexpressibly ~~sex~~ shocked "To insult the bishop too -he's a dangerous pestilential fellow and must be gotten rid of - indeed,my dear Mrs.Jones,it's just such men that ruin the docility of our Negroes" but Mrs.Jones did not answer,and in her face sat a perplexed half-angry wonder - a creeping gnawing doubt.

The bishop had gone to the ante-room and greeted no one. He looked dreamily out the gilde colored glass until slowly the people had gone and only the quivering dust motes danced in the vestry room. Then the bishop returned thoughtfully pacing up and down. The rector watched him silently with twitching face,and far back in the church the black janitor watched them both. Slowly the bishop turned and saw the rector He smiled; he said:

"I have had a vision."

The rector started to answer vaguely,but the bishop went to where the deacon's robe lay folded and picked it up and handed it to the rector. And then he placed his hands on the rectors' shoulders and said:

"St.George,I have seen a man!"

And the rector bowed his head and was silent.

Chapter XXVV.

~~Interview~~ Bribery

Mrs.Grimes was obdurate and on the whole the board sympathized with her point of view,despite the pleading of a few staunch friends of the late Silena Smith. It was in Canaan amid the same old and ever young hills, where Mrs.Gries,formerly Mrs.Glennworth had made her luxurious summer home since her daughter married. Her gables and faultless lawns spread over Martha Reynold's father's acres and the well-preserved lady who acknowledged to a half century of life and might easily have claimed more, was an assiduous and liberal member of the Mission Society in the Episcopal church. They had formerly given to Silena's school as a matter of course but when she died they had ceased. Now a new call for this school which was revived under a new principal,Robert Calhoun had come and Mrs.Grimes objected.

"What's the name of it?"she asked sharply,being,quite unknown ts herself, a little hard of hearing -"the Momm Bett School?" What an outlandish name - O yes,I've haerd of this school from my daughter- well I object. I do not expect personally to help any further schools or schemes to make the Negroes discontented. They need to learn to work and be clean and save. My ideas of Negroes have changed in the last years. I seriously doubt if they will ever reach a very high plane of civilization. They can hope possibly to make a good contented laboring class,if properly trained and guided. As it is we are educating murderers and rapists - " and then Mrs.Grimes with trembling voice told of the wanton murder of her son-in-law and added "Only the quick arrival of the police saved my daughter from a worse fate,and - it may be wicked but I am glad they burnt the brute." A murmur of sympathy was heard.

"But this school seems to be doing some goo d," timidly suggested another woman. Mrs.Grimes shook her head emphatically.

"I know all about the school" she said "this Robert Calhoun is a dangerous type of Negro and one bound to give the country trouble. He is continually talking of his rights and trying to teach the pickaninnies to read the ten commandments in Hebrew before they can practice them in English."

41-7-429

"Moreover"said a bright little woman(she was Miss Mackay and her father had owned formerly half of the Glennworti-mackay Plantations)"the best class of white people in the place do not approve of this school and that to me is decisive. My brother has just gone there to manage the mills and so I have reliable testimony. It is foolish for us to think all southerners are wrong if white,nd right if black. Here are good Christian people - as good as we are or better - who believe that this young man is doing positive harm with the school in its present condition. I think that settles the matter."

"I don't" said a bold white-bearded old man with burning eyes who had wandered into the meeting,apparently unaware that it was primarily a woman's meeting. "I don't" said he in a deep musical voice. "I know that the Grimes-Reynolds factories passed their last dividends" (Mrs.Grimes pursed her lips and raised her lorgnette)"and that Negro labor in the south is far from what it ought to be and yet - yet I am unwilling to vote away the aspirations of any man on the bare word of another without pretty thorough investigation. I believe Negroes are Men. I want them to have a man's chance. This they have never had. Why not send a disinterested person to investigate the situation pretty thoroughly before deciding?"

But Mrs.Grimes was obdurate,and the Misson Society turned to the consideration of the new Italian Colony near Canaan. Here again Mrs. Grimes as usual occupied the floor.

"I do not approve" she announced "of the workers in this new-fangled settlement. Some of their teaching is distinctly dangerous and socialistic Last night a Miss - Somebody - black Italian looking woman whom they call - what is it?"

"Sister Helida"supplied Miss Mackay.

"Yes - well she made a talk about the rights of laborers and the like that was positively anarchistic."

"She was sent from some New York settlement because she could speak Italian and she's doing wonderful work in nursing and sewing - I hope - ".

But Mrs.Grimes interrupted "The best thing to do with these Italians is to get rid of them. Now I will tell you confidientially that Judge Boggs who has charge of my property in the south and Mr.Mackay the brother of our secretary have a plan of importing Italian labor into South Carolina to replace the shiftless Negroes. Our plan is to transfer this troublesome Canaan colony to Wilton Point."

The Mission society was enthusiastic at this bit of news.

"I broached this matter to the settlement folks and this Sister What - you - may-call-her was most insulting in her remarks. But as the settlement depends very largely on my subscription I rather expect they'll come to my way of thinking" and Mrs.Grimes smiled complacently.

41-7-430

Chapter XXV.
The Strike.

Robert Calhoun was facing the grimmest struggle of his life. To his surprise the Bishop had not dismissed him from his deaconate, nor had the trustees of the church funds immediately dropped his school. Yet he had been informed that the $500 appropriation would be cut to $100 the next year, and he knew that after that his little school would be left to shift for itself. In the white community about the bitterness and prejudice toward him redoubled in intensity. White visitors no longer came to the school, store-keepers refused him credit and cheated him. The anger toward him was especially wreaked on his helpless constituents; some lost their employment because they sent their children to him, some were scolded and threatened; some had their wages lowered; new "jim-crow" laws were broached and wholesale Negro disfranchisement was changed from practice to law just as soon as the fear of government intervention was removed. Worst of all Robert saw that secretly but irresistibly every chance, every avenue by which black men were likely to get any sure economso foothold or earn decent incomes were being shut off. Not only was this true at Wilton Point - he heard of it everywhere throughout the south. Was it the work of some dark secret agency? Some great organized propaganda working for the same ends that the White Camelia and the Golden Circle had worked in other days? He had heard dark hints of those names and deeds from his father. He believed the Ku Klux Klan was the same movement in other guise and he felt that today new underground deviltry of the same kind had its unholy grip upon the fair throat of the south.

Wilton Point had long been prosperous. It was a railway shipping centre. It had cotton mills and other manufactures. Yet none of this property came to the Negro. Poor whites from the hills came trooping down and filled the mills and Robert hated them for it. Only the lowest drudgery and menial work was left to the Negro and that was wretchedly underpaid. Even the profits on raising cotton and food supplies that belonged of right to the Negro went into the pockets of the merchants and middlemen who stood banded together for the one purpose of cheating Negroes as Robert bitterly complained.

41-7-431

Yet there were some faint gleams of promise. The high tide of prosperity had passed, and wages were falling. The women and children of the mills working 12 and 14 hours a day were grumbling audibly and emissaries from the northern trade unions were flitting among them. Rumors of strikes and disorders filled the air and only this very morning a slouching committee of poor whites had been to Judge Bogg's office and had a long talk.

After they were gone the Judge talked with John Reynolds and then called in the new young manager, Mr. Mackay.

"Mackay, if we aint damned careful we'll have a strike on our hands"

"It looks that way - and my northern stockholders are continually yelling for more dividends - Boggs, we can't afford to have a strike, I tell you."

"Well, that's my - who's this?"

Robert Calhoun entered the office. Mackay started to offer him a seat but Boggs scowled.

"Well?" he asked gruffly.

Robert plunged straight into his message.

"Gentlemen, your hands are threatening to strike right here in your busy season. Why not put Negroes in their places?"

Boggs stirred impatiently but Mackay bent forward. Robert continued:

"Now I'm not asking this on the ground of charity or philanthropy but for our mutual advantage. We want work. You want reliable labor Now if you will take the boys and girls trained in my school - not the ignorant rabble, but those intelligent young people, in a few months they can carry on the mills and in a few years they'll form the best skilled labor in the country."

The two white men looked at each other.

"Drop in again tomorrow,Calhoun,"said Boggs and closed the door after him.

"Well?f asked Mackay.

"Won't do "said Boggs;first place we'd have a race riot,and in the second place who'd raise the cotton and do the common labor? It would send wages of day labor from 50¢ to $1 a day in six months and ruin the Niggers. They'll get uppish,want to get out of their places and be white folks. No it won't do yet,we may have to come to it sometime,but not yet - moreover I've got a better plan" and he drew Mrs.Grimes' letter from his pocket:

41-7-432

"My plan is this;yield to these fellows now;bring in the Italians gradually;they are docile kind of Nigger anyway,when we get enough,smack down the wages and tell those who want to quit,to go to hell."

"Good"said Mackay and within a week the first load of Italians landed in Charleston enroute for Wilton Point.

Months rolled by and the Italian colony grew until fully half the factory hands were foreigners. Then suddenly came a 14% cut in wages. A wave of anger and amazement burst over the Italians. They showed their contracts,they recalled the promises made them,they jabbered and gesticulated but Mr.Mackay was dumb and Mr.Boggs shifted his cigar and said:

"O go to hell!"

John Reynolds went to Florida for his health.

Meetings were held and the Italians and poor whites met and talked togetherp For a week they talked and talked and then a last one morning Mary listened as she came out of the school house - "The mills"she said "Robert I do not hear the whirr [Ah!the whirr of the Pain,the grinding pain] of - of the mills?"

Robert listened too. The great mills lay quiet. Two thousand workers had struck.

Chapter XXVII.

~~The Black Man's Chance~~ Sister Helida

"Who is she"cried Robert angrily " why sister, it's the black man's chance. They have tried to get more Italians but the Italians won"t come The whites won't work. They've asked us. I can get 500 young people in a week. Think of it! the industries of Wilton Point will be ours. The school will be saved - supported willingly out of their earnings."

"I know it,Robert, it seems [the Pain,the low swift Pain] -ah- so clear nntil now,and yet she says 'Are you who have just been slaves going to make slaves of your brother workmen? Are you going to be the clubs wherewith the organized exploiters of the south will beat their laborers into submission and starvation wages? Is this the spirit of Christ? Do you really think the southern black man will ever rise by tramping the poor white underfoot any more than the poor white can climb to glory on black men's bones?'"

"But who is she?"interrupted Robert "and what business has she to interfere."

"Sister - Sister Helida -she signs herself - she had been a nurse and settlement worker among these Italians."

"Some foreign intermeddler who is afraid that these Italians won't get a chance to exploit the poor black man, just as other nations have - no sister, I am going to do it."

Slowly secretly he gathered his men.

"It's the chance of your lives"said Mackay "here are guns - now if you folks are not cowards you'll go to work and hold your places."and Robert shut his teeth grimly.

41-7-433

But the letters kept coming, now from Canaan - then from New York at last from the Italian settlement at Beaufort. At first Robert answered brusquely, and irritably, then the earnestness of the pleading, the culture and gentleness of the ~~method~~ mind caught his attention. He grew to lingering over the letters, studying the hand writing and thinking of the woman. She was evidently an educated woman, well born and well read, trained in heart and soul - her touch was sure and quick and ever courteous suggesting things she did not say. So for two weeks they talked together by mail.

"We have a right to use our cheapness as a weapon to get bread and butter"wrote Robert hotly.

"Is it not a two-edged sword?"suggested Sister Helida.

"If it is, they forged it and will suffer with us" he replied.

"They?oh,no! Not these men not even their fathers -it was the masters not the poor whites.-"

"But we need the aid of the capitalist"he insisted turning the argument.

"So do all poor workingmen, black and white."

"And now that organized capital is giving us our chance we can not refuse."

"You can refuse to join oppressors in oppression at any price."

"But these workers oppress and hate us as well."

"Is that excuse for hating in turn? Does hating pay?"

"Their unions bar us from work"insisted Robert doggedly.

"Then force your way up, - up not down."

"Good!that is what we are doing."

"But must you not be careful of the sort of force you use?"

"Work is war."

"Even in war, thought and justice count."

"If we do not force out these foreigners they will take the bread from our children.

"On the contrary welcome the foreigner, he will transform the south with law and order and justice."

"Is it right to throw away the advantage we now have?"

"Yes for the sake of a larger advantage to come."

So they argued, writing, until one day a letter came to Mary, saying:

"I have comn to Beaufort - there is much sickness here among the poor Italians and I am helping. Will you not come over tomorrow and see how things really are?"

It was afternoon when Robert and Mary sat out. Robert was thoughtful and Mary limped painfully. The great red mills still sat in grim silence but within Boggs was rubbing his hands.

"We expect 500 Niggers tonight at midnight; tomorrow the machinery starts - then see the dagoes and crackers run for their jobs."

41-7-434

Along the road that led up to town from the plantations lurked grim yellow faced men, hugging their rifles and watching for the black scabs. Just at the edge of town they halted Robert, but Mary showed Sister Helida's letter and they passed in. The town was bare and still. Coarse pale faces glanced here and there from the windows, and then a child ran toward them. It was white and Robert turned from it as he turned from all things ~~pale~~ white, but the child came nearer - pale, blue and scrawny, half clad, its great eyes were staring, and it cried: "Bread!"

Robert stopped and something choked in his throat

"Mary" he said slowly "go on I - I ' m going back. You must stay here all night if possible."

"But I wanted the lady to see you so, Robert."

"Yes - yes, tell her I'm coming back - tonight."

Mary started - "with the workmen?"

"Yes" he said - "but without guns."

Up the crooked dirty street the black girl limped [ah, the Pain- the tired, tired pain] until at last she came to the house. she stood a moment panting by the door, then turned - started in amazement - gave a little joyous sob and cried:

"Hilda - O my Hilda."

Long hours they sat together.

"I knew the name would puzzle you - the Italians pronounced it so and it sa ved time when I worked with them to spell it that way" - but Mary hardly listened.

"Forgive me, Hilda, O forgive me - I did not know you loved him I did not dream it until long after when he had lost you."

Hilda put her arms gently about her. "There is nothing to forgive, Sister, we needed the lesson both of us."

"But he needs you, Hilda, Robert needs you. He scarcely realizes it, but he is waiting. His whole life is waiting for the chord once touched by you and you alone. I am sick but he does not know it. Yet I know it. I know that the time hastens when I shall take a great journey to some fair painless land, and but for one thing I should be glad, so glad for I am tired, Hilda. He loves you; he always has- he always will - O Hilda couldn't - couldn't you love him just a little." And then she looked up into Hilda's eyes and murmured:

"Thank God - O thank God!"

It struck 12. "I wonder Robert doesn't come?"

But Hilda rose - "He - he must not see me tonight .- not tonight sister - wait until the strike is over — and then - then" So they talked on until there rose a great cry without - a long low wailing cheer. They stepped to the windows and saw rolling along the stree great wagons laden with bread and fruit and black men and women were handing out the food to the guaunt and stricken throng of the strikers. Long into the night the footsteps came and went.

41-7-435

Over the great white sea struggled the day and the tired watchers in the mill saw surrender written in the dawn.

Boggs was lived with anger and he cursed with every oath he knew.

"Damn their black souls" he hissed "I'll never hire another Nigger as long as I live."

"Yes you will too" growled Mackay as he returned from a parley with the strikers.

"What?"

"Yes you will - the crackers have tacked another item on their demands: they want Niggers hired in the spinning room."

Boggs rushed out to the strike committee.

"Look here! he yelled "Do you know what you're doing? Haven't you got daughters working in the mills?"

"Yes, my Sal she works there" drawled the spokesman.

"Well do you want your daughter to carry a Nigger?"

"Well no, I ain't a-hankering after that."

"Well then what'll you do when these Niggers get to earning as much as you do and feeling themselves just as good as you?"

"Well" said the man reflectively "if one of them asks her I'll just tell Sal to say 'no'".

Chapter XXVIII
The Beginning

When Robert left Mary he went directly to his men and told them the situation. No kinder-hearted people than Negroes exist on earth and it took but little persuasion to turn their thoughts of force and revenge into a desire to relieve the struggling starving strikers. Robert went with them to the edge of town and then turned back, and walked home at midnight alone, forgetting Mary, forgetting Sister Helida, forgetting all but his burden. Again he had done his duty, and again the grey hard bitter world stretched before him. What would his poor people live on next winter, now that they were giving their all away? In his pocket lay a summons to the last meeting of his trustee board. He knew what would happen - yes - yes - and then? What would happen? Would the school close?

41-7-436

No! He clenched his fists. He would not give up. He would not yield - he would never cease fighting the red injustice of this awful world so long as there was a breath of life left in his body. And he lifted his face to the stars and swore to God in the great white midnight never to falter, never to yield.

All night he walked. He knew they would tempt him at that board meeting. He must not give in - he must think and plan; and all night he walked and planned until his head whirled and pulsed. He did not go home lest something should break his determination, but walked straight to the vestry room.

He found gathered there in the rectory, the bishop and the rector, the principal of the white school and an old bald and grey bearded man, with great soft eyes whom he seemed dimly to remember. Robert entered bowed silently and stood a while until the rector bethought himself and offered a chair. The old man glanced about thoughtfully and spoke:

"As I have said, Bishop, I am willing to devote $10,000 a year to this work during my life and to endow it liberally when I die. My only condition is that the sum be equally divided between a white and Negro school"

The Bishop bowed; ~~cautiously~~ "We are certainly indebted to your great generosity and will endeavor to use the trust for the advancement of God's work - Mr. Patterson can you tell us of your plans?" The white principal explained at length. There was a pause. The Bishop turned "Mr. Calhoun" he said "Will you now kindly tell us of any plans you have?"

Robert started but rose and said: "I thank you but I came here merely to say that I have decided to withdraw my school from your control and to try and support it by my own efforts."

The bishop frowned "And why?" he asked.

"Because" said Robert "my ideas of what a Negro school should be differ so much from your that I could not conscientiously carry out your ideas."

"Could you carry out your own?"

"I could try Sir, and I'm going to try."

The bishop rose and Robert with a sigh bent for his hat.

"Then sir" said the bishop "Try - I say frankly that I do not believe the Negro race is ready for your ideas or capable of rising to them. We may differ as to Negroes, my son, but we do not differ as to men, and God forbid that I should ever place my ignorance of divine plans in the way of the aspirations of any human soul. Mr.Brown, your other $5000 will by our advice go to Mr.Calhoun's school." And then instead of warm words of thanks, instead of a courteous speech, instead even of a silent bow, Robert stood awkward and speechless and great tears gathered and rolled down his cheek.s

(37-7-11)

He rushed home to tell Mary and then with swelling heart heard, first of the opening for black workmen in the mills. Reverently he kissed his sister and turning toward his little study entered and closed the door.

It was Sunday and the service was done. Robert had read the wonderful 53rd chapter of Isaiah and preached from the text "The Chariots of the Lord and the horsemen thereof;" he had greeted the people, all save Irma Lloyd-Jones and her little golden haired grand-daughter. They had shrunk away before the sermon was done. One other stranger he had noted too, but she had gone. He turned to the little vestry of his chapel and stood a moment looking out: the long low luring horizon that lined the west lay all lurid with the sun. He closed the door quickly and sat down alone. Yes he was happy - happy at last he said, staring vacantly across the narrow room - was he happy ? and then with a groan he bowed his head in his hands and groaned:

"Hilda!"

And as he called her suddenly the door flew softly open and a flood of warm sunshine bathed his head. He raised his eyes slowly, wearily. The sun was drifting in in fading glory and, dyed in it crimsons rays lithe and glorious, stood a shadow. His heart stopped still. Yes it was Hilda- the vision of Hilda, and he sat motionless lest it fly. Then he caught his breath - no - no it was not Hilda - the witching roundness of her form was gone. - There were grey strands in these bronzen curls, there were lines in the golden face and shadows beneath the eyes. It was - it was not a vision of the past - It was Hilda - the real Hilda, flesh and blood, and he rose dizzily from his chair, stretched his arms and tried to speak - came swiftly to her and wound his arms about her - kissed the coiling curling of her hair, hungered into the misty depths of her dark eyes and whispered "The chariot -the chariot of the Lord and the Horsemen thereof!"

A great song arose. High above in the dim crimsoned chapel sat Mary her fingers straying idly - lovingly over the keys of the organ, her ears listening, her eyes wandering over the shadowy landscape toward the west and toward the east. Westward the sun was dying, eastward the nearer sea lay foaming white, but the sea beyond glowed with the echo of the sun. Suddenly a great Peace came hovering over all her Pain - a foreshadowing of the great painles s Peace to come. The organ rose in fuller music and she sang gently,clearly,then in deeper,greater tones,till the song rose and swept like some full plumaged bird:

"I know my mother will be there:
"In that beautiful world on high."

Far down in the rice fields a weary laborer caughtthe melody and sent the mighty singing onward with his great voiced lungs - far up in the cotton fields a weary mother clutched her dying child and singing,lifted her eyes up to the stars - and so voice on voice took the refrain until all a long the lowlands and above the wide dark waters,a great song arose.

Below the lovers listening clasped their hands,and together they walked down the world and toward the blazing sea. Above them hung the sound of the song of the sister's singing;within them thrilled the chords of endless Love and Work;Beyond them surged the mighty chorus of the sea - and all was peace and joy and hope - - save where an old way-weary man reeled onward to his death - save there where sat a woman's startled soul, staring white faced at the white faced sea.

41-7-438

Fragments and notes

Various drafts

41-7-356

11

Story of Mary Calhoun

The Seat of the Scornful.

Book I

The Story of Mary Calhoun.

I am a Child of God. I have been washed in the Blood of Christ. I know that many people don't like that kind of talk. They think ~~to be fanatical~~ folks that talk this way are badly off and don't mean it. But I am in earnest. And while I never had much education & can't talk like some I want to tell what the love of God & Christ would what he has done for me. I just let me go back & tell about my mammy. My mammy was a Heathen woman and she owned & yet somehow I think she knew God. Always I think of her as Uncle Cæsar used to tell of her

A1-6-508

"Who was the tall black Lady that I saw all Day — and was it Mammy all the Time I was
I was taken to Bed at night and Mammy washed
I must have thought I was old
All that day Mammy — my tall beautiful black
Mammy was a smiling & lovely and strong Old Lady with black crinkly hair was dear dear. I heard her say how Gal was angry and wanted the Sunshine of Heart & then turning on me, sudden-like,
"go play with Dawn —" she said "and bring her down here"
I loved to play with Miss Dawn. She was Old Masters only Child and 2 years younger than me — tall-straight & white white & gold with beautiful clothes. He dared Think her Mother asked her to come & our cabin but often I would ask & Miss Day Dawn & as soon as she saw me, off we went, about the yard & across the Fields & sometimes down to my cabin under the Bank where we played house. To day Mammy watched us carry & washed us play & as the sun began to sink she called us in & gave us buttermilk & bread. Then she said to me —
"go over to Aunt Dinah's and stay to night — I'm gone in to the Big House & I'll take Dawn home —"
I danced & grace for Mammy never went to the Big House. And besides me Dinah's quite frightened our Jane — I started to stand but suddenly I felt Mammy's eyes burning on me and I stood still away. Mammy often sent me to Aunt Dinah's when she wanted to be alone. I don't know road ahead. So I went slowly to Aunt Dinah's cabin back of the house to see Mammy & I was standing there in the dark way & behind there burned the fire I liked to go to Aunt Dinah's cabin when Uncle Eben was there. We did not like one another. But Aunt Dinah was cross & kind to me & gave me cookies & cooked good things. Uncle Eben lived away on a mountain plantation & did not come down often. And as I thought slowly on & the room fell cooler & the bugs sang, I peeped in at the door. Uncle Eben was there — a black black man with red eyes. I shivered & then crept in timid like. Uncle Eben frowned at me sharp.
41-1-153

"Git outs' o here" he growled "I want gorden have no yellow brat hangin' round me. Git out & go & yare damned white mother" Poor Aunt Dinah looked at me but I knew. Once the calico head nod & my the branch & down & the corners crooked & my by the great oak; — I half shrieked & turned either to run for it. or to the door. Quickly I crept to the cabin. ~~He was~~ The room was empty and in the little kitchen behind I heard Mammy Bell a-cooning. I crept in & climbed into the big chair in the shadows. Then I saw before the fire crouched a big black dog headed with curious things outside beside it crouched Mammy Bell's deadly snake. I was scared — O and I was scared & wished I had stood out under the oak tree in the dooryard myself. I closed my creek down where we found the kitchen came Mom Dell. She was most naked, her fine robes shredded & everything savaged on her breasts. On her outstretched arms lay the white & naked body of Little Anna & Mom Dell sang low as she walked & the blood ran. I tried & screamed but I couldn't. I saw the fire flare & the snake slithered coiled & struck. Mammy raised Anna high in the air & cried aloud and Ran —

41-1-154

Frantically knocked on the door. Sambo & Louise came the screaming & Mammy Bet screamed and woke When the door crashed in we came old Master He seized Anna & turned & I heard his cleaks running in the night. Mom Dell never stirred. She stood, her hands on hips, her breath gusting in her teeth. She stood so it seemed hours, hours. Then silently Old Master entered again & closed the door behind him. I can't never forget what came: the fire, the smoke, the ashes; Mom Dell & Colonel B Bentley. Old Master watched her & she cursed him — how that awful curses then came in gusts rolling thunders. The blood bubbled clouds & the fire ate. The snake turned & squirmed & over the stench of the grand blaze with breeze and shuddered in the air. O many I never hear such Curses again as I heard in Ancient Times songs & as blood, as she savaged as she fell as she lay in blood & flame

41-1-155

I went to Aunt Dinah's then & here came was helping working in the fields and singing as usual when Uncle Eben came But at last he came no more. Perhaps he died. Perhaps he was sick with. I don't know. Only I knew that my mystic eden dark tell about Aunt Dinah sat in the corner quiet like with her apron over her head. Long years I never saw Dinah out often I used to go and sit in the twilight where she sat & the cabin used to be & think of Aunt Bell and wonder.

~~One day I was sent on an errand & the day. Next. I was~~

So the years flew. I was 18 and a field hand 'Sis' now and then I went in the Boy House & helped out. O how I wanted to stay there & have clean clothes & all the nice things & eat. One day I saw Miss Dunn — tall elegant & white; and beautiful but clean & raised her head high. She was in the October and they became her waist was neat & She saw me. I had a new gingham & my shirt covered with a button — a white & stood proud — in it. She looked at me. I stood trembling & ashamed, face flushed with Paddick I was away in my hands.

"Which one?" asked Miss Dunn

Cook smiled & says "Aunt Bell's —" but she changed & did not finish why till after — "She's Mary — Aunt

41-1-157

Dennis give" and said.
~~Stands~~ "get her some clothes" and send her 2 me"
remember when I was, and I never died of fear.
I was & some clean dresses and shoes & stockings & shelly would cuss & scream. I was so sad when Dad & mama sold Annie & nothing & do but smile when I miss shelly always. O I was shaddy shaking
I dressed my mistress. I remember her ~~queen~~ temples ~~& changeable but I was going & to~~ & how changeable she was and I would try on hands, all hand. All went well for a long long time. I found I was liked me. I learned & looked her. I was sad & sorry for her because for all her things hands & money she wasn't a bit happy. Always something was drawing her on & on & she was like a young horse that kicked & pulled.

One night — I remember it so well. Miss
I was had gone out & I was not especially her hair had had. And came and knocked & me.
Now shall I tell it? I had met Tom.

41-9-510

"O, he was high and great and pretty. Smooth and black and stronger than everybody. When first I saw him standing in the young cotton field with his great arms and sweet eyes, my flesh went all a tremble for I knew my man had come, my own man. Yet Celia wanted him and Celia was yellow and witching. I saw her tempting him once as he took her across the great lagoon under the tortuous shadows of the trees; she leaned toward him and put the spell of her eyes across him and he looked at her puzzled-like. O I was mad with jealousy I was crouching in the slimy underbrush and they glided almost within [illegible] and then disappeared.

41-9-509

I wanted to die. I wanted nothing on earth like I wanted him. Without him I meant to creep into the slimy swamps + drink death. And then he came one night. He came + stood outside ~~the~~ Amos Dennis's cabin + played on his banjo. And when I came to the creek of the door, he told me how he loved me and wanted me & he dries tears And my hands crept along his cheek. And I cried.

And on third night when Miss Fanna was gone + I was alone in her beautiful room, Sudden like I wanted to be beautiful. I wanted to be the most beautiful thing in the world for a moment — just for Tonio's sake. All he could see me. I did never dared to look on this I.'s Thing before but merely, as mechanism but just once. I was wonderful. It was a miracle. The feel of hair + softness, the shine + color. I did not know clothes could do so much. I did not know myself. I stared + stared into the glass. Why I was — I was — almost — a Lady! almost — witche! And then — then I saw Miss Fanna.

She knew me. She knew me after ten long years.

41-1-158

She hated me. I found she meant to kill me but she fainted — from unhealthy dear. I put her kindly on bed & left. But God was not done with me. He was trying my stubborn heart & humbling the pride of Babylon. That day Tom came & me. He was covered mud dust & sweat & a great red scar was cut across his face. I shamed down & my aching heart. He was running away. He had chased a wicked woman. He was running away from. He he wouldn't let me go much down. But did come & get me some day. Some day — he come before God. He left me a crushed heart on the cabin floor.

That night I wandered deserted & alone but God guided me. He turning by the creek & along the dry road. He led me with fright as the sound surrounded voices there day. He guided me on & on until I stood at the cross roads — ledge the great road & took across the Charleston road. That way with edge of the summit Tom was running running to days & days & men were chasing him. I groaned & sank down until an old woman hurried me up & guided me with the church

41-9-511

It was crowded & I heard a crowd then. It was deserted. I knocked at windows. God forgives me. I did and demons.

When I left Hands an one was watching me. I went out a ways. I listened. All darkened. A minister was with old wooden pulpit & their deer nearby the hills. He took aside his edibles. It was terrible hot & he took off his coat & collar. We leaned over & ate & eat softly.

"Emelmus, I wants to tell you a story. It is the Negges' story ever told. Nito' I and God."

I remember every word of him along. I can tell it as he did with his tone and accents. But I can tell what he meant to say.

41-9-512

Conversion of Mary Magdalene

And the people got mad. And they said they didn't care nothing about no God's crime they was [illegible] buying selling something to eat & clothes on their backs; and besides they gave charity & read their prayers regular. And if they have sinned after their fashions & disobeying of the laws they'd have done broke out. And when Jesus & the twelve folks began & says as how they wanted to be something in mind this fellow & and & this he was a right young fellow & quiet & decent & they began & follow him & learn about God. And the rich folk & elders & deacons got mad.
They said how we got to stand this fellow run our hall down no. So they gave a dollar 30 cents & got amongst the fellows & left on him, & [illegible] they arrested him & had him in jail

41-7-357

I danced with me for Joy. I knew my Lord was Born again & I was a Child of God
And me sang & sang & I lifted my voice above them all

I praise the Lord

" " " "

" " " Bless Lord the Lord

to me

And so I ~~sang~~ became a child of God &
I have reformed from all my sins. O yes I have sinned & backslid but forgives & comforts me he leads me by His hand, & his mercies are everlasting.

O don't I remember, dear God, don't I. Remember when your sent Tom back to me.

41-7-189

50
50
50
50
50

250
12
3000

41-7-345

Story of Eyebright

(Story of Little Lloyd Calhoun)

3½
2

The memory of the tall thin black boy whom she called brother.

He came home ~~bleeding to the~~ Mammy & cried about it & I cried. I'm going & run away

Mammy tells them to go — the gods of the Devils are angry — Strangers — & they must alone for 3000 moons She draws from the two rings & blesses & cures them & he goes with me

Her tall black mammy. — The smelly black smoke the barred door

Mammy is told to stay with Emma

She is sent away & Aunt Dinahs for the night

Uncle Clem drives her home — he and grim & stern no yellow but sorrow round with his children

She creeks in Mom Ellis tent

The altar & the strangers — the crowing in the kitchen. Woman bitt & her prayers — Market & the white still body of Emma

I tried & scream & Candrin

The fire — the little wandering flame — the ~~mossy~~ smoke

The incantation — the knock on the door — the rescue of Emma — the door ajar

Old master returns

The low curse & vows

The silent washing — the dreary smoke the last blow

I faint

I am at Aunt Dinahs ~~the rains is already~~ ~~needs and a bucket of cold water~~

I sit on the green grass where mammy Cabin was & cry.

a beautiful baby comes by & I clap. Miss Emma wants me "to stay with"

I go & dig trenches. Old master touches me with [illegible] & says "For shame" & I run & clasps his hands

One day I am alone near old Master, he looks at me sorrowfully & suddenly I know — he is my Father — he kisses my brow & gives me a packet — when you get married

([illegible] is marriage ring & $500 in it)

I try & be good — I nurse Tom Calhoun — I am converted

~~I am [illegible] Jesus Christ~~

~~I am converted~~ in the great revival & I serve the Lord. I am married & go to Atlanta. I open my basket & find marriage ring & $500.

I try on ring & kiss I mean clothes & am ~~[illegible]~~ diamond & am diamond — she takes the ring

my baby is born & dies

my second baby is born & ~~freedom~~ War comes my third is born & freedom comes. My third baby dies. My husband becomes a leader & we are almost rich; in 1874 my boy is born. ~~I and the ring about this week~~

My husband is knighted & I run away with my two children. I try & take Hilda but lose her.

I go to Atlanta & become a washerwoman

my girl in College & my boy Theodore has married

He is sent to Chain gang. I work hard and in 6 months — he is pardoned & sent back. He runs away & I pray for him

I find Hilda crushed Hilda. She cries. Boy dangerously. She tells of persecution.

I pray for my boy. He comes back & marries Hilda. God is good. Hilda sickens We go to Colorado. He disobeys [I want the murderer. It is Hal. He is converted. He tells me & gives me my ring & I forgive God forgives — in Heaven]

Interlude – On the High Seas

3. The Seat of the Scornful

Book I The Story of Mary Calhoun * (see 3/2)

Mary Lloyd, was born in 1839 and was one of two children of the Wild woman, Irma Bell & her master Colonel Lloyd, by whom Irma was the mistress & the unnatural father of Irma. Her mother was a Cherokee Indian princess & a devout religious woman. She was driven from home by Irma & married Tom Calhoun in 1868. He was a political leader associated with John Reynolds & they had three children – two girls who died in 1871 & one boy Hal Calhoun, born in 1874. Reynolds deserts Tom & Tom is lynched in 1876. Mary Calhoun, bankrupt in both money & health moves to Atlanta where Hal, in 1886 becomes a wage-earning & pillar of the Wheat Street Church. Hal leaves his little playmate Hilda Rumbo. He meets new companions in Atlanta & his mother has a hard time. He gets into the chain gang & she crashes down. He runs away & she prays for him. God will give him back to her before she dies

Book 2 The Story of Hal Calhoun

Hal is born in Charleston in 1871 & Hilda in 1872 for 11 years they are inseparable companions. Then Hal is taken to Atlanta. He is a lazy slouch & in 1886 strikes an ensign & is sent to the chain gang. He swears to kill a guard often with a little finger bitten thru and a peculiar ring of twisted gold. He is cursed by a year in the chain gang & determines to pray. He leaves home for Atl. He becomes a gambler, loses all & breaks into a house the office

She hears Mary Bell curse & runs to Irma's room & tells the news. Irma orders her taken to the other end of the laundry building & locked

41-7-3442

1886
1871
15
1890

of the Iron Workers. He is given five years in the mines. He comes out in 1893 broken in health & spirits. He becomes a Pullman porter in 1894 stealing a comrades trousers. He tries & steal from Annunciata Reynolds. She gives him her pocket books & kisses him. He remembers Hilda. ~~Love Hilda~~ He returns & Atlanta & finds Hilda much his mother — a beautiful cuddle. He marries her in 1895 & toils furiously for her. She develops consumption He goes on the road as porter & struggles her & Col. Strongs. They refuse her entrance. He is mad mad & drives. Then Annunciata comes and Hilda dies. He gives up the child. I would find one thing he cries — a Ring. He steals ~~treed. bound~~ smith on a fullman

A Rear Admiral, as Atlanta commander, curses him for a "damned drunken nigger". He sees the ring. He kills the admiral. drunk navy Navy asks the judge "Because he called me & my wife & my child" The judge says he ought to be hanged. He is sentenced to death under another name. Hes mother comes & visit him in prison. They meet. He dies converted. She dances for joy

Book 3. The Story of ~~Robert~~ Reynolds Blakesley Lloyd-Jones

He is born in 1897, the ~~husband~~ son of Rear Admiral Lloyd & Annunciata Reynolds. Very early he knows that he was colored & refused to do. ~~When~~ He early became an artist, loved the outdoors, painted & was passionately fond of women especially ~~the~~ Indian. He went to a select N. E. preparatory school & visited ~~to~~ Brent friend from a colored servant of A. Vinal. He told his mother he wanted to go to a

41-7-346

1896-97

Randolph College — as Athlete. She developed, mentally, physically & emotionally. He went to A.V. and entered College as Reynolds Lloyd, dropping the Lloyd. From the first he was attracted by a slender girl Doris Jones — Tall straight & beautifully formed, her skin satin, her features small & beautiful, her hair a great mass of natural fibres parted in two shell masses & her eyes. He used to sit and looked at her until her embarrassment blushed in anger. When the students teased & he noted their social classes of Colored or suspicion. He resented the "morality" of the teasers & the narrowness of the Community. He helped in a great Concert with Negro songs & then discovered Doris' voice, her great sombre contralto. He knew when he heard it & broke in upon it until she was woken. Then he sang at her. They stood a moment face & face & then turning she ran away strangely with sobs. He tried to speak to her next day. She avoided him. Then came the Memorial students call & war, he enlisted. Sang at Doris again. She had gone. He discovered Mary Blankenship & loved her. He met unashamed & disdainful white students & took their manners & language at them as one in training — a Charlestonian — Harrison Coles. Then he [illegible] met Coles in N.Y. & Coles was hopelessly astounded. He told Armstrong when he was entering the black world for good. She told him he was Mary B's grandson & promised a home for him in Philly. He enlisted 92nd division, entered maneuvers. Became a lieutenant [illegible] in 368th. Engaged under Col. Coles. Went to Argonne battle. Was wounded

41-7-347

Esther & Archibald married by Red Cross nurses & part at his request much fortunes. Gets his wedding. On Dunkirk he hears the voice of Doris. He sleeps two weeks & she comes. She sings - shades of Mme Butt - the wedding bells of this version of the Friends of Hell let loose
They plan to go to Africa & raise the black world
They meet Indians & Egyptians, Chinese.
They are married in Tunis & see Cape Mount
& the 5 p.a. congress
The Poetlinde - On Mount Everest

Head of Uncle Conjuro
Comic Mount

41-7-348

Part 3 The Seat of the Scornful

Mom Bell & Caesar, Hal & Hilda, Robert & Mary

Robert the University becomes a Priest & marries Hilda.

Hal becomes a criminal — thief, murderer, confidence man, labor leader. Robert takes the war-children

Rich Hilda & colorado & flanches a Rabbi-woman via and she dies. The Parson & Robert Love. Her baby is born & lives. Edith Coles goes west & loses her child. Her baby is born & dies. She meets Robert & adopts his child. When Reynolds is after years wonders at his color & tries Edith reminds him of Mom Bell. Robert Lloyd Coles-Reynolds tames the Indian maiden.

Looks & see. Removal. Settlement work; slumming; travel.

His fathers power. The Great Imperial Conspiracy in London - 1911. *

He meets the Inner Circle — something clubs — His fellow-men

World War. He summons back & Amens & gets into the 92nd division. His ancestors troubles & tells them his descent. He smiles. I know — I've always known it. Father Robert did not tell me — I told him.

With the 92nd — the assignment — the shell — the Negroes human Emotions mixed Americans Fools

Boggs a Cabinet

* ended with disease Japanese Indians — the Italian baby

11-7-34

1877
1864
75

Annandale

Mary Calhoun's eldest daughter grad N College
& studies medicine. She works as a trained nurse
(25 yrs old in 1877) She is the medical woman Annandale likes. She founds or helps found the Charleston Hospital for Women & Children

Part III county."

"Is that Colonel Henry Jones?"

"Yes - he was in the front coach - his wife is not there; just had a child last week and they say she's very low."

"A handsome woman, I've heard."

"Well no, not handsome but a woman of fine appearance, haughty and aristocratic and bright-minded I hear - I never have known her well."

"Married long?"

"Why no -four or five years - look there do you see that wench?"

The funeral train of carriages and horsemen had passed, and a line of black folk afoot were following; they were mostly old people decently clad and reverent in bearing. At their head, stalking alone was a singular figure, a tall black woman of massive frame, erect carriage and swinging gait. Her skin seemed stretched across her great bones like hard thin leather and between it shone in almost painful emaciation. A single garment of coarse cloth was found curiously about her, out of which her head rose in strange forbidding aspect - short tufted hair of greyish black, high cheek bones, straight full nose and swelling lips, all set with eyes of piercing keenness. The whole aspect of the face was mingled hatred, mysticism and cunning. And yet, repulnive as was the general aspect of the hag her face held something fascinating perhaps even a memory of former attractions. She walked quietly in swinging strides, erect with high poised head and the people as she passed seemed to shring from her, the whites almost imperceptibly with vaguely shown uneasiness - the blacks with half-reverent fear.

41-7-349

"See that wench? that's Mom Bett," said the postmaster; "well now, in my opinion" lowering his voice to a whisper, "she poisoned old Lloyd."

The stranger started uncomfortably.

"She's one of those Voodoo women - came here in 1807. I remember it well. I was a young fellow and was down to Charleston and by George, she was the finest looking wench I ever saw. She fought like a beast when they landed her and Lloyd bought her on the spot for $1000, an enormous price then. She said she was some sort of queen and by George she's lorded it over his plantations ever since, till everybody's afraid of her. Lloyd tried to sell her mulatto daughter last year and she raised hell. I believe she poisoned him in revenge ~~for bringing her down here from the old plantation~~ - some slow poison, for he's drooped and dwindled

There sat the cradle but it was empty while on the floor ~~lay two little naked babies and beside them~~ crouched an old wild looking black woman. Irma leaned against the door way thinking and moistening her lips. Why was Mom Bett here she thought dimly. ~~Why were there two babies~~? Where was the baby Then suddenly a face appeared in the doorway-frightened, fearful. ~~It was Juno, Juno!~~ Why Juno was sold south ~~two years since~~. Irma spoke slowly, with great effort:

"What are - you doing here?"

The old woman lifted her awful face and ceased her crooning.

~~"They're both his" she said holding up the child.~~

Irma tried to ~~answer~~ speak - to say -~~"He - no only, Juno"~~ but a great weariness stretched through her limbs. She reached her hands for a chair and then settled quietly to the floor and lay there prone and white.

41-7-358

Below Colonel Jones was in his office with lighted cigar explaining something to his guest who listened intently. Colonel Jones paused and ~~listened~~ hearkened

"Excuse ve a moment" he said " I fear my wife may be sick and I thought I heard a noise in her room. Excuse me just a moment" and he stepped into the hall.

As he stepped out he heard the cry of a child. He looked up the great stair case and staggered backward with an oath - poised half way down the stairs was the half girded red black form of the hag Mom Bett, tall and hideous. She stood like an arrow, one arm akimbo while in the other held straight aloft lay a tiny white and naked babe; her head was thrown back, her eyes were fastened on the infant and her lips muttered convulsively as she stepped majestically noiselessly downward.

In an instant Jones comperhended. She was stealing his new born son. He leaped forward. She saw him suddenly-crouched backward snarling like a beast, hurled the babe at him and fled. Fortunately he was so near that the child fell but a few feet and he caught it gently; he hesitated a moment as the woman darted by, then he rushed up stairs.

"Celia, Celia" he cried violently ringing the bell. The servants came trooping up stairs with scared faces but the nurse Celia was missing.

Colonel Jones carried his wife quickly to her bed, absent again a moment over the sleeping child then hurried down stairs. ~~For a moment he hesitated in the hall breathing~~ hard. He stepped hastily to the door of the study.

Mr. Reynolds

"Well, well," he said with ill-assumed ease. "I did not mean to leave you so long. I beg a thousand pardons. One of the maids has disappeared and Mrs. Jones is feeeling badly too. I must excuse myself for the night but you will remain all night of course and we'll finish our business in the morning - no- no - it's no trouble and I'll have no excuses. -Jim-Jim! show the gentleman to the guest chamber and see that he is comfortable."

He watched them slowly ascend the stairs in a fever of impatience. Then he went quietly to a rack in his study and took down his pistols and a long lithe snaky-looking whip, and had started for the front door when a woman ran violently against him, then leaped back wild-eyed, terror-stricken. It was Juno.

"How dare you enter this house" he hissed "you black wench."

"I - I lost - something" she panted. He wheeled on her and raised the whip.

41-7-351

"Where's your mother?"

"She gone to the cabin."

"Did you help her tonight?" His hand twitched.

"No - I came - to stop her, but I - I lost."

"Get home, damn you."

"But -

He whirled the whip above his head and with a frightened moan she fled into the night. He rushed after her. Across field and fen they ran, down the old road, over the highway, toward the sea. He grasped the snaky whip and bent low keeping his eyes on her flying form, and cursing softly. Once he stumbled and lost sight of her, rose and staggered and ran again till he saw her form flitting by the red light against the sea. On he came bounding to the door of the cave-like hut.

Within was a flickering dying flame and over it crouched Momm Bett, crooning. In one corner Juno had thrown herself in a huddled mass sobbing wildeyed In the other corner was a dark shadow but Juno terrified thought she saw there an old, old man with wrinkled face and shadowy eyes. The witch woman never turned as Henry Jones entered and he said no word. He glanced at the shadow once, at Juno twice and then he threw off his coat, rolled back the shirt sleeve from his great white arm, and stripped the coarse cloak from Mom Bett's naked back in one movement. He whirled the black writhing lash and it hissed and sang in the air.

It was very still there at the edge of the great rice marsh-no birds, no insects, only the dull tossing of the [illegible] and the keen rythmic swishing of the black lash. A little stream of blood trickled lazily to the floor.

The Colonel Jones spoke: "What - did you mean to - do with - my child?"

She looked at him with great eyes and said slowly "To kill. To kill." He raised the whip and struck her again and again. She crooned a low wild song as the blood streamed and spattered, then suddenly, leapt straight into the air with a quivering, fading shriek and fell prone on her back, with the blood oozing from her nostrils, and a great distorted smile on her rigid face.

His arms dropped. He leaned giddily against the crazy door, then turning reeled strode into the night. And His face was as scoured marble.

41-1-156

ent of our Peace was upon him and with his stripes we on her heart like a knell- All we like sheep she groped ave gone astray, "(she tottered forward)" we have turned his own way." (She must go; she must think -the air here) - the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all."

She rose swiftly and dragging the child walked unsteadily toward the door hearing as she went:

"He was oppressed and he was afflitced, yet he opened not his mouth, he is brought as a Lamb to the slaughter and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth."

Some one stretched dark hands to help her but she shrank away. She did not hear the prattle of the child:

"Grandma, are black people really people?"

"Grandma, did God make black people?"

"Why did he make them black, grandma?"

"Grandma, I like black people, don't you?- only they look so funny."

She did not hear the sough and sigh of the great winds nor the music of the leaves, only the music of that voice haunted her - where had she heard it before? -and the words, the strange old new words.

"He was despised and rejected of men-

"with his stripes we are healed.

She did not see the streets, the city, nor the great dull sky, but tottered thru the gate with dim and wide stretched eyes. The child looked at her face in silent awe and crept noiselessly away. So all the world had left her - would leave, -and she groped for the great arm chair on the veranda and sank into it. Ah, she was weary, so tired, tired. The sun was burning the red sea and a black hulled ship hovered on the horizon. So the slave ships used to sail in blood.

"He was despised and rejected of men,
And With his stripes we are healed."

She bent forward and stretched her shrunken arms, and wisps of white hair played on her toothless jaws while out of the night rose a singing, wierd, wild singing beneath the dead sky and across the murmuring waters - long into the night she sat there staring whitefaced at the white-faced sea.

41-7-329

41-1-208

The Sign.

There was battle in the summer seas. A great hard muscled man was stalking through the loveliest of the languorous isles of the gulf, drinking the air, smelling the sea and scenting the perfume of the sky, but keeping his eyes ever afar to sight a great black ship, dim-sailed that beckoned and hovered in the offing. A hound ran before him - a huge blond and blue-eyed hound, with great curved back, slim legs and shifty eyes. He ran nervously to and fro nosing the ground searching, searching; and ever he crossed the way of the man's footsteps and the man with his eyes aloft kicked him as he stumbled on him and the hound snarled.

Suddenly they came to a place of flowers - wonderful flowers: great thick and golden blooms, curiously in wrought and cunningly carven, delicately strong and sick-sweet with a strange alluring scent. No sooner did he see them than the hound howled foamed at the jaws and pawed with glazed set eyes among them. The man would pass on but the hound leapt in his path frothing and whining: the man struck at him with the great limb of a tree but the lithe beast leaping, set his fangs into the tall man's arm and the blood spurted. Then there was battle in the summer seas. The man fought carelessly and threateningly, but the hound beat him back; he fought angrily, viciously but the hound fastened on his waxen throat; he fought madly, despairingly but the hound hung voiceless drinking the pouring blood. So fiercely did the man and hound fight, so quickly did they move that it seemed as though men and hounds by hundreds were battling over the whole face of the island. The breath of battle stirred the very air - the sea dashed itself against the land, the great white water mists rose and rolled themselves into the black lowering land clouds - the sea roared and the heavens thundered, while forked lightnings crashed in the heavy treetops, waving above the frightened eyes of the white faced woman who watched the battle from afar, wrapped in the forest.

602-1-17

Suddenly the ~~black~~ dark ship vomited its burden - the black and bloody bodies of shackled slaves, quick and dead, dark maids and women great with child, whimpering babes - all muttering wailing, shrieking.-clamored down into the sea under the lashing whips, and as they poured down they bled till the ship ran blood and men. The waters hurled them inward toward the shore, floating, swimming, wading. But the white faced woman watcher, mad with fury called to the waters and up from the depths ~~came~~ rose dead women, white faced and white-lipped. The sea whirling, hurled the pale dead into the black faces of the fear-struck living, beating out the brains of the men and bursting the breasts of the women till their babes sucked blood.

Suddenly night fell and with it fell madness and confusion. The hound snapped at its own lean flank - the man tore at his own bloody throat, the cramped hands of the white-lipped women clutched in each other's trailing hair and the wretched slaves fell on each other in ignorant fury. With wail and shriek the wind puffed in the dim sails of the black ship, the wonderful golden flowers turned black with night and red with blood, and with a great cracking groan the man fell across them and died in lonely silence, while in the forests rang a woman's cry.

41-1-210

Afar on the ship fading into the night sat a brown-faced Indian with his face set westward. On he flew a-top of seething hissing waters, passed naked isles, passed mournful headlands, passed the black backs of other shackled slaves crouching in the shudder of the storm. And behind in the ~~single~~ empty isle, with his red feet on the dead white face, the lone hound howled to the howling winds.

"He was digging potatoes here evidently"said Reynolds. "And here are his tools - ah - to the barn."

They ransacked the barn. There was no one to be found.

"Well,he may have gone down town-supose you come back about dusk" said Reynolds. And then he returned sat among his guests and thought. As he sat there he glanced up and saw Martha looking at him from the kitchen door. An appeal lay on her face but he did not see it - he only saw a look that brought back through the mists of twenty years and more the memory of a round girlish face,with terror in her eyes who crouched on the lintels of that very door and told him a tale of runaway slaves,and then he and she had slipped out into the yard yonder - he started to his feet. Fool! how could he have forgotten that old trap door . A moment he hesitated but the memory of that dark night on the wharf arose and he went white with anger. Sauntering out on the porch, later he watched the road and met the marshall. He whispered to him and the marshall and his assistants hurried to the barn just as Martha appeared on the back porch with a plate off food. She threw her apron over it and stood petrified. The tardy minutes dragged away and then the barred door opened and Tom Calhoun chained hand and foot came out slowly between two heavily armed men. The food crashed to the floor;she staggered back to the kitchen.

"Silena,Silena" she cried " they're taking our Tom back to slavery" and then she settled into the old chair and stretched her arms on the kitchen table and fainted away.

Silena lost not a minute of time. She dashed a whole pail of water over the prostrate woman and then picking up her skirts jumped through the window leapt the fence and flew up the dusty road. Far behind she heard the hoof beats of the marshall's horse,but she threw back her head and ran like a fawn,across the bridge,under the great elm,into the post office.

"Father - father" she screamed "They're kidnapping Tom Calhoun."

And with a shiver and a roar the town of Canaan poured into the streets.

Meantime the guests, save Higby, had no inkling of the incident. Grimes was showing certain specifications on a large blue print to Haynes and Coles and Bates. Higby had ridden down town,and John

41-1-203

Reynolds was listening to Grimes.

"What's that" asked Grimes as a low rumble reached his ears.

John Reynolds stepped to the door. A distant roar of voices was wafted in.

41-1-204

"Excuse me - I'll step down and see" he said seizing his hat, and to Grimes' disgust Haynes followe d. The wagon of the marshall was in the midst of the long street of Canaan surrounded by an angry crowd of men.

"Thief"

"Slave-catcher."

"Murderer", they yelled "Let him go- let him go."

John Reynolds pushed his way through the throng and clambered into the carriage. The marshall recognised him. "Gentlemen" said Reynolds "we are all law abiding citizens. You know me - I promise you that this man shall not be taken from town without a fair trial. Let us see that he is safely put in the look-up tonight and his case properly tried tomorrow." The crowd looked upon Re ynolds as defending the Negro and quickly assented.

The next morning Harrison Coles sauntered down town. Something had been said casually at breakfast about the trial of a fugitive slave, but no particulars were given, and yet he was curious. The court room was crowded to the doors with men, women and children. The women were in tears, the children wide eyed and the men stern and solemn. A gnant minister opened the proceedings with along earnest prayer and then Tom Calhoun was arraigned and Colonel Higby offered documents to prove that he was his property

Surprise, disgust and indignation swept over Coles' face.

"You acknowledge that you ran away from slavery?" insisted the prosecuting attorney.

"Yes" said Toc.

"And that you came from ~~South Carolina~~ Virginia?."

~~"Yes."~~ "No!"

"~~And~~ But this description could not be more precise" he argued as he read from a newspaper.

"That description might fit a thousand Negroes" protested the lawyer of the defense. "There is absolutely no identifying mark outside the general description of height, weight, etc.

"I think I can identify the man" the voice came from the back of the room. Higby looked around in ourprise and Reynolds in apprehension.

Harrison Coles came forward. "This Negro" he said "belongs to me. He was the property formerly of Senator John C. Calhoun and came to me through my aunt by inheritance. He was always well treated, was married in my house and had two children. Suddenly and to us unaccountably he beat his young wife terribly and ran away. We suspected that he escaped North on some of the sailing vessels out of Charleston, and altho I advertised locally, I made no great effort to trace him. His action to me was unaccountable. His treatment was the best I could give and if he wanted to leave I was willing he should go. I have here a description of him with certain scars and marks, published in the South Carolina ------ March 3--18--" Moreover I think Tom will corroborate my words."

"They are true" said Tom Calhoun. "I am Master Coles' slave."

A groan went through the strained audience.

"I have - ah- evidently been mistaken in this identification and I witdraw all claim" said Colonel Higby and with an awkward bow to Coles he hurried out.

"I award this slave to Harrison Coles" said the commissioner.

Tom bowed his head and an ominous murmur shook the room.

Reynolds came quickly over to Coles. "We have arranged to slip him out of the back way" he said "a swift carriage is there and the south train will stop at the crossing - pay no attention to these ". But Harrison Coles brushed by him.

"Mr. Commissioner " he said I have made no claim to this slave and make none now. If you will make out a certificate of his freedom I will sign it."

There was no cry - no cheer that greeted these words only a great sob quivered among the crowd and slowly, fully the voices of the men swelled in the old long-meter doxology-"Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow."

"This court stands adjourned" said the commissioner.

The incident spoiled Mr. Grimes' conference. Congressman Higby and Haynes were called suddenly to New York, and Mrs. Coles wrote her husband to join her in Saratoga. "It is unusually gay" she said. As Harrison

41-1-205

"I have -ah- ~~-er-~~ evidently been mistaken in this identification and I withdraw all claim "said Colonel Higby and with an awkward bow to Coles he hurried out.

"I award this slave to Harrison Coles"said the commissioner.

Tom bowed his head and an ominous murmur ~~gasp~~ shook the room.

Reynolds came quickly over the Coles. "We have arranged to slip him out ~~of~~ the back way"he said -"a swift carriage is there and the south train will stop at the crossing - pay no attention to these -" but Harrinon Coles brushed by him.

"Mr.Commissioser" he said " I have made no claim to this slave and make none now. If you will make out a certificate of his freedom I will sign it."

There was no cry - no cheer that greeted these words onlya great sob quivered among the crowd and slowly,fully the voices of the men swelled in the old long - meter doxology --"Praise God from Whom all Blessings flow."

"This court stands adjourned"said the commissioner.

41-1-206

The incident spoiled Mr.Grimes' conference. Congressman Higby and Hay Haynes were called suddenly to New York,and Mrs.Coles wrote her husband ~~longing~~ to join her in Saratoga. "It is unusually gay"she said. As Harrison Coles wound ~~northward along~~ Westward across the dark rivers ~~Housatonic~~ and looked at the hills and the faces,a bewilderment lay on his spirit. He had met in that ~~little~~ back village of a North he had never known before. The Northerners he knew were prigs and doughfaces,money bags like Grimes schemers like Reynolds and a few fanatics. Here however he faced a great sincerity. Simple deep belief and honest conviction. Why did the North thus thrust forward its worst side to the world? Then he sat up with a start:was not the South doing the same- was not the South being judged by its Higbys and Jones,it Kitts and Barksdales? Is it not ever thus that the cruder,noisier,more vulgar elements of men drown out the voices of gentler truer humanity? Striving thus with his thoughts he rode into Saratoga and saw that Babylon in full and shameless swing - the ladies in low-necked gowns and bare arms lolling in their carriages, the men silk-hatted and gorgeous with silk and perfume.,gaping and gambling and everywhere black liveried servants,loud strident laughter,a flood of gold and gayety and feverish ease.

When Mr.John Reynolds walked in from the lobby to the floor of Congress in December 1860,the first man he met was Harrison Coles and he

Doles wound westward across the dark rivers and looked at the hills and the aces, a bewilderment lay on his spirit. He had met in that back village f a North he had never known before. The Northerners he knew were prigs nd doughfaces, money bags like Grimes, schemers like Reynolds and a few anatics. Here however he faced a great sincerity. Simple deep belief nd honest conviction. Why did the North thus thrust forward its wort side o the world? Then he sat up with a start: was not the South doing the me - was not the South being judged by its Higbys and Jones', its Kietts d Barksdales? Is it not ever thus that the cruder, noisier, more vulgar ments of men drown out the voices of gentler truer humanity? Striving

41-1-207

"We cannot, Calhoun tried logic, Clay tried compromise, Taney tried and we have tried force in Kansas."

"We lost for want of slaves."

"We lost because of our enemies' strength."

"let us leave the North".

"Can we not carry the nation into war for expansion southward?"

"No, this has failed after ten trials -one in California, two in Mexico, three in Central America and four in Cuba."

"Can we not bring on a foreign war".

"We have tried that twice with Spain and England and failed, ~~moreover its outcome might help or hinder us - we cannot tell.~~"

"Let us leave the North."

"Would they let us leave in peace?"

"Yes, after some bluster."

"Would the whole south leave with us ?"

"No - we are sure of South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi . We have a ~~fighting~~ chance in Georgia, Louisiana and Texas. We cannot carry the rest, unless -

41-9-493

"Can we not try further compromise?"

"We have gone too far. Expansion of slavery is our least demand, and expansion of slavery is their greatest grievance."

"Then we must? " -

"Secede!"

"We cannot secede without - "

"War!"

"War?"

"Anything but war!"

"Nothing but war!"

"Why?"

"Armed agression from the North will unify the south."

"But the north will not fight?"

"We must make them fight."

"How?"

"Anyhow."

"Why?"

"We are between the devil and the deep sea. Stay in the union and slavery will fall; leave the union and only the lower south will follow; hence war to unify the south, and take fifteen states out of the Union into the confederacy

"But if the North fights, it may win."

"The chances are against it. We are p repared, half the North is ffriendly and foreign nations will intervene to save King Cotton."

"But if the North should win?"

"We would be no worse off than now".

"Suppose they should abolish slavery?"

"We would re-establish it under another name."

"And if we win?"

"With our trained army, we would sweep down to the Isthmus and across the Carribean."

"Then to South America".

"And then?"

"Back to the United States and Canada."

"Then Africa and the slave ~~trade~~,"

"Then- the World."

"The question is ~~then~~ Surrender or Fight?"

"Compromise or SEcession".

"Secession and War?"

"War and Secession"

"Let us vote - Silver for Compromise. Gold for War."

So at last they voted - the gleaming balls of gold and silver rolled along the table to the feet of the king. The giant black man, blind and noiseless, raised them as they fell and dropped them in the silken folds of his lap. The trumpet blazed against the dully echoing walls and the whole company arose.

"Secession and war by your votes" said the king.

"Secession and war" echoed each man in turn.

The silence of death reigned in the hall. The eyes of the King were closed and his face was glittering white. Slowly, slowly he stretched forth his thin and wasted hand and laid it on the great black book which thie kneeling giant held. The councillor arose and trooping silently forward each laid his right hand upon the king's and in low hushed tones, they swore the Great Oath.

Then they made obeisance before the king and slowly disappeared amid the gloom of the massive pillars. But Colonel Jones looked back. The king still sat motionless and lo! his white hand lay upon the book crushed as with a weight of stone, the fingers gripping the pale flesh drew oozing blood and the burning depths of his great eyes lurked a sorrow, infinite like the very passion of Christ.

All the next morning, Colonel Jones wandered with his companions in a great tropical park, listening to the winds and the sea and talk of the great decision.

"I scarcely see" said he to one "how we can force the North to fight, a more pliable and cowardly set of human beings I never heard of."

"Do not deceive yourself - it will be far easier to start them fighting than to stop them."

"How can we do it".

"Maintain the irreconcilable attitude. Yield nothing - demand everything then at last, if nothing else will do, commence war, seize federal property, fire on the flag."

"But that will make us the aggressors."

"Yes but retaliation will come so fast that we shall get southern sympathy."

"I doubt if that will work."

"Wait and see".

Just at twilight came the final summons to solemn court. A great grove stretched before the councillors, dark with palms and ancient oaks, sloping like an amphitheatre. On one side rose a dais surrounded by torches, on which the pale king sat enthroned in flame. Twenty or thirty new comers grouped themselves around - men whom Jones did not know. Some were dark Latin looking men of foreign tongues; others Englishmen and still other turbaned strangers from the far East. The voice of the King rang full and sweet:

41-9-495

have become the strong arm of mankind Human Freedom
men pursuit of the true interest of humanity?
There
homer is grown all then are apparent: then our today is not simply the limitation of our power it is its infinity. So let it be. We meet the issue. Our imperial mandate for this Solemn Covenant of 1858 is this: Shall we continue to cling to the Union all free to expand with or over all the Americas, or shall we separate from the World, and ourselves suddenly over Mexico
Central & South America all the islands of the sea, free the African slave trade, and turning again Northward rob the United States and Canada of the greatest empire the world ever saw — America.

Wherefore we are met, Citizens, in 5th Solemn Covenant, at this Centennial

41-1-201

"Turn then & the trial before you & the God of Nations guide your deliberations!"

Long minutes and hours and ~~days~~ days they sat about that dark & polished board beneath the vaulted roof. Then voices rose & fell, then bodies leaned & gestured, their flushed and drawn. Yet then every word and turn of thought the three leaders caught, turned & guided ahead ~~others~~ three and threw, then each argument in brief burning snatches or snatches of condensed argument. So that John Reynolds bleak bearded and cunningly designed found himself watching & studying the speakers as they argued but listening to their arguments only as they fell transformed & crystalized from the leaders mouth:

"Let us cling to the Union."

"We cannot, ~~anti slavery~~ Abolitionism expells us."

"The abolitionists are not in majority."

"But they that would limit slavery and ~~thus choke it to death, kill~~"

"Slavery must expand or die."

~~"Choked slavery means enslaved master as well as man."~~

"Then overcome this party for ~~slavery~~ limitation."

"Slavery must expand or die."

~~"Choke slavery means enslaved master as well as man."~~

"Then overcome this party ~~for slavery limitation~~"

"We cannot. Calhoun tried Negro, Clay tried Compromise, Taney tried Dred, and we have tried force in Kansas"

"We let the hand of slaves."

41-9-513

are opposed and they began some rioting this morning — Mark!"

"

An unmistakable sound of turmoil far away, struck on their ears, and they walked nervously to the door.

"Is Tom Calhoun still with you" asked Martha.

"Yes, he's been porter here now since you sent him to us four years ago" — he said" I suppose you know that he came to us before you ever saw him - let's see, away back in '52, and we sent him Canaan way - " he glanced at his watch. "the fact is that I'm worrying about him now - I sent him for your carriage and he's an hour overdue, and I'm half afraid - "

"Afraid of what?" asked Silena.

"Why the mob down town is ugly and they've been especially bloodthirsty in attacking colored men. I — " He did not finish. A black form staggered around the corner of the street and a gang of women, boys and men rushed after him. They were ragged, jeering, wild eyed creatures drunken, red faced and bloated, cruel and frenzied; bricks and stones and missles flew through the air and they poured their vilest epithets on the staggering victim. "Kill the black Nigger, smash his damned head - string him up".

"Come" said the secretary in alarm "this way to the back door. - "

"But open the door for Tom - he'll be killed" cried Silena.

"There's no time - they'll kill you if you let them in" but 41-1-200

"There's no time - they'll kill you if you let them in" but Silena ~~Silena~~ leapt to the great door and with a wrench threw it open. A great jagged rock hissed through her hair and a mud covered brick struck Tom full in the head just as he reached the steps;a woman leapt at him with a club,but he rose with a powerful effort and staggered in the door just ~~gored in the door~~ just as a dozen men hurled themselves against its hastily thrown bolt.

Silena quivered and swayed as she saw the blood dripping from his head but he picked her up in his arms and rushed on through the back office, and down a flight of stairs. Martha,the boy and the man were cowering there and fumbling at the door but Tom quickly unlocked it and pointed to a covered wagon,and horses standing there. Then he staggered, closed his eyes and fell like a log to the pavement. It was clear that he had brought the carriage here to avoid the mob on the stree,but had been unable to effect entrance. Apparently he had then slipped around the front way but the mob had overtaken him.

202-1-17

For a moment they all hesitated,then bending they lifted the inert body into the carriage and covered it from sight. Silena wiped and fanned the bloody head while Martha chafed his great rough hands,and the secretary drove cautiously out to the main street. Above them the mob was yelling cursing and pillaging,columns of smoke and flame rose in great volumes from the Negro orphanage to the west and below a cordon of blue coated policemen came rushing to the scene. The carriage whirled furiously down Third Avenue.

"Can we make the boat"asked Martha.

"I'm afraid not- but we'll try"and the carriage jolted and twisted on. A crowd of gamins stoned them,women jeered and once a mass of yelling men rounded the corner in front of they but they wheeled into Second Avenue and went on. The horses were reeking with sweat and panting pitifully. There was an ominous sound of fierce fighting ahead,but above it rose a low rumble of thunder;thh lighting flashed and quickly a great dashing shower of rain poured and beat upon the mob,swept steets of the city and cleaned them of their vermin,great and small.

"We'll miss the boat,but save our lives"whispered the weary driver. Yethe pushed on to the wharf.

"The boat is still waiting" he cried in surprise.

"Quick aboard-"

"And Tom?" asked Silena "He's recovering -he's -" 41-1-198

Book III.

The Seat of the Scornful.

The Seat of the Scornful.

Chapter I.

~~Mom Bett.~~ The Coming Freedom

All the dark lowlands were sleeping. The solemn oaks dipped to the gloomy waters and a wild bird frightened from her nest rose and shrieked in the darkness circled in the air then settled to her sleep again. but the ~~li ttle~~ lone boy whom her shrill cry wakened, strated from his dreams sat upright ain his bed and turned fear struck eyes toward the sea. Within the cabin all was dark and still save a dying gleam in the fire place and a sound of breathing. The little boy hearkened -how the sea roared like a great Voice! what was it saying? What were those little answering whispers and whence that glowing in the outer blackness? A slow dim terror crept and trembled in his limbs; his dry lips would not speak but he strained with his eyes out the great dark door. See a flaming sat upon the midnight waters, and round it - yes, round it- rode the dark shadow of a shadowy ship, sailing swinging hurrying; and above it swirled a face, a great dark awful - "Mammy", wailed the child "Mammy - mammy - mammy" he shrieked in an ecstacy of terror till two great soft arms came out of the night and held him, and a voice crooned:

"There, honey, there; it's all a dream, nothing shall hurt mammy's child."

When the child awoke again the sun was streaming across the waters. He wakened his older sister and whispered to her and together in their scanty night gowns which scarce covered their smooth dark flesh, they stepped to the kitcher where the mother was hurrying to and fro and singing softly.

"Mammy" ~~please tell us another story about Momm Bett" they asked in unison.~~ cocked the boy "I dreamed Mom Bett done got me, last night"

Ever and again such dreams came through long long years. But one morning the looked on Negro schools as non-sensical experiments bound to fail on account of the sheer stupidity of the children. Then when they prospered they begrudged them the public monies. At last there came a new and more sinister palint - the scarcity of labor. It was a ~~thnew~~ thing - unknown in its present form in slavery times and the ~~p~~ainters attributed it to the deviltry and laziness of the freedmen.

41-1-199

30-27-37

"There are a dozen good cotton hands down at that Nigger school" said Mr. Johnson to the loafers in his store "and a couple of dozen half-hands -it's bad enought to keep these niggers idle without teaching them all to shun work or making them impudent. By God they'll think they're good as white folks in a year or so." Thus the white community grumbled. Nor was the black world altogether satisfied.

"Miss Mary's a good teacher but she's had her share of the school money now and she ought to let somebody else have a little now" suggested Sands, cautiously.

"She don't pay any attention to my children, it's only the smart ones she cares for" growled another.

And so the leaven of criticism and discontent grew about the unconscious hard working girl, until the ~~day that Henry Reynolds found himself~~ day of the new election came and Harrison Cole was replaced on the board by Robert Reynolds ~~with a grievance against her rather~~ [illegible] at ~~the~~

He saw the name of Mary Calhoun on the pay roll and remembered something

"Is this Bob Calhoun's sister" he asked.
"Yes, sir" said the colored porter.
"Where's Bob -"
"He's up to Columbia at School."
"And she's supporting him, I suppose.
"Yes, sir, I guess so."

Johnson drummed on. Well give that school girl Sands' daughter. She's a good nigger."

~~end of the school term.~~ 172

Chawter ~~XIV.~~ 12

The Servant.

She went into her little room in the cabin and lay down on the bed and thought it all out. Next year was Robert's last year in college - it would be awful to have him stop now, he must not stop. He had worked in Columbia last year and in the long summer months had saved $75. His scholarship had added $50 to this and she had sent $150 from her salary.

30-27-386

30-27-384

2

Reynolds dictated. 'Sometime next week' he said at last slowly and hastened out again. He was soon [illegible] with [illegible]

41-1-191

"She was up in the nursery crooning over two naked children on the floor and Miss Irma sank fainting beside her. I seized one of the children which one I did not know and rushed down the stairs to the kitchen and met the nurse Celia face to face.

"Give me that child! she screamed. "How dare you undress it" and seizing it and pushing me aside she rushed to the nursery. I slipped around searching for the other child but I could not find it and Colonel Jones drove me home and x came down and whipped my mammy to death."

Her voice died away in whispers as she sank lower beside the bed.

"My God, can't I never do nothing for my sin. I didn't know, they did not tell me, why did God leave me ignorant and punish me hot and awful when I fell. God knows my soul is clean as the stars; I have never wanted man but you. And can my body never get clean again? Since then I have been clean as the mother of God. Are these stains that Time nor Goodness can't

30-1-124

"Don't touch me, Master, I's free." cried the brown man.

The whip curled and spat about his shoulders. He shrank back and the lash hissed across his face. He sprang forward and again the whip sang but only to the air, for with one fierce lounge he had seized the rider swung him far into the air and dashed him like a child into the cotton rows. A yell arose, the dark mass wavered a moment then started with a cry toward the horsemen. The horses reared and turned, one shot was fired and a woman clutched her breast, convulsively and sank to the ground, then the horsemen rode headlong across the field and after them hurried a cursing howling black mob, with sticks and stones.

41-9-362

John Reynolds viewing the fracas at a safe distance, shook his head: this meant trouble and he started for the camps where the white tents of the soldiers glistened among the foliage.

"The war is over" said the Colonel to whom he applied. "I have not jurisdiction over these men, especially as Johnson has pardoned them all."

"But this will practically mean Negro slavery again."

"Let them protect themselves."

"How can they, ignorant, unarmed, poor, unorganized-"

"That may all be but President Johnson has put th e rebels in the saddle again and I - " Here an orderly entered with a message. The Colonel smiled and handed it to Reynolds.

"Colonel ------ is directed to arrest all persons interfering with Negroes on the leased plantations and hold them for military trial."

A company of blue coated soldiers were soon on the road raising white dust as they flew along the level road by Hilton Head. They had scarce wheeled into the higway to Beaufort than they faced a body of men- some 25 white men armed and riding in a hollow squad around a band of a score of Negroes shackled hand and foot and grey with dust.

"What's this?" asked the Colonel.

A man rode forward and showed his badge. He was the sheriff of the county.

"This is my possee" he said " and we are arresting these fellows for riot and murder."

"Where did you arrest them?"

"I do not regognize your authority to question me, but I do not mind watched and waited.

"What can have happened?"

"He'll come"she said nervously.

Reynolds sank back in silence. Here was a pretty mess:the idea of a reputable merchant,cloaked and disguised like a murderer,hanging about in mid ocean on a wild goose-

"Hark"she bent forward with strained face,and peered from the darkened cabin northward.

"He's coming."

Reynolds disappeared in the darkness.

The woman slipped to her cabin. She draped a silken shawl on her gleaming armsand firm heaving bosom;her gown flowed in one great shimmering undulating wave from bust to ankle,curving and filling in sinuous beauty. She shook out the dark coils of her hair,touched the powder to her cheeks and waited.

Silence -long silence. Then the soft tingle of waters-dip-dip-a grating of a low hail wood, and a hasty muffled footfall. A dark cloaked form appeared on the deck,hesitated a moment-glided across and descended to the cabin. A moment it paused:suddenly the cabin door flew back and the soft light of the chandelier gleamed on the silken draperies of a half hidden couch, sparkled on the gold and silver and linen of a richly dressed table, where the wine in the cut glass decanter glowed blood-red, and the food and iced fruits lay in delicious soft colored mounds. In the midst swayed the curving form of the waiting woman,alluring,splendid;half mystical in the artful beauty of her framing.

"Zirra"he whispered passionately.

She whirled half round and hid her face in her hands then as the silken shawl fell from the pink and heaving flesh with seeming sudden abandon,she stretched her bare white arms and cried:

"Come!"

An hour later another cloaked form glided across the deck and descended.

"Careful-not a sound"he said warningly. He stepped into the boat and the rowers drew away with muffled dip. Then when they were half a mile out the little engine began to pulse but it pulsed but little louder than the heart of John Reynolds who muffled and disguised was flying to the Grand Conclave in Congressman Henderoon's stead.

Within a half hour Reynolds espied a dim light far ahead-on they whirled over the billows-then came a flashing of lights,which slowly disappeared in the tall tree tops as their keel grated on a silent shore. A single dark figure stood there silent and shadowy and Reynolds' heart leapt to his mouth. He did not hesitate however but seizing his pistol firmly advanced ~~to the silent figure.~~ A blinding light flashed in his face and then without a word the figure turned and walked quickly into the dense damp forest beneath the great white stars and Reynolds followed.

Chapter XII
The Inner Circle.

It was broad day. ~~A black bearded~~ man splendidly uniformed in crimson and gold stood ~~before~~ a great carven oak door knocking and his hand trembled as he knocked. The door flew abruptly open and a blast of trumpets rolled in vaulted corridors. The room into which he stepped directly from his simple quarters was of stately magnificence. It was tinted in crimson and gold. Two rows of massive pillars lined each side holding great rounded arches of gleaming mosaic. The light streamed in from painted windows above the pillars and high over them hung the carved and vaulted roof. Down the length of the hall between the inmost pillars, stretched a broad table of rich dark wood, polished and inlaid, resting its curved claw feet on red velvet carpets which guarded ~~the~~ a white marble floor. Twenty one golden chairs, with crimson trappings surrounded the table. The chair at the foot was empty. From the others rose ~~twenty~~ numerous men as ~~the~~ the ~~black bearded man~~ entered. ~~He stepped forward quickly with eager face - he knew that one this one, all? yes, all of them, as he glanced rapidly and the great names of the South crowded to his lips but froze there, for the remembered what must happen if they knew - if they suspected.~~ They were clad in ~~the same~~ gorgeous military uniforms ~~as he but each different, cream, and grey and blue, and they bowed gravely and courteously as he seated himself in the empty chair.~~ (over)

Directly opposite to ~~him~~ us and close to the unoccupied end of the table, was ~~the~~ a throne silghtly raised above the level of the floor. It was of pure white marble canopied and carven magnificently and garlanded with cloth of gold. Upon it ~~rose~~ stood a great black chair, strait and ancient and on the ~~great~~ vast sparkling arch that folded itself above the chair hung a circle of jewels and gold.

Two gigantic black heralds- men mighty in limb and stature stood by the amrposts and as the last great crash of trumpets struck and wailed through the hall - ~~as~~ the richly girded company rose and faced the chair, ~~the black bearded man~~ ~~bent~~ ~~forward~~ ~~in~~ ~~amazement.~~

A singular figure ~~was already seated there.~~ The slight body was shaped in a flowing silken robe that swept the soft ~~black~~ red carpet. Above rose a face transparently white, pinched and shrunken; the top was bald so that the forehead rose like a pale dome: the upper lip was shaven but from the chin flowed a long white forked beard and the fringe of ~~silvery~~ hair from his head slipped down and mingled with it. The eyes were dim and shadowy and the face lay perfectly still in calm dignity as though in deep reverie. He seemed unearthy, a thing haloed in mystery, unsubstantial, yet real with a stinging forceful reality that gripped the heart of every man there. That vast mysterious power that lay in these men's hands, that power before which ~~was~~ continents were ~~bowing~~ bowed, and the ~~Five~~ seven Seas ~~resounding~~ resonant, seemed here suddenly incarnate flesh and blood and yet that flesh spiritualized and the blood, bloodless and thin. Over all his face and form hovered and appearance of extreme age, endless years, long, long acquaintance with the infinite

Wars in every dress with medals & orders across their breasts. ~~There is the treaty room in~~
~~& I send my minister in a magnificent livery, gown~~
~~with a strange order in diamonds about his neck~~
After we ended they all sat, the admiral at the table — I had my stool ~~next~~ at the admiral's, one of twenty other smaller stools & curules for the little tables with books papers & documents &c used by the delegates when required

Past, and thought involuntarily, perhaps, with - the Infinite Future. The man aroused himself nervously looked about him and ever the unasked question slipped to his lips-"Who is he?"

As if in answer the old man spoke and his voice sounded full and musical as it rang in the great hall:"My Lords, it is years since I placed myself on this throne. Whence I came and why matters little to you. I have seen the cracking of empires and the staggering of nations until weary with the old world's I sought in the new world the true divinity of Might, the true doctrine of human inequality and human subordination. First I set myself to establish the supremacy of the central all dominating Will - the principle of monarchy to which the South was ever true. Through that will we strive to establish a great slave empire stretching from Hudson Bay to the south Pacific and from Sea to Sea."

He paused and scanned their strained faces.

"The march of our empire has been irresistible magnificent. The day of the crisis of its fortunes is at hand. The vaster the triumphs the deeper the dangers. Our foes and militant and faintly suspect our power and designs. Their power is growing and their purposes are apparent :their aim today is not simply the limitation of our power it is its upoooting. So let it be. We meet the issue. Our imperial mandate for this Solemn Conclave of 1859 is this:Shall we continue to cling to the Union and force the Nation to expand with us and slavery southward over all the Americas, or shall we separate from the North, hurl ourselves suddenly southward over Mexico, Central and South America and the islands of the sea, free the African slave trade, and turning again northward roll the United States and Canada into the greatest empire the world ever saw - America.

"Wherefore we are met, Cousins, in solemn conclave, at my command. Turn then to the task before you and the God of Might guide your deliberations."

Long minutes and hours, and days they s at about that dark and polished board beneath the vaulted roof. Their voices rose and fell, their bodies lounged and quivered, their eyes flashed and dimmed. Yet their every word and turn of thought, the thin strong leader caught, turned to quick sharp phrase and threw back to them their own argument in brief burning snapping snatches of condensed argument. So that John Reynolds black bearded and cunningly disguised found himself watching and studying the speakers as they argued but listening to their arguments only as they fell transformed and simplified from the leaders mouth:

"Let us cling to the Union."

"We cannot, abolitionism expells us."

"The abolitionists are not in majority."

"But they that would limit slavery are, and slavery must expand or die."

"Then overcome this party for slavery limitation."

"We cannot, Calhoun tried logic, Clay tried compromise, Taney tried law and we have tried force in Kansas."

"We lost for want of slaves."

"We lost because of our enemies' strength."

"Let us leave the North."

"Wait! can we not carry the nation into war for expansion southward?"

"No, this has failed after ten trials- one in California, two in Mexico, three in Central America and four in Cuba."

"Can we not bring on a foreign war."

"We have tried that twice with Spain and England and failed."

"Let us leave the North."

"Wait! Would they let us leave in peace?"

"Yes, after some bluster."

"Would the whole south leave with us?"

"No, we are sure of South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi. We have a chance in Georgia, Louisiaina and Texas. We cannot carry the rest, unless- "

"Can we not try further compromise?"

"We have gone too far. Expansion of slavery is our least demand, and expansion of slavery is their greatest grievance."

"Then we must"—— "

"Secede!"

"We cannot secede without "-

"War!!

"War?"

"Anything but war!"

"Nothing but war!"

"Why?"

"Armed aggression from the North will unify the South."

"But the north will not fight."

"We must make them fight."

"How?

"Anyhow."

"Why?"

"We are between the devil and the deep sea. Stay in the union and slavery will fall; leave the union and only the lower south will follow; hence war to unify the south, and take fifteen states out of the union into the Confederacy."

"But if the North fights, it may win."

"The chances are against it. We are prepared, half the North is friendly and foreign nations will intervene to save King Cotton."

"But if the North should win?"

"We would be no worse off than now."

"Suppose they should abolish slavery?"

"We would re-establish it under another name."

"And if we win?"

"With our trained army, we would sweep down to the Isthmus and across the Carribean."

"Then to South America."

"And then?"

"Back to the United States and Canada."

"Then Africa and the slave trade."

"Then - the World."

"The question is Surrender or Fight?"

"Compromise or Secession?"

"Secession and War?"

"War and Secession."

"Let us vote- Silver for Compromise. Gold for War."

So at last they voted - the gleaming balls of gold and silver rolled along the table to the feet of ~~the king~~ my father, He ~~The giant black man, blind and noiseless,~~ raised them as they fell and dropped them in the silken folds of his lap. ~~The trumpet blazed against the dully echoing walls and the whole company arose~~.

101 A

I remember sitting innocent with starchy clarinets

+ ~~170~~ 100

~~"Secession~~

"Secession and war by your votes" said ~~the king.~~ he

"Secession and war"echoed each man in turn.

The silence of death reigned in the hall. The eyes of the King were closed and his face was glittering white. Slowly, slowly he stretched forth his thin and wasted hand and laid it on the great black book which the kneeling giant held. The councillorsarose and trooping silently forward each laid his right hand upon the king's and in low hushed tones, they swore the Great Oath.

Then they made obeisance before the king and slowly withdrew stepping backward face forward to the throne until they all disappeared amid the gloom of the massive pillars. ~~But Colonel Jones and John Reynolds~~ Two alone lingered and looked. The king still sat motionless and lo! his white hand lay upon the book crushed as with a weight of stone, the fingers gripping the pale flesh drew oozing blood, and inthe burning depths of his great eyes lurked a sorrow, infinite like the very passion of Christ. And ~~Reynolds~~ the king stole noiselessly out into the night.

Across the waters flew the little boat in mad haste leaving a blaze of phosphorescent light upon the inky waters. John Reynolds head was in a whirl - had he been dreaming, was it true? or was it some ~~EHYHIXH~~ curious nightmare? And he staggered to his feet with a jerk as the boat slipped noiselessly up to the dark ship. The watch hailed her gruflly. ~~before~~ Reynolds ~~could signal. He~~ clamored quickly to the deck and whispered a word. The watchman stepped to the companion-way, and disappered; there was a long silence. Then, below came a sudden crash of glass and slamming of doors, a cryand an oath, quick footsteps, and a man, tall pale and dishevelled, with boated blood-shot face leaning ad for over the rail a moment, swaying and blinking in the pale moon light.

"Clark"he cried.

"Ay-ay!Sir!" came from the boat below.

He clamored dizzily over the side - bare-headed and uncloaked.

"Quick - to the island"he screamed and the little boat sighed

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

Unpublished manuscript, c. 1930's

Book 1 pp. 1-21

Unedited

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

BOOK I.

Poor Whites

A cherokee Indian stood on the crest of ~~the~~ Kenesaw ~~in 1842~~ and watched a railroad creeping North. Days and months he had come and watched and watched again twelve miles away, scarcely visible and yet clear to his mind's eye rolled the dull, gold flood of the Chattahoochee, sullenly the blood-red dust of Georgia down to the Western Eternity. He saw the little railway stagger on, now crookedly in pieces, now straight in sure, fast shining lines. It had crossed the river, coming North and West, over a year ago with many a trial and quiver and fall, but at last it lay straight toward Marietta.

38-12-272

On this cold, clear day before Christmas 1842, came lumbering along the rails a noisy machine, belching fire and smoke and dragging six full wagons into Marietta. Silently, the Indian walked down the mountain, skirting the steeper sides and striding toward the town. He wore neither blanket nor feathers, but his old warn clothes molded themselves closely to his strong straight form. His face was keen-cut, but dark enough to show Negro as well as Indian blood. Behind him solemnly trudged a boy of eight or nine years, black and slender, with big bright eyes. Together they approached the town at sunset, but the Indian ignoring the clamorous engine, turned deliberately west as he came to the huts of the village and walked straight into the setting sun. Kennesaw loomed on his right hand, but he passed it by without a glance. Unblinking, he strode ahead and the crimsonof the dying day enveloped him like a warm and glamorous blanket and soon hid him in the night. The boy, when he saw the dawn and the engine, hesitated and stopped. He looked West toward his father and South toward the engine. He was tired and hungry and above all, he was curious, and quite unknowingly, he made there a great decision.

He turned from his father's footsteps and went down to the depot and mingled with the throng that surrounded the engine. He pulled a piece of cornbread from his pocket and (gnawed) it meditatively, staring at the engine, and then he fell quietly asleep.

Three days later, the boy had wandered slowly along the railroad track to the river ten miles below, following the smoky trail and glowing cinders of the wonder train and eating fruit and fish. And so he came to Terminus.

And found beside the old and tattered wayside log cabin, a dirty little white girl of perhaps five years playing in the sane and a boy about his own age, lounging in the door. There were sevenor eight log huts staggering drunkedly among the trees and about the little village, surrounding a huge wilderness of mighty trees and thick undergrowth. In the midst of all, was a newer house, where the railway ended, that was the center of the town, its depot, its railroad office, its church.

38-12-273

The little girl stopped playing with her mud pies: "Hello nigger," she said cheerfully, as the black boy approached. The boy made no answer but looked passed her to her equally dirty brother in the doorway. The white boy paused from knawing an apple:

"What's your name," he demanded.

"John," answered the black boy.

"John who?"

"John nothing, just John."

"I'm Harvey Eves. My father built the first house here." John considered this a while without comment and then he sat down.

"I'm hungry," he announced.

A tattered white woman appeared out of the dark depths of the cabin, bare-footed and unkempt.

"Why don't you give the little nigger some vittals," she wined. "Ain't you got no manners."

The little girl arose and dived into the door and soon re-appeared with a sodden corncake and a yam which she gave to the black boy. The white boy lounged out lazily. The children sat on the ground; the white ones stirred, the black one eating. The mother crouched in the door and sniffed snuff.

"Where you from?" she asked. "Up there?"

"Indian country. Yessum."

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

"You ain't no Indian--might be nigger and Indian."

Then around the corner lounged a discontented looking man. He carried a shotgun and powder pouch. He looked keenly at the black boy.

"Any gold up there?"

"Heaps."

The man was evidently interested. He stopped, polished his gun with his sleeve, sat down onthe step.

"You better stay over night," he said.

"The children stared at each other.

"Ever see an engine?" said the white boy.

"Once," said John.

"I seen and engine heaps of times, two, three, six times."

"It came in last Tuesday dragged by sixteen mules."

"Where from?"

"I don't know. Want to see it again?"

They started running toward the depot. The black boy shooting far ahead and the white boy soon giving up.

"I don't feel like running," he exclaimed, and then he drove his little sister back home. He began to explain things to John.

"See this here stake. It's going to be a city with more than a hundred houses sometime. John was doubtful.

"Can't get that many houses together," he said.

"You just ask Mr. Long. There he sets now, talking with Mr. Thrasher. Mr. Thrasher is going to build it."

They crept nearer and listened more or less comprehendively to the conversation.

Long was a strong-faced man, dressed for outdoors with a keen-clipped Northern assent. Thrasher appeared more important with slouched hat and long black coat. He had something of the air of a planter and smoked a cigar.

38-12-274

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

"I don't see it, Long," he said, "I just don8t see it.x First place, this land isn't worth anything. Jane Doss, lazy old huzzy, got it for nothing in the lottery of 1825 and sold it for $50, which was too much."

"Why I paid $300 for only four hundred or five hundred acres and I reckon I'm stuck."

"It'll be worth a million in less than 100 years," said Long.

"Poppycock. I don't aim to be living 100 years and if I lived 1,000, this piece of woods would never been worth $10,000. You see you're all wrong,Long. Here's a piece of land from Marietta to--what do you call it--Terminus--from nowhere to nothing. How in the hell can it ever pay? Who's here to make it pay?"

38-12-275

"Nobody's here but they'll come, and I'll show you why. You know how the state passed those three railroad charters in '33?"

"A fool trick, too, nothing will come of it."

"One was at(Central), Savannah's bid for western trade and it reached Macon year before last."

"Well there was some sense to that."

"No, no, Charleston is the coming port, not Savannah, and even Savannah is going to depend on Terminus and not on Macon. Now see here. Just glance at this map. The Georgia road has reached Madison from Augusta and Augusta is already hooked up with Charleston."

"Yes, and I notice the Georgia road stopped at Madison and turned down to Macon and up to Athens, showing some sense. I tell you Long, Macon is the coming city for western trade."

"Listen, the Central will reach Terminus from Madison in two or three years, and by that time, Macon will build up to us from Forsyth."

"Nonsense, where's the money coming from? Here the state has squandered a million dollars and one-half on this road North and evenif the road should come in from Augusta and Macon, what then? They come from big cities to a stake driven in the ground and one-half dozen log huts."

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

"Then everything will happen. They will complete this load to Chattanooga. Why not to the moon?"

"No, Thrasher, you ought to have been with us in Knoxville in 1936. Delegates from seven states were there and we studied maps and then they sent me down to study the land and I climbed down from Chattanooga to Decatur. I climbed mountains and forded streams; I crwaled through undergrowth and sat in the top of massive oaks, and then I came down here and drove that stake. I tell you, Thrasher, I've got it. It's just as John C. Calhoun said."

"The chains of the Allegheny Mountains and the courses of the river, make the formation of the country between the Mississippi Valley and the South Atlantic Coast such that all the railroads must unite at a point in DeKalb County, Georgia, not far from Decatur, so as to form one system of roads between the West and the South. You live in Decatur, Mr. Thrasher. It's just six miles away and I find that this point here that I call Terminus is the logical uniting point of the natural road beds that will yet make the South and the West one."

"Well, Long, I've got to say that you've got a damned sight more faith than I have. I'm going back to Decatur, but I'll watch this nest of huts and if it really grows, I'll return."

Long before this conversation was over, the two boys had examined the engine and the track. They had viewed the half-dozen huts in town and walked out into the woods. They slept together that night in the corncrib and early the next day, they followed Harvey Eves toward the mountains. There ensued long and beautiful days that lengthened into months and years. They hunted and fished in the mountains; they brought home beasts and birds and fish to the little hut. They played and sang at night and always they hunted for gold and found none.

"You sure your pappy knew where it was got?" old Harvey asked repeatedly.

"Heaps," answered John, but they never found it, save in the leaves and the waters of the Chattahoochee and the gorgeous sunsets." But the interest of the boys was always in the town and it was astonishing how the town grew. Wagons with mules and oxen lurched in. Poorly dressed newcomers came and put up new long log huts.

33-12-26

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

They worked on the railroads; they raised food and cotton. By Christmas, 1843, there were seven or eight families in Terminus and a (separation) at which the boys existed, when the village was incorporated and named politely after the Governor's daughter, Marthasville. Harrey Eves was dissatisfied. He did not want railroads and people and lands. He wanted gold. He wandered further and further away, lured by the blue peaks to the North, and one day fell into a great pit where he was sure he saw gold, but he never came back to tell about it.

Young Harvey had his mother and sister to support. It didn't take much, but he began to want more. The crowds of newcomers spurred him on.

In 1843, came the new naming of the little village, Marthasville, after the daughter of Governor Lumpkin, who had striven so vigilantly to get the land from the Indians. Both Harvey and John watched with keen interest the growth of the town. There was the sawmill which Norcross, the Northerner, bought in 1844, amid a good deal of skeptism of the onlookers from out of town. He rigged the machine up with an old blind horse and then began sawing logs and planks for cross-ties with astonishing rapidity.

The song of the saw went all through Johnson and soon he was working there for 25¢ a day, working and watching, chiefly watching, the growth of the town. This little excited gangling effected John strangely. He saw its sheer physical growth from seven families, when he came in 1842, to 20 families in 1845. He saw the 100 people become 300 in the two years that followed the event of the Georgia railroad, completing the line from Augusta to Atlanta, and when the new city received a new name in 1847, John from his work in the sawmill, was eager to (join.) He wanted a cabin, a mile from the depot, up to the still and solemn woods. He wanted growing things with flowers and vines and voliage. Harvey wanted this too, but for different reasons. He had his father's hunger for gold. He wanted money; he wanted wealth and gradually he began to see that the land around his father's old cabin and down in the center of the town, was a better source of gold than the unfound mines of the mountains. He talked with Mr. Thrasher about it. Thrasher looked at the scrawney, ugly boy of 16 and sensed a certain hard grit in him.

28-12-27-83

"Yes," he said, " your little town here is worth something, will be worth more, perhaps, --much more, but if you get that dirty old cabin off it and put some buildings up, you might make a good deal. I just leave give you a few hundred dollars for the place."

But Harvey was too shrewd. He would sell a little of the land, but not all. And finally, he got a plot, 30 feet by 200, for $60 cash to Mr. Thrasher. It was more money than he had ever seen before, but he took it and planned with John for the new cabin up toward the woods. This, they finished by 1845 when the Georgia railroad reached town, and when Marthasville boasted of 100 inhabitants. Harvey took a bit of his hoarded money and made a trip to Madison just to see what the world was like. John, over the protest of the old lady who was getting weak and foolish, moved her and her daughter up to the new cabin and installed them, and then going from his jobinsthe sawmill or working only intermittently, he went to watch the town grow. He walked out over the roads that came into Atlanta, east toward Decatur, southwest toward Nannan and southeast toward McDonough.. He went north to Marietta again on foot, sparing none of his hard-earned cash for railroad rides. He went out Peachtree Creek. Everywhere, were the wagons, long trains with 2-4-6 mules, and yokes of oxen coming in daily. Some days the busy merchants could not weigh all the cotton received. The stores increased in number; the drivers complained of the increased competition of the railroads, they had done a brick trade from Madison to Atlanta until the railroads were finished. They still drove their teams south and west and north beyond Marietta.

In 1846, came another railroad and people literally began to pour in. Harvey became more and more excited. He determined to build a store and some houses on his land as soon as he got the money. He got experience and advice everywhere, questing night and day and spending little or no time at home. Usually, he slept in the old cabin which he had not yet torn down and which he had made into a sort of office for his dreams and plans. He could not forget that day when the first train came over the Macon and Western. Many passengers came, strangers and of a little different type, well-dressed merchants and planters from Macon; and then with a gasp he saw the greatest thing he had ever seen. The man stepped down from the passenger coach; he was slim and elegant, with every nicety of dress from his top-hat to his gold-headed cane. His silk cravat was beautifully tied and he was both fashioned and bewhiskered. But that was the lesser side. Beside him was a woman, a young girl. Never in all of Harvey's experience had he seen anything like here. She was all silk and jewels, gold and ribbons, her feet were little and she stepped as though the earth belonged to her. She scarcely glanced at the dirty cloghoppers pressing about. She surely did not hear their comments or see their astonishment. Harvey stared with all eyes. He pulled Mr. Thrasher's coat to find out who they were, but Mr. Thrasher pushed him impatiently aside and went up to greet the strangers with a low bow. But Harvey found out it was Mr. Rhett and his daughter from Savannah. She was Atlanta Rhett. They were rich, very very rich people. They had come to glance haughtily over this new land and consider business investments. Only Mr. Thrasher's house was good enough to hold them and that needed much apology. John was coaxed into service to help get something and most of the information that Harvey got came through John. They went home talking eagerly about it. Harvey's eyes were big.

38-12-278

"That's the sort of woman I'm going to marry," he said.

John jeered. "She wouldn't look at anybody like you," he said.

"Why not," growled Harvey, "I'm as good as she is. I'm goin to be better. I don't care if she is one of those rich planters that own a lot of niggers. This is going to be a white man's town and we're going to run it and get rich. You can't get rich farming. You've got to buy and sell. I'm going to be rich."

By that time they had come to the house.

The mother lay dead on the doorsill and Savannah was staring at her with tearless eyes.

They lived on there. Harvey was too busy with his plans. He was eighteen now, two years older than John, and Savannah was twelve. John and Savannah kept house and attended to the garden and flowers. Now and then he took a job in town, but carefully guarded Savannah. It was astonishing how the people kept pouring in until in 1847 came two events: they incorporated the town and named it after Atalanta Rhett. It was very pretty to see her bowing and curtesing at the honor and carrying her little sixteen years like a queen. Harvey was mad with infatuations. Hehad sold another piece of land and was building a store. He had torn down the old cabin. In a single year, the population doubled. People seemed to be walking over each other to get into this new Atlanta. Roads and railroads were full and there was a magnificent torch-like procession to celebrate the election of Taylor and Filmore in 1848 and when the crowd yelled for a speech, John saw a pale, thin man stagger forward and wave. He could not speak. The blood was flowing from his scarred face. It was Alexander Stevens and he had just had a fight with knives with Judge Cone. In fact, Atlanta was a pretty rough town. No wonder the aristrocratic Rhetts moved on to Chattanooga. Thrasher didn't seem as disappointed as Harvey thought he ought to be. Harvey was now clerk in Thrasher's store and expected soon to become a partner, if he could save enough money from land and work.

38-12-249

"Ain't they coming back?" he asked Mr. Thrasher.

"I don't know and I don't much care," said Thrasher.

Harvey stared at him. The idea of no one not caring about the Rhetts; and then his heart leaped when Thrasher added:

"They ain't got no money; they're just broken down planters, and my opinion is that Rhett knows how to drink and gamble better than anything else. They have been sponging off me long enough. I hope they stay in Chattanooga."

But they didn't. They went to Chattanooga to celebrate the finishing of the railroad. Atlanta stood at last complete in 1850. She had thrown out railroads like wings; one north to the great and boundless West; one south to Macon, and the sea; one east to Augusta, Charleston and the cotton kingdom, and a fourth wing was promised to the West.

Like a small but mighty cherubim, her wings were sweeping in; man and woman, cotton and corn, merchandise. One could not count the people as they came. The

28-12-280

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

The seven hundred inhabitants of 1848 had become 2,500 by 1850 when President Filmore visited the city and the Rhetts returned.

Of course even then, it was not much of a city to look at. It had a telegraph line to Macon and four churches; a Methodist, a Baptist, a Presbyterian and an Episcopal church. Homes were building and manufacturers of railroad material soon began. Land on Decatur Street rose from $10 to $25 a front foot, and with its rise, Harvey became a partner of Thrasher. A weekly paper began publication in 1849, but the Post Office was at Five Points in a grocery store and hoodlums amused themselves by rolling hogsheads full of squealing pigs down Alabama Hill. The water came from two wells and the streets were dangerous with holes and ditches, but the spirit of Atlanta was high. It was a new thing in the South. It was a city of poor men, of merchants, traders and artisans. It despised the cotton kingdom and planter elegance and show. It was fiercely determined to gain and keep power, to make money. Macon sneered at them. They had no ancestors, these hoodlums of Atlanta. They had no history. They had nothing to do but to go to work and to work they went. Then around the workers, like parasites, gathered the thieves and the criminals. There were two sets of them; one in the reeking purlieus of Slabtown near the railroad tracks. On Whitehall from Marietta to Alabama Street there were plank walks. All the buildings were wooden and only the north sideof Decatur down to Ivy built up. There was whiskey and fights and sloons and Harvey was astonished to see that the aristocratic Mr. Rhett gravitated easily to the slums and gambled elegantly with the riff-raff. Harvey kept a sort of unofficial watch over Atalanta. He thought she seemed older and worried. Then there came the night when he rode with the Vigilantes to drive out some of the worse elements and found Rhett dead drunk in a dive and brought him home. Atalanta rushed to him wildly and appealingly and then dismissed him haughtily, but Harvey had made up his mind,--he was going to marry that girl.

He did not know just how he was going about it and went up to talk to John. Somehow John seemed to have little sense about things in particular, but a good deal of wisdomabout things in general. He knew Atlanta. He knew its people. He threaded its stredts like a dark ghost and then at all times at day and night went home to guard Savannah.

38-12-281

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

John hurried up to talk to John. John wouldn't know anything, of course, he was just a nigger, but it was good to have somebody to talk to. He stepped into the door and stood rooted. There sat Savannah with a golden baby in her arms and John was bending over her. Harvey was too astonished to speak. He did not know what to think or do. Of course he knew such things had happened; Indians and poor whites, Indians and niggers, niggers and poor whites had now and then taken up together. But that was back in the woods and in earlier days. It didn't happen now and it couldn't happen to a man who was going to marry into the Rhett family. But what could be done? There was a baby. There was his sister staring at him with great eyes. And there was John, lounging in his non-committal way, whose strength Harvey knew well from many an encounter. Harvey said nothing. He walked in and gathered quickly his few things and walked back toward Thrasher's store. He went by the small house where he had just brought the drunken Rhett. The Rhetts were not living so elegantly now. Mr. Thrasher found that he didn't have room in his house for them, but he let them use this smaller house, temporarily; he said, "temporarily," and looked annoyed. Harvey stood still and looked in. Atalanta was sitting with listless hanging hands and there were tears, yes, tears in her eyes. Her father was breathing stertorously with disarranged and dirty clothes, but she was not looking at him; she was looking out the door. She was looking at Harvey, who lounged forward awkwardly. He didn't know what to say or how to say it. He knew he was ugly and ill-dressed. He spit out a quid of tobacco in his mouth and then nervously took another chew. He swayed unsteadily in the door, drunk with the lure of her beauty and scared stiff with his own temerity. Before he knew it, he had grabbed her and was slobbering over her. She screamed and tried to tear away. Her father awoke and swore, jumping up with his unsheathed pistol, but Harvey grabbed him. A shot rang out and the father dropped to the floor and lay very still. The girl turned toward him in fury. She beat upon him with every she knew to show her disgust and loathing. She called him poor white trash and dirty loafter and murderer and thief. Then he went berserk; he grabbed her with all his might, crushed her in his arms and slobbered over her. He threw her on the bed like a log and she groaned and shrieked.

It was an hour later that a woman, white, thin and drawn, staggered out of the little house. She walked slowly along the way, holding on to trees and fences. A few people offered aid, most of the passersby stared at her or grinned, but she so nobody. She went on until she came to Mr. Thrasher's house and crawling in, fainted away.

28-12-282

Two days later, she was able to sit up in bed and Thrasher came in looking miserable and awkward.

38-12-283

"Did you kill him," she said.

"Kill who?" he asked.

"That murdering beast."

"Your father is dead and buried."

"I don't mean my father. How dare you! I mean his murderer. A lout whom you call Harvey."

"Oh, him," said Thrasher. "No, I didn't kill him."

"Very well," she said, coldly, "is he in jail. Has he been arrested?"

"No," said Thrasher, "xxxxxxxx

"But he must be. Have it attended to at once. I'll awear out the complaint." And she started to get up.

"There there, now, hold your horses. Let's talk this thing over. You see, it's this way."

"He murdered my father, didn't he?"

"Well, that isn't no quarrel. Your father was shot with his own pistol."

"Nonsense. Do you think he killed himself?"

"Well, that would have been about the best thing he could have done."

"How dare you! I tell you that scoundrel killed him and that isn't all. Do you--do you realize how he treated me?"

Thrasher hung his head.

"Are you a white man," stormed the girl. "Are you going to let a lady in this awful town be treated like a common prostitute?"

"Now, now, see here, don't let's get excited. Let me talk a little plain sense. You haven't got any money and you haven't got any friends. The only way your father has been living laterly is by gambling and drinking. He left Savannah in a hurry and if you don't know why, you ought to. I suspect you do. He couldn't go back there and you shouldn't. Now here there's only one thing for a woman to do and that's to get married and go to work keeping house. There's no place for ladies in Atlanta. We don't know what to do with them. Now here's a young fellow that's crazy about you."

38-12-284

"My God," she moaned. "Are you actually proposing."

"I'm proposing that you marry this boy. I don't see what else you can do. If you try to have him arrested and accused of murder, you couldn't get a jury in town to convict him. The whole town believes either that Rhett killed himself or deserved to have Harvey kill him. That wouldn't easily approve of what Harvey did to you, but on the other hand, some of them would think that you got what you deserved. On the other hand, if you just forget all this and marry this boy, I'll tell you frankly you can make a man of him and a mighty rich one. He's got land and he's got sense. He worshipseyou like God Almighty and you can twist him around your thump. That's all I got to say," and he went out.

It was three days later that Atalanta Rhett staggered down to the cabin where her father had been killed and where Harvey was living. She went up the steps and opened the door and went in.

So race and sex came to Harvey Eves and John in bewilderingly different ways. To Harvey, it was like shuddering tulmult. There was no joy in it, but rather fear, yet fierce desire. He wanted to live up to his wife; he was ashamed of his sister and afraid of John. He was determined to be rich.

To John, sex had come like the slow dawning of a beautiful day. It did not seem new or unusual, but natural and beautiful. It made him sing and work slowly with joy; it made flower and fruit bloom about him.

And then as he looked about, and as Harvey in a surprising way spurned him and drew away, he realized that of the three thousand people in the city, there were five hundred whose skins were colored more or less like his. He had before hardly noticed it. He had felt for them no greater kinship than for the whites, perhaps not as much. But

38-12-285

But now, he had common cause with them. Quietly and without effort, he sought them and looked at them and sat beside them. They seemed very much like other people he had known, poorer, meeker, more timid, but only in degree and not any abnormal way. He began to consider in a rather puzzled way what the future of his two children was going to be, for there were two now, and the pale and often lonesome mate was drooping. The blood rushed from her mouth one night. After he had made her easy, he went rapidly down to Eves' door and rapped. Harvey opened it and glared angrily at him.

"Didn't I tell you never to come here."

"No you didn't," said John suddenly, "but only one thing brought me. I'm afraid Savannah is dying."

"I don't care, let her die," growled Harvey, and slammed the door in his face. He was shaken. He would have liked to have gone, but he was afraid of that sharp-faced woman in the other room.

Atalanta was curiously changed and changing. Her beauty, which had been chiefly of coloring and ornament, dropped away. She gave little attention to her fine little hands and wore coarse shoes and cotton stockings. She had no modist and her hair looked straight and straggling. Chiefly her features sharpened and her eyes grew hard. But she did not pine or sulk. She was healthy and fully alive. She treated Harvey with something that was not distain and certainly had in it no shadow of love, but was calculatingly purposeful. He wanted to get rich; so did she and even more. They worked together more and more, with machine-like steadiness. She bought land; she started another store; she had trucks and drivers, with mules and oxen. She sent her agents out scouring the country-side; she sold cotton in Savannah and Charleston and bought hardware and groceries in Cincinnati and Pittsburgh. She saw what Atlanta might mean. The geographical capital of the state was Macon. Milledgeville was the planters' substitute; a country town a bit to the side. Atlanta was a center made by its railroads. It could be reached with greater ease than any city in the state from all directions; had more work, more things to do, and its growing was phenomenal. There were things to be done for the city which meant money. Gas lighting came in 1855 with Eves money in it. Railroads were still(planning)to the West and the Northeast, and unground manipulation of stock in the railroads already had begun. And then always there was the land.

Professional men began to come in; lawyers, wholesale dealers and commission merchants, physicians. Here Atalanta's social pre-eminence helped. She made her house attractive and planned a larger one; she bought clothes and good clothes for special occasions and used them.

38-12-286

Manufacturing began in the city--iron and lumber. Machine jobs, printing mills, tanneries, two shoe factores, a soap factory and cl thing manufacture started between 1856-1860.

The first plan of what came to be the Southern Railroad, then called the Airline, began in 1857. And in 1859, real estate of Atlanta was assessed at nearly $3,000,000 and $3,000,000 a year was spent in trade.

Atalanta kept her grip upon the land, selling lots in the city now at high prices and buying out-lying portions.

"Who owns that land around the dabin back in the woods on the Marietta Road?" she asked suddenly one day, when she and her husband were driving out and looking at their possessions. He tried to distract her, but characteristically could not.

"It belongs to John," he said solemnly. "What! All that land and that house to that Negro? Is he free? How did he get it?"

John explained lamely, but she got out and walked toward the house.

"He's got no business with all this land. We've got to get it away from him."

John was sitting on the steps of the cabin and on his knees two children; a boy of nine and a girl of eight; beautiful in form and feature, the boy dark, the girl golden. Atalanta stared at them.

"Where's the mother?" she said, glaring at John keenly.

"Dead." answered John, and the little girl said:

"Is that my Uncle Harvey?"

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

38-12-297

Then Atalanta knew what it was she had seen, the undoubted resemblance. She wheeled upon Harvey; then held herself back:

"Your family was even lower than I thought," she said, and then considered the children. But she turned away.

"We must take that land," she said, when they were out of earshot,"and I think we'd better take the children. They have a claim to it. We can get them indentured. They'll grow up and make good servants. And that black Negro must get out."

So it came in time that the children went down to live at Harvey's house and worked on Charlotte the daughter slept in the back and did their chores, and They were entered as slaves at the courthouse.

John did not demur. On the whole, it seemed better thus. He did not know how to take care of them. He wanted to watch the city more intimately and continuously than he had lately been able. He walked away from the house and went down to the alleys behind Decatur Street and found a delapidated hut where he slept and dreamed.

The rumors of war did not effect Atalanta and even less her husband. Atalanta had heard brief talk about secession and fighting. She did not believe that it would ever come to anything. Certainly, she did not want it to. It would interfere with her accumulations, and she was beginning to handle money. Harvey was director in the new Fulton Bank.

When he was invited to the Kansas protest meeting which a few persons had gotten up in Atlanta, she told him not to go.

"We've lost nothing in Kansas," she said, "and it's silly to think we can drive slavery there. We have got our hands full here buying and selling the cotton and exchanging goods and sending them over the world."

At the same time, she could not help but dislike a certain brash independence and discourtesy among Atlantans. They actually arrested Senator Jefferson Davis one day in the trainshed as he got out for air and exercise. He was so well-dressed that he was looked upon with suspicion and as a probable confidence man. To her home, Atalanta invited Steven A Douglass, when he came to speak. She supported him because he was trying to stop this crazy talk about war, and she resented his treatment at the hands of an audience which did not know its own mind. They shouted and yelled at him because he wouldn't acknowledge the legality of secession, when none of them for a moment wanted secession. They simply wanted to appear Southern and independent.

38-12-288

When war came, Atlanta boomed. The population of ten thousand more than doubled in five years. People rushed in to this railway center from city and town. Real-estate values rosed rapidly. Everything of importance had to pass through Atlanta. There came the day, February 16, 1861, when Jefferson Davis came through on his way from Washington to Montgomery, where he would head the new nation. He stopped off, tall, precise and immaculately dressed. A little later, passing the other way, came a man who had seen Atlanta before. His face still bore the scars of the duel. He was a cripple on crutches, but Alexander Stevens passed through from Montgomery to Savannah and there made his celebrated cornerstone speech. The cornerstone of all the new Confederate government was to be Negro slavery. Then the world war swept the city and Harvey and Atalanta with surprise noticed two things: that the only effect of the war on Atlanta was to make her prosperous, much more prosperous and increase her population; and then shrewdly concluded that no matter which way the war went, Atlanta would . Neither of them wanted the North to succeed, but if it did, Atlanta would still be the gateway to the neighboring North and if it did not, it would be the great railway and commercial center of the southeast. Then in addition to threat, came the threat of war, the concentration of munition-making in Atlanta. Harvey Eves and his wife furnished the land and houses and invested money. Then came the hospitals and prisoners and more land was needed and paid for. Out of the city flowed an endless stream of war materials and Atlanta made shells and revolvers, knives and swords, drums and shoes, hats, bread, candles and (matches), wire and coffins. And yet Atlanta remained far from the seat of war. There was little of it for several years. To be sure, her crack Gate City regiment marched off to Florida and volunteer regiments were called for now and then. But once only in the earlier years did the war scare come near. Harvey saw those seven white-faced Federal prisoners shot. Twenty-two of them had tried to steal and engine and destroy the thirteen bridges in the

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

38-12-256

North, but they were caught before they could do any damage and before they reached Chattanooga. Then there was a lull, until suddenly the real scare came. Grant was coming to Atlanta., and Joe Johnston did not have troops enough to keep him back. No, Grant was passing on to Richmond, but Sherman was coming down from Tennessee.

"Why didn't Jeff Davis send reenforcements? What was the matter with the Confederates that they could not see that Atlanta was the most important place in the South. What did they mean by letting the prosperity and profits of Atlanta be interfered with by this raiding Northern army, but the army came on." *

Atalanta was suddenly troubled. She had accumulated a large store of cotton ~~xxdxx~~after the prices began to rise and put it in the old hut where John and his children had lived. She had large investments in buildings and manufacturies, in public service, banks and railroads. Suddenly, she saw these threatened. Harvey was panic-stricken. He saw the end of all his striving, but his wife knew better than this.

"Let them come," she said, "and burn down our houses. We've got the land. Let them destroy the railroads, the road beds is there. Atlanta is still a commercial center and a place for money-making if all its visible wealth should be swept from the earth."

Harvey couldn't believe this, but he was heartened, ~~and~~ Then suddenly came war. Suddenly came armies sweeping across the dull flood of the Chattahoochee from the North and East and cutting off Atlanta from the cotton kingdom and tearing up the railroads. And then came Hood, the newly appointed Confederate general, dashing at the Federals, shouting, snarling and worrying them as they came steadily on. To John, the drama was tragic. He knew its every point and movement. He saw the Federals cross the water at Pace's Ferry. He heard the bullets and saw the smoke at the shadow of Peachtree Creek. He walked in and out of the Federal camp and walked out and in all Atlanta.

A tremor of fear shook the Harveys. They heard the roar of that fiery rain that began to descend upon the city. Life suddenly stopped; children, men and women lay dead upon the streets; fires started here and there; some set by the Confederates; they salvaged their munitions; some set by the Federal sheels; and then at last it was over. Harvey went up and talked with Mayor Calhoun. There was one of the unarmed citizens that rode out to talk with Sherman. They went down Marietta Street through a mass of ruins, dilapidated houses and deserted earthworks. After riding four miles, they came to the presence of Sherman and explained that they had come to surrender the city. Sherman accepted the surrender bruskly, but courteously. John saw the Union troops entering, when suddenly, on Decatur Street, within a few yards of where he slept, a dozen Confederate calverymen fired upon the Union troops. There all was confusion, but soon after, Atlanta asserted itself. stores were filled from Federal depot supplies. Trades began. Billiard rooms and jails were opened. A minstrel performance was advertised. The streets were filled with soldiers and citizens and at the corner of Mitchell and Washington Street Sherman had his headquarters. The war was ended and Atlanta was trading again. Then, September 4, came an astonishing order. Atalanta was beside herself with rage. Harvey was in despair. Sherman's Order was terse:

BLT 13 Regt Inf Div Baggage III A 13

38-12-290

"The City of Atlanta be exclusively organized for war-like purposes, will be at once evacuated by all except the armies of the United States and such city limits as may be retained." In vain did the citizens ask respite. Two thousand people left Atlanta and the city was burned. Four thousand five hundred buildings went down in smoke. Harvey and his wife did not go but hid in the hut with their cotton. John did not go. He was wandering around the Federal camp when suddenly a recruiting officer put him in uniform. He took his gun and wandered over toward his old home.

To most people, it seemed as though the end had come, yet Atalanta knew better and told Harvey so. She insisted the war was going to end. Secession did not take place. Slaves would go free, but they would send up the price of cotton, and they had few slaves in Atlanta. Land values still stood. The railroads were destroyed, but it would not cost so much to restore them and there was labor, white labor and Negro labor available. Here, then, was nothing like the destruction and despair that threatened the cotton belt. The industrial system was not overturned. In fact, with the high price of cotton and the rising demand for food, Atlanta's commerce was more needed than ever. Then did Harvey's heart stand still. The Federal troops were searching for cotton and their guide was John. He showed them where the Thrasher family had their hoard; he pointed out one or two hiding places and then quite easily and unconcerned, he walked straight to his old home and showed the Federal officers where Harvey had stored ten thousand dollars worth of cotton. Seething with rage and yet unable to do anything, Harvey saw the transaction from afar and went home to tell his wife. They stared at each other with consternation. They knew the whole thing was quite characteristic of John. He flew into no rages of templer; he was deeply interested apparently in nothing, and yet slowly and with a certain careless method, he walked on to his revenge and the betrayal of their cotton was revenge for the betrayal of his children and his land.

38-12-291

When spring opened, the world of Atlanta came trooping back. It was, on the one hand, a sad sight of destruction and disorganization, and on the other hand, careful calculation as to just how to take advantage of this crisis. The Harvey's had meant to stand their losses of buildings and temporary unproductiveness of their land by the ready capital furnished through the sale of their cotton. Of course the sale would have been difficult; they would have to have smuggled in North or South and perhaps bribe officials, but Federal officials could be bribed and smuggling was not impossible. Now, however, they were suddenly without funds, without a home, and with no quick means of capitalizing returning trade. The worry and fear of this situation brought to Atalanta the sudden end of her life. She died giving birth to her only son, Harvey Rhett Eves in 1865.

The city did not hesitate. It began to buzz with new activity. Temporary huts were put up, stores were opened as soon as possible, and credit and capital eagerly sought. Before Hood had disappeared toward Tennessee or Sherman begun his march to the sea, Atlanta was beginning to trade again.

Then the people poured into the city and especially Negroes came. The poor white and black occupied the half-ruined houses of the rich. There was a accumulation of destitute people, especially from the country roundabout. Three hundred white families were in danger of starvation and perhaps more Negroes. In the midst of it all,

In the midst of it all , Harvey Eves sat angry and hesitating. He had re-opened his store and partially stocked it on credit. His daughter was sixteen and his son an infant. Savannah Thrasher, as she was called, John's daughter and Harvey's own colored neice, was but a year older than his daughter and acted as a nurse to the baby. The boy had run away, probably with John's connivance and followed Sherman to the sea.

38-12-292

These were the days when Atlanta sat quite still and held its breath. On the whole, she was very much satisfied with the result of the war. Her situation was such that unless the separation of the two parts of the country had taken place in peace and friendliness, her whole geographical reason for being would have disappeared. As it was, she was about to become, and she knew it, the great gateway between North and South with every possibility of becoming great and rich. She was not worried that when the planters met at Milledgeville under the old regime and tried in vain to restore it. She welcomed the provisional governor and Johnson sat down and listened to the legislature of 1866. It still was dominated by the planters, by the shadow of Cobb and Tombs and ~~the rest~~ Stevens. It had a lot to say about slavery and Negroes concerning whom Atlanta did not care a rap and it and it did not change the capital to Atlanta.

Of course it had seemed presumptuous before the war to talk of Atlanta as the capital of the state, away from Savannah society and the cotton kingdom, but Atlanta knew what she knew and her phenomenal growth and the war-like activity pointed to manifest destiny. It came at last when the Federal general arrived to take command of the Third Military District with headquarters at Macon. He came in March.

In April, he transferred his headquarters to Atlanta. He did it probably because of the greater ease of communication by Atlanta's railroads, but Harvey Eves rejoiced for he knew that Atlanta was a center which the planters could not dominate and that the changing of the military headquarters from Macon in April, 1866, to Atlanta in April, 1866, was a significant act, the end and beginning of an era. From that time on, Atlanta dominated Georgia and in a real sense, dominated the new South.

Book 2 pp. 1-12

WINGS OF ATALANTA

Book II

White and Black

John Thrasher had grown up and had added the name Thrasher to his first name when his first employer died. His growing up had been slow. In the years from 10-15, his life had been wonder and observation, exploring and looking with his great black eyes. Then had come the miracle of sex and love and with it a certain unity of spirit with Atlanta, the town of which his and he belonged. He had no binding sense of dependence between himself and the white people who were there. Every foot of railroad, every store, every truck, flowing to and fro, was a part of that inseparable unity, that made him and Atlanta one.

It was broken, first, rather harshly with the death of his young wife and the fury of Harvey's wife. The consciousness of race difference, first, began to creep in and a certain sense of inferiority and submission came. This sense was destined to disappear and then in after years return, re-doubled, and finally to be transformed into a philosophy of life which resembled his first years of oppression and wonder. He had given up his children easily to the Eves family. It seemed on the whole natural. They belonged to them as much as to him. More so, perhaps. They could take care of them, while he had difficulty. It freed him to walk and see and explore. On the top of that came the awakening of war-time and a new and contradictory sense of power. As a soldier, he had sensed and opposition of race which did not leave him inferior, but at least equal. Indeed, perhaps, superior, although this sense was evanescent and came and went, lingering but at short intervals. Perhaps it surged to its highest when he had been made a registrar to help register black voters and then with astonishment saw the convention of December, 1867.

There were 107 delegates and 140 of these were the kind of human beings that John was used to seeing in command of things, carrying on business, sitting in high places like courts and public meetings, but the other 33 were Negroes, 4 of them so white that for a time John did not know they were of Negro descent, but the other 29 manifestly Negroes, black and brown and a few yellow.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

This gathering of Negro leaders was viewed with a certain astonishment in Atlanta by both black and white. John Thrasher, ~~as he now called himself,~~ was especially stirred. Until now he had taken no great personal interest in the world about him, but had viewed it as a moving and interesting pageant. He was thirty-seven years old, but looked much younger, straight and strong, intolent and yet wiry. He picked out all the Negro leaders and talked to most of them. There was Henry Turner, with his smooth face, great voice and flashing eyes. There was no doubt about his ability and his aggressiveness. He walked into the convention, self-confident and self-assertative, a former army chaplain, a preacher and agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, and now, the leading Negro politician of the state. He was born free; he had travelled widely and was soon the target of the whites who feared his influence. "An unscrupulous fellow," said the Atlanta Intelligencer, but John liked him and believed in him. Then there was Aaron Bradley who was a pronounced radical, openly opposed to the planters, interested in the convicts and demanding land for Negroes. He was a yellow man, sparingly built and handsome and was one of the first that the whites sought to get rid of. Someone soon declared that he had been convicted of a felony and had served a term in Sing Sing, New York. He denied the felony and the term in Sing Sing, but admitted that he had been convicted of seduction, and then he whirled upon his accusers:

"I've got a letter which says that the white delegate from Gordon County and President of the Convention have both been convicted of the same offense. I do not wonder that I am nettled."

Bullock, the carpetbagger and afterward Governor, leaped to his feet and moved that Bradley be expelled from attacking the social position and standing of these gentlemen and their families. Bradley left the convention, but he was sent back to the legislature afterward as Senator from the First District. Then there was Tunis Campbell, a brown man, born in Massachusetts, who had lived in Canada. He had held an island off the coast of Georgia against government forces for the Negro tenants and was only disposed by armed force. Then he became a magistrate in Darien and white planters had to appeal to him to get labor. He came to the convention eager for the election of frank and honest men to office. He all candidates for their views on universal suffrage. He was a member of the committee on education and a man of great personal charm. There were other leaders noticeable and assertative, but faithful, like Costin, who was never absent, and in all the convention, there was not a single charge of graft or selling votes. The convention ended March 11, 1868 and brought out a constitution which established for the first time universal suffrage and free education in the state of Georgia. Crowds of Negroes and many whites roared their approval as the black and white members walked out of the convention hall.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

32-11-52

But they were not laborers, they were not slaves, they were not even furtive and apologetic in their manner. For the most part, they walked like men; they were well-dressed; they could rise and make speeches and they did, and John listened with a certain fascination. He saw them hob-nobbing and consulting with leading white men, sitting beside them at the desks. He sensed their leadership in certain matters, the right to vote, relief, and public schools. There were a few ill-dressed and noisy; there were one or two who got drunk, but as a group they suddenly made John Thrasher realize that distinctions among human beings were largely superficial. Unconsciously, he set his shoulders back and began to dream of action, of work, of finding and guiding his children, of something very like a career.

It was at this stage of his development that he ran into Harvy Eves. They had seen each other many times since the war, but had rather ostentatiously avoided each other. John knew that he had deliberately kept Harvey Eves from being a rich man, although of course the chances are that Federal officers would have discovered his horde of cotton. Yet, he might have bribed his way out. Eves nourished bitter resentment and hatred against John. The connection with his sister had grown in his mind now to a monstrous attack upon his race. It was The matter of cotton was (theft and cheating;) but things had changed. Harvey with his quick sense of economic development, began to conceive that Negroes, perhaps hereafter, had to be counted with, were coming into power, were going to help rule. In that case, he must now make peace with them and his easiest path lay with John. "You know we got a lot of interest in common," he said, as he met John this day and looked at him knowingly. "Why don't you get into the legislature?" John stared at him in astonishment. He could neither read nor write. He knew nothing about politics and law-making. It never had occurred to him that he could be one of these law-makers, but to Harvey, apparently, it was all very simple, and of course before John realized it, he was a member of the first Reconstruction legislature of Georgia.

32-11-57

The outlook of Harvey Eves on life was much more direct and concrete. He was not a part of Atlanta; he was going to use Atlanta for his purposes. What he wanted in Atlanta was to get rich and do things which would accomplish his purpose quickest. He had few scruples as to method, although, of course, it would have defeated his object if he had to crassly run afoul of the law. Atlanta itself was properous. Its income in 1866 was nearly $300,000. Cotton was still high and all the country thereabout Atlanta and the country which it fed toward the South needed food and Northern goods. They were selling rapidly. A rolling mill had been started and Harvey held a part of the capital of $200,000. A machine shop destroyed during the war had started up again and banks were needed. Yet Harvey was cautious, and he had his eye on the railroads and the future of the railroads depended on the legislature. He had met Kimball and was greatly impressed. Here was a man of ideas and power and he knew how to handle people. Harvey was going to string along with him and get in on these railroad deals, and one of his first specific efforts was to get John into the legislature where he could handle him. His son Rhett Eves, born in 1856, was now thirteen years old and a bright youngster. He had had some schooling, but Eves put him into Block's factory to grow up with their business. On the other hand, John took sudden interest in his lost family. Young John had marched with Sherman to Savannah and was working there. John got in touch with him and he came back with a young wife whom he had just married. Savannah, born in 1850, a year after her brother, was now living with her father and John and his young wife joined them. For Savannah, John planned an education. It was a new idea to him, but he found it pervading the legislature. The whites were not enthusiastic, but evidently regarded it as a sop to the poor whites and the Negroes in return for which they could extract more vital concessions. Some of them learned the way in which they had sidetracked a scheme for popular education in 1858 by capturing the convention and overwhelming those who had sent an emmisary to Rhode Island to look into public schools. But in this legislature, the movement was too strong. (Already Atlanta University was set upon a hill and begun in 1865 and opened in 1866.) John sent Jane to school, and there on the spot of such a school and with a new public school system, the new legislature turned much of its attention.

The planters did not surrender without a frantic effort. John went down to their (arbor) on Alabama Street on a hot July day. It was the Democratic state convention with over one thousand delegates, representing every part of the state and representing especially the land and wealth of the state. It was the last appearance of the great pre-war triumvirate, Stevens, Toomb and Cobb and their (conjugators), Ben Hill and former Governor Johnson. They were armed cap-a-pie in all their panoply of eloquence and arrogance. They wore long black coats and black cravated (stocks.) They spoke with mighty voices and the air of those used to authority. Five long hours they talked on a blazing afternoon. It was the last bitter blast of the planter aristocracy, but it very evidently missed its mark, in that the masses of those who attended did not listen,--they did listen and enjoyed the whole thing. It was to them a sort of vaudeville. They applauded rounded periods raptuously; but it was unreal. In the first place, it was the wrong setting. In Savannah, in Augusta, even in Macon, such an assemblage would have been overwhelming, but powerless, because too far from this new center of brute power, Atlanta; and in Atlanta All this sounded unreal. These people had led; they were born to lead; but their leading ended in disaster. They were through, although they did not know it. They declared the war amendments unconstitutional; but they were being enforced. They denounced the Reconstruction legislature, but it was the Reconstruction legislature with its black members sitting in the state capital. They told what they were going to do, what must be done, what the duty of the South was, and yet all of their political plans were impotent and they and their audience knew it. The one power that was irresistible, they did not mention, but pushed ahead; with the last card held up their slave by which they proposed to purge the legislature of its black membership, deprive the carpet-baggers of these supporting votes, and drive the scalawags back to cringing obedience. And even as they talked, the great and irresistible new movement rolled on and gathered power. The new wholesale business began for supplying the small stores in the towns which Atlanta reached and where the stocks were depleted by war. People needed food and clothes; they could get them in Atlanta straight from the North and West; they could pay for them with cotton and food and raw materials. They began a new tilling of the soil; that red, unfertile soil around Atlanta and the black rich soil further South. The whites worked as never before; the blacks continued to work. From way down in the cotton belt, bales began to roll North toward Atlanta, instead of always South toward Savannah and New Orleans. Twenty thousand bales a year were rolled into Atlanta and in five years more, this was destined to be increased five times. All this called for railroads and more railroads, and increasing miles of railroads in all directions. There was not enough private capital to build these things, and yet, they were run for private profit. The government of the state must furnish capital, but the profit was to go into private pockets. Here was power, here was vision, and thiw was what Harvey Eves and Kimball and Bullock and the carpetbaggers were thinking of, but the planters, Bourbon and obdurate, did not see this. They had a trump card and they played it.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

33-11-57

It had been suave but true, with all the finesse of that political chicanery which had duped Congress into permitting the conspiracy of secession to grow with helpless hanging hands. When in the constitutional convention someone had asked for a specific statement that Negroes had the right to hold office: "Why is that necessary?" blandly asked ex-Governor Johnson. "The citizen, of course, carries that right." And the same ex-Governor Johnson, as he canvassed in the Southern part of the state during the campaign, pointed out the fact that the constitution and the custom of the state gave Negroes no right to hold office. On the other hand, around Atlanta and in the Northeastern part of the state, came dangerous communistic appeals to the poor whites.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

32-11-60

"Be a man! Let the slave-holding aristocracy no longer rule you. Vote for a constitution which educates your children free of charge; relieves the poor debtor from his rich creditor; allows a liberal homestead for your families; and more and more than all, places you on a level with those who used to boast that for every slave they were entitled to three-fifths of a vote in congressional representation. Ponder this well before you vote." (Thompson, Reconstruction in Georgia, p. 204.) Black Reconstruction, Du Bois, p. 500.

The ensuing legislature now meeting at the capital had by reason of this appeal all too many poor whites and scalawags, but above all, it had forty Negroes, and these alone feared the eye of the Bourbons. They might have been the planters allies; they were nearer the planters by convention and inherited sympathies. Indeed, before and during the convention, the planters had counted on them and often worked with them, but now it was time to get rid of these monkies because they were evidently a source of danger. The planters had not expected that the Negro members of the convention of the legislature would be much more than a worthless mob ready to take orders. They were surprised and chagrined by the appearance of leadership and self-assertion by the possibility of an entirely new alignment of Negroes, scalawags and carpetbaggers.

The matter came up as soon as the legislature met early in June, but met unexpected reluctance and opposition. It began in the Senate and Milton Candler a planter from middle Georgia, precipitated the debate. He declared that Negroes were not entitled to their seats because they were Negroes and that they could not hold office under the constitution of Georgia. A long and heated debate ensued and the colored Senator Bradley, who had been a bone of contention in the convention, fought back bitterly. He moved that Candler's resolutions be espunged from the minutes and he secured unexpected support, not so much because his fellows wanted the three Negroes in the Senate, but because they knew that Reconstruction was not all and that such high-handed action might goad the grim North to acts of retaliation. Senator Nunnally, therefore, sought to sidetrack the present discussion from the main point. He brought up the old charge of an alleged conviction in New York against Bradley and got this matter referred to a committee, of which he and Candler were members, and then kept it there until the Senate was formally organized and the new Governor Bullock's message received. They feared that this would make Georgia's position in the Union stronger and that later they could do as they pleased. The special committee on Bradley had had . The majority declared him ineligible because of the conviction in New York, but the minority declared that the evidence was not convincing. Nevertheless, Bradley was not permitted to defend himself and although no quorum was present, the President of the Senate refused to call the roll. The matter dawdled on until August as Congress had adjourned and immediate danger of interference was past. Then when Bradley saw that he was going to be expelled; he forestalled action by resigning. But he was defended by Campbell, another black Senator and Campbell and Wallace still held their seats. Campbell had some eloquence and education; Wallace was illiterate, but he was no fool. In September, the stage was finally set. Candler headed another special committee. The Negroes were given one hour for defense and then un-seated. Campbell and Wallace left with bitter protest.

32-11-61

"in behalf of ourselves, ~~our~~ the constitution and also in behalf of nearly 500,000 loyal citizens of this state, we do enter our solemn protest against the illegal, unconstitutional, unjust and oppressive action of this ~~protest against the illegal, unconstitutional, unjust and oppressive action of~~ body, ~~based upon the resolution of the Senators from the 35th Senatorial Dis-~~ ~~this~~ ~~trict,~~ declaring us ineligible on account of color."

Thereupon, the Senate took the curious but practical step of seating in the places of the three deposed Senators the persons who in the last poll received the next highest number of votes, or in other words, the bitterest opponents of the man unjustly expelled.

[redacted] Six white Senators joined in a protest, but this was ignored and the Senate resolved that the persons in the districts of Wallace and Campbell who received the next number of highest votes should be allowed to take their seats. Bullock, Governor, sent the election returns asked for , but expressed his displeasure and indignation and the explusion of the colored Senators. Candler declared that the Senators had the right to expell any of its members and that the letter of the Governor should be ignored.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

The governor protested. Bullock was no Negro lover. He had served in the Confederate army. He had grown to be a Georgian by instinct and action during the fifteen years of resistance, but he knew his North and he knew the future of Atlanta. He wanted to get down to railroads and building and commerce and invite interference with his government by this foolish and unnecessary action. He protested, but the Senate paid no attention, and the Bourbons now turned their attention to the twenty-five Negro representatives in the House. In the meantime, Building operations were rushed on. At first, huts and haphazarded buildings with high rents and scarce material between 1866 and 1869. The city limits were extended three miles in each direction and between 1869 and 1872 there were large building operations. The James Mansion, after the Governor's residence, cost $70,000 in 1869. In 1870, the Opera House and the marvelous Kimball House cost $500,000. The Fourth Baptist Church and the new Catholic Church went up. Four Hundred buildings were erected in 1871, including a Union passenger station and in 1872, the Fifth Baptist Church. During all this time, from 1865 to 1871, there was a real estate boom and wide speculation. The Atlanta National Bank was established in 1866 and Adair's real estate office opened in 1865.

When the matter came up in the House, it touched John Thrashor and thrilled him. [illegible] was a fight; he had never been used to fights; he had let life flow on around him and had drifted with it, but his colleague in the legislature was a young man named Clairbourne, a dark, thin-faced, passionate man from the black belt. Clairbourne was ten years younger than John, only twenty-eight, but he had been attracted, first, to John himself with his easy humor and tolerant philosophy so in contrast with his own; and then he had met Savannah, John's daughter, with her brown face and waving black hair. They were married in 1868.

The Negro members of the House had only begun to take part in business.

32-11-63

offered a bill to establish proper forms and house of refuge in the county. James Porter offered bills against racial discrimination and to incorporate a German fire company in Savannah. James Sims offered several bills on the city government. J. T. Costin was appointed to the committee on rules and was immediately attacked as not being a resident of Talbert County. Turner was on three committees, on institutions for the blind, on corporations and on the state of the . Also, he was on the special committee to notify General Meade that the House had acted on the constitutional amendments and to invite him to attend the inauguration of the Governor. He introduced bills to incorporate the Georgia Mutual Life Insurance Company, to punish dueling and to prevent race segregation on railroads. Phillip Joiner was on the committee for institutions of the deaf and dumb. He tried to reduce the vote of the sheriff of Dougherty County and the salaries of the judges of the Superior Courts and wanted to compel police officers to secure badges. U. L. Houston wanted to tax arable land which was not cultivated, five cents an acre, and T. M. Allen presented bills to regulate elections in Jasper County and protect farmers from foxhunters.

The colored legislators in the House thus began their ~~setter~~ work and continued during June and July, while the fight for explusion was going on in the Senate.

On August 11, however, a resolution was introduced in the House denying colored members the right to their seats. The majority of the committee on privileges and elections declared all Negroes ineligible and ~~there was~~ included the four men who had one-eighth or less of Negro blood. The debate was continued through September and Turner was protagonist, although others took part. Romulus Moore, for instance, made a clear statement of his claim to his seat. ~~Moore was~~ a Negro preacher, Representative Slower said: "Stop white folks. Take this resolution off the table and let's go to work." But Turner made the chief speech.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

32-11-64

But the House machine acted mechanically and leaving out the four octoroons, expelled in September the remaining twenty-five Negro members. The state was divided. The newspapers wavered. Already in June a test case had come before the courts covering the case of a Negro elected to local office. Chief Justice Joseph Brown and one colleague out of the three justices decided that the Negro had a right to serve. Brown, the last pre-war Governor, thus aligned himself with Bullock, the carpetbagger, by whom he had been appointed to the court. It foreshadowed a new deal between planters and carpetbaggers who were turned toward commerce and industry, but the decision had no effect on the legislature and the House refused to rescind its vote in order to placate Congress. Meantime, support for the planters' program came from the South. The Ku Klux, dressed in white shirts and pillowcases, began to ride; but as they were funny and bizarre in appearance, their actions were not definite and business-like. They drove Negroes into the fields to make cotton; they intimidated or killed Negro leaders; they whipped men black and white who stood up for anything new. Two hundred and sixty outrages were reported in the single year, 1869.

John Thrasher was astonished and helpless. A development of white people and black people side by side with the blacks learning from the whites, and the whites reaching out for alliance and support, this he could understand, this was clear; but a fight between blacks and whites, that was impossible. That did not seem reasonable even in the nature of the case or in the possibility of doing anything. He was disposed to be content with pleading, to wait until persons more powerful, until that far-off Congress and Northern abolitionists, came down and cleared the way. He was astonished when Turner and Bradley and Campbell prepared to fight. He didn't know whether he ought to go down to that meeting in Macon, but his son-in-law persuaded him. Then he found that he had no money. Clairbourne went by train and urged John to come, but John made excuses. He would come by the next train. He had no money; he never had any money. He never had much use for money, and so with scores of others, he walked to Macon, ninety long miles, which still did not seem long. It gathered more and more the aspect of a pilgrimage, of an assembling army, of the determination and might of black people. It gave John a new conception of power and of possibility, and it culminated there in that closed and almost secret meeting where 136

32-11-65

MEN raised their great voices and he listened and joined in the roll of their chorus: "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand; all of the ground is sinking sand." Eighty-two counties were there and Turner was the acknowledged leader. There were bitter and firety speeches, most of the men could not read and write, and yet, deftly guided by Turner and others, they did the practical and necessary thing. They went to work and set forth their case with facts and figures, with actual record of occurrences and legal and social argument. The Ku Klux outrages around them rosed to a crescendo. Former colored members of the legislature were attacked. Colby of Green County was taken from his bed atdnight and beatened. Richardson was killed and Davis escaped death because he was mistaken for a white man. The riot took place at Camilla with nine black men dead and twenty or more wounded. But the convention at Macon stuck to its guns, out of poverty it raised money; it sent Turner and Sims to Washington to beseige Congress, and at the same time, Bullock, the governor, hurried North to warn the leading Republicans that without the Negro vote not only would reactionary Democrats represent Georgia in the United States Senate, but the state would go Democratic in the election of 1868, now only a month away. It was a crisis and action must be taken. Terry, the military commander, reported that in some parts of Georgia there was no government at all and no real courts. Congress did not like the situation, but there was little to do. The Georgia presidential vote was practically held up. The Senators elected were denied their seats. Georgia was again out of the Union and under military rule. It seemed to John a miracle, while to the planters, it was a final defeat and to the carpetbaggers, a new bid for greater power.

Book 3 pp. 1-21

BOOK III.

Chapter I.

It was a pretty stiff fight. The black boy was about nine--small, lean, almost scrawney; the white boy was larger and older, perhaps ten or eleven; fat, almost to flabbiness. It began with a thrown chunk of clay which hit the black boy behind the ear. He whirled angrily and yelled at the grinning white youth.

"Here, you," he cried; and starting forward, paused. It was a clear, bright morning at eight in the early spring of 1909. Flowers were peeping out. Birds were twittering and there was warmth in the air. White children, boys and girls of varying ages and a variety of dress, were straggling west to the Walker Street school in twos and threes; crossing their path came colored children going north to the Mitchell Street school--walking, running, playing. The whites paused and began to congregate, amused; the colored children walked more slowly and watched. At first, the white boy had thrown his clay and started away laughing; but when he saw that the black boy was not following him, he turned and stood his ground.

Little John scowled; hesitated; took another step forward and then turned completely around. He knew that he mustn't fight white boys. The white boy was encouraged. He hopped, yelled and ran forward. Some of the white children laughed and egged him on:

"Go git him, Patty!"

"Make the little nigger run."

Patty stooped and picked up a stone; in a flash John was on him. The white crowd yelled; the black children grew strangely silent; a few hurried away, but the rest pressed forward with tensed muscles, grim and watchful. At the first onset, John went down in the dirt with the big boy on him; but in a moment, he had squirmed loose and struck the boy full in the face with his bundle of books and the boy sprawled in astonishment. Then they rushed together again, hot and angry. They struck, scratched, kicked and bit. Blood appeared on their hands and faces, clothes were torn and dirty, books and papers were scattered. The laughter of the white children changed to a menacing growl. The silence of the black children broke in to a shrill scream. They dropped their books and pressed nearer.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

"Kill him, John; kill the damn Cracker."

John was slowly getting the better of the tussle; he was strong and wiry despite his size and he was determined. Murder surged in his heart. The white boy grew scared and furious. He yelled for help. People, white and colored, stopped, looked, and began to draw near. There was a menace of bitter race riot in the air when two figures came flying along the street from its opposite ends. The colored woman had a bundle of clothes in her arm and moved cumbrously, but swiftly: the white woman, thin, half-dressed in a flimsy kimono, with flying hair, ran rapidly. She reached the fighting couple first and tearing at John ripped his shirt from neck to waist, and slapped him sprawling. The white boy, encouraged by unexpected help, started to scratch, gouge and kick him; but by that time John's mother was there. She was calm, almost smiling, as she pushed the white boy back and tried to take John in her protecting arm.

"There, there," she said. "Now, stop it, both of you. These here children will get into mischief, won't they, ma'm?"

"Don't talk to me, you black wench," screamed the hysterical white woman. "I'll kill that little devil."

"Now, now," said Savannah, "I'll see to him. He'll get a good whipping. And you all better go on to school," speaking to the colored group which began to move slowly and then more swiftly as they saw two policemen in the distance.

The policemen blustered up. "Here, here, now," one of them said magisterially, "what's going on here?" A number of grown people had now gathered, mostly white with a few blacks at a distance.

The white woman clutched her clothes and tried to put up her hair. She explained volubly and rapidly, panting and trembling through her thin garments.

"This little nigger has been fighting my boy and tearing his clothes."

"But--," stammered John, "he hit me first."

"Shut up," said the policeman. "Now get on to school, you children;" and the white children slowly began to move away.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

"That's all right, sir," said Jane, "I'll see that he gets punished, and he won't do it again. He's a good boy--"

"He'll pay for my boy's clothes, the black scamp. He ought to be on the chain gang," said the woman.

"Sure should," said the policeman," and I'm going to take him down to the Tower." The other policeman moved to a telephone.

"Please don't," pleaded the black mother. "Surely we can fix this up. It's just a child's fuss. I work for Mr. Eves and Mr. Blake. They'll tell you who I am,--Savannah Jones. Surely we can fix this up. I'll see that your boy's clothes is paid for, ma'm." But she talked in vain for already with a clatter and shriek, the Black Maria wheeled up and John and his mother were bundled in. The white woman stood soothing the sullen white boy.

"You'll come down and make charges, ma'm, this afternoon," said one policeman politely; but the other stared at her,leering familiarity in his eye.

"I sure will,"said the woman, staring back angrily.

The black group was gone, but the white group lingered, already augmented by other white men and women, while far off in the outskirts the colored women and men, dispersed, and the whites scowled after them.

Little John was thoroughly bewildered, especially at his repeated inability to state his side of the case. Even in the wagon, as they rode down Mitchell Street and over the viaduct by the beautiful new Terminal Station; then down by Pryor to Decatur, all the time he was trying to get his mother to listen to him, but apparently she did not hear. She just patted his hand nervously.

"You see, mammy, I didn't begin no fight. I didn't want to fight, but he hit me with clay and dirtied my clothes, and even then I was going on about my business when he grabbed a stone and jumped at me. What would you expect me to do? Let him pound me? I couldn't do that, you know I couldn't. I had to fight back, and I was licking him, too, good. I don't see how it was my fault."

They went in to a dirty, noisy place with laughing policemen and loafers. They were duly booked and Jane pleaded for them not to keep the boy there and let him appear next afternoon. The sergeant was disposed to ridicule her and joke about it, and said "the ornery, little nigger better be locked up lest he get in more mischief." But at last a telephone call to Mr. Lucius Eves secured his temporary release. Yes, Mr. Eves knew Savannah. Her people had worked in his family many years. He'd come down and speak to the Judge.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

32-11-82

When John got home, he succeeded in making his mother talk. She explained that in a way he was right; of course he was part right.

"But you say I mustn't ever fight white children? That wouldn't be fair, if they jump on me."

"Well, it's a curious world, full of wicked people, white and black; but you can't make them do right by beating them. You got to be a good boy and serve God and--"

"But why don't the Lord get busy? He had a chance to straighten that fight out and he didn't do a thing."

"Hush, boy; Don't talk about God that a-way. He takes his time."

"You mean he will fix it up tomorrow?"

"Yes, well, no, perhaps not tomorrow, I tell you, the Lord takes his own time. He's just got aplenty of time."

"But I don't see no sense in his getting things so muddled up in the first place. Why don't he play fair? If he just got to fight, he ought to give us a chance to fight the thing out and not stick in policemen and old, wild, white women."

But Savannah only sighed. "I tells you it's all coming out right."

"Well, it looks like a mess to me," said John. His mother raised her hand sharply as if she would slap him; but her raised hand changed to a caress and her resentment to a sob.

Judge Broyle's court next morning was a further astonishment to John; the judge on his high bench seemed angry and sneering. The reporters were in repeated gales of laughter and one who was beginning his work on the Constitution and writing a funny column concerning Judge Broyle's court, was especially edified.

"Isn't that a type?" pointing to Savannah; and he sketched her swiftly and deftly.

"The little nigger ought to be in rags to be typical; but he's quite like the small, black gentleman." And that fact itself seemed to irritate the judge.

"Look here, nigger," he said, "don't you know that you mustn't strike white folks?"

John was silent.

"Don't you?" reiterated the judge.

"Got lessen they hits me, first," said John boldly, and the reporters tittered. The judge got red.

"I'll teach you," he said. "Look here, Savannah, I'm going to put this impudent little nigger on the chain gang and teach him manners;" but Savannah pleaded.

"I've always treated white folks with respect," she said, "and I'm sure my little boy tried to, too."

"What have you got him all dressed up them fer? What's he doing in school? Why don't you put him to work and make him support you? If you can buy books and clothes like that, I reckon you can help support this city. It will be $25 and costs."

Savannah was dumb. That represented more than a month's work. She had only brought ten dollars in dimes and quarters. Then Lucius Byes entered the court. He shook hands cordially with Judge Breyle and whispered to him. After a time, Savannah and John went out. He could not understand the world about him. He had knocked a big, white boy down and pushed his head in the clay because he had started at him and hurt him; but now he saw how his mother had to plead and work to keep him out of the chain gang.

His mother looked at him thoughtfully.

"You know," she said, "that your uncle, the brother that I loved;" and then she paused, and finally went on with some difficulty, "was in the chain gang many many years until it killed him, soul and body. I don't want you to go there. Some way, I don't know how, I want you to make up for what he wasn't and might have been. Perhaps you can't do it wholly. He was--glorious, but you, you can be a good boy and an honest man."

"Perhaps," she said thoughtfully, "you may be a preacher,--perhaps. I don't know."

And all this John could not understand. He had done right. And yet right was wrong. He must let white boys sneer at him and chase him and strike him. No, not that.

BOOK XII. Chapter I.

He drew the line there. They mustn't hit him. Everything else he supposed he had to bear. But even then he couldn't see why. What was all this difference because of color, anyway. And who was this God whom he had to serve because his mother had promised, and who let things like this happen? It was a funny muddle. He didn't understand it. And he hated things which he couldn't understand.

The white woman was angry, too. She was given $10, about twice as much as her boy's clothes had cost; but still she was angry.

"That's it," she muttered to her fellows," these rich scoundrels are always paying for their niggers and putting them up to impudence while they steal the bread and butter out of our mouths. I know that boy of mine ain't no angel; he's going to hell as fast as he can; but who's fault is it? I'm away slaving in Eves cotton factory for 75¢ a day, while he's running the street. I'm trying to dress him decent and keep him in school, while Eves is starving his workers, and giving their places to niggers. I'd like to kill every nigger in Atlanta. If it wasn't for them, we could hang together and get better wages. By God, something's got to be done about this," and she went home bedraggled, trembling, and in tears.

92-11-85

BOOK III.
Chapter II.

There were two old men sitting in a summer house back of a mansion on Peachtree Road. On the porch of the house with its large and gracious facade gleaming white in the sun could be heard the voices of children--Millicent Eves, who was ten, and her companions; and the wail of Fred, the new baby. But in the summer house far in the rear there were only murmurs. The white man was 72--old, fat, doddering and irascible; the black man was tall, remote, full of regrets and memories and plans, but thin and ageless, despite his 70 years. He would say: "Next year, I'm going West where my father went." But he never went. At most, he walked to Marietta or Macon. Whimsically, he would add: "When I was in London, I saw the King." Then Harvey Eves, his white companion, would burst out bitterly: "You ain't never been to London, you old fool. You know damned well you ain't."

"I see spring flowers over yonder," said Old John.

Harvey Eves sniffed. "Them ain't flowers; they's the new skyscrapers. Air you goin' blind?"

"No, I'm getting second sight. I can see a heap these days--a heap."

"You're always tryin' to talk like a book. You know you ain't got no education. Now my wife--there was a talker and a reader."

"She didn'r read after you got her; she jest took snuff."

"And damn; but you ought to hear my granddaughter, Millicent."

"Bet she don't know how many cities I can see yonder."

"You don't see but on, you fool, and that's--Atlanta."

"I see 3 cities; a black one; a white one; and a white-and-black one--all different."

"You blacks don't count."

But the black man maundered on:

"Atlanta done throwed out railroads like wings, North and East and South and West."

BOOK III. Chapter II.

"Who ever heard of a bird with all them wings?"

"I have, and more. They's cherubims. There's lots of birds with four and six and eight and fifteen wings. I done seen them in the big woods in old times."

"You're a damned liar."

"Take back that 'liar', whitetrash, 'fore I bust you one."

"Git out--git out, leave me, you black son of a bitch. Always spongin' 'round here."

"Ah, don't go, John--don't leave me. I don't mean nothing. I ain't got nobody now. Rhett is too damned busy and Lucius and his wife think I'm dirt. Have another drink?"

Old John settled back in his chair and drank slowly.

"There's a heap of things I never did figure out about Atlanta. Somehow, I couldn't just exactly see what I'm looking at. There's always something half hid in Atlanta. For an instance, there ain't no market square."

"Atlanta never did have no market. She built herself around a depot."

"And made a railroad depot her God and worshipped it. And on the depot was the cherubim with the wings; the Wings of Atlanta."

"I don't know what you're talking about, nigger. But we Southerners always was x religious and God-fearing."

"No, just scared, plum scared stiff; devil worshippers who whoop and holler to scare off spirits. Just like us niggers. And they's lots more I don't understand."

"If thare anything you don't understand, I might explain it to you."

"All right. Now all this land, who made it?"

"Who made it? You damn fool, nobody made it; 'ceptin God."

"Then how did you and Rhett git it?"

"We bought and paid for it."

"Sure and you paid a man who didn't make and couldn't own it and you gave him half what it was worth, and what made it worth anything is the 150,000 all around who don't

BOOK III. Chapter II.

own nothing."

"Oh, hell, you make me sick--listen."

Below came the sound of bells. No, it was the ring of iron clinking on iron. It was the stirring of convicts at eventide. They had been clearing the land and building roads and making way for new palaces of the rich.

"Your boy, Rhett, done made a heap buying and selling niggers."

"It's a lie. He's a contractor. The convicts ain't fit for nothing, but to be sold and worked."

"He made a heap, just the same."

"Sure did."

"And he's lost a heap, too, in Hoke Smith's panic."

"How did you know he lost money?"

"Riots don't make money."

"You are the God dammest, old, belly-aching fool I ever heard tell of. And if you think my Rhett won't make his pile again, you're crazy. They've made the price of convicts higher with their new fool rules and they beat hell out of his railroad stock. But you wait; he's got schemes."

"He made money out of the blood of one of mine down there. Powerful pretty boy. He ought to be killed for that."

"If you don't stop that talk around here, you'll get lynched."

A group of children ran back into the yard and stopped and stared.

"There's pappy," said a pretty little girl.

"And there's his old nigger," added another.

"I ain't your pappy, nigger, and never was," said Old John, placidly. "I never belonged to nobody and never will."

The mother hurried into the yard.

"Why don't pappy keep that nigger away from here. It isn't decent," she complained. She was one of the poor white Murray's and deathly afraid of her smart neighbor's judgment.

BOOK III. Chapter II.

Old Eves hated her. He had wanted Rhett to marry a lady born like his wife and he went and took up with one of the poorest of the poor whites.

"Shut your damned mouth," yelled Old Eves trembling with wrath; but Rhett came out. He was a smooth-faced, cold-looking man.

"Go on," he said briefly to the children, herding the children to the front yard.

Rhett Eves in 1919 was fifty-four and looked old. He had married in 1876 and had a son, Lucius, and a daughter. He had one object and that was power through wealth. He had disciplined himself severely. He neither drank nor used tobacco. His sex appetite was small. He was a member of the Baptist Church, careful in his orthodoxy; and he had been rich. He had made money out of the convict lease system and land ownership, but was hard hit by the depression of 1907. He proposed, however, to begin again to make money out of manufacturing and the control of labor. He despised his father, but tolerated him; and let this queer, old man be his companion. It was as cheap companionship as he could imagine. He glanced at them coldly.

"Don't make so much noise, and I'll have no swearing about here. Come to supper, Pappy, and you, John, go to the kitchen and eat all you want to," he said, crisply, and walked on.

The old, black man arose.

"Sit down," pleaded the white man. "Have another drink." But the black man moved away in the night.

"I'm going," he said. "I'm going to see what it's all about."

"What what's all about?"

"What all is all about."

"You'll get your fool head knocked off wandering around at night," yelled Harvey, as Old John disappeared. He went along the back roads like a ghost, shuffling softly in the dusk and came down through the valleys into the West side, crossing Peachtree Creek and the meadows, and at last came to a place where men were meeting and there was singing in the air.

It was in Darktown and in old Wheat Street Church a turbulent meeting was being held. The pastor had started the singing. He was P. James Bryant and had come to Wheat Street Church ten years before, following the almost deified Father Tillman at the age of twenty-five. And now the church had threatened to split on him. A bitter feud had torn it in two and Bryant was using all his power and finesse to hold it together. Bryant was a thin, wiry, black man, with sharply etched face, and he was fighting the great fight of his career; and fighting with him were a mass of women, and their weapon was song. Soon the wave of music filled the hollow where the Negroes lived and welled up toward the strongholds of Atlanta buisness and the residences of the rich.

BOOK III. Chapter XI.

Hither John walked and stood and listened and afterward watched the bitter, quarreling and recrimination. Far away to the North in New York there had just been a meeting in Carnegie Hall where Henry Watterson, Governor Hughes and Seth Lowe had presented Booker T. Washington, and a few months later in Boston, Trotter and his friends had rioted against Washington. Hitchcock was even now up yonder in an Atlanta hotel planning to buy votes in the Republican conventionto nominate Taft. Tomorrow Taft will be nominated and in the fall elected just as Joe Brown will be elected governor and bring victory for the railroads. All this was seething around the fight in Wheat Street Church, and during the year thirteen Negroes were lynched in Georgia.

BOOK III
Chapter III.

32-11-90

It was after Golden Boy had gone to the dark disaster of penal chains that Dick Jones asked Savannah to marry him. He explained diffidently and apologetically, that she and her mother needed support and protection; that he was quite alone, just an old bachelor, with no decent home to stay in; that he was earning good money, $100 a month as a fireman, and would soon earn more, as he got promotion.

But only one of his arguments really moved Savannah; she had had no contact with men and no thought of marriage. Her whole life had been bound up with Golden Boy; but when Dick Jones pointed out that after the twenty awful years, and perhaps even before, if Golden Boy got pardoned, he would need guidance and support, Savannah grasped at the straw and grasping found herself unexpectedly in Dick's arms, weeping out for the first time the full bitterness of her revolt and disappointment and finding comfort and protection she had never before known. Still she hesitated until she noted with Dick how suddenly old and weak her mother Jane was getting; how difficult it was for her to accomplish the week's washing, and how she sat long hours and stared at nothing. She, who before had never stopped, but gone methodically, even if slowly, about her day's work.

So at last and quietly, they were married in 1898, and in 1900, Young John was born. It was to Savannah, a revelation. She had been hitherto rather a silent, unemotional woman, dark and quiet. Only now and then did her emotion burst through as from a dead volcano and her great contralto voice foam in floods about the world. Usually, she sang alone; and it was this voice that from its birth had tremendously impressed and awed her son John. Her love for her little boy was different than that for her brother, Golden Boy. Him, she had worshipped and adored and set on high. But Little John, she held apart. He was a symbol and a promise.

"Young John", they called him, after his great grandfather. The boy was dark brown and sturdy; he grew up free and happy until 1906, when he was six years old. Almost it seemed to him that he began to live in 1906. First, his grandmother came home, deep in the night, with a bundle of rags in her arms, and she seemed to think it was Golden Boy; and then they brought a stark and maimed body and buried it secretly in the back yard.

BOOK III. Chapter III.

And that was Golden Boy; and then a few days later, he heard an uproar in the night. He heard explosions. His mother almost dragged him into the church past a man torn and hidden with his own blood. Her voice with the others rose in a song of defiant triumphant, and she dreamed that little John ~~think~~ was to be a great man; that he was to lead his people.

She had not greatly regarded him until 1906 when her brother was done to death. And then suddenly, in her loneliness and distraction, he became more. He became slowly the embodiment of her hopes for Golden Boy, without the beauty, without the glory, but with something solid and firm. She felt that she must insure this by not making the mistakes which had ruined Golden Boy. Young John must obey; he must behave; he must go diligently to school; he must keep out of trouble and trouble to her meant friction with the whites. She must in some way not yet just clear make this boy a great man--not by love; but by discipline, not by devotion; but by sacrifice. In some mysterious way, he would work the great atonement and final salvation.

Before that night after the riot, she had attended church only perfunctorily, although John had been sent regularly to Sunday School. Her husband was more regular in attendance, being a deacon at Friendship where the pastor, E. R. Carter, had served a quarter of a century. After that night in church, urged by her husband and the pastor, she attended more regularly; she had never joined a church; she had never "experienced" religion. Now she began to see that possibly in some mysterious way her great work of atonement, salvation and vengeance was coming through the church. The thought of this kept recurring until there came the day of the great revival. An evangelist had come to prepare and gather the annual harvest of converts. He was a shrewd and intelligent man and did this sort of thing for a living. His knowledge of the psychology of crowds, and particularly of Negro crowds, was profound, and preachers were willing to pay him a goodly sum to relieve them in this annual recruiting of their congregations. Carter did not think much of him as a man, but he knew his power and technique, and he had to acknowledge that in conversions he was a finished artist.

This year, his opportunity was unusual because the nerves of the people had been set on edge by the riot. They had seen death in its ugliest form and they were prepared to talk about God and what he had done and what he proposed to do. But the evangelist did not quite strike the right note. These people were not disposed to think about submission and Heaven; they had been through Hell and they wanted to talk about the vengeance of the Lord right here on earth. The stranger who had not lived through the riot did not understand their attitude. His usual vocabulary and stock of antics left his audience curiously cold and he realised it. Into his fervor, which was usually so productive of loud amens and even screams of approval, crept a doubt. He confessed to himself that this was the hardest and dumbest crowd that he had met for a long time. While he was shouting and gesticulating, he began seriously calculating whether he were going to be able to raise a large enough sum to pay his expenses and to justify himself before the Reverend Carter; and to be able to get further engagements on Carter's valuable recommendation. He had already been here a week and if things did not pick up, he did not propose to fool away another week.

92-11-92

He raised his voice to a great shout: "Come to Jesus!" pausing dramatically.

And then the break came. He was used to it; if he could work his audience up to a certain point, the floodgates would give way and a wave of emotion would seize them and toss them up and on. Usually there were premonitions of such an event, increasing centers of excitement here and there, murmurs and sobs; but tonight in an audience cold and still, suddenly a scream rent the air. It startled even the evangelist. For a moment, he did not connect it with his preaching; he thought perhaps somebody had been hurt, or vaguely pictured a white mob. Then he gripped himself and realized. A woman had arisen and was standing in the audience. Tears were streaming down her face and she had beside her a little boy fiercely clasped by the hand. A dark man was trying uncertainly to restrain her. The evangelist paused and then bent forward. He was himself again; he knew the symptoms. Here was the call, the demoniac possession, the frenzy of religious madness. It was typified by a woman who did not easily let herself go; who was struggling even now to keep back the silent emotion that surged within her. The evangelist stretched his arms; he was a big man and standing high in the pulpit loomed large over the audience. His vast voice rolled: "Come to Jesus," he said, looking straight at the woman, and she came with a swift rush dragging the little boy, frightened but unresisting, beside her, and leaving her husband. She came up the aisle and the intensity of her emotion, the trembling of her hands and the swelling of her hard-held sobs gripped the audience because they knew her. She represented all that they had been through: these awful days; the chain gang, murder, rape, mobs and fire, the horror of everything that was called "the race problem", and she represented, too, the hard hand which had held out against God all these years and now had been miraculously touched. A moaning swelled over the audience. It rose to a murmur and broke into a prayer with low obligator of strophe and antiphonm.

BOOK III. Chapter III.

"Oh Lord (Hear her Jesus--bless His name) Receive this soul
(Bow down our knees--and bow our heart beneath our knees) that comes a-weeping to your breast
(Make a way, God--in the Sin Wilderness) Open your great arms, God (O crucified one--Open your arms) and take her in. Give her peace, God; Give her peace (Wash her sin away--Save her soul) and wash her sins away in your own blood--your own blood, O lamb of God and Savior of all men."

Suddenly the bowed and praying woman looked up, dry-eyed and grim. The evangelist, watching her with narrowed eyes and only partial comprehension, stopped the waving of his hands and sudden silence fell. And the woman said, low-voiced: "I done seen him."

"Now what's coming," said the evangelist to himself. He was afraid she was a crank or crazy and that he might not be able to keep the spell which he had woven upon his audience. But he said, aloud:

"Speak, sister, testify."

And she said in a clear voice: "I saw Jesus," and then paused. She could not add that he looked like Golden Boy; that he was Golden Boy. She simply said, speaking clear and distinctly:

"I saw Jesus. I did not know before that people ever saw him. I thought they lied when they testified. But I saw him last night. I saw him plain, with his poor, crucified body all dust and blood."

A groan of pain shook the mass of kneeling folk.

"And He said' 'For give me', he said, 'when I knowed as I never knowed before that I was the sinner, I was the murderer. I, I alone had killed God.'" and she beat her breast and her voice rose louder about the rising tumult.

BOOK III. Chapter XXI.

"And Jesus said: 'Bring me a sacrifice that I may save me and mine. Bring me your first born and stretch him on my altar and let his blood and mine wash all the sins of the world away. And I've brought him and give this boy to you. Take him, preacher, and make him a man of God. A preacher of the word, that this Jesus may live again and all my people, my poor, black people, be saved." And falling to her knees, she worshipped for a second in ecstacy the vision of Golden Boy.

Rising quickly, she lifted the boy bodily and thrust him toward the evangelist. The scared child trembling stared on the sea of faces. The evangelist took him in his arms and soothed him. Then the preacher raised his great, harsh voice in staccato bursts of recitation:

"Shall I--be car-ried-to-o-the Skies on flow-ry --be-eds--of ease;
No I--must fight--to win--the prize and soul--thru blood--y seas;"

Then above the jerking explosion of the preacher rose the voice of the woman. She filled the interstices and spaces of recitation with pure music. This audience knew singing, instinctively it knew music, but somehow it seemed that never before had Friendship heard a voice like this. It was an immense voice and yet full of glorious harmony. And as the thump of the preacher's rhythm struck like a bared fist, the song of her voice swept on and up and its magnificent cadence shook the building. The audience went wild. The music of a thousand voices throbbed and swelled, and the evangelist in silence led them only with wild waving of his hands. There had been no such singing for many years in old Friendship.

Back in the rear of the church Old John loomed. He had glided silently in, hearing the singing and watching for his great grandchild. He stood there now softly cursing; long and low he cursed, for Little John was curiously close to the old man. They talked together, soberly and often. There had been no such bond between him and Golden Boy and Savannah resented it. She made herself believe that some evil influence of bad manners and godlessness might be the result of too close association between the two Johns.

Old John had apparently never noticed Golden Boy. It was not altogether the

BOOK III. Chapter III.

stain of his illegitimate birth. Old John was no crude stickler for morals. To him babies were babies and parents parents and he gave little weight to religious ceremonies. But he never liked Golden Boy. Perhaps as a man, he resented his beauty, or deeper than that, feared it. He wanted not so much to curb the boy, as to get his feet on the earth and hold him down from walking the clouds. He did not want to guide him, but he wanted the boy to guide himself by some solid landmarks and along real paths and over hard mountains. And when nothing of this seemed possible, he withdrew to the side and watched this brilliant phenomenon dance and laugh by, and crushed and concealed his own forbodings of the coming disaster.

32-11-35

But in Little John, he saw a jewel; a solid, good, little bit of humanity; he wanted only to breathe flame into him and tell him great wonder tales. Anchored to the earth by the very sturdiness of his physique, the boy should expand and grow and make his race a strong, fighting fist to smash the color bar and the miserable fortresses of caste. Now this had come, and Old John cursed softly and bitterly. He hated the church. He hated the meek and spineless Jesus. He despised preachers. He saw through the evangelist as through an open book. He laughed at his tricks and mannerisms. Yet there, high on the altar, with the voice of his mother singing below, with the arms of the church around him, he saw his little boy gripped and imprisoned and dragged down to his fate. He looked toward poor Dick Jones standing half-bewildered, half- there Savannah had left him. There was no help there. Dick dealt with iron, water and coal, not with feelings, dreams and souls. Old John strode out into the night, crying in his hurt. He whispered: " The whole damned world is wrong; whites are wrong; blacks are wrong; God or the Devil is going to burn this world down."

BOOK XII
Chapter IV.

Judge Murray could never forget that visit of Savannah's pleading for her brother and his son. He always saw his own dark son in the chain gang sent by his own father for a political bargain. He was sure that the boy was bad. The testimony seemed too clear to doubt that; and yet he knew equally well that the testimony might be prejudiced and that certainly no white boy of the sort would have gone for ten years to the penitentiary; and he knew too that his own political ambition, the greed of Eves, had helped send him there. After some years, harassed by his own conscience, he tried tentatively to see what he could do to get Golden Boy pardoned; but the warden talked plainly to him.

"Do you know, that devil?" he said. "He is Lucifer; he is King of the Damned. He is the hardest, craftiest, meanest nigger in jail. It would be a calamity to loose him on the public. He ought to stay his full term, and if possible, I'll try to get him extra years."

There seemed nothing to do but await the boy's release and then give him money to go North and study and go to work under wider, freer surroundings. Meantime, the political pot boiled. From the city court, the judge had gone to the Superior Court bench. In the turmoil of 1906, he was running for the Supreme Court. If he won, he might be governor some day and even United States Senator.

But his campaign was not successful. He was offended by Hoke Smith's virulent attack on Negroes. He tried to hark back to that union of poor whites and blacks which Tom Watson had visioned in 1876. But Watson and the whites turned on him bitterly and embraced disfranchisement. His subsequent campaigning was poor. He seemed no longer able to make an effective appeal; his hands seemed palsied; and the zest had gone out of life. He was afraid, with deadly fear, and prayed loudly and much too long in his neighbors' opinion at the weekly Methodist prayer meeting. There was no doubt but that the judge was failing.

Then came the release of Golden Boy, his awful crime, the riot and the election. Judge Murray was defeated and he died. The physicians called it heart failure. His wife followed him, leaving only his daughter, who had married a fireman in 1895. They had two children; one, the boy, Patty, who fought the battle with Young John on the streets in 1910; and a younger sister, whom they called "Sis".

32-11-96

BOOK III. Chapter IV.

It was an unhappy family. Grace Murray could never forget that her father had once been a great man and almost rich; that he had sat as judge upon the bench; and that if he had lived, he might have been governor; and that she had lowered herself by marrying a grimy fireman who came home black as a darky, and indeed, had to work at a job where Negroes also worked and got as good or better wages.

Her husband was bitter, too. It was intolerable that he should be working at a Negro's job, and the only way was to get rid of Negroes. They must not be permitted to become engineers, and that was accomplished by the Union many years before. But even now, they held their seniority rights as firemen; they got the same wages as the whites; and they kept themselves in place by being servile, and waiting on white engineers. That's the reason that the same white engineers, damn them! preferred black firemen. That's the reason he couldn't get promotion and better wages. There were, of course, other reasons; but Tom Hammond did not acknowledge them: he was not a good fireman; he didn't attend to his work; he drank too much liquor; and he loved to loaf. Thus all the more, Hammond's economic position and his wife's social regrets, converged into the Negro problem. He was one of the main leaders of the riot of 1906.

He and his wife were among those white laborers on the edge of subsistence. Continually they were thrown into competition with Negroes and were goaded to desperation in the fear of losing caste by being out-stripped by the more energetic and resourceful blacks. They discussed the Roosevelt-Booker Washington dinner in 1901 and considered it a crime against nature. They were beside themselves with wrath when Jack Johnson beat Jim Jeffries: first, because a black man had been allowed to pummell a white man before the eyes of the world; but more especially when this ape had married a white girl and flaut her through the country.

The riot of 1906 took for them the aspect of a crusade.

BOOK III. Chapter IV.

"We killed a dozen of the damned niggers," said Hammond, as he came in drunk from the orgy with his arms laden with goods that he had stolen from Negro houses.

His wife was disgusted with him, with his thefts, but she kept the goods and nursed the hate, and finally, was compelled by his shiftlessness to enter the cotton mills and take a job as a spinner. Only in this way could she support the two children and hire a slatternly maid which any white family must have to keep up the last shreds of appearances.

Tom Hammond became prominent in the new union movement against Negro firemen. Negroes were not allowed to join the firemen's union movement against Negro firemen. Negroes were not allowed to join the firemen's union, but under the leadership of Dick Jones, they formed their own union and began to negotiate with the railroads. This raised the fury of the white firemen. They organized themselves; they went on a strike which rose to the dimensions of a race war. From many railroads, the Negro firemen were driven pitilessly; but on the old Georgia road, Dick Jones kept his position and his seniority rights and fought back. But one thing broke his heart. He had always hoped to see his little son John succeed him as a fireman. Once had thought of that for Golden Boy, but Golden Boy was too glorious and walkedom upper air; but Young John was sturdy and good and he wanted him to be a fireman. He clung to that even after Savannah had decided that he was to be a preacher. Now, however, he would probably have to be a preacher; no more Negro firemen could be taken on, and Dick's heart was near broken at the thought. But Tom Hammond and his fellows were not satisfied with broken hearts. They lay in ambush and shot Dick Jones and many other black firemen. Little John saw his father brought home dead, and saw his mother wearily bring home again the piles of weekly wash to support and keep their little home.

Then came a ray of light. The Fulton mills were going to take on some Negro spinners. They must be good, faithful workers and if they work good and learned easily, the jobs were permanent. They would be given $8 a week at first. This spelled a living for Savannah and her boy.

BOOK III.
Chapter V.

32-11-99

Old John and Harvey Sves were sitting in the summer house. Harvey looked very old and shrunken and mumbled rather than talked. Old John was at the same age and with the same aimless questing for truth.

"I see they done lynched a Jew," he said.

"I hates Jews," said Harvey Sves.

"They say as how white folks has lynched 2,500 niggers since Reconstruction. Young John reads to me that black folks is meeting in New York to talk about it."

"Gotta behave themselves and let white women alone," mumbled Harvey.

"You know white folks is not only wicked; but they's dumb. First, they kills their enemies; then they kills their friends; then they kills themselves. God don't mind a bit of wickedness now and then, that is natural; but he sure hates dumbness. God's gwine to sweep this world with a wind of death. I sees blood upon the moon; I sees fire," but Harvey was not listening. He was mumbling:

"My grandson, Lucius; there's a man. He married money. They say she was an Aster. I don't know. But she brought him a nice pile. Now there's Rhett, the fool; he didn't marry nothing. But Lucius; he's going to make us rich again."

Old John watched Lucius drive up the long path. He was a fine figure of a man. There was none of the pale, hard look that his father, Rhett, had. He was well-groomed and well-fed, generously proportioned, with an air of assurance. He had had education and contacts. Descended from generations of poor whites, he looked the born aristocrat. He viewed Old John with something like speculation and amusement in his eyes; and then he looked on past him and his eyes rested on the city below and away to the right. He saw the city clearly for what it was; a wilful, quarreling, jealous bird of prey, with mighty shadows of wings. There was something immeasureable and titantic about a vast, festering, industrial gangling like Atlanta. And yet with all its minute, penetrating, devastating intelligence, it was in essence a vast Unknowable; an immense ignorance which not even God comprehends. Its slimy pus exudes God and syphilis, palaces and brothels, murderers and prostitutes, births and suicides.

Book 3 pp. 1-23, 35, 40-42, 47-58

32-11-48

BOOK III.

Chapter I.

It was a pretty stiff fight. The black boy was about nine--small, lean, almost scrawney; the white boy was larger and older, perhaps ten or eleven; fat, almost to flabbiness. It began with a thrown chunk of clay which hit the black boy behind the ear. He whirled angrily and yelled at the grinning white youth.

"Here, you," he cried; and starting forward, paused. It was a clear, bright morning at eight in the early spring of 1909. Flowers were peeping out. Birds were twittering and there was warmth in the air. White children, boys and girls of varying ages and a variety of dress, were straggling west to the Walker Street school in twos and threes; crossing their path came colored children going north to the Mitchell Street school--walking, running, playing. The whites paused and began to congregate, amused; the colored children walked more slowly and watched. At first, the white boy had thrown his clay and started away laughing; but when he saw that the black boy was not following him, he turned and stood his ground.

Little John scowled; hesitated; took another step forward and then turned completely around. He knew that he mustn't fight white boys. The white boy was encouraged. He hopped, yelled and ran forward. Some of the white children laughed and egged him on:

"Go git him, Fatty!"

"Make the little nigger run."

Fatty stooped and picked up a stone; in a flash John was on him. The white crowd yelled; the black children grew strangely silent; a few hurried away, but the rest pressed forward with tensed muscles, grim and watchful. At the first onset, John went down in the dirt with the big boy on him; but in a moment, he had squirmed loose and struck the boy full in the face with his bundle of books and the boy sprawled in astonishment. Then they rushed together again, hot and angry. They struck, scratched, kicked and bit. Blood appeared on their hands and faces, clothes were torn and dirty, books and papers were scattered. The laughter of the white children changed to a menacing growl. The silence of the black children broke in to a shrill scream. They dropped their books and pressed nearer.

"Kill him, John; kill the damn Cracker."

John was slowly getting the better of the tussle; he was strong and wiry despite his size and he was determined. Murder surged in his heart. The white boy grew scared and furious. He yelled for help. People, white and colored, stopped, looked, and began to draw near. There was a menace of bitter race riot in the air when two figures came flying along the street from its opposite ends. The colored woman had a bundle of clothes in her arm and moved cumbrously, but swiftly: the white woman, thin, half-dressed in a flimsy kimono, with flying hair, ran rapidly. She reached the fighting couple first and tearing at John ripped his shirt from neck to waist, and slapped him sprawling. The white boy, encouraged by unexpected help, started to scratch, gouge and kick him; but by that time John's mother was there. She was calm, almost smiling, as she pushed the white boy back and tried to take John in her protecting arm.

"There, there," she said. "Now, stop it, both of you. These here children will get into mischief, won't they, ma'm?"

"Don't talk to me, you black wench," screamed the hysterical white woman. "I'll kill that little devil."

"Now, now," said Savannah, "I'll see to him. He'll get a good whipping. And you all better go on to school," speaking to the colored group which began to move slowly and then more swiftly as they saw two policemen in the distance.

The policemen blustered up. "Here, here, now," one of them said magisterially, "what's going on here?" A number of grown people had now gathered, mostly white with a few blacks at a distance.

The white woman clutched her clothes and tried to put up her hair. She explained volubly and rapidly, panting and trembling through her thin garments.

"This little nigger has been fighting my boy and tearing his clothes."

"But--," stammered John, "he hit me first."

"Shut up," said the policeman. "Now get on to school, you children;" and the white children slowly began to move away.

33-11-49

BOOK III. Chapter I.

"That's all right, sir," said Jane, "I'll see that he gets punished, and he won't do it again. He's a good boy--"

"He'll pay for my boy's clothes, the black scamp. He ought to be on the chain gang," said the woman.

"Sure should," said the policeman," and I'm going to take him down to the Tower." The other policeman moved to a telephone.

"Please don't," pleaded the black mother. "Surely we can fix this up. It's just a child's fuss. I work for Mr. Eves and Mr. Blake. They'll tell you who I am,--Savannah Jones. Surely we can fix this up. I'll see that your boy's clothes is paid for, ma'm." But she talked in vain for already with a clatter and shriek, the Black Maria wheeled up and John and his mother were bundled in. The white woman stood soothing the sullen white boy.

"You'll come down and make charges, ma'm, this afternoon," said one policeman politely; but the other stared at her, leering familiarity in his eye.

"I sure will," said the woman, staring back angrily.

The black group was gone, but the white group lingered, already augmented by other white men and women, while far off in the outskirts the colored women and men, dispersed, and the whites scowled after them.

Little John was thoroughly bewildered, especially at his repeated inability to state his side of the case. Even in the wagon, as they rode down Mitchell Street and over the viaduct by the beautiful new Terminal Station; then down by Pryor to Decatur, all the time he was trying to get his mother to listen to him, but apparently she did not hear. She just patted his hand nervously.

"You see, mammy, I didn't begin no fight. I didn't want to fight, but he hit me with clay and dirtied my clothes, and even then I was going on about my business when he grabbed a stone and jumped at me. What would you expect me to do? Let him pound me? I couldn't do that, you know I couldn't. I had to fight back, and I was licking him, too, good. I don't see how it was my fault."

They went in to a dirty, noisy plade with laughing policemen and loafers. They were duly booked and Jane pleaded for them not to keep the boy there and let him appear next afternoon. The sergeant was disposed to ridicule her and joke about it, and said "the onery, little nigger better be locked up lest he get in more mischief." But at last a telephone call to Mr. Lucius Eves secured his temporary release. Yes, Mr. Eves knew Savannah. Her people had worked in his family many years. He'd come down and speak to the Judge.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

When John got home, he succeeded in making his mother talk. She explained that in a way he was right; of course he was part right.

"But you say I mustn't ever fight white children? That wouldn't be fair, if they jump on me."

"Well, it's a curious world, full of wicked people, white and black; but you can't make them do right by beating them. You got to be a good boy and serve God and--"

"But why don't the Lord get busy? He had a chance to straighten that fight out and he didn't do a thing."

"Hush, boy! Don't talk about God that a-way. He takes his time."

"You mean he will fix it up tomorrow?"

"Yes, well, no, perhaps not tomorrow, I tell you, the Lord takes his own time. He's just got aplenty of time."

"But I don't see no sense in his getting things so muddled up in the first place. Why don't he play fair? If he just got to fight, he ought to give us a chance to fight the thing out and not stick in policemen and old, wild, white women."

But Savannah only sighed. "I tells you it's all coming out right."

"Well, it looks like a mess to me," said John. His mother raised her hand sharply as if she would slap him; but her raised hand changed to a caress and her resentment to a sob.

Judge Broyle's court next morning was a further astonishment to John; the judge on his high bench seemed angry and sneering. The reporters were in repeated gales of laughter and one who was beginning his work on the Constitution and writing a funny column concerning Judge Broyle's court, was especially edified.

"Isn't that a type?" pointing to Savannah; and he sketched her swiftly and deftly.

"The little nigger ought to be in rags to be typical; but he's quite like the small, black gentleman." And that fact itself seemed to irritate the judge.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

"Look here, nigger," he said, "don't you know that you mustn't strike white folks?"

John was silent.

"Don't you?" reiterated the judge.

"Not lessen they hits me, first," said John boldly, and the reporters tittered. The judge got red.

"I'll teach you," he said. "Look here, Savannah, I'm going to put this impudent little nigger on the chain gang and teach him manners;" but Savannah pleaded.

"I've always treated white folks with respect," she said, "and I'm sure my little boy tried to, too."

"What have you got him all dressed up then for? What's he doing in school? Why don't you put him to work and make him support you? If you can buy books and clothes like that, I reckon you can help support this city. It will be $25 and costs."

Savannah was dumb. That represented more than a month's work. She had only brought ten dollars in dimes and quarters. Then Lucius Eves entered the court. He shook hands cordially with Judge Broyle and whispered to him. After a time, Savannah and John went out. He could not understand the world about him. He had knocked a big, white boy down and pushed his head in the clay because he had started at him and hurt him; but now he saw how his mother had to plead and work to keep him out of the chain gang.

His mother looked at him thoughtfully.

"You know," she said, "that your uncle, the brother that I loved;" and then she paused, and finally went on with some difficulty, "was in the chain gang many many years until it killed him, soul and body. I don't want you to go there. Some way, I don't know how, I want you to make up for what he wasn't and might have been. Perhaps you can't do it wholly. He was--glorious, but you, you can be a good boy and an honest man."

"Perhaps," she said thoughtfully, "you may be a preacher,--perhaps. I don't know."

And all this John could not understand. He had done right. And yet right was wrong. He must let white boys sneer at him and chase him and strike him. No, not that.

BOOK III. Chapter I.

He drew the line there. They mustn't hit him. Everything else he supposed he had to bear. But even then he couldn't see why. What was all this difference because of color, anyway. And who was this God whom he had to serve because his mother had promised, and who let things like this happen? It was a funny muddle. He didn't understand it. And he hated things which he couldn't understand.

The white woman was angry, too. She was given $10, about twice as much as her boy's clothes had cost; but still she was angry.

"That's it," she muttered to her fellows," these rich scoundrels are always paying for their niggers and putting them up to impudence while they steal the bread and butter out of our mouths. I know that boy of mine ain't no angel; he's going to hell as fast as he can; but who's fault is it? I'm away slaving in Eves cotton factory for 75¢ a day, while he's running the street. I'm trying to dress him decent and keep him in school, while Eves is starving his workers, and giving their places to niggers. I'd like to kill every nigger in Atlanta. If it wasn't for them, we could hang together and get better wages. By God, something's got to be done about this." and she went home bedraggled, trembling, and in tears.

7

BOOK III
Chapter ~~III~~ 2

32-11-42

It was after Golden Boy had gone to the dark disaster of penal chains that Dick Jones asked Savannah to marry him. He explained diffidently and apologetically, that she and her mother needed support and protection; that he was quite alone, just an old bachelor, with no decent home to stay in; that he was earning good money, $100 a month as a fireman, and would soon earn more, as he got promotion.

But only one of his arguments really moved Savannah; she had had no contact with men and no thought of marriage. Her whole life had been bound up with Golden Boy; but when Dick Jones pointed out that after the twenty awful years, and perhaps even before, if Golden Boy got pardoned, he would need guidance and support, Savannah grasped at the straw and grasping found herself unexpectedly in Dick's arms, weeping out for the first time the full bitterness of her revolt and disappointment and finding comfort and protection she had never before known. Still she hesitated until she noted with Dick how suddenly old and weak her mother Jane was getting; how difficult it was for her to accomplish the week's washing, and how she sat long hours and stared at nothing. She, who before had never stopped, but gone methodically, even if slowly, about her day's work.

So at last and quietly, they were married in 1898, and in 1900, Young John was born. It was to Savannah, a revelation. She had been hitherto rather a silent, unemotional woman, dark and quiet. Only now and then did her emotion burst through as from a dead volcano and her great contralto voice foam in floods about the world. Usually, she sang alone; and it was this voice that from its birth had tremendously impressed and awed her son John. Her love for her little boy was different than that for her brother, Golden Boy. Him, she had worshipped and adored and set on high. But Little John, she held apart. He was a symbol and a promise.

"Young John", they called him, after his great grandfather. The boy was dark brown and sturdy; he grew up free and happy until 1906, when he was six years old. Almost it seemed to him that he began to live in 1906. First, his grandmother came home, deep in the night, with a bundle of rags in her arms, and she seemed to think it was Golden Boy; and then they brought a stark and maimed body and buried it secretly in the back yard.

BOOK III. Chapter III.

32-11-43

And that was Golden Boy; and then a few days later, he heard an uproar in the night. He heard explosions. His mother almost dragged him into the church past a man torn and hidden with his own blood. Her voice with the others rose in a song of defiant triumphant, and she dreamed that little John ~~kuck~~ was to be a great man; that he was to lead his people.

She had not greatly regarded him until 1906 when her brother was done to death. And then suddenly, in her loneliness and distraction, he became more. He became slowly the embodiment of her hopes for Golden Boy, without the beauty, without the glory, but with something solid and firm. She felt that she must insure this by not making the mistakes which had ruined Golden Boy. Young John must obey; he must behave; he must go diligently to school; he must keep out of trouble and trouble to her meant friction with the whites. She must in some way not yet just clear make this boy a great man--not by love; but by discipline, not by devotion; but by sacrifice. In some mysterious way, he would work the great atonement and final salvation.

Before that night after the riot, she had attended church only perfunctorily, although John had been sent regularly to Sunday School. Her husband was more regular in attendance, being a deacon at Friendship where the pastor, E. R. Carter, had served a quarter of a century. After that night in church, urged by her husband and the pastor, she attended more regularly; she had never joined a church; she had never "experienced" religion. Now she began to see that possibly in some mysterious way her great work of atonement, salvation and vengeance was coming through the church. The thought of this kept recurring until there came the day of the great revival. An evangelist had come to prepare and gather the annual harvest of converts. He was a shrewd and intelligent man and did this sort of thing for a living. His knowledge of the psychology of crowds, and particularly of Negro crowds, was profound, and preachers were willing to pay him a goodly sum to relieve them in this annual recruiting of their congregations. Carter did not think mudh of him as a man, but he knew his power and technique, and he had to acknowledge that in conversions he was a finished artist.

This year, his opportunity was unusual because the nerves of the people had been set on edge by the riot. They had seen death in its ugliest form and they were prepared to talk about God and what he had done and what he proposed to do. But the evangelist did not quite strike the right note. These people were not disposed to think about submission and Heaven; they had been through Hell and they wanted to talk about the vengeance of the Lord right here on earth. The stranger who had not lived through the riot did not understand their attitude. His usual vocabulary and stock of antics left his audience curiously cold and he realized it. Into his fervor, which was usually so productive of loud amens and even screams of approval, crept a doubt. He confessed to himself that this was the hardest and dumbest crowd that he had met for a long time. While he was shouting and gesticulating, he began seriously calculating whether he were going to be able to raise a large enough sum to pay his expenses and to justify himself before the Reverend Carter; and to be able to get further engagements on Carter's valuable recommendation. He had already been here a week and if things did not pick up, he did not propose to fool away another week.

32-11-44

He raised his voice to a great shout: "Come to Jesus!" pausing dramatically.

And then the break came. He was used to it; if he could work his audience up to a certain point, the floodgates would give way and a wave of emotion would seize them and toss them up and on. Usually there were premonitions of such an event, increasing centers of excitement here and there, murmurs and sobs; but tonight in an audience cold and still, suddenly a scream rent the air. It startled even the evangelist. For a moment, he did not connect it with his preaching; he thought perhaps somebody had been hurt, or vaguely pictured a white mob. Then he gripped himself and realized. A woman had arisen and was standing in the audience. Tears were streaming down her face and she had beside her a little boy fiercely clasped by the hand. A dark man was trying uncertainly to restrain her. The evangelist paused and then bent forward. He was himself again; he knew the symptoms. Here was the call, the demoniac possession, the frenzy of religious madness. It was typified by a woman who did not easily let herself go; who was struggling even now to keep back the silent emotion that surged within her. The evangelist stretched his arms; he was a big man and standing high in the pulpit loomed large over the audience. His vast voice rolled: "Come to Jesus," he said, looking straight at the woman, and she came with a swift rush dragging the little boy, frightened but unresisting, beside her, and leaving her husband. She came up the aisle and the intensity of her emotion, the trembling of her hands and the swelling of her hard-held sobs gripped the audience because they knew her. She represented all that they had been through: these awful days; the chain gang, murder, rape, mobs and fire, the horror of everything that was called "the race problem", and she represented, too, the hard hand which had held out against God all these years and now had been miraculously touched. A moaning swelled over the audience. It rose to a murmur and broke into a prayer with low obligato of strophe and antiphon.

BOOK III. Chapter III.

33-11-45

"Oh Lord (Hear her Jesus--bless His name) Receive this soul
(Bow down our knees--and bow our heart beneath our knees) that comes a-weeping to your breast
(Make a way, God--in the Sin Wilderness) Open your great arms, God (O crucified one--Open your arms) and take her in. Give her peace, God!
Give her peace (Wash her sin away--Save her soul) and wash her sins away in your own blood--your own blood, O lamb of God and Savior of all men."

Suddenly the bowed and praying woman looked up, dry-eyed and grim. The evangelist, watching her with narrowed eyes and only partial comprehension, stopped the waving of his hands and sudden silence fell. And the woman said, low-voiced: "I done seen him."

"Now what's coming," said the evangelist to himself. He was afraid she was a crank or crazy and that he might not be able to keep the spell which he had woven upon his audience. But he said, aloud:

"Speak, sister, testify."

And she said in a clear voice: "I saw Jesus," and then paused. She could not add that he looked like Golden Boy; that he was Golden Boy. She simply said; speaking clear and distinctly:

"I saw Jesus. I did not know before that people ever saw him. I thought they lied when they testified. But I saw him last night. I saw him plain, with his poor, crucified body all dust and blood."

A groan of pain shook the mass of kneeling folk.

"And He said: 'For give me', he said, 'when I knowed as I never knowed before that I was the sinner, I was the murderer. I, I alone had killed God.'" and she beat her breast and her voice rose louder about the rising tumult.

BOOK III. Chapter III.

"And Jesus said: 'Bring me a sacrifice that I may save me and mine. Bring me your first born and stretch him on my altar and let his blood and mine wash all the sins of the world away. And I've brought him and give this boy to you. Take him, preacher, and make him a man of God. A preacher of the word, that this Jesus may live again and all my people, my poor, black people, be saved." And falling to her knees, she worshipped for a second in ecstacy the vision of Golden Boy.

Rising quickly, she lifted the boy bodily and thrust him toward the evangelist. The scared child trembling stared on the sea of faces. The evangelist took him in his arms and soothed him. Then the preacher raised his great, harsh voice in staccato bursts of recitation:

"Shall I--be car-ried-to-o-the Skies on flow-ry --be-eds--of ease!
No I--must fight--to win--the prize and soul--thru blood--y seas!"

Then above the jerking explosion of the preacher rose the voice of the woman. She filled the interstices and spaces of recitation with pure music. This audience knew singing, instinctively it knew music, but somehow it seemed that never before had Friendship heard a voice like this. It was an immense voice and yet full of glorious harmony. And as the thump of the preacher's rhythm struck like a bared fist, the song of her voice swept on and up and its magnificent cadence shook the building. The audience went wild. The music of a thousand voices throbbed and swelled, and the evangelist in silence led them only with wild waving of his hands. There had been no such singing for many years in old Friendship.

Back in the rear of the church Old John loomed. He had glided silently in, hearing the singing and watching for his great grandchild. He stood there now softly cursing; long and low he cursed, for Little John was curiously close to the old man. They talked together, soberly and often. There had been no such bond between him and Golden Boy and Savannah resented it. She made herself believe that some evil influence of bad manners and godlessness might be the result of too close association between the two Johns.

Old John had apparently never noticed Golden Boy. It was not altogether the

BOOK III. Chapter III.

stain of his illegitimate birth. Old John was no crude stickler for morals. To him babies were babies and parents parents and he gave little weight to religious ceremonies. But he never liked Golden Boy. Perhaps as a man, he resented his beauty, or deeper than that, feared it. He wanted not so much to curb the boy, as to get his feet on the earth and hold him down from walking the clouds. He did not want to guide him, but he wanted the boy to guide himself by some solid landmarks and along real paths and over hard mountains. And when nothing of this seemed possible, he withdrew to the side and watched this brilliant phenomenon dance and laugh by, and crushed and concealed his own forbodings of the coming disaster.

32-11-47

But in Little John, he saw a jewel; a solid, good, little bit of humanity; he wanted only to breathe flame into him and tell him great wonder tales. Anchored to the earth by the very sturdiness of his physique, the boy should expand and grow and make his race a strong, fighting fist to smash the color bar and the miserable fortresses of caste. Now this had come, and Old John cursed softly and bitterly. He hated the church. He hated the meek and spineless Jesus. He despised preachers. He saw through the evangelist as through an open book. He laughed at his tricks and mannerisms. Yet there, high on the altar, with the voice of his mother singing below, with the arms of the church around him, he saw his little boy gripped and imprisoned and dragged down to his fate. He looked toward poor Dick Jones standing half-bewildered, half- where Savannah had left him. There was no help there. Dick dealt with iron, water and coal, not with feelings, dreams and souls. Old John strode out into the night, crying in his hurt. He whispered: " The whole damned world is wrong; whites are wrong; blacks are wrong; God or the Devil is going to burn this world down."

BOOK III.
Chapter ~~IX~~ 3

52-1137

There were two old men sitting in a summer house back of a mansion on Peachtree Road. On the porch of the house with its large and gracious facade gleaming white in the sun could be heard the voices of children--Millicent Eves, who was ten, and her companions; and the wail of Fred, the new baby. But in the summer house far in the rear there were only murmurs. The white man was 72--old, fat, doddering and irascible; the black man was tall, remote, full of regrets and memories and plans, but thin and ageless, despite his 70 years. He would say: "Next year, I'm going West where my father went." But he never went. At most, he walked to Marietta or Macon. Whimiscally, he would add: "When I was in London, I saw the King." Then Harvey Eves, his white companion, would burst out bitterly: "You ain't never been to London, you old fool. You know damned well you ain't."

"I see spring flowers over yonder." said Old John.

Harvey Eves sniffed. "Them ain't flowers; they'se the new skyscrapers. Air you goin' blind?"

"No, I'm getting second sight. I can see a heap these days--a heap."

"You're always tryin' to talk like a book. You know you ain't got no education. Now my wife--there was a talker and a reader."

"She didn'r read after you got her; she jest took snuff."

"And damn! but you ought to hear my granddaughter, Millicent."

"Bet she don't know how many cities I can see yonder."

"You don't see but on, you fool, and that's--Atlanta."

"I see 3 cities; a black one; a white one; and a white-and-black one--all different."

"You blacks don't count."

But the black man maundered on:

"Atlanta done throwed out railroads like wings, North and East and South and West."

BOOK III. Chapter II.

"Who ever heard of a bird with all them wings?"

"I have, and more. They's cherubims. There's lots of birds with four and six and eight and fifteen wings. I done seen them in the big woods in old times."

"You're a damned liar."

"Take back that 'liar', whitetrash, 'fore I bust you one."

"Git out--git out, leave me, you black son of a bitch. Always spongin' 'round here."

"Ah, don't go, John--don't leave me. I don't mean nothing. I ain't got nobody now. Rhett is too damned busy and Lucius and his wife think I'm dirt. Have another drink?"

Old John settled back in his chair and drank slowly.

"There's a heap of things I never did figure out about Atlanta. Somehow, I couldn't just exactly see what I'm looking at. There's always something half hid in Atlanta. For an instance, there ain't no market square."

"Atlanta never did have no market. She built herself around a depot."

"And made a railroad depot her God and worshipped it. And on the depot was the cherubim with the wings; the Wings of Atlanta."

"I don't know what you're talking about, nigger. But we Southerners always was ~~x~~ religious and God-fearing."

"No, just scared, plum scared stiff; devil worshippers who whoop and holler to scare off spirits. Just like us niggers. And they's lots more I don't understand."

"Ef thars anything you don't understand, I might explain it to you."

"All right. Now all this land, who made it?"

"Who made it? You damn foll, nobody made it; 'ceptin God."

"Then how did you and Rhett git it?"

"We bought and paid for it."

"Sure and you paid a man who didn't make and couldn't own it and you gave him half what it was worth, and what made it worth anything is the 150,000 all around who don't

32-11-3P

BOOK III. Chapter II.

own nothing."

"Oh, hell, you make me sick--listen."

Below came the sound of bells. No, it was the ring of iron clinking on iron. It was the stirring of convicts at eventide. They had been clearing the land and building roads and making way for new palaces of the rich.

"Your boy, Rhett, done made a heap buying and selling niggers."

"It's a lie. He's a contractor. The convicts ain't fit for nothing, but to be sold and worked."

"He made a heap, just the same."

"Sure did."

"And he's lost a heap, too, in Hoke Smith's panic."

"How did you know he lost money?"

"Riots don't make money."

"You are the God damnest, old, belly-aching fool I ever heard tell of. And if you think my Rhett won't make his pile again, you're crazy. They've made the price of convicts higher with their new fool rules and they beat hell out of his railroad stock. But you wait; he's got schemes."

"He made money out of the blood of one of mine down there. Powerful pretty boy. He ought to be killed for that."

"If you don't stop that talk around here, you'll get lynched."

A group of children ran back into the yard and stopped and stared.

"There's pappy," said a pretty little girl.

"And there's his old nigger," added another.

"I ain't your pappy, nigger, and never was," said Old John, placidly. "I never belonged to nobody and never will."

The mother hurried into the yard.

"Why don't pappy keep that nigger away from here. It isn't decent," she complained. She was one of the poor white Murray's and deathly afraid of her smart neighbor's judgment.

BOOK III. Chapter II.

Old Eves hated her. He had wanted Rhett to marry a lady born like his wife and he went and took up with one of the poorest of the poor whites.

"Shut your damned mouth," yelled Old Eves trembling with wrath; but Rhett came out. He was a smooth-faced, cold-looking man.

"Go on," he said briefly to the children, herding the children to the front yard.

Rhett Eves in 1910 was fifty-four and looked old. He had married in 1876 and had a son, Lucius, and a daughter. He had one object and that was power through wealth. He had disciplined himself severely. He neither drank nor used tobacco. His sex appetite was small. He was a member of the Baptist Church, careful in his orthodoxy; and he had been rich. He had made money out of the convict lease system and land ownership, but was hard hit by the depression of 1907. He proposed, however, to begin again to make money out of manufacturing and the control of labor. He despised his father, but tolerated him; and let this queer, old man be his companion. It was as cheap companionship as he could imagine. He glanced at them coldly.

"Don't make so much noise, and I'll have no swearing about here. Come to supper, Pappy, and you, John, go to the kitchen and eat all you want to," he said, crisply, and walked on.

The old, black man arose.

"Sit down," pleaded the white man. "Have another drink." But the black man moved away in the night.

"I'm going," he said. "I'm going to see what it's all about."

"What what's all about?"

"What all is all about."

"You'll get your fool head knocked off wandering around at night," yelled Harvey, as Old John disappeared. He went along the back roads like a ghost, shuffling softly in the dusk and came down through the valleys into the West side, crossing Peachtree Creek and the meadows, and at last came to a place where men were meeting and there was singing in the air.

It was in Darktown and in old Wheat Street Church a turbulent meeting was being held. The pastor had started the singing. He was P. James Bryant and had come to Wheat Street Church ten years before, following the almost deified Father Tillman at the age of twenty-five. And now the church had threatened to split on him. A bitter feud had torn it in two and Bryant was using all his power and finesse to hold it together. Bryant was a thin, wiry, black man, with sharply etched face, and he was fighting the great fight of his career; and fighting with him were a mass of women, and their weapon was song. Soon the wave of music filled the hollow where the Negroes lived and welled up toward the strongholds of Atlanta buisness and the residences of the rich.

BOOK III. Chapter II.

32-11-41

Hither John walked and stood and listened and afterward watched the bitter, quarreling and recrimmination. Far away to the North in New York there had just been a meeting in Carnegie Hall where Henry Watterson, Governor Hughes and Seth Lowe had presented Booker T. Washington, and a few months later in Boston, Trotter and his friends had rioted against Washington. Hitchcock was even now up yonder in an Atlanta hotel planning to buy votes in the Republican convention to nominate Taft. Tomorrow Taft will be nominated and in the fall elected just as Joe Brown will be elected governor and bring victory for the railroads. All this was seething around the fight in Wheat Street Church, and during the year thirteen Negroes were lynched in Georgia.

BOOK III
Chapter IV.

32-11-31

Judge Murray could never forget that visit of Savannah's pleading for her brother and his son. He always saw his own dark son in the chain gang sent by his own father for a political bargain. He was sure that the boy was bad. The testimony seemed too clear to doubt that; and yet he knew equally well that the testimony might be prejudiced and that certainly no white boy of the sort would have gone for ten years to the penitentiary; and he knew too that his own political ambition, the greed of Eves, had helped send him there. After some years, harassed by his own conscience, he tried tentatively to see what he could do to get Golden Boy pardoned; but the warden talked plainly to him.

"Do you know, that devil?" he said. "He is Lucifer; he is King of the Damned. He is the hardest, craftiest, meanest nigger in jail. It would be a calamity to loose him on the public. He ought to stay his full term, and if possible, I'll try to get him extra years."

There seemed nothing to do but await the boy's release and then give him money to go North and study and go to work under wider, freer surroundings. Meantime, the political pot boiled. From the city court, the judge had gone to the Superior Court bench. In the turmoil of 1906, he was running for the Supreme Court. If he won, he might be governor some day and even United States Senator.

But his campaign was not successful. He was offended by Hoke Smith's virulent attack on Negroes. He tried to hark back to that union of poor whites and blacks which Tom Watson had visoned in 1876. But Watson and the whites turned on him bitterly and (embraced) disfranchisement. His subsequent campaigning was poor. He seemed no longer able to make an effective appeal; his hands seemed palsied; and the zest had gone out of life. He was afraid, with deadly fear, and prayed loudly and much too long in his neighbors' opinion at the weekly Methodist prayer meeting. There was no doubt but that the judge was failing.

Then came the release of Golden Boy, his awful crime, the riot and the election. Judge Murray was defeated and he died. The physicians called it heart failure. His wife followed him, leaving only his daughter, who had married a fireman in 1895. They had two children; one, the boy, Fatty, who fought the battle with Young John on the streets in 1910; and a younger sister, whom they called "Sis".

BOOK III. Chapter IV.

32-11-32

It was an unhappy family. Grace Murray could never forget that her father had once been a great man and almost rich; that he had sat as judge upon the bench; and that if he had lived, he might have been governor; and that she had lowered herself by marrying a grimy fireman who came home black as a darky, and indeed, had to work at a job where Negroes also worked and got as good or better wages.

Her husband was bitter, too. It was intolerable that he should be working at a Negro's job, and the only way was to get rid of Negroes. They must not be permitted to become engineers, and that was accomplished by the Union many years before. But even now, they held their seniority rights as firemen; they got the same wages as the whites; and they kept themselves in place by being servile, and waiting on white engineers. That's the reason that the same white engineers, damn them! preferred black firemen. That's the reason he couldn't get promotion and better wages. There were, of course, other reasons; but Tom Hammond did not acknowledge them: he was not a good fireman; he didn't attend to his work; he drank too much liquor; and he loved to loaf. Thus all the more, Hammond's economic position and his wife's social regrets, converged into the Negro problem. He was one of the main leaders of the riot of 1906.

He and his wife were among those white laborers on the edge of subsistence. Continually they were thrown into competition with Negroes and were goaded to desperation in the fear of losing caste by being out-stripped by the more energetic and resourceful blacks. They discussed the Roosevelt-Booker Washington dinner in 1901 and considered it a crime against nature. They were beside themselves with wrath when Jack Johnson beat Jim Jeffries: first, because a black man had been allowed to pummell a white man before the eyes of the world; but more especially when this ape had married a white girl and flout her through the country.

The riot of 1906 took for them the aspect of a crusade.

BOOK III. Chapter IV.

3-11-33

"We killed a dozen of the damned niggers," said Hammond, as he came in drunk from the orgy with his arms laden with goods that he had stolen from Negro houses.

His wife was disgusted with him, with his thefts, but she kept the goods and nursed the hate, and finally, was compelled by his shiftlessness to enter the cotton mills and take a job as a spinner. Only in this way could she support the two children and hire a slatternly black maid which any white family must have to keep up the last shreads of appearances.

It was in such a world that little John was born. Old John had walked North to Marietta and far into the northeast along the mountains where he had led Harvey Eves' father to find gold; he saw the magnificent Falls of Tullulah again, saw them harnessed and choked and bound to make electricity for Atlanta and Georgia. He walked angrily away, and passing by the lynching of the Jew, Leo Frank, and came down again to Atlanta. White labor was striking against Negroes. Negro labor with its back to the wall had no corresponding leadership. Its leaders were trying to amass capital and become themselves hirers of labor. John was now a stocky, black, rather unstable boy, given to fits of enthusiasm and seasons of morose introspection. His fight with the white boy was symptomatic of the development going on.

The evolution of the boy was slow and fateful. At nine, he was interested in other children; he explored the streets; he liked the school, although a little timid at its harsh contacts, the pushing and crowding, the occasional fights which he avoided as much as possible; and the strange and largely unintelligible teachers. There were questions that he wanted to ask, but there were too many people and too little time.

His mother was worried about the schools. There were double sessions because there was not room enough in the schoolhouses for all the children who ought to go, which meant that most of the children received only a half day's schooling, when they ought to have had a whole day. And with classes of sixty, seventy and eighty, individual attention was impossible. There were not many books to ready, but he devoured his text-books, and as far as he could understand them, liked them.

33-11-34

At ten and eleven, the puzzle of caste began to intrigue him. Evidently there were beneath the sky two quite separate worlds; a white world and a black world. They touched each other here and there, but they never united. The things that you could do and say, the jokes you could pass, the laughter that you could have among black boys and girls, sank to gray silence when white boys and girls appeared. The whites sometimes yelled and jeered and threw stones at the black children. In such case, you must not yell back or throw stones in retaliation. This was law according to the teachers of the Negro schools. But why was it law?

Then there was strange demeanor on the part of white grownups. They were sometimes joking and affable and generous; and at other times, suddenly and for no apparent reason, cruel, angry and bitter. You never knew just why or when? If you went to white people's houses, you must carefully find the back door or the side door and take off your cap. This was not necessary when you went to the homes of colored people. But for some reason John always did it, just perhaps to keep the balance of his soul.

In 1911, came his first bitter sorrow in the death of his father and bereavement.

Tom Hammond became prominent in the new union movement against Negro firemen. ~~Negroes were not allowed to join the firemen's union movement against Negro firemen.~~ Negroes were not allowed to join the firemen's union, but under the leadership of Dick Jones, they formed their own union and began to negotiate with the railroads. This raised the fury of the white firemen.

Dick Jones, as president of his union, had fought a pretty successful fight. He had come to work for the Georgia railroad in 1905 when they first began to hire Negro firemen. Firemen then got half the wages of an engineer, but they increased the wages of the engineers, but refused to increase those of the Negro firemen, until pretty soon Dick was receiving $1.75 for runs for which white men received $2.77. Nevertheless, this was much more than he had been able to make before.

He was willing to join the union and so were the other black men, but the white firemen refused.

"I hope and pray that I may never live to see the grand old brotherhood of locomotive firemen so disgraced as to take into its protecting folds this class of God's creation."

38-11-35

The white firemen, despite the fact that they got more than Negro firemen, blamed Negroes for their low wages, and in 1909, the Georgia railroad removed white assistants who were getting $1.75 a day and filled their places with Negroes at $1.25 a day, and at the same time, gave Negroes equal seniority rights. Dick's wages immediately went up because he had already been working five years. The result was a strike, and the leader in Atlanta could hark back to the riot.

"We should have white supremacy," he yelled, and the city of Atlanta and the towns through which the firemen ran came to his aid. The Georgia railroad service was crippled. Witnesses were called in an effort at arbitration, who declared Negroes too ignorant to make good firemen, but the railroad defended their efficiency and admitted that Negroes were employed because they were cheaper.

"If we can get what we want cheap, is it a crime to take it?"

Finally, the arbitration board decided that Negroes must be paid the same rate of wages as white men, and the ~~conclusion~~ thought was that Negroes would thus lose their jobs.

The white locomotive firemen's league rejoiced. Negro firemen must go. Dick Jones rejoiced also ~~too~~ because he had held his men in place and increased their wages, although he knew the danger of the public sentiment that had been aroused. It was a ~~of~~ the fact that in view of this sentiment, Negro firemen were not good cheap investments for railroads.

Two years later, the white firemen on the Southern railroad struck, following a strike on the Queen and Crescent. It was agreed to hire no firemen north of a certain point on the line and to make a difference of 30% in the pay. An agreement was finally signed with all the Southern railroads that the percentage of Negro yardman would not be in the future larger than it was January 1, 1910. Thus the future entrance of colored firemen into employment was blocked.

From many railroads, the Negro firemen were ~~driven~~ entirely; but on the old Georgia road, Dick Jones kept his position and his seniority rights and fought back. But one thing broke his heart. He had always hoped to see his little son John succeed him as a fireman. Once had thought of that for Golden Boy, but Golden Boy was too glorious and walked on upper air; but Young John was sturdy and good and he wanted him to be a fireman. He clung to that even after Savannah had decided that he was to be a preacher. Now, however, he would probably have to be a preacher; no more Negro firemen could be taken on, and Dick's heart was near broken at the thought. 32-11-36a

32-11-36

It embittered Dick's soul when the railroads promised the white union to hire no more Negro firemen, as the present ones died. It meant that his boy could not replace him; it meant that a whole, lucrative job and place in industry was going to be lost to colored people. He fought bitterly against it; he tried to engage the interest and help of the colored people; but the more influential Negroes were thinking not so much of the interests of colored workers, as of the new interest of colored investors. They gave him but half-hearted support; perhaps more enthuasiastic support would not have availed against the growing bitterness of the whites. Even as it was; whites furiously resented the retention of Negro firemen, and began to attack from ambush the Negro firemen whenever and wherever they could be found; and so it was that some one shot and killed Dick Jones from ambush in 1911 as he passed through Cartersville on his engine.

Sorrow and disappointment, poverty and hard work, descended upon little John's family. Even the burial of his father was difficult. He had had an endowment insurance in the Mason; but they were in financial difficulties and did not pay. A little church funeral at night was all that they could afford. The grandmother, Jane, became more and more insane after the tragic death of Golden Boy, and the burden of family support after Dick's death fell upon Savannah. She bent beneath the burden of weekly wash, gathered at first from the richer white people, and paid for with reasonably good wages.

But when Savannah had to move from the little home they were buying from Perry to more unsightly slums, the richer whites did not want their clothes taken there, and Savannah had to work for poorer whites, less reliable, always complaining, often refusing or negglecting to pay. Then came John's fight with Fatty. It was a major disaster; it put Savannah in debt; it made her determined to take John off the streets and the public schools and put him in the grades at Atlanta University; and that was difficult.

32-11-17

BOOK III. Chapter VII.

In the midst of this, human beings gradually as inserted themselves in this life. He could not yet see quite clearly after that flash of blinding light in the Argonne, but he knew Old John was the tall, thin, black, wraith of a man who came and stood beside him and looked down upon him.

BOOK III.

Chapter VIII.

32-11-14

The white woman stood on her front porch looking eagerly and moodily across the street. She could almost see the Negro homes stretching out toward her, and they weren't what she had always called and looked upon as Negro homes. They were more pretentious than hers and neater, and better furnished. She was angry with herself and with the world, and particularly with the Negroes as cause of it all. It seemed to her somehow that it all had started when that black boy had beaten her little son and held him up to ridicule and torn his only decent suit of clothes. They had no right to put her in this position. Her family was just as good as the Eves. Her Aunt had married Rhett Eves. They would not recognize her now. She could not put her foot in their homes; she was no longer a judge's daughter, but the wife of a dirty fireman, and the fireman couldn't earn any more money, if as much, as some of the black men who were taking his work from him. The work in the mill was harder and called for longer hours. Fatty had left school, knowing scarcely more than how to read and write, and "Sis" was getting wild; and it seemed to her all on account of the Negroes. In fact, it was the anomaly of this situation, that whatever misfortune or ill-omened happened to Negroes, was charged up as the fault of the whites, and particularly of the poor whites; and whatever happened to the whites, was charged up as due to the Negroes, and particularly those Negroes who were getting rich and arrogant. The mill workers had been stirred almost to frenzy when in 1890 six colored spinners were put in their places. They flew to membership in the new organization and they quickly made Eves come to terms. Then they tried to demand shorter hours and higher wages, but in this they were soon and easily beaten.

Gradually the factories had been moved out of the cities to the smaller towns, a displacing of gardening and shrubbery, and a few pretty houses for officials on the front streets had been made; and then the whole town was put under the strict rule of the company. They owned the church and its minister; they owned the school and its teacher; they chose the police the textbooks; they selected the officers of the town; they made its ordinances; they

(1) (main) 41 32-11-15

Joseph Brown, candidate for the Senate, July 26, 1914, takes white labor to task because it is trying to organize labor. He claims that they are trying to raise the wages and shorten the hours of all Negro servants and Negro farm labor.

"Will you go with your present leaders into Negro affiliation and the labor degradation and probably war upon white employers which are its logical results?"

He quotes a letter from middle Georgia, that the Negro secret societies are trying to regulate the price of cooking, nursing, and picking cotton, and making a black-list of white people who are having a hard time to get washerwomen, cooks, nurses, etc.

Alexander W. Stephens, nephew of Alexander H. Stephens, denounces as scurrilous and willful, malicious, unmitigated lies, the charges that he is: "habitually endorsing Negro politicians," and that his personal tastes and inclinations are not along such lines.

The number of white people striving for jobs which had hitherto been those of black men, expanded; and Grace Hammond, standing on her porch, was in tears.

"I'd like to kill every nigger in Atlanta. If it wasn't for them, we could hang together and get better wages. By God, something has got to be done about this." And Tom Hammond, staggering home half-drunk, agreed with her.

But the respectable city fought the unrest of the poor whites. The white Baptist Convention joined the Employers' Association in 1914 and fought the printers' strike. The ~~x~~ strikes in the Fulton cotton mills in 1913 and 1914 were broadly stopped by the police and the courts. The union failed, and the newspapers misrepresented the facts.

But in one line, ~~the~~ a white union succeeded. The white barbers had long resented Jackson's dominance of the best barber trade and the stream of money that was going into his pockets. They organized a white union, and in 1914, got a license law enacted by the legislature, and the appointment of a board to pass on the qualifications of barbers. This board was of course white. In time, it would be composed of barbers, and gradually it would be easy to freeze out the colored barbers. Moreover, the colored barbers had one singular disadvantage; into their white shops no colored man could come. They must discriminate against their own. Colored grocers, colored doctors, colored ministers could all court and live on colored trade; colored barbers who catered to colored people had also a monopoly; but the richer colored barbers, with their white shops, could have no colored trade. It was a dangerous situation to defend before the growing consciousness of their own people.

In 1916, came street railway strikes with troops to stop picketing, until finally, by arbitration, the street railways recognized the Union. Atlanta was conscious of the world war only as it made better business.

BOOK III

Ch 10?

Chapter VIII.

It was dusk. Another one of those unbelievably georgeous sunsets which lights up Atlanta from the West. ~~Yet~~ young John had set out as was his want, ~~traveling at night time~~ on one of his long walks. The city ~~was used to him now; he was a sort of tradition, pointed out for his lean length and old-fashioned clothes, parched, but never dirty~~ figured from his Church, quite touched with it. He came along ~~the new~~ Ponce De Leon Avenue and Freddie saw him. Freddie was seventeen now and in the high school. He felt his manhood and he was slipping over to the Hammonds where he knew Sis ~~would be~~ was sitting on the porch. She was in the high school, too, and in his class, although a year or so older. She was plump and pretty, but cold and calculating behind her innocent, blue eyes, and brought up to laziness. Fred greeted ~~Old~~ John gaily:

"Hello, ~~pappy~~ John," he said, and ~~Old~~ John nodded, and watched him thoughtfully, until ~~he saw him~~ he turn down Piedmont Avenue, ~~but~~ Then he walked on toward Stone Mountain. Freddie kept on Piedmont to where it began suddenly to change its character, and where a city ordinance had tried to push back the on-coming Negroes with their threat to purchase homes next to a better class white district. But it was ceasing to be better classed. The Hammond's home which Grace had inherited from her father, had once been fairly pretentious, but now its site alone had any value; the house was old and sadly in need of repair. "Sis" was on the front porch in a dress which her mother had washed that afternoon, and had just finished ironing. The mother, tired, was sitting in the darkened parlor, drinking a bottle of coca cola, and the father stood sullenly by her. He was arguing:

"I wasn't going on that time; I ~~was~~ am tired slaving for these railroads for nothing; I ~~was~~ am going to find some way to make money, if I ~~had~~ have to steal it;" and then they both listened to Freddie's voice. Freddie stood close to "SiS" and had slipped his hand far up under her clothes. She made no movement, merely looking at him steadily.

"I've got a hundred dollars," he explained, "and we're going to have a swell cabaret celebration."

"Where did you get it?"

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

"Pa Jeff slipped it to me. He's made a killing in coca cola."

Tom Hammond pricked up his ears and moved closer to the window.

"You see," continued Freddie, "they're going to declare a big dividend when they meet next week, and that means the stock will go kiting. Jeff has got some money that he's going to salt down into it."

Hammond pulled Grace to the back porch and began talking excitedly.

"Here's our chance," he said, "if we could just raise some money now; if we could borrow another thousand dollars on this house, I could double it."

"How?" asked Grace, doubtfully.

"Didn't you hear what that kid said? That's inside dope. Coca cola stock is going up. If I buy $1,000 worth tomorrow, by next week it may be worth $2,000 or even $5,000, I tell you."

"I don't believe it. I don't understand it, and besides, we can't get $1,000 for this house; its mortgaged already."

"I know where I could," said Hammond, "and I'm going to do it, unless, of course, you want to keep playing the damned fool and refuse to sign."

So the talking went on; the quarreling on the back porch; the whispering and bold love-making on the front porch. But John walked steadily down to where a great new avenue curved and to where new palaces were rising, belonging to the new Atlanta millionaires. Ku Klux

He stood at mid-night on Stone Mountain and watched the burning cross. He saw the hosts of celebrants in sheets and pillowcases, and he knew that Simmons had resurrected the Ku Klux order and was going to make money at it, and was going to keep people busy, who might otherwise be busied with something else.

As the crowd began to scatter, he easily recognized Jeff Eves, and quietly walked down beside him. Jeff turned on him with a start, and then laughed:

"Hellow, grandpa," he said.

"What's this mischief?" asked Old John.

"Oh just to scare off bad niggers and Jews."

32-11-22

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

And John added: "And to make poor whites think they's doing something."

"Sure," said Jeff laughing, and then he became more serious.

"I say, pappy, do you know where I can get $10,000? You don't happen to have it, do you?"

"I've got more than that," said Old John. "I've got poverty and peace and the wide road," and he turned off to the North.

Jeff next found himself walking beside the city clerk, who looked upon the old nigger striding away with some suspicion.

"Oh, he's all right," said Jeff. "Just an old servant of ours."

And then suddenly the city clerk got confidential.

"If I had your father's endorsement for some contractors who are making a bid on the new city hall, I could clean up a lot of money for myself," and then he paused, grinning at Jeff; "and for my friends."

Jeff was all attention. Here perhaps was just where he could get the money he needed for investment in coca cola stock. He brought up the subject next morning with his father; diplomatically asking him first for a loan, which his father peremptorily refused.

"I don't mind saying, Jeff, that I'm making money just now; a great deal of money, but it's invested, and I can't realize on investments just now. There's a new era coming in this country, an astonishing one, and we who get in on the ground floor are going to have money, plenty of money; but I can't spare cash."

"Well I tell you what you could do, dad, if you don't mind. You know there's a new city hall; well there's a man I know who has just landed a good, fat contract, he needs backing. Now if you'll just endorse him; I mean, say you know he's all right; he can put the thing over and I'll share in the profits."

"Who is he?" asked Lucius.

"You don't know him, but I do, and I can vouch for him."

"All right," said Lucius, impatiently, and he gave the endorsement and hurried to the office.

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

The city clerk glanced at the paper and gave Jeff a check. It was for $5,000. He hooped; and that night gave Fred his hundred dollars for the high school celebration.

Fred took "Sis" to the cabaret, to Mrs. Hammond's great pride and to her husband's gratification. Warily, he pumped Fred during the long wait for "Sis" to dress. It had taken the last dollar he could scrape to pay for that party dress.

"I was thinking," he said carelessly, "of taking a little flier in coca cola."

"That's the stuff," said Fred, speaking importantly. "Jeff's been talking about it. You see the Board meets Monday, and they're sure to declare a dividend; a much bigger dividend than usual, because they have been making a pile of money lately. You know their incorporating now in Delaware. Why Jeff tells me they're spending a million dollars a year advertising."

"I know it," said Hammond, "and er--that dividend is pretty well settled, is it?"

"Sure thing. The directors are bound to meet. Most of them have already gotten their hotel rooms. I was down with Jeff to the Biltmore calling on one today."

Hammond was jubilant. That very day he had negotiated for $1,000. It had been hard work; but the real estate man to whom he was talking wanted to buy that corner, and he wanted it right off. Instead, therefore, of a second mortgage, he took a demand note from Hammond, signed by him and his wife, and then bought the first mortgage which was nearly due, and which formerly had always been easily renewed. Hammond got the thousand dollars and hurried to a stock broker. He loafed around a bit trying to look as intelligent as possible, and then said:

"I think I may buy some coca cola stock." The broker was eager.

"I'll tell you confidentially," he said, "that stock is going up like a kite as soon as the directors meet, and they are meeting tomorrow."

"I think I'll take ten shares," said Hammond, and laid down his thousand check.

"Say," he said, "why ten shares? Why not buy one hundred shares on margin;" and then he explained the details of margin buying and its mysteries.

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

"You see, when the shares go up, you can buy (one thousand) that you have engaged to buy, or you can buy more on margin. Coca cola is the biggest buy in the United States today. Why you might make yourself rich on this thousand." And Mr. Hammond bought one hundred shares on margin. On Tuesday morning, he opened the Constitution, expectantly. The meeting of the directors of the coca cola corporations had been postponed; some of them couldn't be present. No dividend, therefore, had been declared and it wasn't certain when they would be. The stock had come down several points, and might fall further. Someone knocked on the door. It was the little boy from the neighbor's house where they had a telephone and someone wanted Hammond on the telephone.

"I'm afraid, Mr. Hammond," said the stockbroker affably, "you'll have to put up a little more margin."

"How much?"

"Oh, 250, perhaps."

"But I haven't got it," said Hammond.

"You'll have to get it," said the broker, crisply.

Within a week the house was gone, sold out to the real estate agent, who rapidly transferred the land to a corporation for a ~~failing stock~~ filling station and made 50% on his investment. The Hammonds moved further down behind the homes of the well-to-do Negroes, and next to a Negro slum. The father lost his job as fireman, having neglected his work too long, and the mother fell sick and could not go to the mill. "Sis" had to give up school and become a mill worker and Fatty, leaving his odd jobs and long hours, became affiliated with the Ku Klux Klan to ~~secure~~ sell regalia on commission.

Meantime, young Jefferson Eves, about to invest $5,000 in coca cola stock, hears in the office from his fellow workers of a secret, inner deal. It seems that the dividend was to be declared, but it was just as easy to appear to postpone it, which would send the stock down. This would mean that persons who bought it could get it for a good deal less than what they would have to pay if they bought now or after the dividend. The meeting of the Board was postponed two weeks, and in the meantime, Jeff's $5,000 bought seventy-five shares, where it would have bought only fifty, and then when the dividend was declared, the price of shares shot up and Jefferson Long found himself worth at least $10,000. He was jubilant. He bought a new car and drove into the country. There was a favorite place down by the Chattahoochee where he like to loaf. In other days, he had courted his wife there, but she was too busy now for love-making, and it made no difference. After all, he wanted to plan. He went down Pace's Ferry road and then turned off to Power's Ferry, and crossing the narrow bridge came to a flat spot where he could watch the brown flood of the Chattahoochee. To his annoyance, two black men sat there. He got out of his car and approached them rather imperiously. They would probably go when they saw him coming. Then he recognized them. It was Old John and probably this fellow was that grandson of his, Young John. He greeted the old man and looked at the younger one curiously. He never before had had a chance to talk with a young, colored man of education; it rather intrigued him.

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

38-11-26

38-11-18

"Hello, you went to war," didn't you?"

"Yes," said John shortly.

"Well I got out of it, and I'm damned glad of it."

"You should be," said John.

Jeff glanced at him keenly.

"That draft board got you, didn't it? And by the same token it left me out."

"Hard lines for you? How did you like it?"

But John was silent. He never talked about the war, and Jeff recognized the symptoms. He had seen some young, white men get tight-lipped when they were asked about France. Indeed, a loud rumble on the bridge would have drowned out any answer that John had made. A coca cola truck was rushing by.

"There goes my fortune," said Jeff, (quietly) and Old John looked up.

"It looks like the river," said Old John.

"It is like the river," said Jeff.

"Listen, by Jove, that's not a bad simile. You know the flood of coca cola that's flowing with the (day) it makes a pretty respectable river."

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

"Sure, sure," said Old John, "and you wouldn't have thought it in the days when I saw it beginning."

"What!" said Jeff eagerly, "you know something about the beginnings of coca cola?"

"Sure do," said Old John. "It was back about '86. I was a boy of only fifty, and there was a fellow in a basement on Marietta Street who had a big idea. He thought he could make a drink which you could serve at counters and stop a headache, so he got me to help him. We put sugar and water together and added a little color and dope and called it coca cola, and peddled it around to drug stores. I had a pushcart and for a while I did pretty well, and sometimes he paid me. Then I began to find that the druggists were charging him pretty stiffly for his coloring matter and dope. Of course sugar and water was still cheap. So at last when he had run up a big bill with Candler, the druggist, Candler offered to buy him out, and he had to sell; and that's where I lost my job. Candler didn't take much to niggers."

"Well, well, that's a story," said Jeff. "I'm going to write that down and get you to give me some more details. I know the firm will be crazy about it."

"What happened then?" asked John.

"Oh, Candler pretty soon closed his drugstore about '92, and just went into the coca cola business. He sold considerably, but there was a lot of competition, and pretty soon the government began to snoop. They came down on him in 1916 for selling dope, and he had a hard time escaping government inspection."

"How did he do it?" asked John.

"Just changed his formula. Put in less dope."

"But it still contains cocaine, doesn't it?"

"Oh no, it has caffaine, which is about the same thing; but it probably doesn't have as much caffaine to the bottle as you find in a strong cup of coffee."

"No, we're both wrong there," said Jeff.

"So now all you have to do is to pay low wages and make money," said John, with a grim smile."

32-11-19

BOOK III. Chapter VIII.

32-11-20

"Not on your life," answered Jeff. "We can do better than that. We pay high wages, but we don't hire many people. We do it all by machinery."

"I have seen the miracle," said Old John. "That new factory out on North Avenue. It does everything but say words, and there mighty few people working about it."

"And then as far as I can figure," said Young John, "you come pretty nearly getting something for nothing."

"Well, there's something in that," said Jeff, " but who gives it to us? People don't have to buy coca cola, and if sugar and water is cheap and they want to pay 5¢ for it, whose got a right to stop them?"

"What I don't see," said Young John, is why competitors don't rush in and either buy you out of business, or drive the price down to a cent a bottle.

"Ha ha," laughed Jeff,"you don't understand. We've got the courts back of us. We've got a decree in the district federal court perpectually prohibiting any one from using the word"coca cola", or the word "cola" or scriptor lettering identical with that used by the company, or from supplying anything except coca cola to a purchaser, or performing any act or using any name, artifice or contrivance likely to cause any produce to be sold as coca cola. We can require soda fountains to handle coca cola only in the bottles we send to them, and to deal in no similar products."

"You got it sewed up, haven't you?"

"Sewed up? I should say so. The cotton mills have to give clothes for money; the steel mills have to give steel, but coca cola makes its millions out of soda and sugar, and still you can't touch it."

"My God, what are we coming to?"

"I know what I'm coming to," said Jeff, as he climbed back in his automobile, a little ashamed of his boasting.

"And so do I," said Old John.

BOOK III.

Chapter IX.

Mrs. Lucius Eves was more than disturbed. She was angry, and she said so.

"There, right opposite their home, was building a standard oil filling station. Indeed, vulgar trade had been increasingly encroaching on Peachtree Road. They built a depot; they built a lot of grocery stores; they put in hotdog stands and filling stations. It was impossible for self-respecting people to stay there.

38-11-27

Lucius tried to pacify her. He did not tell her that much of this business development in the midst of (residence) real estate was financed by the First National Bank, and that the whole trend of business toward Peachtree Street had been caused by the fire of 1916. Otherwise, business might have gone down toward Auburn Avenue and the Negro section, but that would have given the Negroes too much money for their land holdings. It was better to have the higher prices distributed among the already rich. And of course, Lucius meant to have a new home and a fine one; but there were difficulties. The city was expanding rapidly; there were nearly 100,000 whites, and over 60,000 Negroes in 1920, and what was more to the point, the number of telephones had doubled in ten years, and the postal reserves increased. Eight railroad systems clustered about Atlanta, and the new freight rates just granted by the Inter-state Commerce Commission put Atlanta on a par with New York and Philadelphia in shipping facilities. Atlanta could really become a great wholesale center. Indeed, there were one thousand national concerns in Atlanta's portals now, and the funds of fourteen states flowed through her banks. Three Hundred and Twenty millions in deposits lay in those banks and the clearings were approaching the fabulous sum of Three Thousand Million.[P] Atlanta was being advertised. A million dollars had been spent in the last few years, and as a result, three thousand conventions had brought eight hundred thousand visitors. There was no doubt about the golden future. The Apples of Hespesides lay all about. On the other hand, the labor situation was changing and getting worse in many respects. The Negroes were being forced down and out in many cases, even of the lower jobs. Unionism among white workers, which was to be held in check by the Negroes, was asserting itself; and while disfranchisement kept the vote of the city down to 16,000, union members already amounted to eight thousand, and that gave them undue and dangerous political influence. There was a bitter strike at the Piedmont mills in 1918, which was only put down by flashing the German spy charge against the labor leader. He was never tried, but the ruse worked. The school teachers went into the Federation of Labor; that is, the white school teachers. The railway clerks and telegraphers struck during the war, and President Wilson had to plead with them. And then in 1925, after a quarter of a century's fight, the millowners had had to submit to a child labor law. It wasn't such a strong one and it didn't make so much difference. Instead of low-paid child labor, they could use the stretch-out system and make the adult laborers work more machines each, and longer hours. A vast credit structure had been built upon a basis of real prosperity and golden hope, and if nothing untoward happened, Lucius Eves would be many times a millionaire, and nothing must happen. Now this morning; here came the ominous note; it seemed that his son Jefferson had got himself and his father mixed up in this city hall graft; a silly piece of plain stealing which was bound to send several political leaders to jail. It was the effort of the small fry and the stupid to get hold of money by graft, instead of ligitimate business. Lucius quietly paid Ten Thousand Dollars to hush up the matter of his endorsement of the contractors. The city clerk kept his mouth shut and went to jail; and then Lucius gave Jeff a talking to. But Jeff showed him his holdings in coca cola stock and promised greater care in the future. Meantime, wider and wider opportunities for expansion and vast profit came to Lucius and the First National. There was the bank Power trust. They were consolidating and covering the southeast. There were the rayon mills, almost a Southern industry. There were chemicals and furniture. It was a new world that Lucius was looking on. But they must anchor themselves to cash, and everything that brought in hard money as a basis for this credit investment must be nursed along. He put new machinery in his factories and cut down the wage roll. It made trouble; but in the already contracting demand for labor, the men did not dare strike. It was only "Sis" Hammond and the girls that she ran with that took a decisive step. They calmly quit work and went on the streets. There were any numbers of rich and near rich men who were willing to pay for their favors. Moreover, there was no use trying to earn enough to run the family in the mills. Her father now was drunk most of the time. The flare-up of the Ku Klux Klan had subsided and

BOOK III. Chapter IX.

BOOK III. Chapter IX.

the racket of furnishing them regalia was disclosed. Fatty lost his job and was loafing; and then when the frail mother realized the ancient profession which "Sis" had taken to, she simply laid down and died of the horror of it. Freddie Eves attended the Institute of Technology in the day-time, but at night, he ran with "Sis" and her pals, so long as he could borrow or filch money enough to pay the bills. There were other sources of cash profit which were brought to Lucius Eves' attention. He did not touch them directly; but indirectly, he financed a number of them. The Negro Savings Bank, for instance, was over-extended, but it had good assets, and Lucius helped force its failure and secure its cash and securities. The Negro Oddfellows formed a gold mine for litigation and receiverships. Lucius shared in this loot, and finally, when the Standard Life and the whole financial and industrial structure built upon it began to suffer, there was Lucius that furnished the money and got the grip upon the valuable assets there. And then still further afield, and much more indirectly recognized, came the bootlegging; the result of the prohibition law, coupled with petty gambling from the poor. This had to be carefully concealed. Lucius could honestly say that he knew nothing about it. He did know that he made loans at fabulous bonuses and high rates of interest that were paid regularly in cash. Nothing but bootlegging and gambling could have made such returns. But after all, that was not his funeral, or if it was, it did not seem to be in 1925. So the paper profit that lay before him on his balance sheets became astonishing. He was ten times a millionaire. After all, there was no reason for denying Mrs. Eves her natural ambitions. So when he went home that night, he took plans for a palace in Druid Hills. She was beside herself in joy; it crowned her ambitions. It would put the snobs of Charleston, Augusta and Savannah on the defensive. After all, Atlanta did not need traditions. She had the solid rock of wealth on which to build. And Mrs. Eves immediately began to work with those plans. They had started with the thought of spending $100,000; but as the plans developed, and the architect suggested, and Mrs. Eves social ambitions rose, the costs went to $200,000, $300,000. They might reach half a million. It was a beautiful creation, topping a sloping hill; its walls were marble, and its wood oak and maple and cedar. There was intricate iron grill work, stained glass windows, and a yard that recalled the little Trianon; there were cypresses and a swimming pool, a sunken garden and a forest. Flowers and lawns and shubbery and a box wood hedge that cost a fortune. Then within there were Chinese carpets and vases, Turkish rugs and Japanese bric-a-brac. There was silver and even gold plate and furniture that offered every temptation to rest and sleep and enjoy. Never had Mrs. Eves been sso happy in planning this house. Its opening was going to be a social event of the decade, and then in the midst of it, Freddie fell sick. At first, it seemed a little indisposition; he couldn't study; he wanted to stay at home. Then he was seized with serious illness. There was a defiant breaking out on his face, and at last the physician, who had shaken his head for some weeks, came out to the parents and told them the truth: Freddie had a severe attack of primary syphilis; it was an unusual virulent infection and he must go to a hospital for regular treatment. Mrs. Eves was beside herself. She had for the first time of Freddie's consorting with "Sis" Hammond and her pals and she wept:

BOOK III. Chapter IX.

3-11-30

"How can such shameless creatures live?" and then came what seemed to her a curious anti-climax: dinner was not ready; the cook was gone; the cook was dead; her husband had killed her to get money for gambling in the numbers.

pp. 1-7, 19-20, 22-24

WINGS OF ATALANTA

The Georgia legislature which met in December, 1870, was the same which had expelled its Negro members. The Negroes were back in back in voice and power and the Republicans had a majority in both houses.

First, there was the matter of the pay of the expelled Negroes. They finally received it all, $28,938. John had $1,000. It was more money than he had ever seen at once in his life. He took it down and put it in the bank and felt rich.

38-12-293

He had had little use for money. He had seldom handled it. When he worked, he got a few dollars in cash and the rest in food and clothes, or else he got the clothes and food and afterwards worked for it. He could understand and was vastly interested in the movement of goods and materials, the boxes and barrels and bales of cotton and sides of meat and fruit and coal and iron; but this money; he couldn't understand. It was mysterious. How it was made, how people got it in the first place, what they did with it and what a bank was for, that was a mystery in which he had not been interested. But now he was interested. He had $1,000. He felt at the same time both rich and afraid and he walked down to that office on Decatur Street where he had seen the sign, "Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company", chartered by Congress. He walked in and secured a bank book and then went out and in the evening got John to read it to him. On the cover was printed in large type: "National Savings Bank"; a Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company chartered by Congress; principal office, Washington, D. C.; branches in New York, Baltimore and all the principal cities of the South and Southwest. Then on the third page came this information:

"Colored Citizen's Savings Bank
Chartered by Congress, March 3, 1865

Abraham Lincoln's Gift

to the Colored People
His signature to the Bill one of the last acts of his life.

He gave Emancipation, and then this Savings Bank

Your freedom and prosperity were in his heart united.

Economy the Road to Wealth.
Save Your Money!

Save the pennies, and the dollars will take care of themselves

"I consider the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company to be greatly needed by the Colored People, and have welcomed it as an auxiliary to the Freedmen's Bureau."

Maj. Gen'l. O. O. Howard.

(Freedmen's Savings Bank, Fleming, p. 146.)

38-12-294

And finally his son read these momentus words:

"You have here presented to you the names of some of the best men in your country, who have gratuitously assumed the care and responsibility of a company for the safe-keeping and investment of your spare earnings.

"You are now on the same footing, as to your legal rights, with all other people of this country. You get your wages for your labor, and no one can prevent you.

"If you work hard you will earn money the same as other folks. Not one of you need remain poor if you are careful and do not spend money for candy, or whiskey, or costly clothes. As for food, cheap, hearty victuals--beef, fish, bread, coffee--will do for men and women better than pies, cakes, and such things which cost more money and give you less strength.

"Tobacco and Whiskey are the two things which all men who are going to save money must neither touch nor taste.

"Let us count the cost of a cigar and a glass of whiskey every working day. A mean cigar costs five cents, and the poorest glass of whiskey five cents, which makes ten cents.

"Now, if instead of worse than wasting this, you would save it every day--one Dime per day--at the end of one year, of three hundred and twelve working days, amounts to thirty-one dollars and twenty cents. ($31.20)...

"Now let us see how much a man, who saves ten cents every working day for ten years, will have if he puts it at interest:

"The first year he will have.....	$31.20
"The second year he will have.....	33.07
"The third year he will have.....	35.05
"The fourth year he will have.....	37.15
"The fifth year he will have.....	39.38
"The sixth year he will have.....	41.74
"The seventh year he will have.....	44.24
"The eighth year he will have.....	46.90
"The ninth year he will have.....	49.71
"The tenth year he will have.....	52.69

And at the end of ten years he will be worth in cash.....$411.13

"And all this from saving the price of a mean cigar and a vile glass of liquor every day! There is no excuse for any healthy man being poor in this country. The richest men in it began by small savings. The merchant, Billy Gray, of Boston, saved his first dollar by carrying bricks. Then he added another and another to that, and saved the interest, and put that on interest, and at last had many millions of dollars."

(The Freedmen's Savings Bank, Fleming, pp. 147, 148.)

At last John understood. Here was the revelation. He took his $1,000 down and put it in the Freedmen's Savings Bank. In ten years, when he was 50, he would have enough to make him comfortable for life; and perhaps, like Billy Grey of Boston, in some mysterious way, he might be rich.

38-12-295

The Negroes were busy. First, they tried to be magnanimous , and following Senator Campbell, voted pay not only to the expelled Negro members, but pay to the white members who had illegally taken their places. It made the bill for salaries enormous and in after years this was credited to the extravagance of the Negroes, rather than to their generosity toward the whites. But especially were the Negroes interested in two things: in schools and convicts, in presenting state legislation toward education for all and in stopping or ameliorating the new slavery imposed by the courts.

(1) In this session of the legislature, many Negro Senators and Representatives introduced bills on education. Senator Campbell had a bill for a "thorough public system" and a lengthy resolution describing how money for education was to be secured. Senator Bradley was interested and his proposals for amending the bill went through were accepted. When there was insufficient money for paying other government expenses, Representative Porter made the motion to postpone the payment of funds for education which was adopted. Representative Clower attempted to increase the appropriations for education and Representative Golden of Liberty County tried to require all barbers to pay a tax of $50 a year for educational purposes.

On motion of Phillip Joiner, a Negro representative, it was proposed that an appropriation of $100,000 should be used to make Atlanta University a state institution, or to establish some other institution nearer the black belt. The former Governor's mansion at Milledgeville was proposed, but no action was taken. After considerable delay, the legislature put in operation a public school system providing equal facilities for both races and two higher institutions, Atlanta University and the University of Georgia were to receive $8,000 each from the state annually. The capitol and mansion at Milledgeville Schools became a reality. The Reconstruction legislature with its black members pushed the public school system and a Board of Education was elected in 1869 and the charter amended in 1870 to allow for school taxation. In 1872, three schoolhouses were completed and the public schools opened. Clark University was opened in 1869 and purchased a campus in 1871. The Atlanta Baptist Seminary, which had been started in 1870, was finally moved to Atlanta and consolidated with a similar school, and in 1877 this institution became Atlanta Baptist College which finally changed its name to Morehouse College. Colored men became prominent in various ways.

38-12-296

It was Clairbourne, John's son-in-law, who noticed and fought two insidious tendencies: first, the courts were not only beyond the power of the Negroes, they were beyond the power of the poor whites and in the hands of the planters, and the planters proceeded to use them to put Negroes back in slavery.

All the Negroes in the General Assembly were keen to correct the management of convicts in jails in the state. Turner offered several resolutions for reform and served on a committee of three to confer with the keeper of the penitentiary. Senator Wallace and Representative Sims served on a joint committee to ascertain how convicts were treated. Peter O'Neal wanted to abolish the penitentiary system. As a result of these efforts, some changes were made in methods of punishment and the pressure caused Bullock to issue many pardons for which he was greatly blamed.

Sims was the most energetic fighter for better conditions for the convicts and offered bills on that subject and for the preservation of order on election days, to incourage immigration, to regulate fees and costs and other matters. Some of his bills were passed.

They began leasing convicts and afterward the carpetbaggers helped them. Clairbourne and Sims and others investigated the jails, and insisted on pardons for the innocent and over-punished. Clairbourne also noted another thing: the crop lien system which had slipped in during the early efforts at Reconstruction before the Negroes could vote. This astonishing evoking of property rights out of nothing began with the law of 1866 which permitted railroads to mortgage the crops of their tenants, even though the crops were not yet planted. Thus indebtedness for stock, tools and food was secured by a crop yet yet to be raised. In turn, the planters were allowed to give liens to merchants for the purchase of food and fertilizers. This gave the landholders a strangle hold upon labor and material, and Clairbourne knew and resented its possibilities; but he did not realize how far this was destined to go. Before that, he died. It was a shock to John and his first facing of the problem of brute force. Malcolm Clairbourne had just offered bills to make fathers maintain their bastard children and to prohibit the sale of lottery tickets and to stop the use of the chain gang on public works. Warren and Turner supported him and the three bills were accepted. The day after Clairbourne presented his bills, he was killed by the white messenger of the House. Clairbourne had accused him of discharging a colored page and replacing him by a white boy. The messenger was incensed and shot Clairbourne on Marietta Street near the Henry Grady school. The House expelled the messenger and turned him over to the civil authorities. A committee of three, including Turner, was appointed to make arrangements for the funeral. Robert Lumpkin in Macon County died during the sesson. He introduced no bills, but was faithful and his loss was keenly felt.

The House passed a strong resolution of condolence to"a faithful representative." Clairbourne had to be buried quickly because of the decomposition of the body. The Reverend Mr. Peck of the A.M.E. Church performed the services and the body was taken at once to the cemetery.

Still the Negroes toiled on with their efforts.

Turner offered a bill to establish a state police, to appoint chaplains for convicts, to donate lands for the orphans home, to enable women to vote, to use the state buildings at Milledgeville for educational purposes, to regulate fees in various counties, etc.

The House adopted his resolution extending sympathy to the people of Richmond after the fire.

Senator Campbell introduced numbers of bills touching the jury system, the government of Savannah, and all other towns, establishing district courts, incorporating railroads, etc. Most of these bills were favorably reported. Campbell served on the committee to confer with the City Council of Atlanta in regard to the new capitol building.

38-12-298

But as John soon sensed, a new power was rising and new alignments of the older sources of power. First, the carpetbaggers, led by Bullock and Kimball and supported by Negroes and the poor whites, began to forge toward industry and money-making. An initial effort was to entrench themselves in the legislature for another two years. They had a plausible argument. The legislature, although elected for two years, had been for most of that time irregular because of the expulsion of its colored members. All of its acts were illegal and had to be reenacted, as, for instance, the acceptance of the 14th Amendment. Under such circumstances, it was plausible to say that the legislature should last two more years. It was a temptation to the members because evidently a new alignment of political forces might eliminate the Negroes and many of the poor whites in the next legislature and put them back in the hands of a new political alliance, if the present legislature had a chance to accomplish its work and entrench its position; and at the end of that time, they might be able to make a popular appeal.

The colored Senator Campbell thereupon sought to prolong the legislature by declaring that no election should be held until the representatives elected to Congress should be seated, which meant that the election would be postponed until Congress met in December, 1871. This bill passed the Senate, but was defeated in the Lower House. Moreover, the Senators elected in 1868 were finally seated in Congress.

Bradley and Wallace, the colored state Senators, believed that no election was necessary and that the two Senators elected before should hold their seats, but the legislature decided on new elections. Meantime, the colored Senator Campbell asked that all court proceedings in the state be suspended until the judiciary was reorganized and civil government restored. This was not acted upon, but the legislature had to adjourn from February until April so that Congress could complete the re-admission of Georgia. Bullock, then, aided by Butler in Congress, tried to prolong the state legislature two years beyond the time it was originally elected and because of the delay in recognizing Georgia as a state. This would have prolonged the hold of the Republicans, but Bingham in Congress prevented this, and finally, July 15, 1870, Congress explicitly declared in the admission act that the people of Georgia were not to be deprived of a right to elect a new legislature according to the constitution.

John wavered; he did not know how he ought to vote. It was unfair to be elected for two years and allowed to serve only six months. And yet, the constitution required an election every two years. He was offered money; it did not seem at the time wrong to take it. Kimball met him and slapped him on the back and they drank together in a Decatur Street saloon.

38-12-299

"Well, how about your vote on extending the legislature?" asked Kimball.

"It only seems fair," said John slowly.

"Fair, it's right; it's just; it's the only thing to do. I tell you frankly, boy, either we hold this legislature in power or you Negroes go out of power forever."

He sat down his glass and turned away.

"Oh, by the way," he said, "how are you all for money? I'd be glad to make you a little loan. Take this. Don't mention it."

And he handed John $50. John thanked him profusely and then looked at the bill doubtfully. It seemed a friendly act, but afterward, it seemed perhaps a bit too friendly. Suppose now he had been given this money for while he was hesitating over a bill he knew was bad. Law-making couldn't be carried on that way; but he added the $50 to his horde in the bank.

While the question of prolonging the legislature was being debated, many attempts were made by Democrats to bribe Negroes to vote against the prolongation, but they would not accept bribes. Alexander Stone of Jefferson County particularly refused in a special committee investigating his case. It was shown that Stone had received a gold watch costing $100 from a state official, but this, it was proved, was given Stone by his friends, for his firmness and fidelity in opposing prolongation, and the funds were subscribed after prolongation had been defeated August 12 and the watch was not presented until August 16. The House openly declared Stone free of all charges of bribery by a vote of 100-10. But among the ten were three Negro representatives.

When the effort to prolong the legislature was killed by congressional action, Bullock and his friends got busy. They hadn't long to last and they knew it.

First and foremost, there was the matter and the pressing matter of railroads. Whatever Atlanta meant and stood for was because of its railroads. With the railroads in good condition, its fortunes were made. Now the key line, the Western and Atlantic, had been wrecked by Sherman during the latter part of the war, but Jenkins, the provisional governor, appointed by President Johnson, had spent over $3,000,000 in appealing and restoring it. It paid into the treasury a sum of $25,000 a month, supposed to represent its profits, but this was really only a small part of the profit, but large enough to appease the curious or the critical. The rest went to those who were manipulating the loan. Bullock and his friends proceeded to get in on this graft.

38-12-300

(6) First Governor Bullock appointed a political henchman, Foster Blodgett, Superintendent of the Road. He used the road to pay political debts and accumulated a debt of nearly $1,000,000 through waste, stealing and unfit officials. This brought protest, but not so much protest against graft as question as to who was going to get the graft. ~~It was determined to lease the road to private parties.~~ The road was sure to make money if handled rightly. It was a heavy freight carrier and the freight that came down from Chattanooga was distributed over three different railroads closely connected with it. All these paid good dividends.

The only way to handle the situation seemed to be to lease the road to private parties. This did not mean that the state would get the profits which it ought to get from its own road, but it did mean that its profits would not be distributed exclusively to that part of the political hierarchy that was at that time ruling the state. The planters were moving for some share in this new set-up.

The legislature lasted 328 days, but cost the state $979,000. Bullock's printing and contingent funds were extravagant and indicated graft, but the pay of the members of the legislature, $9 a day, was established by the Johnson administration and not by Bullock.

38-12-301

The colored representatives in the legislature in 1871 and thereafter worked for the uplift of the Negro in many directions. There was James Porter, interested in religious matters, but crippled by an accident and unable to go as a missionary as he had wished. Before the war, he was connected with the underground railroad and secretly taught school. Then he became music teacher and trained a chorus for a white Episcopal Church in Savannah and finally became a school principal. He published an English grammar for beginners. In the legislature, he tried to organize ~~x~~ volunteer military companies to advance education, to better the jury system, and to enforce the Federal Civil Rights bill.

T. G. Campbell, son of Senator Campbell, was also a representative and worked for education and the reorganization of the codes, but he was rather unreliable and often found drunk. Many other bills were proposed by various colored representatives, two that were passed were to help the Columbus railroad and to receive seats for ladies in the gallery. Another representative proposed to strike out the word "white" wherever it occurred in the code of Georgia, but was unsuccessful.

O'Neil of Baldwin County tried to get bills for better selling and enforcing the payment of wages to agricultural laborers and abolishing the convict system. These were defeated. Costin served on more committees than any other Negro, but introduced no bills. Certainly, the Negro representatives played a constructive part.

~~and~~ Robert Toombs was mad. He wrote to Stephens:

("I went to Atlanta to see if I could be of any service in the present coup d'etat of Bullock and his conspirators. It is a hard job. He is perfectly (~~ruckless~~ reckless,) ~~justly~~ supported by the military, stakes all upon success and offers all the offices, places, money and the plunder of the people for help to aid him to obtain the dictatorship of the state.") looking and healthy; he did not get drunk, at least not regularly, and he worked hard. He did not waste her money and he did not interfere with reasonable liberty on her part, so far as she could calculate. They were married in the fall of 1881 and in 1882, their daughter, Savannah, the second Savannah Eves, was born. Millicent chose the name. It intrigued her. Rhett had no particular feeling one way or the other, since the baby was a girl. He had heard that once he had an aunt of that name; but Harvey, the grandfather, was rather vehement in his initial objection and then suddenly said nothing.

38-12-302

The great machine of the new South had scarcely started on its new career and the whirrof its well-oiled engines had not long been audible when also one could hear opposition. It was manifest, first, in the constitutional convention of 1887. The rulers of the state had put off suggestions of change in the basic law as long as seemed feasible, but the railroad situation among other things forced them to do something.

25) "The favorite practice of reconstruction was for 'carpetbaggers', financed by Wall Street brokers, to buy up simultaneously the stocks of the railroad companies and the members of the state legislatures. The legislatures would then vote milliones of dollars in bonds or endorsements to the railroad companies, and the political officials would divert most of the proceeds into their own and their confederates' pockets. This practice continued until the panic of 1873 made such securities unmarketable." (Hawkes, Economic History of the South, p. 490.)

Graft, therefore, in Georgia, especially looked toward the railroads. It was a well-known form of stealing throughout the United States. The function of government was to make roads. If roads, paved roads, and now iron roads were promoted by private persons, the government helped, and instead of effecting its ownership and even its part ownership, it turned over the whole profits of the undertaking to private parties. It was, therefore, the business of private parties to get the government to appropriate as much money as possible. This was complicated in Georgia by the fact that the government owned a railroad.

There were some $4,000,000 worth of bonds sold under Bullock concerning whose validity and the disposition of the proceedings there was great argument and much recrimination. It figured in the charges against the Bullock regime, but it was not confined to that regime.

There was in 1872 a question as to whether the railway bonds sold in New York should be repudiated or not. These bonds consisted of currency bonds and gold bonds with which to redeem them. Some $3,000,000 worth of gold bonds were issued and the state proposed to repudiate them cheaply because they were in the hands of Northerners and of Bullock and Kimball. Ex-Governor Brown wanted to compromise, but Toombs, Ben Hill and Wadley wanted to repudiate them. In August, 1872, the legislature declared null and void the endorsed railway bonds and others designated by the Investigating Committee and in 1877, payment of the bonds were declared illegal by the constitutional convention.

38-12-30

The constitutional convention of 1877 provided for a railway commission which was established in 1879. Freight rates were lowered somewhat, but discrimination continued in favor of the cities at the expense of the way stations. A city dealer could ship his cotton from a great distance at less expense than the farmer or merchant along the way, and the same thing applied to goods purchased. The new railroads were fleeced by inside construction companies with lucrative contracts and bonds were issued far in excess of the assets and the proceedings squandered upon accessive salary and absurd improvements. The Central of Georgia built elaborate parks with flower gardens and running fountains at small and unimportant stations. Thus original investors were frozen out and the road forced into bankruptcy. Reorganization would follow and the stock was heavily watered and sold to the public. Much of the railroad mileage in Georgia was built by the wages of thousands of small investors and then stolen by financiers without sanction of the courts. In the midst of this, the commission was powerless and had to permit rates high enough to yield reasonable dividends on stocks, water and all.

(28) Other large corporations, especially insurance companies, did the same thing, and throughout the country trusts began to make their appearance.

The farmers bore the burden of taxation. Personal property escaped its share. Atlanta in 1898 valued all its watches, jewelry and plate at only $108,000 and although the largest distributing center between Baltimore and New Orleans, it had in 1890 only $3,000,000 worth of taxable merchandise. Many counties, supported by the (supply) business, reported no merchandise at all. Atlanta had only $400,000 of merchandise in 1890. Railroads, although generally required to pay taxes after 1877, paid nothing to the counties

John sensed the change that was coming and the power outside of politics that was ruling. He watched it and although he knew little of its theory and of the great influence throughout the country and over the world that was behind it, yet he saw it in detail more accurately and understandingly than most men. And the view of it and the unerring intuition of its meaning began in him that paralysis of effort and indecision and tendency to withdraw as a spectator which characterized his later life. What after all could one do? He toyed with the matter of armed resistance to the growing use of fraud and force, to keep Negroes from voting and from holding office. Their numbers in the legislature dwindled sharply. There were few Negroes in any administrative office of any importance. They were over-looked, perhaps too elaborately for the real truth of the matter, and yet effectively. They had no power; they could exercise no power, and any point or place where in anger or deliberation they showed resistance, immediately overwhelming force was brought to bear; police, Ku Klux, mobs. And yet in secret and for many years, John talked with men who wanted to fight with the turbulent and yet wary Turner who had turned from politics into the church, and yet retained his leadership. They sat often in the back room of one of the Negro saloons in Decatur Street. They went over the question as to what could be done. John, despite his illiteracy and because of his life-long acquaintance with Atlanta and his peculiar and personal knowledge of so many of the chief figures in the dilemma, gained considerable hearing and a certain accendancy.

Then John received a blow in many respects more shattering than anything he had experienced. In all this fight, he had depended upon the powerful North. It was an indefinite and vague thing, but it stood for righteousness and justice and fair play. It was intwined with the momentus name of Abraham Lincoln. It had made men free; it had put down the mighty from their seats and exalted them of low degree. His confidence in life, his dream of an old age of leisure and independence, had gradually and increasingly been built upon that $1,000 in the Freedmen's Bank, but there seemed to be some trouble in the Atlanta branch. The Reverend Phillip D. Cory, cashier, was not as pleasant or affable as former cashiers when John went to have his interest entered. Cory had broad and ambitious plans. After all, money was money. Why talk or think of a Negro bank? It should be just a bank and of course predominantly a white man's bank. He distinctly encouraged white depositors. This alarmed and drove away the Negro depositors and the branch did not thrive. John was among those who secured his removal in 1874 and put a Negro in his place and the Negro came to John and others in alarm. Ten Thousand Dollars of the deposits had disappeared; embezzled by Cory. They prosecuted him in the courts and he was sentenced to prison, but pardoned and given an appointment as an Indian agent out West when he promised to repay what he had stolen, but it was unnecessary, because later the same year the Freedmen's branch in Washington, branches and all, failed, owing believing black folk $3,000,000 of their hard-earned money, and in this was John's $1,050 and its accumulative interest.

38-12-304

38-12-305

They paid him back $300 in 1875, but he gave it to the mother of Golden Boy to educate him at Atlanta University. Three years later, in 1878, he received $150 and gave it to little Jane to start her in school. In 1880 there came $150 more and in 1882-1883, other driblets, but John had lost interest. He squandered the money and gave it away.

It was, of course, cast on the side of moderation and care. They were proposing to fight superior numbers, superior organizations, superior guns and ammunition, and above all, superior wealth.

"That's the thing," John reiterated, "this here money. We've got to have it. We've got to get in on this new power. We've got to be merchants and traders."

"But we can't own railroads," objected Turner. "We can hardly discover more mines and we can't work cheap convicts. We don't know about cotton weaving and spinning and how can we learn?"

"No," admitted John, "we can't get in on some of these big things, but we can be storekeepers and buy and sell. We can be lawyers , doctors and preachers; we can form the rank and file of this industrial army and have voice in elected officers, and determine what to do."

Turner doubted it. "Officers ain't elected," he said.

John went home and went home to one of those startling changes that came now and then in his life. He lived with his son and their little girl Jane, born in 1872; a rather sad-faced, quiet, dark little thing, with close crinkled hair. One could be sure that she was born to endure and yet to hold steadfastly to such part of the world as came within her hands. She had a singularly musical voice. John's daughter, Savannah, called after her mother, had been a widow since Clairbourne was killed in 1869; an unwilling and bitter widow, a beautiful rebel against hate, and it was in 1878, nine years after the death of her husband, that she came back home. She had been working at service in Atlanta in one of the newer mansions which expressed the pretentions of the new rich. She came home and brought a baby, born in 1878, a gorgeously beautiful boy, golden, big and healthy. She looked her father squarely in the face and showed him the baby.

38-12-306

"I didn't know you'd married again," he stammered.

"I'm not," she said calmly; and more than that, she added: "It isn't necessary to find the white man who seduced me. He didn't seduce me. I wanted a child and I have it and I can't see that it's anybody's business."

There were many things that John might have said and thought of saying, but they did not seem of any particular importance. He took the boy in his arms and cuddled him. He and the boy remained close friends, but little Jane kept apart and John, Jr.; and his black, morose wife said nothing. It was not exactly a happy family living there in the old fourth ward, and yet they got on together.

Meantime, in accordance with John's thought, the Negroes, forced more and more out of politics and political influence, tried to make alliance with the new commerce and had varied success.

The Negroes felt the new commercial and industrial impulse, but an entry into industry was difficult. Employers must not too greatly offend the poor whites by giving them Negro competition in the better paid jobs, but on the other hand, they could keep the wages of the poor whites down by threatening such competition. The Negroes were to be kept on the farms as far as possible and in the city used mainly as common labor and as servants. In the smaller semi-skilled industries, they were widely used, but at low wages. There seemed, however, a chance for them to enter the industrial field as small contractors and capitalists, although the lack of credit facilities and of political influence made such attempts hazardous.

pp. 1-12

C

32-11-66

John Block was a young Union soldier from the West who walked in with the earliest of Sherman's patrol. He looked at Atlanta with a careful eye. It was a place where he would like to settle. He liked its high hills and vista, but especially he liked its railroads and its evident flair from business. He dropped into Harvey Eve's store and sat there loafing, fingering his musket and talking with Harvey. Harvey was only too willing to be communicative. He did not know just which way to jump, but he was strongly inclined to get on the right side of the Union soldiers. Under promise of deep secrecy, he imparted the knowledge to Block that he had enlisted in the Confederate army and marched out a ways, but had calmly deserted and returned to his business.

"It wasn't any war of mine," he said.

Then Savannah came in. She was fifteen, fresh and pretty, and it had been a long time since Block had met womankind. They had a good deal of good honest chaffing and Block promised to return. He did return the following year with $25,000 in his pocket which he had brought from his home, St. Louis, the whole of his capital. He meant to stay in Atlanta and make a fortune. He met Joseph Brown and talked with him and heard from his lips what had been going on. The planters only the year before had hurriedly got together under the direction of Brown and at Milledgeville with the idea of taking up the affairs of the state as though secession had not occurred, but Federal soldiers interfered. Then came Johnson's provisional government. Brown leaned back and talked about them: three hundred old men and politicians, all planters and their satiates. They quibbled about the results of the war and set forth their claims for emancipated slaves.

"I didn't accept office from them and neither did Stevens. They met again as a legislature and passed a black code which stirred up Congress, although I kept out it's worse features."

"How about the Negroes?" asked Block.

"Well, they're worrying us a bit and being stirred up by somebody, but we're keeping careful tab on them. Of course, we had to recognize them as citizens and immediately they began to settle. They have already held a big convention in Augusta with one hundred delegates and formed an Equal Rights Association. But they didn't ask universal suffrage."

38-11-87

"They looked wise," said Block, and then he began to talk about investments. Brown encouraged him. He told him about the railroads, about the manufactures that were bound to be restored, and particularly the trade, North and South. Block went away thoughtfully and in a little while had found and re-visited Savannah Eves.

Together in February, 1866, they went to the mass meeting at City Hall. It was a turbulent meeting of white folk and difficult to keep in order. The Radicals, started by Colonel T. C. Howard, aroused the Extremist element and resolutions were passed to appeal to the Supreme Court against the Reconstruction acts. Next month, the city was extended from a mile to a mile and a half in every direction from the passenger depot and then a year later, the legislation laws of March, 1867, burst like a thunder clap upon the city. Toombs returned from Europe. The Negroes hasten to Macon for a great meeting at Rose Hill cemetery; a third gathered and opened services by singing on "Jordan's Stormy Banks, I Stand", and the new leader appeared, Henry M. Turner. They marched with flying banners, one of which said: "As we have got to live and vote together in one state, let us be friends." There was good order, but the meeting was evidently radical and endorsed the Reconstruction legislation. It was followed a week later by a counter-demonstration in Savannah with many white Southerners, including ex-Governor Johnson on the platform, and ten days later, a third meeting in Augusta with the same set-up and with more Conservative reaction.

General Pope arrived and in April set up headquarters in Atlanta. He immediately appointed a Board of Registration in each of the forty-four military districts to be composed of two white men and one colored man, but purposely he put almost complete power in the hands of the whites by leaving to them the choice of their colored members. Registration was ordered immediately and the election for the last three days of October. The whites, taken by surprise, divided sharply in open. Ben Hill and the planters advised the whites not to register and to vote against the convention and if in spite of this there should be a convention, to vote against any constitution which it might draw up. Joseph Brown, the last pre-war Governor, was more canny. He met Block on the street and talked it over.

"There's no use of opposing Reconstruction," he said, "or trying to restore the power of the planters. I have trained out planters but I'm a poor white and Atlanta is the new kingdom of the poor whites. Now what I say is that it is foolish to let the Negroes and carpetbaggers win a victory unopposed. There is as many blacks as whites registered in the state, not counting, of course, the ten thousand planters and ex-Confederates who are disfranchised. Sixty thousand of the whites registered, but did not vote; twenty-four thousand Negroes did not dare vote. Nevertheless there were 100,000 votes for the convention and only four against it. Moreover , the significant thing," said Brown, "is this: the convention is going to meet in Atlanta and not in Macon and not in Milledgeville and of course not in Savannah. It's a new day."

It was a new day, not simply for Atlanta, but for the Negro. Atlanta had now a population of twenty-two thousand and of these less than twelve thousand were whites. Nearly as many Negroes as whites had registered as voters in the city. Atlanta was fast becoming a Negro city.

The whites got together again in January, 1868, and held a meeting at City Hall, inveighing against the convention and against the evil councillors around General Pope. This meeting was especially to impress the new Commander, General Meade, in order to stop payment of the $40,000 needed by the convention in order to meet. Meade was very cordial and courteous to the committee, but he ordered the $40,000 paid.

So the convention came to Atlanta December 5, 1867; A kind of meeting unheard of before in the history of Georgia. There were 170 members of whom 29 were Negroes and 33 of Negro descent; that is, four of the Negroes were so white that there was no way of proving their Negro blood. The scalawags, carpetbaggers and Negroes together had a majority of the convention, or, to put it another way, the convention was dominated by ex-slaves, native whites who joined the Republican Party and Northern whites, who had been Republicans. Notwithstanding this, exc-Governor Brown, although not a member of the constitutional convention, dominated it. He helped prevent discriminatory measures against the whites and as he said, secured a good constitution, disfranchising no whites beyond the requirements of the national legislature.

The convention was chiefly interested in suffrage, the work of relief and education. The Negroes took a large part and acted intelligently and with foresight. They appeared with few exceptions well-dressed and well-behaved.

In the campaign, the Republicans made open appeal to the poor whites to vote against the former slaveholders. This was the effort of carpetbaggers and Negroes to join hands with the poor whites against the planters. It forecast a new economic labor and commerce against the old aristocracy. It foreshadowed the new Atlanta.

The city in 1868 apparently elected no officials, but Atlanta ran true to form and the city council unanimously passed a resolution asking for the removal of the capital of the state from Milledgeville to Atlanta. This was accomplished by the help of Negro votes. Fulton County cast a total vote of 4,248 with a majority of 210 for the constitution and Atlanta was made the capital. The constitution was adopted April 20, 1868, and Rufus B. Bullock, a Northern man long resident in the South and a Confederate soldier, was elected Governor. He called the legislature to meet in Atlanta June 25.

The new legislature was to meet in Atlanta in June, 1868, and while the Ku Klux were riding through the South and committing murder and arson, Atlanta was settling down to its new stride. The city income was nearly $300,000 in 1866. High-priced cotton and needed food and Northern goods were selling rapidly. A rolling mill company was organized with a capital stock of $200,000 and a machine shop destroyed during the war had started up again. There were enough new banks. Block bought land and put up a building and started to manufacture candy and crackers. Fifty years later, his company was making 450,000 pounds a week of these goods.

32-11-70

A new wholesale business began for supplying the small stores in the towns which Atlanta reached and where the stocks had been sorely depleted by the war. Indthe very disturbance of war Atlanta saw her chance and took it. People needed food and clothes. They could get them in Atlanta, straight from the North and South. They could pay for them with cotton and food and raw materials. They began to till the soil; that red, unfertile soil around Atlanta, where by intensive work crops could be had to pay for food and clothes. The whites worked as never before. The blacks worked. From way down in the cotton belt bales began to roll North toward Atlanta instead of always South toward Savannah and New Orleans. A Jewish synagogue was built in Atlanta in 1867 showing the presence of new, shrewd Jews.

There were other unusual indications of a new spirit. The movement toward public schools in 1858 and 1859 had been adroitly sidetracked by the taxpayers as we have seen and finally, they had been established by the constitutional convention of 1868, but before that, right in the smoke of battle, had come schools. Negroes Atlanta University was established as a grammar and high school in 1865 and a primary school, Storers School, was opened by the American Missionary Association in 1866. A private school for Negroes was established in Bethel A.M.E. Church which was worshipping in a carbarn on Jenkins Street about 1868.

The first Reconstruction state legislature met in Atlanta in June, 1868. There were three Negroes in the Senate and twenty-nine Negroes in the legislature. Although again four men of Negro descent were so white that they could not legally be classed as Negroes.

In the Senate, were A. A. Bradley, T. G. Campbell and George Wallace, and they were not cordially received, but entered into the deliberations with courage and strong convictions.

The planters made a last frantic effort. In an arbor on Alabama Street, July 23, 1868, a great convention was held, which ~~fairly~~ greatly over-shadowed in numbers and wealth and influence the constitutional convention. It was the Democratic state convention of Georgia with 1,009 delegates from 108 counties. All the great leaders were there. The convention declared the war amendments unconstitutional and Ben Hill, Bob Toombs and Howard Cobb spoke for five hours on a blazing afternoon. Ben Hill denounced the Reconstruction legislation. Toombs, Cobb and former Governor Johnson denounced the constitutional convention. It was the last bitter blast of the planter-aristocracy.

38-11-71a

No sooner had the legislature met than a final plan of the planters came to a head. They had at first not expected [illegible] the Negro members of the convention would be anything more than a worthless mob ready to take orders from their former masters. Surprised by the appearance of leadership and self-assertion, they now determined to enforce a legal quibble as soon as the state was sufficiently re-admitted to the Union and declare that Negroes had no right under the Constitution of Georgia to hold office. This matter had been discussed in the conventional convention, but no specific pronouncement made on it on the plea that this was not necessary; that a voter was necessarily an office holder; that throughout the campaign it had been insiduously suggested throughout the Southern part of the state that Negroes could not be elected to office. The matter came up as soon as the legislature met in June and continued under discussion until September. It met unexpected and brilliant opposition from the Negroes themselves. Milton Candler, a planter from middle Georgia, precipitated the debate.

33-11-726

. He declared that they were not entitled to their seats because they were persons of color and could not hold office under the Constitution. A protracted and heated discussion ensued.

The Negro Senators continued in their seats and Senator Bradley especially fought back bitterly. After an eloquent speech, he moved that Candler's resolution be expunged from the Minutes. Thereupon Senator Nunnally offered a resolution bringing up the old charge and declaring that Bradley was ineligible because of his alleged conviction in New York for seduction. A special committee of five white men with Candler and Nunnally members of it, was appointed to investigate Bradley's eligibility. The matter dragged along and nothing more was said until after the Governor's annual message had been received as part of the routine.

32-11-73

The special committee on Bradley finally reported and a majority declared that Bradley was ineligible because of ~~his~~ the former charge conviction in New York, but the committee reported that the evidence was incomplete. Bradley was not ~~elected~~ permitted to defend him and Campbell raised the point of order that no quorum was present. The President of the committee refused, however, to call the roll. ~~Nevertheless,~~ The debate was continued and on August 10, Bradley made the surprise move of resigning his seat; ~~and then, of course,~~ he could not then be expelled. Nunnally wanted to continue the case and the discussion continued several days with Campbell speaking fluently in behalf of Bradley. Finally, Bradley ~~'s reflection was not acceptable and he~~ was declared ineligible, ~~he~~

The discussion ~~than~~ returned to the question as to whether any colored man, criminal or not, could be a member of the Georgia legislature, and on September 17, 1868, over three months after the Senate had met, a resolution was offered declaring Campbell and Wallace ineligible. All three of the colored senators had meantime been active in legislative work.

Campbell offered bills concerning the city government of Darien and the process of securing and paying intelligent jurors and Bradley tried to establish a state militia and amend the code on civil rights. Both Campbell and Bradley had a fair education, but Wallace, the third Senator, was illiterate. Nevertheless, he was a man of considerable ability.

32-11-74

Another special committee with Candler at the head was appointed to investigate this matter. The Negroes were given one hour for defense and then were declared ineligible. They sent a protest written by Campbell which declared that they were elected by a large majority of the votes cast in several districts and they believed the right guaranteed them by the Constitution of the United States and the State of Georgia, as well as the Reconstruction laws of Congress, and claim to be the legally elected representatives. They cited the fat that according to the constitution, no laws could be made to abridge the privilege or immunities of citizens of the United States or of Georgia. "Therefore

"And we respectfully request that this, our protest, be spread upon the Journals of the Senate.

T. G. Campbell
George Wallace,
By his friend, T. G. Campbell. (Journal of Senate, 1868, pp. 278-279.) (Christler, p.35.)

32-11-75

"This protest was written by Senator T. G. Campbell, who was not one of the passive cowardly Negroes who would allow themselves to be abused and oppressed without protesting. Clarke Howell would have us to believe that all of the Negroes elected were 'unlettered,' ignorant politicians, who seemed more like a 'stack of puppets and harlequins of a menagerie.' (Clarke Howell, History of Georgia, vol. I, p. 589.) (Christler, p. 35.)

"This protest and resolution were ignored by Candler, who offered a resolution asking that the two persons in the Senatorial Districts of Wallace and Campbell, receiving the next highest number of votes should be allowed to take their seats if eligible, and that the Governor was respectfully requested to send election returns for Senators in the second and twentieth Senatorial Districts to the Senate." (Journal of Senate, 1868, p. 280.) (Christler, p.36.)

32-11-76

"Rufus P. Bullock, Governor of Georgia, sent the returns with a letter of admonition in which he expressed his displeasure and indignation at the action of the Senate in expelling its colored members." (Journal of Senate, 1868, pp. 324-326) (Christler, p. 36.)

Meantime, twenty-five of the Negro representatives in the House were meeting the same trouble. They had begun to take part in business.

11

In spite of the plea of the governor and the speeches of the Negroes, the Georgia legislature expelled 25 ~~x~~ 29 Negro members. Bullock went to Washington not only to secure reinstatement of the Negroes, but to prove the whites had not elected his candidates for the Senate and for choosing Democratic electors in the presidential election.

32-11-77

The newspapers of the state wavered. Some said the matter should be carried to the courts and others declared that the legislature was the sole judge. In June, 1868, before the explusion had taken place, a test case came up in the case of a Negro elected to a local office. Two justices out of three decided that Negroes were eligible to office, but the legislature refused to follow this decision in regard to expelling its members. It was suggested that the House rescind their vote in order to stop action by Congress, but this the House refused to do. Meantime, in support of the action of the legislature, the Ku Klux Klan raged in the country districts thereabouts. During the year 1869, 260 cases of outrages were reported. And these, of course, were not nearly all.

"It was the Negroes themselves, however, who started the movement that ultimately reseated them and finally reconstructed Georgia. A closed colored convention (that is, white men excluded) was held in Macon; many of the one hundred and thirty-six delegates (Avery, p. 405) walked ten to forty miles to attend the meeting. I. W. Avery, editor of the Atlanta Constitution at this time, says,

> "In nothing was it more remarkable than its bitter characterization of the white radicals who had voted for their expulsion from the General Assembly. There were some venomous and incendiary speeches, but these unlettered men went to work to do their business of retribution and recovery of their privileges in an extraordinarily practical way." (Avery, p. 405.)

This convention represented eighty-two counties and was presided over by Turner, who welded his followers into a solid unit. They collected reports of outrages and murders and sent a delegation headed by Turner to Congress.

Meantime, the outrages went on. Even the colored representatives were attacked. Colby of Greene County was taken from his bed at night and beaten because he had requested military protection for the colored school in Greensboro, Greene County. Representative Coulter reported that Representative Alf Richardson was killed by the Klan and that Madison Davis only escaped death because he was so white that he was not recognized. A riot took place at Camilla where eight or nine Negroes were killed and and twenty or more wounded.

The Macon convention sent Turner and Sims to Washington and they appeared before a Committee of Congress. General Terry reported that in some parts of Georgia there was no government at all and no justice for the Negroes.

The Atlanta Intelligencer advised the legislature to go on and transact business. The legislature refused to readmit the Negroes or to ratify the 15th Amendment. One Senator made pledges in Washington that the colored members would be reseated and the 15th Amendment ratified if Congress would not interfere. The Democrats refused him reelection.

As a result of the fight, Senator Josiah Hill was refused admission to the United States Senate and Georgia was put back under martial law. She was not readmitted until January, 1870. The legislature was then reconvened by General Terry who ousted the 24 Democrats who were unable to take the test oath.

pp. 1-23, 25-26, 36

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

The Story of Work and Wage

Georgia fought bitterly for the land of the Indians. The Indians fought back with the Supreme Court behind them, but Andrew Jackson cared nothing for the Supreme Court. First, the Creeks gave up and went West and its land became state property in 1821. In 1825, a land lottery was held and Lot 28 came to Jane Doss as a free gift. She sold it for $50.00 and on this land now stands the Candler Building, the Ansley and Haley Buildings and the United States Post Office. In 1838 it was sold again for $300. Indeed, this piece of land became historic. The day of canals was closing and that of railroads opening. The Erie Canal had made New York a great port and Western railroads were feeding Philadelphia and Baltimore. Charleston and Savannah had ambitions. Charleston, by 1850, was a city of nearly 43,000 inhabitants, half white, half slaves and 3,500 free Negroes. This, of course, was nothing beside New York's half million and Philadelphia's 121,000, but there were possibilities, especially if Charleston could tap the commerce of the West. And then there was Savannah. It had only 15,000 ~~Negroes~~ inhabitants in 1850, over 8,000 whites and nearly 7,000 blacks, but it had a good harbor. Why could not Savannah and Charleston reach the West? Railroads across Georgia rather than canals was the solution. The obstacles were the distance and the mountains, the ~~waterheads~~ streams and the rivers, but this could be overcome. Georgia became railroad-minded. In one year, 1833, it was at the beginning of the rule of the cotton kingdom. The political power of the planters was manifest. Calhoun was leading nullification in South Carolina and his state convention in 1832 declared the tariff null and void. Jackson warned him and the United States navy threatened Charleston harbor. The tariff of 1833 was finally passed after a compromise and the tariff was gradually to be scaled down. It was this year, 1833, that the Georgia legislature, ~~spurred on by Calhoun and his friends,~~ chartered three railroads: one was the Central Railroad. It was the bid of Savannah merchants who paid for the survey, to connect Savannah with Macon and the West. Macon was a little city of 5,720 in 1850, over 3,000 whites and nearly 3,000 blacks, but it was favorably located, almost in the geographical center of the vast state, within equally easy reach of Chattanooga and Florida, Mississippi and the sea. The road was chartered, surveyed and rushed to completion by 1843. Then there was the Georgia road that was the path of Charleston for outlet to the West and also to connect Augusta with the West. Augusta in 1850 had nearly 12,000 persons, over half of them black; and it was the natural gateway through Charleston to the sea. The point was, however, where were these railroads to open up the West? For that purpose, the Central must reach beyond Macon, and Augusta already connected with Charleston was only the start of the Georgia railroad. It must go West. It reached the inland town of Madison in 1837. Then it hesitated and threw out feelers North and South; one up to Athens, a small town through which a railroad theoretically might reach Tennessee if the terrain was favorable. The other way toward Macon, for Macon loomed as a possible commercial center.

31-9-56

31-9-57

The third railroad chartered in 1833 attack the problem of the penetration of the West from Macon. It was known as the Monroe Road and was built from Macon to Forsyth. Then from Forsyth, it went north to Griffin, but by that time was bankrupt and re-organized as the Macon and Western. It hesitated at Griffin, between going still further north or going westward to West Point and there tapping the cotton country of the Southern South, But that country was already tributary to New Orleans and a railroad to West Point did not solve the problem of opening the North and West to the South. This left all the railroads looking northwest and in 1836, with the return of prosperity, the legislature took a decisive step. Instead of waiting for the railroad builders to find a northwest passage, the state took the bull by the horns and itself went into the railroad business.

(1) "On the 21st of December, 1835, the act was approved by Governor Schley authorizing the 'construction of a railroad from the Tennessee line, near the Tennessee river, to the southwestern bank of the Chattahoochee river, at a point most eligible for the running of branch roads thence to Athens, Madison, Milledgeville, Forsyth and Columbus.' In 1837, Stephen H. Long was appointed engineer in chief, and the eastern terminus was established, not at the Chattahoochee, but seven miles east of it. There was much opposition to this plan. After all, what more was needed than connecting central Georgia with the Atlantic? Indeed, the state was hardly yet conscious of its new heritage of Indian land. Rich wooded acres oft which gradually with finesse and firearms the Indians had been herded until now they slowly marched through Alabama and eventually beyond the Mississippi.

Terminus was placed here because of the geographical trend of the mountain ridges which made the building of railroads from Tennessee to Terminus, from Terminus to connect with the Augusta road and from Terminus to connect with the Macon road and there was also on similar ridges the possibility of running roads northeast to Charlotte and Charleston and the center of North Carolina and Virginia and Southwest to the cotton country.

31-9-58

The site, then, of the first general passenger depot in Atlanta was the point of contact selected by Long.

The quotation shows that the Act itself required this location, and the site of Atlanta was therefore the result, neither of accidental circumstance, nor of arbitrary choice, but of natural conformation, as the most 'eligible' point for the purposes recited in the Act. Here intersected, as stated, the great mountain ridges, upon which were afterwards constructed the Georgia, Macon & Western, and Atlanta & West Point Railroads;..." (Illustrated History of Atlanta, by E. Y. Clarke, pp. 19, 20.)

The state voted in 1836-1837 $350,000 to start the railroad. The convention, meeting at Macon, emphasized the need of this Western railroad and it happened that this same year Hardy Ivy came to Decatur, a little village, and not quite satisfied, moved six miles above Decatur into the rolling hills and built himself a log cabin which was the first house in Atlanta.

To Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1836, seven states sent delegates on the 4th of July, who studied maps and bids and it was this convention that selected the construction engineer and he showed them that Hardy Ivy's cabin was the proper Terminus for their railroad.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

In 1839, Atlanta was entirely covered with forests and had but a few log huts. As the railroad was projected, a few stragglers came in, poor and bare-footed, living on dirt floors. It took five years to finish the railroad from Atlanta to Marietta, but it was done in 1842 and on the day before Christmas, an engine was loaded on boxcars and dragged by sixteen mules from Macon to Atlanta. It was then hitched to the train and the first trip was made from Atlanta to Marietta. Immediately, the little village began to hum with activity; real estate began to boom. There were about seven or eight families in Atlanta and in December, 1843, the village was incorporated and politely named after the daughter of Governor Lumpkin, who had fought so hard to get Indian land on honorable terms for the state of Georgia and had succeeded finally in removing the Cherokees. The Cherokee's, with their mixed Indian and Negro blood, went West to Indian territory.

31-9-59

In 1837-1838, Georgia appropriated one-half million dollars for the Western and Atlantic and in 1838-1839, $1,500,000, making $2,350,000 up until 1840. Later, it added $900,000 to this, between 1847 and 1852.

In 1844, Marthasville consisted of a few small houses on Decatur Street and scattered shanties. That year, Norcross set up a sawmill with an old blind horse as motive power. It was quite a curiosity and people came in from the country to look at it. Land began to increase in value. A plot, 30 feet wide, running back 200 feet between what is now Mitchell and Hunter , sold for $60 in 1844. Thrasher had refused to pay $5 an acre for it. Lloyd's Corner was sold for $3,000 in 1845 and about 1860, sold for $25,000. Trade increased, lumber was brought in for railroad building and stores were set up. The farmers round about brought in their produce and products began to come from the North. The Georgia railroad, from Augusta, reached Marthasville in 1845 and found a population of 100 people. This road had built ~~bridges~~ arches to Macon, Athens and Georgia and now, finally, completed it s line of 171 miles from Au usta to Atlanta.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

The first train arrived September 15, 1845 at dusk. One man on fell into a well and was drowned and the ~~imminent~~ Judge King very nearly fell into the same well. There were about 20 families in Atlanta at the time. They tried to incorporate Marthasville as a city in 1846 to celebrate the coming of the railroads, but the venture failed. The town government had little authority and there is no record of votes. Finally, however, December 29, 1847, a city charter was granted under the new name, Atlanta. Jurisdiction was granted over a distance of one mile from the depot in every direction and free white males of twenty-one years and over were to vote for a mayor and six members of a city council. There were 300 inhabitants at the time and in 1848, 174 votes were cast.

31-9-60

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

The road from Macon, extending the Central from Savannah, was finished in 1846 and the train coming through. Here were railroads from Augusta and Savannah reaching to Marthasville and from Marthasville north to Marietta. John C. Calhoun, ~~who~~ speaking at the Southwestern Convention in Memphis, in 1845 said: "The formation of the country between the Mississippi Valley and the Southern Atlantic Coast, from the (course) of the Tennessee, Cumberland and Alabama Rivers, and the termination of the various change of the Alleghany Mountains, make it necessary that all the railroads built by local interests must unite at a point in DeKalb County in Georgia not far from Decatur so as to make one system of roads between South and West."

The state of Georgia was urged by state railroad meetings and ~~the~~ this great Southern Railroad convention held at Memphis in 1845, to ~~build~~ continue the Western and Atlantic north from ~~Atlanta~~ Marietta to Chattanooga. This was done by ~~1849~~ 1850 when the road was 138 miles before finished; and from here it was hoped to ~~make~~ river and rail connections with the entire Mississippi Valley. In this case, Atlanta would become the terminus for all goods shipped from the West to the Southern seaboard because once they arrived in Atlanta they could be shipped to the ~~sea~~ south by the way of Macon or Augusta. Just as the Erie canal made a great port on the Northern seaboard, so the Western and Atlantic could create a similar great port on the Southern. It was a question, however, whether Charleston or Savannah would be the port. Plans were also made for running lines across the state, East and West, from Atlanta to West Point, or Augusta to Columbia. As a result of this, Georgia possessed by 1850 five hundred miles of railroads and was the fifth state in the Union in railroad development. Later development showed that these railroads tended to increase the cotton crop and that in Georgia the roads built up Atlanta at the expense of the ports.

31-2-61a

31-2-61

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

Thus dawned the year 1850. Atlanta had a population of 2,572 persons, of whom 2,060 were whites and 512 colored. It was thus a small place, but only exceeded in population by Savannah, Augusta and Macon. Even Milledgeville, the little town where the capital of the state had been set, was very nearly as large. But all these other cities were down in the cotton belt and dominated by the big planters. Atlanta was not supposed to be a city. It was a gate-way for trade.

Later,

"The Atlanta & West Point, and the Montgomery & West Point Companies, allied with each other, began building from Atlanta to Montgomery. The Charlotte & South Carolina and the Greenville & Columbia, both projected in 1845-1846, but not formulated until became the two main lines of the Piedmont region." (Hawkes, Economic History of the South, p. 332.)

The Atlanta and West Point and Montgomery and West Point Railroad Companies allied with each other, and began building from Atlanta to Montgomery. The Airline, now known as the Southern, was first planned in 1857 from Atlanta to Charlotte, but was not built until after the war.

31-9-62

Although Atlanta thus was a railroad city born of railroads, the railroads met much opposition. There was opposition in the legislature against granting state money to build the Western and Atlantic. This venture of the state into industry had the enmity of many of the Conservative planters. As a challenge, Atlanta with its roads and forest beds, attracted an increasing wagon trade. When the Georgia railroad to Augusta reached Madison and Athens, there was busy wagon trade to Atlanta and the extension of the railroad further hardly seemed possible. When it came, the wagoners complained bitterly.

Even in 1848, Atlanta was only a small country village in the heart of an almost impentrable wilderness surrounded by hugh forest trees and thick undergrowth. Yet two or three years later, a population of 2,000 had grown in the city and the five public roads which entered the town from Decatur, Marietta, McDonough, Newman and Peachtree Creek, brought a large wagon trade. There were long trains with 2-4 or 6 mules and and many yoke of oxen coming in daily. Some days it was impossible to weigh all the cotton the day it was received. The merchants did a large and increasing business and every wagon returned home ladened with merchandise. The cotton was shipped to Charleston and Savannah and as early as 1848, the first manufacture of iron began in Atlanta. The city itself was straggling. Whitehall Street was a place for drinking and fighting. There were only two houses on Peachtree Road. All the streets were unpaved, except except from Alabama to Marietta on Whitehall, where there were plank walks. The older portion of Atlanta was on the North side of Decatur Street down to Ivy. Here were small wooden stores and dwellings. The Post Office was a wooden building located on the corner of Peachtree, Edgewood and Decatur.

31-9-63

There were four churches in Atlanta; Wesley Chapel, First Baptist, First Presbyterian and the Episcopal.

In 1848, they held their first election with 215 voters mostly employed on the railroad. New settlers poured into this busy town; whiskey and fights and slums. Vigilantes, afraid to disclose themselves by day, rode at night and killed and drove out some of the criminals. A Moral Party overcame the Rowdy Party in 1851. By 1850 there were 3,000 people and 50 stores.

1848, a great political meeting was held at Walton Spring with great demonstrations when Alexander H. Stephens appeared. He was unable to speak because he had just had a fight with Judge Francis Cone and was stabbed.

1848 On the election of Taylor and Filmore there was a great demonstration in Atlanta with a torchlight parade. The marchers carried pine faggots.

Always the value of the land was increasing. The stretch between Peachtree and Pryor on Auburn Avenue sold for $1,000 in 1849. Seventy-five years later, it sold for $232,000.

61 In 1849, Richard Peters bought 405 acres extending from North Avenue to Eighth Street and from Bedford Place to Plum Street, paying $2,100. Today, it contains the Georgian Terrace Hotel, the Tech School, All Saints Episcopal Church and is worth a vast sum.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA 1849 / 70 / 19

In 1849, a half acre of land with 105 feet on Whitehall Street sold for $200. Seventy years later, one-fifth of this sold for $160,000. T

The first telegraph line came to the city in 1849 and in 1850, President Filmore visited the town. It was still a frontier settlement where hoodlums amused themselves by rolling hogheads full of little pigs down the Alabama Street hill. The matter of water early became a problem. Wells were authorized at the corner of Whitehall and Mitchell and Whitehall and Hunter in 1851. The city streets were dangerous from holes and ditches into which people often fell, While lamps were placed at various points on the streets in 1853 and gas lighting was considered the next year. Finally, gasworks were completed in 1855. Sherman put them out of commission; but they were resumed in 1866.

31-9-64

With the railroads came religion; the building which was headquarters for the state road was used for Sunday meetings; and then the Baptist began a church and afterward the Methodists. Capitalists and spectators and workers came in. Many homes went up and bigger ideas were talked. In 1852 there came a machine shop for maintaining railroad cars and other railroad work. There was actually a telegraph line privately owned; ~~but it went~~ from Macon to Atlanta ~~and there was~~ a public boarding house. Land rose on Decatur Street from $10 to $25 a front foot; ~~and~~ a paper began to be published in 1849. The Post Office was at Five Points in a grocery store and there the whole population gathered and received its mail in person. Now and then there was excitement, like the first fire that destroyed the Georgia depot, while thieves stole the money.

In 1854 there were 57 stores, not counting the saloons and a million dollars worth of goods were sold every year which rose to a sale of three million dollars worth in 1858. Drygoods were bought and sold for a distance of 100 miles, while the country produce and cotton came in to pay for it. The directory of 1859 showed 14 churches, 5 banks and 5 hotels. There were 29 lawyers, 14 commission merchants, 15 wholesale and retail drygood dealers, 31 physicians and 66 wholesale and retail grocers. In 1850, Atlanta had from 2,572 inhabitants. Of these, 512 were colored and of the colored people, 19 were free and the others slaves.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

So the village grew with manufacturers and trade; trade in goods and material, manufacture of lumber in a mill run by horse power, until in 1856 a foundry and machine shop. By 1860 there were four machine shops and two planing mills and three tanneries and two shoe factories; a soap factory and a clothing manufacture.

A Macon planter afterward tried to explain the psychology of Atlanta. He said: they had no ancestry or history to think about, these new folk of a new city, and then, consequently, they began to think about themselves and had nothing to do but to go to work. And they did go to work and other people noticed them.

When the connection was finished, it linked Charleston and Memphis by way of Atlanta at Chattanooga. The mayor of Charleston and a party dug a hogshead of water from the Bay and went to Memphis to mingle it with the watersof the Mississippi. When they came back carrying water from the Mississippi, they were given a reception in Atlanta and toasted Atlanta as the Gate City.

By 1854, the new Atlanta was actually proposing that the state capital be removed from Milledgeville to Atlanta. This was really a momentus matter. The geographical and social capital of the state was Macon, since Savannah was too far to the East and too large and rich to be considered. Milledgeville was the planter's substitute for Atlanta. A country town, a bit to the side, to be reached by coaches and on horsepower. But Macon was distinctly in the cotton belt and under the planter influence. Atlanta's bid for being the capital was based ostensibly on its railroad facilities. It was easier to get from Atlanta to all points in the state than to get to any other place, for most of the inhabitants of Savannah could be reached only by way of Macon and Macon was connected with Atlanta and Savannah, but was also connected with Atlanta. The real animus back of the movement to make Atlanta the capital was that Atlanta was the center of the poor whites and of those commercial interests who were, if not opposing the planters, at least demanded equal consideration.

They even made a movement for public schools in Atlanta and sent an observer to Providence, Rhode Island, but the merchants and taxpayers easily sidetracked this movement. They gained control of the meeting and postponed the matter. It did not come up again until Negroes were voters.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

Atlanta exhibited in many ways a certain new and frontier independence. Senator Jefferson Davis was ~~elected~~ awarded in 1859 on ~~occasion~~ Quotation of being a ~~trained lawyer~~ and the same year outside slavetraders were taxed to protect the local dealers.

In 1860, Atlanta had 9,554 inhabitants; a growth of 271% in 10 years. The proportion of Negroes had also risen slightly from 19-21%.

~~In 1860,~~ Atlanta was now the fourth city in the state with 60 stores selling one and one-half million dollars worth of goods a year. Nineteen brick stores were built in 1858 and the gas company was started and the Bank of Fulton in 1856. In 1857 came the first plan of the Southern Railroad. They called it the Airline. In 1859, real estate was assessed ~~out~~ $2,760,000 and within a circle of 100 miles, three million dollars a year was traded.

11) Atlanta bothered little about the war. It was not interested in academic talk about slavery or politics. It was a commercial center, extending down to the cotton belt and up toward Yankee notions. Real estate values were rising rapidly and there was a chance for great speculation; but of course so thriving and lively a city had to notice current events, and on March 5, 1858, a Kansas meeting was held opposing the annexation of Kansas as a free state. The resolutions evidently imported spoke "of the safety of our Southern institutions, the peace and quiet of our truly patriotic, liberty-loving and law-abiding citizens," and denounced the abolition fanatics. Collections were taken up to aid Georgians in Kansas and to encourage emigration to Kansas.

31-9-66

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

By 1860, Northern abolition merchants were boycotted and October 31 of that year, Stephen A. Douglass visited the city. Atlanta did not like him because he would not admit that secession was legal. Of course Atlanta had no thought of seceding, but she wanted to insist that she had a right to do it. Then events moved swiftly and Atlanta saw them face to face. There was that 16th of February, 1861, when Jefferson Davis passed through on his way to Montgomery and found Atlanta his shortest route. He stopped off, tall, precise and immaculately dressed and said a few words to this rambling frontier town. A little later came another man, passing the other way from Montgomery to Savannah and then again finding Atlanta the easiest way. He was a cripple on crutches and carried the scars of the knife duel which he once fought in Atlanta. He passed through to Savannah and there made his celebrated "cornerstone" speech. The cornerstone of a new Confederate government was "Negro slavery."

31-9-67

When the war began, Atlanta stirred; she sent one of her companies, the Gate City Guards to Pensacola. Several hundred men signed resolutions to act when necessary, but with the war Atlanta was flourishing. The people rushed in and the population increased by thousands. It was a safe place to be and a profitable place; far from the front and yet with means of communication by railroad. It became of necessity a military center and a supply depot for the Confederate army. Arms and ammunition were manufactured expensively and early in the war, the city was put under martial law and became the headquarters of the Confederate quartermaster as well as the chief hospital point. Hotels and private schools became hospitals and storehouses. Seventy-five thousand wounded were nursed in the next three or four years. Trade was stimulated and when the fighting began to move toward neighboring parts of Tennessee and the end of that same crucial railroad, Atlanta began to organize for defense. It became a base for Federal prisoners.

During the war, Atlanta was a beehive of industry. Munitions were manufactured, shells, revolvers, knives, swords, percussion caps, drum, shoes, hats, bread, candles, matches, gold-foil, cord, wire and coffins. Out of the city flowed an enless stream of war materials. This sudden industrial expansion made a great impression and when the war was over, the idea of manufacturing still held. Atlanta's location was ideal for teaching all parts of the South and for reaching the North.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

Only once early in the war did Atlanta see hostilities near them. A daring battery of Federal soldiers conceived the idea of boarding a train at Atlanta, steering the engine, and destroying the thirteen bridges on the Western-Atlantic all the way to Chattanooga. This was in 1862. Their attempt very nearly succeeded, but they were captured just outside of Chattanooga before they had done much damage. Seven of the twenty-two members of the battery were hanged as spies in Atlanta in June, 1862. Others escaped from jail and six were exchanged as prisoners.

The city boasted but one park, a bit of land bounded by Pryor, Decatur and Lloyd Streets and the Western and Atlantic Railroads. The company allowed the city to use this plot as a park and during the war it became an open air hospital. During 1861, the government continued as usual until it was put under martial law and even then the civil officials functioned until the city was captured by the Federals.

In 1864, there came ominous rumors.

When the Union forces overcame Bragg at Chattanooga, he was succeeded by General Joe Johnston. Sherman assisted Grant in the Chattanooga campaign. Grant went East to take charge of the armies and Sherman was put in charge of the Department of the Mississippi, which included Tennessee and Georgia.

The Union forces were going to attack Atlanta. "Incredible," said the Atlantans. "Atlanta must be defended. It was a manufacturing center. It was a supply center. It was the last link between the Confederates, East and West. What was Jefferson Davis doing that he did not reinforce Johnston and stake all on the defense of Atlanta?" War fervor swept the city. Volunteers, boys and old men, were asked for.

Sherman had 100,000 men, while Johnson had only 43,000. Both armies were reinforced and still the Union Army greatly outnumbered the Confederate. At first it was feared that Grant might come by Atlanta on his way to Richmond, but he did not. Sherman began his march toward Atlanta and his troops appeared along the Western Atlantic Railroad. Atlanta was scared and May 17, 1864, called upon all citizens to form a local militia.

31-9-68

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

Characteristically great religious revivals took place. Wesley Chapel converted any numbers of soldiers. Finally in June, 1864, it was known that Sherman was going to march South to Atlanta from Tennessee. Citizens were warned to leave at a moment's notice. Davis was roundly blamed.

Richmond not only sent no assistance to Johnston, but made the mistake of substituting John Bell Hood as commander in place of Johnston and thus changed Fabian tactics for brilliant but futile forays.

1864, May 27, the Federals approached so near that their guns could be heard and fighting took place at Rocky Face Ridge and Mill Creek Gap and other places. June 27, came the battle of Kennesaw Mountain. The Confederates ~~again~~ fell back. They ~~Confederates~~ crossed the Chattahoochee July 9 and the Union troops July 17. Sherman crossed the Chattanooga at Pace's Ferry July 15. His left wing swung around to Decatur, thus cutting off Augusta. Between him and Atlanta was the Confederate Army, but Atlanta had no defense, West or South. A terrible battle ensued at Peachtree Creek, July 20. Hood lost six thousand men, killed and wounded, and Sherman about two thousand five hundred. The artillery rained fire upon the city and Hood's soldiers set fire here and there to the supply depots. Shells began to fall into the city of Atlanta. The first one killed a child at Ivy and East Ellis Street in the presence of her father and mother. Hood withdrew from Peachtree Creek and July 22, the decisive battle of Atlanta took place. Hood lost 6,000, killed and wounded, and General Sherman 3,500. A truce was declared July 23 for the burying of the dead. The Union army continued to bombard Atlanta. Hood made another attack July 28, but failed. The Union forces pressed on and the city was under bombardment throughout July. The Confederates were attacked on August 5 and 7 and communication of the city with the outside gradually cut off. Bombardment of great fury took place August 16. The Confederates stationed a huge gun at Peachtree and Kimball Streets and the Union Armies concentrated their fire there. There was a continual crash of exploding shells and the roar of falling buildings. Hood protested and Sherman sneered at him for seeking the protection of the city.

31-9-69

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

The last battle was fought at Jonesboro and Hood abandoned the city. There was no city government until January 5, 1865. Johnston was reinstated in command in February, but his army had been shot to pieces and Federal troops not only had captured Atlanta but had begun Sherman's celebrated march toward the sea, while the Confederates retreated toward Tennessee.

Mayor Calhoun called a conference and took a committee of unarmed citizens to interview Sherman. They rode down Marietta Street through a mass of ruins; shell-torn houses and deserted Confederate earthworks. After riding four miles, they came upon Union soldiers and were taken into the presence of Sherman. Calhoun explained that he had come to surrender the city. Sherman accepted it and placed the town under martial law. The Union troops entered; were fired upon by half-dozen Confederate cavalrymen on Decatur Street. The cavalrymen then fled and the Union troops entered. Trading immediately began. Empty stores were and depot supplies opened by the sanitary commission. Billiard rooms and jails were opened and a minstral performance was advertised. Soldiers and cavalrymen crowded the streets but there was no disorder. Sherman made his headquarters at the corner of Mitchell and Washington Street. Food was given to all who needed it. Southerners came back to the city clothed in rags.

31-9-70

1864, September 4, Sherman issued an order that "the city of Atlanta being exclusively organized for war-like purposes, will be at once vacated by all except the armies of the United States at such city limits as may be retained." He offered to send the citizens either North or South wherever they wanted to go and said that Atlanta was no place for families of non-competence. Hood scolded him, but accepted a truce at ten days. The exodus to the South carried 446 families with 705 adults and 860 children. Federal forces left Atlanta November 15, 1864, after Sherman had pretty thoroughly destroyed the city. Whitehall Street was in ruins and Alabama Street. Some buildings were standing on Pryor, Hunter, Mitchell and Lloyd Streets and Marietta Street was destitute. Business blocks, churches, and homes were burned. Some 4,500 buildings in all.

The Wings of Atalanta

Yet this was no complete destruction. Land values still stood. One and three-fourths of an acre on Marietta Street sold for $5,000. Fifty-seven years later, a part of this sold for $180,000 and is the site of the Federal Reserve Bank. Although three-fourths of the city's buildings were burned, nevertheless Atlanta was still a strategic point. The railroads were partly destroyed, but the road beds were there and they could be restored. Invested capital was not gone entirely and labor, white labor and free Negro labor, was still available. There was nothing like the destruction or despair that touched the cotton belt. Indeed, during the war, speculators as well as merchants and financiers were at work.

31-9-71

One merchant had made large investments in Cotton ~~Washington~~, but a Negro guided the Federal troops to it and they destroyed it. Two Negro regiments were immediately organized when the Federal soldiers entered; the 166th in July, 1865 and the 138th, the same month.

The Negro troops were used as a sort of police reserve, but Sherman did not take them on his march to the sea and they were disbanded in January and July, 1866. Already in the fall of 1864, the citizens began to troop back to Atlanta. Mayor Calhoun resumed his duties December 10. The repair of the railroads was begun and before winter was over, the restoration of Atlanta was on its way.

As spring opened, more people began to return. They found Whitehall Street from Roark's Corner to Peachtree a mass of ruins. ~~Only 400 of the 3,800 houses in the city were left standing and it was said that in the city and surrounding country 4,500 homes were destroyed.~~ Each train to arrive was crowded with refugees and they went to work to re-building the city, but there was little lumber and other material and labor was scarce and high. Small cheap dwellings were erected and stores.

Every piece of machinery had been damaged, laths and engines, boilers, sawmills.

In the work of restoration, at first structures had to be temporary until machinery and materials could be imported.

The Wings of Atalanta

Land values were not greatly changed. A two-acre lot of 200 front feet on Peachtree and Baker, running back to Spring, sold for $3,000 during the war and half of it for $5,000 the same year. Even after the burning of the city, it was re-sold for $4,000. In 1922, it was assessed at $180,000.

Especially Negroes began to pour into the city for refuge and for work. The Negroes already there, especially free Negroes, like Roderick and Roger Badger, were on hand to help them. Roderick was a dentist and Robert Badger, a trained hand on the West Point and La Grange Railroad. They helped open the first school for Negroes. The poor people poured in and occupied the half-ruined houses of the rich. "At Atlanta there was more of an accumulation of destitute freed people than I had seen elsewhere. They came from the country roundabout which had been completely devastated. It left three hundred white families were suffering and in danger of starvation, but the Freedmen's Bureau began to work and among the agents was a yellow man with bright eyes. His name was Turner, Henry M. Turner. There were a number of stray orphan children for whom the Bureau found homes and violence against Negroes was reported from the South and the country districts, and hospital facilities began to be opened." So the people came back and began again. There had been severe lost, but after all the main efforts of Atlanta remained. Atlanta was a railway center and a center of trade and land values were still high. Moreover, these people were canny and full of energy. On Saturday, June 25, a few months after Lee and Johnson had surrendered, they held a peace meeting to create loyal sentiment. They passed resolutions and "regretted" the assassination of Lincoln.

31-9-72

Isaac Decatur, a slave during the Civil War, was sent to Atlanta during Sherman's raid with a load of wood to buy food for his master's family. After the war, he conducted a shoe shop and a school in the 4th Ward near Edgewood Avenue.

The main interest of Georgia was still in farming and farm labor and the social center of the state was at Macon and even Savannah as late as 1866. The planters moved swiftly toward Reconstruction so as to rebuild their power. They tried to counteract the migration of Negro labor to the West and formed a Land and Immigration Company in 1865 to encourage white immigrants. Brown, pre-war governor, summoned the legislature to Milledgeville in order to restore the state government, but the army stopped him and Brown resigned, but kept in touch with Andrew Johnson. A Johnson appointed James Johnson a provisional governor and elections were held October, 1865. Three hundred delegates went to Milledgeville; old men and politicians, representing the conservative planters and they acted in the old way. They quibbled with the results of the war, repelling but not nullifying the ordinances of secession. They abolished slavery, but said flatly, that in this abolition they would not relinquish claims for compensation. In the election, the real leaders were cautious. Former Governor Brown and Alexander Stephens refused to be candidates and C. J. Jenkins was elected Governor. The legislature again in Milledgeville elected Stephens and H. V. Johnson Senators and passed the Black Codes. The governor and legislature argued against the 14th Amendment and stoutly refused to endorse it.

31-9-73

All this was at Milledgeville, ninety miles southeast of Atlanta and less than thirty miles from Macon, near the center of the state and inthe cotton country where the planters have always ruled. But new forces were moving to displace the planter. They began among black folk. In 1866, Negroes from eighteen counties met in Augusta with 100 delegates. They formed the Equal Rights Association of Georgia. They demanded that the coastlands given them by Sherman's order should not be taken away save by act of Congress, and asked the right to vote forthose who could read and write and held property. It was a new and startling effort for Georgia, led by former free Negroes and Federal officials like Turner. They even demanded the abolition of corporal punishment and ex-Governor Johnson was present, and the poor whites began gradually to march toward Atlanta, toward the city of the poor workers and away from the planters.

The Wings of Atalanta

1865, May 3, Colonel Eggleston was designated to receive the surrender of the ~~Federal~~ Confederate troops. He came to ~~the city~~ Atlanta May 4; stopped the sale of liquor and raised the United States flag. Confederate Soldiers came in in large numbers and in rags.

May 16, the United States flag was raised at half-mast in honor of the dead Abraham Lincoln.

1866, February 28, a mass meeting was held at City Hall which was divided between Conservatives and Radicals and was hard to keep in control. Colonel T. C. Howard aroused the Extremist and resolutions were passed to appeal to the Supreme Court against the Reconstruction laws and to thank President Johnson.

1866, March, the charter was amended so that the city extended 1½ miles in every direction from the passenger depot.

The Georgia convention of 1866 had recogn zed Negroes as citizens with rights to make contracts and sue. Immediately, they began to stir and the movement naturally began in Augusta where there was a majority of Negroes, nearly 5,000, as against 4,250 whites and 243 free Negroes. The Georgia convention called by President Johnson met early in 1866 and the same month, 100 Negro delegates from 18 Georgia counties met in Augusta with James Porter as President. They advocated not universal suffrage but voting limited by property and educational tests. They appointed a committee to look after education and incorporated themselves into a body called the Equal Rights Association of Georgia. This was to have a President and Vice President in each county. They advised Negroes to work hard, learn to read and write and buy homes. Three factions had appeared among Negroes in the state and resolutions were passed to appease them: one, to confirm their possession of the coast lands unless they were dispossessed by act of Congress; two, to declare that land in the Southern states was not to be confiscated according to the demand of Thaddeus Stevens, and three, an appeal to the legislature for complete equality of citizenship rights.

31-9-74

L

The Wings of Atalanta

The power of the Negroes came with the Reconstruction acts of 1867. The rich whites wanted no convention; the conservatives wanted a convention but without Negroes. But other poor whites and Northerners wanted a convention even with the Negro.

Toombs, unreconstructed, returned from Europe in 1867, but he could not stay the tide.

As soon as the Reconstruction acts were passed by Congress, Negroes hasten to meet in Macon. Macon was nearer the center of the state; had only 38 free Negroes and her population of 6,000 had a majority of 1,000 whites. This meeting, then, was nearer the black belt of the workers. The people were to have met at the 2nd Colored Baptist Church, but it was not near large enough and they adjourned to a grove near Rose Hill Cemetary. Here a huge platform was erected and on it sat schoolteachers and Federal officials. They opened services by singing "On Jordan's Stormy Banks I Stand" and Robert Carter prayed long and loudly. They passed resolutions concerning constitutional amendments and several bills and among the speakers was the new leader, Henry M. Turner and Issac Primus. The procession carried banners, one of which said: "As we have got to live and vote together in one state, let us be friends." The Macon Telegraph congratulated the Negroes upon the good order and e---------observed. About a week later, a similar meeting took place in Savannah. This was the center of the free Negro group. There were nearly 1,000 of them there. They had before the war openly and clandestinely conducted their own school. They were in touch with the free Negroes of Charleston and even of the West Indies. And, too, they were in close touch and co-operation with the whites to whom they were connected by ties of blood. Ex-Governor Johnson and several other white Southerners sat on the platform and two Negroes, afterward prominent in the legislature, and James Porter, who had presided over the Augusta meeting. They elected the ex-Governor as President and passed resolutions and made speeches. The resolutions boldly recognized the enfranchisement of the Negroes, stressed popular education and asked for her registration and election. Ten days later, a third meeting of the court was held in Augusta with 1,000 present and with ex-Governor Johnson as principal speaker. This meeting again asked for equal political rights and was for the abolition of corporal punishment, but there was some opposition to these outspoken demands by the more conservative and careful Negroes, so that the whole meeting was not as harmonious as the others, although orderly and quiet. Evidently the white South had tried hard to influence this meeting but had hardly succeeded.

31-9-75

March 31, 1867, General Pope arrived to take command of the Third Military District with headquarters at Macon, but in April, very significantly, he moved his headquarters to Atlanta, not only for better communications, but conscientiously or unconscientously, taking himself out of the dominating influence of the former slave barons.

His first act was to appoint a Board of Registration in each of the forty-four military districts. The Board was to be composed of two white men appointed by General Pope and the white men were to select a Negro member and the Boards were to register all qualified persons after taking the iron-clad oath. The election was ordered to take place the last three days in October. Ben Hill advised the whites not to register and to vote against the convention and if there should be a convention to vote against the constitution which it should draw up; but ex-Governor Brown counseled the whites not to let the Negroes and carpet-baggers get the victory unopposed. Ninety-five thousand blacks and ninety-six thousand whites registered. Ten thousand and five hundred whites, chiefly the planters and leading Confederates, were disfranchised. Sixty-thousand other whites refrained from voting and twenty-four thousand Negroes did not dare vote. As a result, there were over 100,000 votes for the convention and only 4,000 against it.

31-9-76

Then came the great decision which turned the center of Georgia from the cotton kingdom to the new kingdom of finance with Atlanta in the center. The Reconstruction convention instead of meeting in Savannah, the cotton capital of slavery, or in Macon, the center of the cotton kingdom, or in Milledgeville, the capital of the state, was held in Atlanta from December 9, 1867 to March, 1868.

In Atlanta, 1,653 Negroes had registered and 1,829 whites. Atlanta was evidently becoming a Negro city.

In January, 1868, a meeting was held at the City Hall which adopted resolutions against the convention and against the "evil counsellors" around General Pope. They especially held this meeting to impress the new Commander General Mead who was superseding Pope and wanted him to sustain the refusal of the state treasurer to appropriate $40,000 for the expenses of the convention. The meeting declared that it was unalterably opposed to the Reconstruction acts of Congress. General Mead received the committee very cordially, but, nevertheless, removed Governor Jenkins from office and ordered the $40,000 for the state convention paid.

31-9-77a

31-9-77

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

31-9-81

Atlanta and especially black Atlanta, viewed them with eual interest. First of all, there was Henry N. Turner who was perhaps the outstanding Negro leader. He came South as chaplain of a Negro regiment; they became a missionary of the A.M.E. Church and an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau. Finally, he went into politics. He was self-educated and well-educated with unusually wide influence and had begun his career as janitor in a law office and learned to read.

He was born free and appointed in 1865 to work in the Freedmen's Bureau. The Executive Committee of the Union League asked him to organize the colored people and in this capacity, he traveled over all the state. Turner was uncompromising in his conviction that Negroes should take part in politics. He was earnest and perservering and although a target for Democratic abuse and Republican jealousy, nevertheless s . He was accused and arrested many times, but never convicted. The Atlanta Intelligencer called him"an unscrupulous fellow, shrewd enough to deceive the poor, deluded Negro in the South." Turner openly declared that no Republican was safe in Georgia outside of Atlanta and a few other cities.

His work in the constitutional convention and his speeches were wise and judicious. First, he tried to protect the property-holders and prevent the sale of property for taxes. His ordinance on this subject was passed. It was one for the relief of banks.

He fought for civil rights, but did not want the downfall of the Southern white aristocracy, and was enthusiastic in his effort to secure a pardon for Jefferson Davis. He worked for internal improvements under the control of the legislature rather than private companies or county officials. He wanted to regulate the lands on railroads bridges, valleys and turnpikes.

But perhaps Turner was most influential as member of the Educational Committee in the legislature. One of his proposals was to read the Governor's real charges to the Supreme and Superior Courts and create the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

31-9-82

Next to Turner, stood Aaron A. Bradley, who was more independent and radical than Turner, and attack both Democrats and Republicans and did not favor the Southern aristrocracy. He was immediately dubbed a dangerous and undesirable Negro. The whites hated him, but the blacks never lost confidence. He was active in laying down the powers of the cabinet and drawing up its rules and trying to get an article in the Bill of Rights against all race discrimination. He turned his attention to the jails and prisons and wanted them carefully examined.

Bradley especially championed the Negro's right to land, and earlier as a lawyer, had tried to protect the Negroes against the United States force which attempted to dispossess the Negro on the island off the coast of Savannah. His activities brought the usual attack from the whites. They alleged that he had been convicted of a felony in New York before he came to Georgia and had served a term in 1851 in Sing Sing. Bradley denied that he had been convicted of a felony. The majority of the Investigating Committee sustained him saying that it was sedition and not a felony. While the matter was debating, Bradley turned and hotly accused some of the white delegates present of the same offence that he had been convicted of in New York; namely, seduction .

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

"I have a letter involving the delegate from Gordon County and the President of the Convention and their families in a like offense. I do not wonder at the gentleman being nettled."

Thereupon, on motion of Rufus Bullock, afterward Governor, Bradley was expelled for detracting from the social position and standing of the gentleman and their families who were thus assailed.

Bradley left the convention, but his constituents afterward sent him as Senator from the First District to the legislature.

Tunis G. Campbell was born in Massachusetts and had lived in Canada. He came South as an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau and settled on St. Catherine's Island off Savannah. Here he set up a government among the Negroes and when the owner returned to claim it, he had to dispossess Campbell by armed force. Campbell then went to Darien and was elected magistrate by the Negroes and for a long time administered justice, so that the white planters had to get control of their labor through him. He was a member of the constitutional convention and was eager for the election of straight-forward and frank men to office. He sought candidates for the presidency of the convention to express their views beforehand on universal suffrage. He tried to abolish imprisonment for debt and was a member of the educational committee.

31-9-83

He was a man of great personal charm and a good speaker and defended the Negroes in relief, suffrage and officeholding.

Another leader was J. T. Costin who was a faithful follower of Turner. His motions show his ability to represent the Negro's interest and the repeal of the tax on cotton was due to him. One characteristic of the Negro members of the convention was that they were seldom absent and never without due notice. "It meant something to leaders of the Republican Party to know that the Negro representatives would be present to cast their vote with the party." There was no charge even of the selling of votes in the convention.

The convention completed its labors March 11, 1868, and presented to the president a constitutional privilege for universal suffrage and free public education.

Among the colored folk, many leaders began to appear outside those who came in as politicians. There was Isaac Decatur who was sent to Atlanta from his master's plantation during Sherman's raid with a load of wood to buy food for his master's family. After freedom, he opened a shoe shop and a small store in the Fourth Ward near Edgewood Avenue. Foremost of all, there were the Badger Brothers, Roderick and Roger. Roderick was a dentist and had been complained about by white mechanics before the war, but continued to serve his white clients. Roger was a train hand on the West Point and La Grange Railroad. They helped open the first school for Negroes.

There were a few well-to-do Negroes, Peter Eskridge owned half a block on Auburn Avenue where the Herndon Building is now. He ran a grocery store and another grocery store was started by C. C. Cater at the corner of Auburn and Bell. Opposite was the first colored drug store owned by Dr. Moses Amos.

38-12-307

One colored man, Washington King, between 1880-1884, followed the work of his father in building wooden bridges. He built the first toll bridge on Greensferry, furnishing himself one-fourth of the capital. But the white county commissioner eventually turned the road from Greensferry toward Hunter Street Bridge which was a free bridge. This ruined King's enterprise and he confined his work thereafter to repairing bridges or building small ones.

In 1880, the Negroes of Atlanta elected a colored man, William Finch, as alderman-at-large. He received 1,990 votes. He was the first and last member of the city council.

~~There was William~~ Finch was born in Washington, Georgia, a slave. He went to Athens as a servant in 1848. He enlisted and fought in the war and went to school. During the war, he helped Confederate soldiers and saved coal and valuables for his master and other whites. In 1860, he opened a tailor shop in Augusta, but two years later, he had come to Atlanta, $50 in debt and with six children. Eventually, he bought land on Edgewood Avenue and built a $6,000 home. He was elected to the city council as alderman at large in 1870 and helped to establish public schools with Negro teachers. He owned fine horses.

Jake McKinley operated a brick yard and built a church. Frederick Douglass stayed in his home. James Tate had a grocery business, beginning in 1866 and eventually in the nineties carried a stock of about $6,000. David T. Howard became an undertaker and W. F. Gaines, a tailor, worked 18 years with John Lynch the woolen importers. A. D. Hamilton came to Atlanta from Alabama in 1877. In Alabama, he had been a member of the legislature. He began work in Atlanta as general contractor and his son eventually succeeded him. Negro education under Northern leadership marched steadily on. Spelman Seminary for girls was started in the basement of a Negro church in 1881 and Gammon Theological Seminary was endowed in 1882. Morris Brown College was chartered in 1885, while Atlanta University continued to progress.

38-12-308

But all this meant no great access of real power. The Negroes were laborers and as exploited laborers had less and less power in this new and powerful world. They did not take the line that the poor whites gradually gravitated into. Their revolt began with farmers' organizations and labor unions. John had seen and noted an awkward and scrawney son of an aristocratic millhand who was in the Georgia legislature from 1882-1884. His name was Tom Watson; but he was gruff and uncommunative. He made no response to John's kindly overtures. He represented both the farmers and the millhands, but left the legislature in disgust and was not heard of until 1889. The impulse that aroused the farmers came from the West and the North.

~~From 1882-1887, the farmers were passive, but in 1887, the Farmers' Alliance began to arise.~~ Between 1874-1886, alliances, unions, (wheels) sprang up throughout the country, in Texas, Kansas and New York. In 1889, a National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union was formed uniting many of these other bodies. In 1890, the Southern branch had 3,000,000 members.

The Farmers' Alliance made economic problems paramount. They held discussions and addresses by traveling lecturers. They established periodicals and stressed fertilizers, machines, seed, crop, etc., but they especially planned the existing business and political systems and believed that bankers, merchants, manufacturers, etc. were conspiring to rob and enslave the masses.

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

In 1872, Atlanta was handling 20,000 bales of cotton a year. Five years later, this had increased to 90,000.

The Airline Railroad to connect Atlanta with Charlotte and the Northeast had been chartered and surveyed before the war, but was completed in 1873.

1873, January 10, the Atlanta Manufacturers' Association was formed. This started a demand for coal and a proposal to build the Georgia-Pacific Railroad, now the Southern, between Atlanta and Birmingham.

The familiar and peculiar position of Atlanta was shown by the panic of 1873. While the whole country reeled, Atlanta was scarcely moved.

31-9-17

The population was over 30,000, no banks failed and business continued to flourish. Episcopal, Lutheran and Cumberland Presbyterian Churches were built. In 1874, effort was made to put the police out of politics and limit the debt of the city, showing the power of business and taxpayers. In 1875-1876, there were new banks and new buildings; a cotton factory and waterworks, new churches, a rolling mill, cotton gins, manufacturer of candy and crackers, a fruit market and wide dealing in hardware, drugs and tobacco. By 1877, a million dollars worth of horses and mules were bought and sold in Atlanta. The Atlanta Constitution was established and employed Henry Grady and Clark Howell.

1868, agitation was began for waterworks and in 1875, Atlanta received a modern waterworks system. The first plan was to bring the waters of the Chattahoochee to Atlanta by a canal. The next plan was to bring the waters of the Peachtree Creek. Finally, the City of Atlanta created a water commission and after litigation, the water of South River was brought to a reservoir and conveyed to the city by pumps.

Fragments

WINGS OF ATALANTA

The bourbon regime in Georgia after the war was a business man's regime and dependent upon bankers and merchants of the East.

In 1884, there arose an independent movement which for a time seriously threatened a permanent division of the white vote and was a forerunner of popularism. It began in the northern part of the state among small farmers and where there was a small proportion of Negroes. In this section, before the war, there had been much opposition to secession. Here in the seventh Congressional district covering the western half of the mountain area, a so-called Bullock Democrat was nominated for Congress, named L. M. Trammell. He was selected by the Atlanta clique through the influence of Brown and Brown had the votes of the Western and Atlantic Railroad in his pocket and granted passes over ~~pieces of~~ it to politicians. He probably made secret terms with Gordon and Colquitt. Against Trammell, Dr. William H. Felton made the race as an Independent. He was a farmer, a Doctor and a preacher with an energetic wife. He was elected and re-elected in 1874-1876 and 1878 to Congress.

31-9-41

By 1878, this independent movement against the Democratic machine had captured about one-fourth of the state and was appearing in other Congressional districts.

The Grange appeared in Georgia in 1872 and soon had 18,000 members. It started co-operative stores and wholesale buying and selling agencies. They railway land discriminations and exemption of railroads from taxes and bond endorsements. In this case, Toombs tended toward radicalism and the support of some of their propositions.

Despite the legislation of 1874, it sought to stop endorsement of bonds,

After this in the South, state-wide primaries of white Democrats began the reaction.

He saw that in their economic helplessness, they could not and would not fight against the employers. He, therefore, proposed, in 1904, their disfranchisement, following South Carolina and Mississippi. Hoke Smith secretly negotiated with him to add disfranchisement to the program of railroad regulation and put forward a candidate on this platform. The candidate, Pope Brown, suddenly withdrew in favor of Hoke Smith. Watson was between the devil and the deep sea. He had been an opponent of Smith on free silver and other matters and Smith had roundly denounced him. However, he declared that if Smith would apologize for certain statements, he would support him. Smith apologized and the campaign went on.

31-9-28

31-9-28

31-9-28

Radicals complained because combinations in restraint of competition; discrimination against way stations on railroads and the mortgage and tax systems were not tenured. It was declared that the Woolhat boys must part company with the Silkhat crowd. Another secret corpus was held in February, 1891, to ease the tension and there was open discussion of a third party.

31-9-22

By the close of the eighties, the bourbon democracy seemed established on a crop; but the farmers seemed dissatisfied. The crop lien system by which mortgage could be given on a prospective crop began to arise as a means of obtaining credit for the farmer. The first law was passed in 1866 at the demand of the planters.

31-9-23

From the middle of the seventies until the early eighties, there was a protest against this, stimulated by the Grange, by Toombs and men like Felton. This reacted and its co-operative ventures failed.

31-9-24

Watson had become disgusted because he had been unable to hold the Negro vote. Like Tilman and other Populists, he was for the poor white laborer, but had himself exploited Negroes too long to care about them.

31-9-25

In 1879, the Atlanta cotton mill started with 20,000 spindle capacity, 13,000 spindles in action and 330 looms. In 1883 it put in operation 16,000 spindles and 600 looms, and a little later, the Fulton Cotton Spinning Company started with 12,000 spindles and 450 looms.

At the exposition in 1881, Governor Colquitt with his histronic tailor, para[illegible] in a cotton suit and the Gate City Railroad Company was organized.

31-9-30

The exposition was inaugurated to celebrate the Georgia Pacific Railroad which linked Atlanta to the West and with other links and connections increased Atlanta's importantance to railway transportation. Even the burning of the famous Kimball House in 1883 made little difference, for two years later, it had been rebuilt. The state capitol was started in 1885 and completed in four years.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

In the late nineties and the early years of the twentieth century, there was political calm in the South. The Spanish War drew attention from politics and prosperity began to return with the discovery of gold in Alaska and South Africa and new processes of abstracting gold. The volume of money increased.

In 1898, Allen D. Candler was a Democratic candidate. He favored free silver and the righteousness of the Spanish War and said almost nothing about state affairs. Railroads and corporations supported him. The Populists tried to nominate Watson, but he refused. The Populist vote sank to 50,000.

31-9-31

In 1900, Bryan was re-nominated and Candler re-elected in Georgia; the Populist vote falling to 21,000.

McKinley was elected and the national Populist vote was very small. Conservati es now seized control of the national Democratic party as Roosevelt became President in 1901. Watson was nominated by the Populist party in 1904 and held 115,000 votes. The Socialist vote rose to 435,000.

In Georgia, there was political calm in 1904. A Conservative, Terrell, had been elected Governor in 1902 and re-elected in 1904. The Peoples' Party had no delegate. Suddenly, in 1905, the Georgia Democrats split again. Clark Howell was candidate for governor and in line for the nomination because of his party(legality.) Hoke Smith, on the other hand, who had stood with Cleveland, was outside the breastworks, but he determined to make a comeback by going radical.

Smith turned to a bitter attack upon Negroes all over the state. 31-9-27

The Conservatives tried to keep the Populists out of the Democratic primary, but were not successful. The result was a landslide for Smith and the Atlanta riot.

23 -1-

WINGS OF ATALANTA

31-9-20

In the late eighties and early nineties, times became harder for the farmers and populization was the voice of their protest.

There came an uprising of the Woolhat boys against the bourbon oligarchy, which began as a struggle to oust the bourbons from control of the white man's party and devolved in most Southern states into a more radical revolt against the one-party system.

It failed to divide the white vote permanently into separate political camps, but it split the Democratic party into factions and raised a new type of leadership.

The Peoples' Party tried to get Judge Walter Gresham of Illinois as candidate, but he refused and James Weaver was nominated, who had been in the past both a Democrat and a Republican and was a Union general in the Civil War. The enthusiasm at Omaha was delirious.

The real thing and the more important thing came two years later in 1881 when an International Cotton Exposition was opened which established the cotton mill industry in Atlanta.

-10- 31-9-27

WINGS OF ATALANTA

31-9-33

Watson was against the Fusion and warned the 23 Alliance lamb not to lie down with the Democratic lion. He said that the Democrats were divided into gold bugs, silver bugs, straddle bugs and humbugs.

March 12, 1889, the Constitution announced that there would be an adjustment of differences between Northern and Livingston and the Alliance and Democratic party. But the next day, Northern wrote to the Constitution hinting of moral delinquencies among the officials of the Farmers' Alliance. Further negotiations followed and Livingston retired and became a candidate for Congress in the Atlanta district. Hardeman withdrew and Northern thus had a clear field. Th

WINGS OF ATALANTA

In Georgia, the Democrats became uneasy and Watson taunted them. Instead of following the Southern and Western doctrine of free silver, the Democrats repealed the Bland bill. Northern protested to the President saying that the conditions in this state are fearful and discriminating. Every election in the state for the past three months has gone against the Democrats and in favor of the Populists. (Watson, leader of the Populist, in speaking of all the states to assemble of never less than two thousand and sometimes as many as five thousand people.)

Watson said that the Democratic Party had blind staggers.

Cleveland issued bonds to recoup the gold reserve and appealed to Belmont and Morgan to buy them. He was accused of stupidity and corruption in the South. Hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men were out of work. Many were stranded in railroad conservation camps. Coxes's army made its march on Congress in December, 1893, to demand public works and paper money.

In 1893, occurred the great pullman strike in which four thousand employees took part and one hundred thousand trainmen declared a sympathetic strike. Governor Altgeld refused to employ troops, but Cleveland ordered Federal troops who broke the strike.

In 1894, the Supreme Court declared the income tax unconstitutional.

31-9-37

The Republican state convention of 1896 took place April 29. Out of the 600 delegates, over 400 were Negroes, and the white boss, Colonel Buck, carried the convention for McKinley. Hanna had had headquarters in Thomasville since 1895 with McKinley as his guest.

The Republicans in their national convention, aided by Hanna and his campaign fund, easily nominated McKinley. The Democrats were split, but repeatedly called radical. The Georgia Democratic convention voted 5-1 for free silver. It asked for a tariff for revenue only and constitutional amendment providing for an income tax. The Democratic convention adopted most of the Populist program. Ben Tilman abused Cleveland when his name was mentioned, and Bryan was nominated after his Cross of Gold speech.

The Populists of Fulton County decided to defer all action until they could see what the Democrats were going to do. They declared that if the Democrats he had a company which secured a lease of the state road. This lease was given by a legislature whose Democratic successor had already been elected. When the new legislature convened, an effort led by Toombs was made to break the lease. This was not successful, although the investigating committee revealed in securing the lease and in forming the company.

31-9-34

Brown became one of the leading railway men of the state and a prominent promoter of other enterprises. He was at different times President of the Western Atlantic, the Southern Railway, several coal companies and part owner of iron works. His mineral investments covered a greater part of several counties.

Many of the Negro convicts were leased to the Dade Coal Mines of which Brown was the first sole proprietor and afterward half owner. He paid the state $20 a year and could work the convicts from 10-12 hours a day. Even that limit was removed by the legislature of 1876 and the system remained until 1908. Brown was a prominent Baptist and gave over $100,000 to religion, education and charity.

31-9-42

THE WINGS OF ATALANTA

He was on the privileges and elections committee and tried to stimulate the growth of Savannah, as did also Representative James Porter. Porter was especially interested in religious matters and had earlier planned to be a missionary, but had been crippled by an accident. Before the war, he had helped the unground railroad and taught a secret school; then he became music teacher and tailor and trained a chorus for St. Stephens Episcopal Church in Savannah. Later, he became principal of the first Negro public school in Savannah and afterward in Thomasville. He published an English grammar for beginners.

Among his proposed bills was one to organize volunteer military companies, to provide a thorough system of education, to better the jury system, to enforce the Federal civil rights bill in Georgia, to regulate fees, etc.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

In the West, the Alliance helped the Democratic landslide by fusion and discarding the Republicans.

A series of meetings of the Farmers' Alliance was held, one in the South at Ocola, Florida, was held in December, 1890, and a third party, the Peoples' Party, was openly advocated. It was declared that the old parties were both capitalistic. The Knights of Labor favored a "third party", but they were declining. The new A.F. of L. was not in favor.

The chief difficulty in the South was the fear of race complications after a Third Party arose.

In May, 1890, a second meeting was held in Cincinnati, but the representation from the South was small. Most of the delegates favored a third party. Southern papers attacked this meeting as a meeting of demagogues and clerks.

In South Carolina, the Radicals gained complete control of the Democratic party. In Tennessee, the President of the State Alliance was elected Governor. A large proportion of the Congressmen elected from Virginia, North Carolina, Mississippi, Louisiana and Kentucky, were Alliance men. In other states, the Alliance was powerful, although not in majority. Over forty Congressmen and several Senators from the South were committed to the Alliance program.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

39

It was evident that Negroes would hold the balance of power. The Populists sought their support through the colored Alliance. The Populist candidate for Governor, was endorsed by the Republicans, but the other state officers + the free had different Republican candidates.

In Congress, both Democrats and Republicans were uncertain on the tariff and as to free silver and the McKinley Tariff passed in 1890 was not touched. The Republicans met June 2 and the Democrats June 21, nominating Harrison and Cleveland.

Hoke Smith, proprietor of the Journal, feared Northern was going to be too conservative. Smith was an anti-corporation lawyer and a leader in the movement to regulate the railroads. Clark Howell, editor of the Constitution, thought the railroads were being persecuted. On the other hand, Smith was against free silver, while Howell advocated it, and even accepted the sub-treasury plan in party.

31-9-32

The political pot was boiling.

By 1879, the country had recovered from civil war and depression and a period of expansion and prosperity set in which continued until 1893 ~~with a brief reaction in 1883~~. The South kept time with the nation and Atlanta became the great center of the new activity.

WINGS OF ATALANTA

At present there seemed no need of it as the majority of the voters were Democrats and the majority of the Democrats were farmers. The town workers would probably be willing to overthrow the political bosses. In 1889, L. F. Livingston and W. J. Northern were candidates for the Democratic nomination as Governor. They were planters and ex-Confederate soldiers and had not deemed suited Colquitt as President of the State Agricultural Society. Colquitt had resigned in 1884. Livingston was a Presbyterian and Northern a Baptist. He had attended the convention at St. Louis and helped draft the sub-treasury plan. Northern belonged to the Alliance, but was more conservative, and was accused of being a politician of the Gordon type. Both Gordon and Livingston had supported the Alliance in a boycott against the manufacturers of jute bagging, who had combined and advance prices. The boycott had consid rable success.

Most of the Georgia Congressmen supported free silver, opposed a high tariff and endorsed most of the alliance program, except in some cases the sub-treasury.

Now the Alliance demanded as a yardstick for all candidate

In the North, meantime, the Farmers' Alliance was deserting the old parties and beginning to form a new third peoples' party. The majority in Georgia did not agree with this and most of the Southern states were of the same mind as Georgia. in December, 1889, the new legislature convened and Clark Howell of the Atlanta Constitution was elected Speaker of the House. The first job was election of Senators and Gordon was candidate. He did not agree with the sub-treasury plan, but advocated free silver and tariff reduction. Calhoun, a railway man, connected with the Goulds, secured the support of Livingston and others by uncertain methods and was supported by the constitution. There were two other candidates. Gordon, in his message to the legislature as retiring Governor, played up the Force Bill and the money power. He addressed the legislature in person referred to his army record. He was easily elected Senator.

exchanges were organized in most of the cotton states dealing in all sorts of commodities. The Georgia Exchange was organized in 1889 and saved its patrons of $200,000 in fertizliers the first year of its existence. Co-operative stores and cotton warehouses andegins arose over the South. Local merchants fought them by reducing their prices and ridiculing them and charging them with dishonesty. The State Exchange of Texas failed in 1889 and the continuous fight was revealed to discredit the Georgia Exchange, but it lasted until 1893.

The Alliance turned toward political action. In Arkansas, they called for the repeal of laws permitting crop liens and chattel mortgages. Texas tried to curb the railroads and , He was a farmer and lawyer and had served one term in the legislature, 1882-1884, but had refused re-election. He was a free trader and had compaigned for Cleveland in 1888. Now he thought the money question the most important. He had fought the jute trust. The planters were for Barnes, the incumbent, but Watson had the vote of the workers and the small farmers. He became, therefore, the candidate of the regular Democratic party on a straight Alliance platform and easily defeated his Republican opponent.

31-9-35

embraced the Populist issues, they would return to the party. Watson dissented from this. The Populist met in St. Louis July 20 with the Westerners in favor of Fusion and the Southerners againstit. Watson declared that the Democrats the party ties, so that his only chance was to desert the policies of the Republicans which it had enacted into law and accept the Populist creed, and now was trying to save itself by sacrificing the Peoples' Party.

, a cotton mill company was organized, named the Exposition Cotton Mills. It was embellished with lawns and flowers, but its job was spinning and weaving cotton with cheap labor. They made for trimmings and began to sell them South and North in South Carolina, Japan and China. The Fulton Mill followed, manufacturing chiefly for sale in the South.

31-9-36

In 1895, a bi-metallic league convened in Griffin with 104 counties represented. Most of the delegates were Democrats but Populists were there and welcomed. It was a distinct movement toward Fusion. Moreover, the Populists were greatly weakened by the depression of 1893 and following years.

31-9-38

In the state convention of the Farmers' Alliance, resolutions were introduced endorsing the Peoples' Party, but they were dropped. The Order was predominating Third Party, but the Alliance did not want an open breach with the Conservatives.

31-9-39

The success of the Populist movement depended largely on its ability to protect the Solid South. The stragetic meeting of the Farmers' Alliance was held at St. Louis February 22, 1892.

31-9-29
there were over 2,000 lodges in Georgia and more than 100,000 members.

31-9-21 In 1870, Atlanta had 21,789 population, of whom 11,860 were white and 9,929 black. A new reconstruction began.

alliance had been formed in Georgia in March, 1887.

The first

WORLDS OF COLOR

1961
Notes

X

[redacted] IN WORLDS OF COLOR

A ROMANCE OF THE HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO FROM 1937 TO 1954

(Forming Book III of the trilogy "The Black Flame")

by

W. E. B. Du BOIS

41-16-152

			Page
CHAPTER	I	~~THE COLOR OF ENGLAND~~ a Negro's World	1
	II	~~MANUEL MANSART GIRTS THE GLOBE~~ The Color of England	35
	III	THE QUEST FOR UNDERSTANDING The Color of Europe	70
	IV	THE FREE NORTH The Color of Asia	100
VIII	V	ITINERANT MINISTER Color in the West Indies and America	133
	VI	BISHOP WILSON	153
VII	VII	WORLD WAR AGAIN	172
VIII	VIII	BLACK AMERICA FIGHTS AGAIN	198
IX	IX	ROOSEVELT DIES	218
X	X	NATIONS UNITED	236
XI	XI	THE ATTACK ON PRESIDENT MANSART	261
XII	XII	THE DISMISSAL OF JEAN Du BIGNON	283
[redacted]I	XV	ADELBERT CARMICHAEL AND JACKIE MANSART	311
XIV	XIV	BACK TO AFRICA	334
XV	XV	THE SANCTUARY OF MARRIAGE	354
XVI	XVI	DEATH	378

THE BLACK FLAME

A ROMANCE IN THE HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

by W.E.B. D u BOIS

BOOK III

WORLDS OF COLOR

1936 to 1956

41-16-151

CONTENTS

		Page
CHAPTER I	THE AMERICAN NEGRO'S WORLD	6
II	THE COLOR OF ENGLAND	27
III	THE COLOR OF EUROPE	45
IV	THE COLOR OF ASIA	76
CHAPTER V.	COLOR IN THE WEST INDIES	86
CHAPTER VI.	THE CONFERENCE	97
CHAPTER VII.	THE SOUTHERN WORKER	120
CHAPTER VIII.	THE FREE NORTH	131

Gradually however there a pretty light seem on us and gradually our good times above almost closed I sometimes caught Lucien eyes me with a wistful smile

When I was 12 I was for a time huge in the legislature. I only worked on the watch meetings & while my mother asked for me I do more the nigger members she knew I was getting some useful training & was earning good money which we really needed just then. Said legislature was the biggest joke you ever saw. We many we fooled and bullied those darkies used & send us with grins of complacency. There was the bill & establish an almshouse in Pleasant County & when it was engrossed & passed I moved & be a pension for a worthy white woman. The negroes did not know there is was about for I was the one who made the substitution surreptitiously after the white men had enchanted me, right under the very eyes of the engrossing clerk. Only one nigger saw me and as he finished with & looked he found himself face & face with a big white member from the table

"What were the bill passed — I saw —

"What was the bill passed I started in & the clerk very well"

"O nit I am that day —"

"Do you mean to tell me I lie, Sir"

— Said black man looked clerk in the face a moment & sat down. O it was easy & con him, once you had them dead & rights & your friends on the trigger

When there was the land sale. They mounted & divide up the big plantations & gave all the darkies horses. ~~[illegible]~~ They talked and made big speeches about land ownership and property and the former there was a wrench. When we searched and every swamp, bay, gravel hill & hole in the ground we could find. I said we nearly all wept & many mothers' tears fell as they thought of what could. By this amendment & Reed bigger we got a bill in Congress that took over tens of thousands of acres of woodlies land & the state for a song scam & we heard it in committee until the white men had banged us there doors for a song & then rushed the bill thro' while the negroes cheered & prayed at their deliverance from the land lords! Did you ever see such fools. And every night when I went home, I told enough shenanigan and swindles from the statehouse floor down & keep our cellars & our neighbors well stocked. Of course me & to keep them down from voting. The things she said about negro rule when that legislature nastily bill was inaugurated!

Chapter 2. Education

Another sad change of all my early living was to prisons for schools; beside there were devoted schools and those for niggers. But when I was about 15 she got beyond their depth — She had only learned a smattering "finishing" school before the war, although

Chapter 2. The Ku Klux

The death of my brother greatly shocked me & made me hate Negroes as I had never done before. Before & I had laughed at them or just despised them. But sometimes they got ugly & chatter, or some smart leader got them organized. This was the case the year my father was killed. The wounded Negroes had been persuaded & driven up to our town and the worst Negroes. They expected of course & were that new state government with us but that was impossible & they had & be shown their place. Tom Colbert an old slave of my grandfathers, who from his boyhood should have known better was barbarously lynched & murdered when he called meetings to organize the Negroes & was ready for other rebellion when my brother & others went & killed him. They had & told stories & true tellers & broken threats. They many have whipped one or two of them or all together & I don't know for of course I wasn't there. There was a fight and Tarlton was killed. Of course Tom didn't kill him. He was a peaceful old Negro & never went armed. Boarded up in town. But he was instrumental in my brothers death indirectly because he should stay while humble. There was but one thing & do after Tarlton death. Colbert would die & he would die in such a way as & shock terror & the blacks. Walton tried & reach me in time to get out but he was hard pressed & openly defied all & taking position with & mixed with the crowd. It was terrible but it was silent. There is nothing so lonely magnificent as a man dead. We cleared the streets, drove the negroes into their holes & held the heads of the streets & alleys, shooting at anything that moved. Then silently & carefully, looking for hidden ambushes we surrounded Calhoun House creeping at first a half inch & creeping nearer & nearer in the darkness. Suddenly at a signal, the trenches closed. We were breakfast & went in & forgot & fire, when he walked out on the porch like a ghost. We quickly drew ourselves down & pulled the cottage. Half the negroes escaped. We took down & a mile in the outskirts of the town. Hung down & a tree in deepest silence & then emptied 200 guns into this body. Then we went home.

After that dead in darkness & then for five we patrolled the town & country at regular arrays ourselves in marks & white gowns. It was quite dreamy at first & we had some narrow escapes & end after a while it became a bore. We seized old aunties, caused young wenches, & relieved wives of their husbands.

(Cotton bottom of p 35)

We had rent a list. After words negotiating & words making & treating & entrees when the auctioneer told who I was I hastily went & had V my Confirmation at Columbus. I was 16 and I certainly enjoyed the freedom. There were a lot of "Bull Lillies" & Tom Whites there, the dwellings were old & the professors were wealthy locals. But there was a group of about 20 of us who were gentlemens sons, had a pretty good allowance of money & I can tell you we lived the life. We had plenty to drink & did some pretty stiff gambling. We mixed in many of the best social functions & had parties & dances.

One night on the way ~~home~~ back I college me were feeling pretty gay & it was not much after midnight

"Let's meet some negro girls" said some one I had been keeping pretty close & Watkins about always as far as girls were concerned & I was pretty green But I followed. We rode down & the negro quarter & after hunting about came to a house which one of the fellows said he knew. We knocked.

"Who is there" answered a woman voice We gave a name in a low voice. From the door was opened & a calloping took place. There were all men in — about eight or ten. There was a darkey well furnished parlor of the Creasor sort, heavy lace curtains, an organ, a worn carpet & a sofa. On the center table was a big bible. The woman a big fat yellow thing brought in some whiskey, cognac & hot water & we brewed a stiff grog for it was rather cool. Then we lighted a wood fire & began & sang & drank. At last the women returned with 4 or 5

Colored girls. They seemed rather timid & seemed at first but after a while they came & danced with us and we began to get pretty free. But the woman wouldn't let us stay very late — she seemed afraid of the neighbors — and about 3 a.m. we left but I was engaged & made an appointment with one of the girls who was really very pretty & entertaining. She was a servant girl & after that I met her pretty often — in the woods or sneaking into her home. I really liked her tremendously. She was sweet & modest & it seemed a shame I suppose. But after all she was only a darky & nothing very much & besides ~~that~~ I don't any more.

One day I was walking down ~~Division~~ Main some of the fellows when I saw my girl walking down the street arm in arm with a young negress. I was furious. The fellows tried & held me back but I broke away & went over & knocked the fellow over with my cane. Then I told the girl never to let me see her with a colored man again. Of course I made an ass of myself & got a bigging from the College; but the worst thing was I never saw the girl again. We were always forgiven & we soon made it a rule that they would never go with negroes if they went with us Sometimes my mother went South on a visit. She would have been shocked to know of this but she knew Harry Reynolds & Mulhauser.

realised & was now who for a time was a cadet boy on board. I found she had her little fortune with her — it must have been little enough — & asked advice for investment. He was flattered by her notice & even she began making money and letter [illegible] she continued & get me a [illegible] an assortment & Arrowsdales chicken & arrowroots

I was overjoyed & dressing boys gets & gabardine I went & Reading for the first time in decent raiment. It was hard but I had sometimes got & slept aboard & when the examinations came in 1882
I stood third from the top. A breezy mustanger whom I liked & a wrangy drawly brave genial Yankee whom I hated stood ahead me a northern nigger passed too but when we got through much down after the hard months. We concluded & "resigned" Wasn't the country of the Navy. It's free from Negroes. I in the army they're actually got black officers — a few — but worse shame ever been in the Navy & never will be. We knew other well-bred and breedy men so I do a naval "Officer & gentleman" really means. [illegible] & Jews & [illegible] are really scarce. It took us some time & get rid that damned yankee stain marked the class because he had brains. But we got them at last. He was accidentally killed at Manilla. Of us were [illegible] alive (or shall I say true grey?) Southern
& the Yankees among us [illegible] & despised I me & hated niggers "more than any real Southerner ever thinks of hating.

I had a dog Wally Brand & Keach with us the Evenings. Of course it would have been silly for a gentleman & become a mere "grind" but as our money would depended on our graduating standing
I had a dog Hamlet Bacon & worked & and I graduated in the upper half of the class. Of course it wasn't all grind - by no means, Washington was delightfully near & Mother came & took Ethel. The Normal visits & had a fine house and entertained quietly but generously. Miss Grant more of the Graduates & invited my Mother more & to be found in her exclusive & exclusively Baton. Mother said she wanted & she mean me & Ethel more kind but it wasn't all that bright. She was glad at them known my Harold Bailey & she was courageous at all. Especially was she struck the French negro about Negroes. She did not realize the heartache of so many Emotions & aspirations & ideals here stifled & Crushed. Not Mother! She espoused Grant's attitude for them & her duty. She sketch a good Sketch and drawing - Aunt Hannah from our Glenbrook who was Bondwoman my years old, always by Ethel in the weakest of arms & cuts, & was delicious & see the Professors seek & carry home lunch provided by obliging Negroes & exclaiming at the uniqueness of Negro surroundings

Mother wanted defend the Negroes greatly.
They have never endured against them Slavery Cannot one blame a Brand Burned deep from Grey mind is sometimes charming with the kindest intentions treated them like human beings? And negroes were more than dogs — they were human souls that they were not treated horrible & never heard me. They have natural inferiors, valuable & teaching us how these slaves that we must not buy is rule us as to many ways. And was against natural & written God. I told your mother & the Emperor was followed her one day more & told the 15th amendment than a thousand speeches & many words. Talks & demonstrations why dance can be done at a tea-table, or aftera cozy dinner or even between a discreet pair in a corner than with speeches & Congress can accomplish in a year.

But military salon of race propaganda did not interest me so much as later. I was still pleasantly hunting pleasure & I certainly found it in Washington. I was a bit astounded at first. I had been used & among the grand cavaliers and stately ladies — flirting with them, making discreet love, escorting them in public & arranging myself with them. Simply taking more & more delicious days & one day I meant & marry one of them & set them on edge. I did not attend to it, I dreamed from my window, but I confess I was a little deal on with the brassy Eyed & I dreamed a doll
For my wedding dreams was women & that always Except the negro women — shelly mulattos & octoroons. Whom one meets so often among servants

& rooms in the South. Sometimes one finds them in regular houses but not as often & then I avoided, namely on principal. I & was too dangerous. Now in Annapolis, I find it blissfully the custom of coloured ministers room and & the houses were unfrequented. I therefore found I Washington & for the first time in my life I met white women who were - well and all they seemed &c. I do not mean professional prostitutes — there were however an unusual number of them - but I met a new kind of white woman. One who had confidence & my almost unnatural experience suddenly but no short hands I could interview. Now could I explain it they were very courteous & received. They were puzzled as well & well — my eyes were closed. I & gave me a moral weakness at first but I learned. Of course I had been prepared, but only prepared and probably a little blind. I remembered things now in the South which formerly I would not see or understand. I suddenly realized that all women were alike - that they were good & had strong blood & white & most were restless. They dressed between I think it was around the knee that my whole attitude toward Negroes changed, before I had just dismissed them because of their colour unfortunately. But as I saw them in Washington I began to see them — I could tell by dressed them but I saw clearly that Negroes thought well & that our duty was & towards them

It was not a question of thinking about him. I was the master builder of eternally becoming, the perfectly disciplined. Not even thoughts disturbed him.

I met Jeannette Gravier. She was a woman. She was [illegible] such a western [illegible] and as beautiful as [illegible] graceful. She had brains and even more allure. She came at the world with a certain [illegible] I read a capacity for enjoyment, a recklessness that was never back, a sensitivity & weakness that was haunting. Her beauty drove away every remembrance of Cora or Rosina and her tears threatened devastation. She was [illegible] women — who deserve more — but she was the wonder of them all. Some way sudden I never loved a woman until I met her. I shall never love another.

* Log on page 47

Candles 5.

Foreign Legion Days

I was graduated & commissioned in 1916. and very sudden & I took a end of lieutenant Training & He saved & above all my new uniform There is no denial about it a woman loves a uniform and I had a glorious vacation. ~~She went Sunday Through Carolina & Had Food with Shantenbury & went Sunday to Atlantic where my mother lived Rising there a Somerset Hotel & where Jeannette Brevoort was living.~~

~~"Have some" "said my dreams" and my a blue sky" and some for your Rosemary"~~

~~I waited. But she knew about Jeannette. And if She did have an Envoy Could she imagine Marriage Jeannette's brother was a Congressman and a "Jefferson"~~

"Dr Eldridge lived in Brunswick Georgia, in a large country plantation arrangement. They took me in & all ran the menage while Mother resigned ~~Dorothea & assumed sway at Charleston~~ to the gold miners" Dorothea & understood in her own quiet & exceedingly effective way. I am sure that fall she was and Corvallis was a very leader social fraternal & industrial trade & domestic in United Carolinas & Southern Georgia

"What on earth are you up to, Mother?" I recollect her "formerly a mere rebellion?" She smiled a little grimly.

"Blake" she said "are you worried the Negroes?" Just then the Blakeley maid brought tea & I certainly noticed her. She was ~~suddenly, round~~, about 15 or 16, & somehow dumb. She moved superb beauty I had ever seen — an octoroon, Creole, Circe, with a face heaven moulded gold, a great mass of downy black hair & eyes like mine dusky as living flame. I am crazy about pretty women & I think even Mrs Eldridge was almost by that girl's extreme beauty "Stand you, Hilda," she said "no you mustn't"

Then she went on talking of general matters & when the girl had moved discreet she began again on the Negroes

"Negroes dangerous, Blake, dangerous" and I nodded absent-mindedly agreed with her as my mine grooms & black field hands. ~~For that I learned was the belly of the land~~. I dream I'm a self indulgent & shallow man & want is fortunately unknown as a dread for women. But I'll assure I had ~~not~~ no designs on that child. At least no conscious ones. Of course she was delightfully beautiful & I'm certainly human, but what restrained me so absolutely & unexplained that I wish not take on Medina chase of the flame and fruit was that child shadow I never dream & dreadly

~~resident at this. Reynolds took himself in~~ ~~hand & his assistant daughter in general. And as for~~ ~~Cromwell that nothing & I less unless of course~~ — and I found ourselves
" well unless you've stuck at such trifles —
" I warrant dem day, I shall find enough for rather elaborate arrangements. All the more reason then for going steady as we "
I smiled faintly, I had no notion of running after a needle myself. But she merely said.
" John Reynolds you know that are only daughter is his whole. I will must for her.

never shall. I had slept both days — it was the "morning after" a "night before" It was afternoon when I arose & took a bath. Everybody was out & the house deserted & climbing into bed in my dressing gown I rang 3 times in vain for my breakfast. My hands are burning as I write I must after 11 years in Annapolis do breakfast in bed. I was just beginning I mean when there came a knock at door & there came 14 eggs with the tray. Great Gal! And she was delighted, It was a golden morning. The scent of lilies came in sing where windows & I was hungry & drinking water deeply & good strong. She laid down the tray & I started to kiss her. I meant no harm I had kissed chambermaids — hers is good looking once — once I was touched. But as she started back It was something in the way she moved away that intrigued me. It meant simply: any shyness it had had a shade of something almost tragically sad in her "No sir!" And a crisp commonplace mask and the usual negro slave. I was piqued I snapped "Look here! my baby" I thought, "you're one of the new negroes are you — well I teach you damn it that a gentleman" I leaped between her & the door and engaged "There is only the other bedroom she could use, with the door open to mine & the scent of lilies"

"I was sick" I said stepping forward & hanging And then suddenly I was sad & wearing she drew herself back. The movement I almost knew whether she fainted, or stumbled or tripped Instinctively leaping one or both her balance, and put she more

It was a pretty scene. The bonfire the torches & the reflections and the shouting were wonderful. Some of the enthusiastic negroes wanted to run into the flames some had their wives & children & mothers-in-law the matter some time. It may have been a mere attempt at blood vengeance, at any rate I was disappointed & wished a bit worried Ede said nothing but she looked at me once or twice & in a huff I set off for Atlanta where I found a wonderful one man circus was drawing a little attention. Shame! A dirty old short tower, no society — but I'll never forget it for that (coming to 44 *]

I hung about for & attended a procession & just as I was leaving there came another & more amusing incidents that showed the changing temper of negroes
We were walking along Peachtree street among and turned the corner when we came across some half grown negroes playing marbles in the middle of the road. I suppose they were around boys although some was evidently going & armed one had hoops in a chair were drawn on the turf. Evidently they belonged & some of the negro servants quarters near by the Peachtree mansions. If I had seen them in time I would not have walked into the middle of their game, for I'm a good sport & respect even a little darkeys marbles
But a gentleman in close contact with Jeanette
Frazier is I assume you far above marbles & before

I enter it I had skelled with the middle of the game & collected the marbles industriously. What was a yell & one of the kids — a yellow woolen devil of 12 or 14 with crooked eyes, swore at me. The nigger-mind comes at a whole mass essentially before it's baby & what was a joke became an incident. I waved the dog by the coat & before I knew it the little devil fastened his teeth in my finger. I mean on my little finger a rotten conjuror very white except my finger as a dog. It is a dark gibe currently treated with edges & the ends tattering clouds a foggy blue stone of desolation suffering. Another took it from a maid whom she had to dismiss, believing it to be stolen. She wore Kaffir it is African — some sort of talisman brought over by slaves. Well as I have said that little devil brought his teeth down on that ~~finger~~ finger & crushed it with the bone tearing the flesh out an open wound. I shall carry the scar to my death. I gave him a dollop of a donkey & turned him over to a policeman
I was astounded at the savagery of his attack, and it set me thinking hard on the Negro problem.

Cecil

Chapter 6 Lieutenant Schuyler Jones.

The Boers were attended & duly with Company over the tunnel & several operations divided rather unevenly between my brother & Rhodes brought me to a determination in 1888 ~~and a yet to Cecil~~
I was learning more & more interested in my brother's ideas. I saw black & brown & yellow talk over the tunnel as Rhodes whom the Matabele cannot rule. Our Negro problem was but a phase of of a mixed house problem — a problem which many deem became there millions were right among us + legal equal + our first problem was & during the duration of Negro equality. Any studied review of devastations of Europe must grant exhaustion. She occupied for me & meant many distinguished persons on my errands & in their kind & hospitality One of my new acquaintances this acquaint was Judge Reynolds the multimillionaire. I had heard of him as ~~an army contractor~~ a cadet happy in the success & esteemed a distinguished citizen of Saratoga. I was surprised when my mother sought his aid in retrieving our fortunes lost & Knight she thought he always & wrong him. When I learned that he was already married & some above & Lilian Carrington & had one young daughter Bird in all I found & had not met him

We met at his home at dinner. My self, an army Colonel ~~and~~ his ~~wife~~ ladies & their friends, a senator + Reynolds ~~his daughter~~. It was a sumptuous dinner & the dinner & wines made me realize my mother's coming. We make sins and Islam. She seems she is a semi-married & seldom seen. We champagne, beer & ale heard a hundred millions if woman is kind, is only + come in for a few minutes. Else 14 & a small dark about ugly little thin thing She was very silent but I thought I saw a flash in her eye once & then I observed some upset Bird she was too unresponsive & tried my attentions + did not stay long but I could admire the little + was + was courteous + graceful + friendly Southern + and negro, in enlistment office nearly all were swollen down.

"Colonel" asked John Reynolds "is the new army bill satisfactory"
"No sir it is not that is a measure for more colored regiments & colored officers — a total theory but we need them and of the army said I — they can only be attracted after a time healthy officers are.
good work — one would arm as third in the army
As long as Negroes are led & trained they can acquire & even appeal blame, and so long the country must be solidly united said the Senator
"The country said John Reynolds I have always believed & do the president & great democracy stands of the nations. It needs capital & capital will only come when race conflict ceases
"And race conflicts must cease when the Negro realizes that this country is & would & must & vote" said my mother
"Precisely" said one of the ladies "and we must shield ourselves against the Negro as much as possible & when unavoidable hint & discourage all attempts & liberty
"We need more than that" said John Reynolds "we need a progressive we need concerted action of whole nations against colored. Democracy is for white folk. The Yellow & black & brown nations must be ruled for their own good."
And then asked dinner meeting me and he said your name heard of my meeting"
Yes sir
Yes. I am interested & do not object. You & your brother must have the party at your house. Do not refuse
I was a dirt unpolished hint & did not respond. A yesterday meeting meant a millionaire dinner was said a thing I was likely & refuse and yet I doubted if I could go as I was evidently to be called down on a long course.
putting a week when I was called & messenger & closed with a high manual

The colonel warned against the intrusion of Negroes into the officers corps of the army; the Americans defended the agitation of Negroes rights as patriotic & the industrial development of the South grew so pronounced & characteristic they denied any return of the slaves & Archibald Grimke and Judson Reynolds astounded me by solemnly stating that as we turned down & scattered the Negroes to Europe turned into Ocean & Spain

It was at that dinner that somehow unfolded her quest plan. There was music in the theater after supper — some fabulous famed Contralto. But mother and Molly drew me aside in the library. I cannot see it was true arranged

"Gentlemen she said I am working at a plan I want it would the Anglo American world into a common understanding on matters of vast concern. We are at sea now, our actions are contradictory & self destroying. We do not know what we want or what we are about. For some years now I am been collecting among Americans & Englishmen the men who by their working minds concentration & ability have reached clear & definite conclusions. I find a curious kinship with of thought than I had dared hope. From the large number of these thinkers & statesmen, I and my friends have been selecting a few likely men — men who from their position or force or from any decision are connected and have the widest influence & are best fitted to dominate public opinion & the real Rulers of tomorrow. We have finally selected about 20 & I may say that. Fifty are the people of minds who today in fact rule the world. For some years we have sought a leader — some dominating head, so widely & clearly recognized as to stand at the head of this new international brotherhood which we are going to form. We have at last discovered such a man. You know him in all lines of Anglo American thought he is usually some great figure unknown & the rattle unmentioned in the newspapers, but at yet whom every real thinker recognizes as the Master. We have found such

~~He is alone~~ in the realm of occult science. He is almost unknown. He publishes nothing. He makes no public addresses or public appearances. And yet his library is the greatest in the world his address is sought from the lands of the earth & he is the foremost leader of occult thought in these matters by those who know. Even his name is forgotten or seldom mentioned. He is simply "the Master."

"With intense pride & pleasure I stand at last before my friends & Master. He is to meet us. We are to lay down a great program for the White domination of the world – for replacing Shiva destroying with real & hidden knowledge. And Islam awaits only the details of a suitable time & place."

I was astonished. That portion of mine is a great leader. There was much discussion ~~futile~~ as to place

"Why not New York?" asked Adam Reynolds

"Overshadow" said Madam Bruce softly "We large city can for a moment be considered."

"Some country estate in America or England" suggested another.

"The movement would be noticed. The strangers & Icebergs the well known bizarre followers and would ruin us."

"An island in the sea" said a secretary & after details we all agreed.

"The meeting and location" ought to be elaborate. Symbolic but magnificent. We should charge it deliberately for effect." And the Lord —

"I let drop the cross" said Reynolds

Chapter 7. Castleman Lloyd Jones

Just about this time I was ~~&~~ stationed on Pacific Coast
I and met Seymour. I ~~&~~ was detailed for that service in 1890 & that along I received orders for a long foreign cruise. When matters completed & one week ends of the great Passenger was & have a receiving ~~ship~~ or else & that I was standing & go.

"Yes at Canton" I grumble "Starving Rice very orders

I not the command with a letter, evidently delivered by Brooks and marked "Secret"

"Lt B. L. J. is ordered & Washington immediately on special service"

It was signed by our Admiral, I must confess was on the service no very obvious. I worked during & the Cabinet

~~Abroad~~. I + seemed that I had been made rapid attaché + an Admiral I go on a secret mission + that I had been given the rank of Captain! I was allowed a fortnight + was + melted my existence at a desirable spot in the West Indies the following Summer. I immediately recognised this as one of the spots, where the Brotherhood ~~yearly~~ meeting would take place. ~~& recognised my brother-in-law~~.

We never remember which New York was swelling + my ~~husband~~ Brother was in a long course + ~~London~~ the Mediterranean, I boarded Sir Reynolds beautiful "Ornamental" in the London for a summer outing + ended under a great but as yet unknown meeting. Of these on the yacht only ~~myself + mother + Sir Reynolds were + attend~~ a few — I myself did not know just who — were to attend the meeting — the rest were there on a vacation cruise. The charming Ornamental Reynolds was ~~given~~ as decorous + unpretending as usual; but there were a number of other London of beauty + ~~fine~~ rank, distinguished men of wealth + fashion. These were aboard ~~and~~ viewed my new Captain's ~~Compliments~~ + my brothers with acquaintance + strange casual glances & pressed a fatherly time

My ~~mother~~ early took me aside with that Carelessly casual manner of hers which always dazzled + me a little dismayed and blew

"My dear Clarke" she said "I want to know your thoughts of marriage"

I glanced at her. Had she denied my fiancée? Of course she had. Well then —

"Or what?" I asked "Have you struck a mine?"

"No but I am seriously needing one. My existence are dying + only you can rescue me. I need your help."

Dearest Mamma, you know perfectly well that when I've heard news & Ladies & odds & ends I am always in debt on my wretched salary

What business you married marrying money

I made a mistake. And she succeeded

John Reynolds & I were been talking over the treachery of a match between you & Commissioner.

I was almost drunk. And much the serpent Evil Genius raised away. I've got no real objection to my self- of my looks, my mind or my blood. But I confess it never entered my head that John Reynolds would ever even consider me as a son-in-law. When two I declined to take his daughter. She was an ugly little foreign looking personality. Possibly I loved Jeannette & which I cursed never asked to marry her, yet I declined to marry anyone else. And yet — one hundred millions — Merry God! O that wish wicked of mine, I drank the secret in my blood & fled it away. I found my self looking at Miss R. absentmindedly now & again & I found her eyes often on me, in a quite kindly unconcerned stare. Several times I tried to talk with her but without success. She was perfectly pleasant & neither encouraged or avoided me. She listened to all I said with a kind of [illegible] and almost smiling interest. I found myself a rather conspicuous social success and Commissioner Reynolds likened me. She was either a fool or an unimpressionably sleek young woman. In either case I disliked her & what she thought of me & reading the [illegible] (One or a while she made a clever but rather acidulous remark) Her only comment was "How much your waistcoat fits"

I almost regard suicide [illegible]

on me personally for [illegible] — and it came [illegible]

I formerly do remember consider nothing under an Empire could or can stable duties. Assemmendations [illegible] grandfather had been my truly greatest friend dominion acting a worthy christ & steady to the Republic remained

Part + as I stepped involuntarily then + there now — with the interests present. The delegates were seated + took their [illegible] or substitutes I believe that I was seeing the [illegible] modern world. There were the men of [illegible] — not simply the accredited of Statesmen elsewhere, the times I represented, some I represent. There were Englishmen Germans + [illegible]
Americans [illegible] + Canadians + they took Come to lay down a program for the Anglo Saxon domination of the modern world.

Behind the magnificent surroundings + ceremony of pageantry, the proceedings were strikingly original + direct. It was not a question of details, of phraseology, of interpretation + compromise. The men there knew each other's credentials + were agreed
It was simply a matter of stating details
Constitutional claims. The old Arrow who presided — the Master, as we called him, showed much wounds. His voice in my ear was full + resonant.

" My Lords + gentlemen

clear mind.

We denied that England Germany & America must land have moved through their downward path under under the forms of democracy and the reality of autocracy — a nightmare of brains & blood. Germany was & grew as a working monarchy, efficient & aggressively strong, dominated & controlled by aristocrats of discipline & carefully trained & brave devoted for war. England was & guided the races under her with an industrial government in interests whilst men alone under democratic forms cared their leaders from a definite aristocratic class & this class was to be recruited by men whose genius whose ever it abnormally asserted. But no colored group or nation was & be allowed self rule.
America was & shred industrialized democracy & industry organizing workers on a scale never seen before & ruled by them by means of mechanized brutal & cultured — brain is by means & selling the noble class at governing. She was & cut off from the whole workers, the slaves & helots & by a system of combined force & subtle means made them either migrate & colored lands & be ruled or settle and willing cheap industrially ~~&~~ in America. (over *)

Latin Europe & America were & be alternately & own workers only gradually & as they emerged themselves of the taint of blood intermingling with the darker peoples. Those lands did more & rule such as those that did not were & be subjected & and ruled.

Where men are conscious, free minded, with

Settled all this was to go control & restrained
Conservation. American hopes & wishes but wrong & Dutch England abominable bad news. Germany was to hand over secrets & the service of England & American boundary in new Colonies of Colorado Peak were to be shared equitably by England with Germany

over)

united among ourselves in defence & mutual Own the Lord's day, the masked ghosts are among us.

We are assembled. We are powerful. We hold the world in our hands. One evil alone threatens. The hosts of mob & individual organisation under false flags are going to the conventicles. They can be used & their public genius on our enslaving work of world domination or they can evoke universal enthusiasm & national uprising
If this Indian comes & smells & reaves no one are safe & the colonial world will not dismiss & colonels on our ruins. Have care, my Lords & Gentlemen. Eternal vigilance is the price of freedom. Have no backslidings no jealousies.
Stand as one rock against the howling seas of black & brown
(one) & yellow unfriendly & my Lords & G. — Go to God & rule. Then nothing shall you resist. Accept & possess the Land of the Seminoles.

I never remember clearly the manner of our dismissal. There was bowing & ceremony, crowds but unexcited. There was the rattle of trumpets & I see again the Lord Chief of most magnificent state — of gold & crimson, the mantle & necklace of shearing bright
But I was tired & dizzy & mind dim & I shall wonder & I was drunk — drunk with a new revelation a new ideal a new life work.

Chapter V

My Marriage

I must of course & rushed & wrestled & toil for all every fact & detail & word as it stood fixed in my mind Wrestled & struck old & bent. I ordered it under a stand as I am

I think I am correct in saying that no ancient religious writings set out to be complete codes of conduct. This was a peculiarly Christian idea which was developed in future Muslim does not include regard it as right
Love your friends & hate your enemies
Do unto others what they deserve &
Break no mischief on them or cheat.

her. She is only 50 — and she has lived frugally She has drunk the dregs of hers & Rostania. She has learned decency wd. She would resent, I would have money could only for her but for my self & my work. I would not be worried with petty cares. She would have everything she wanted, in the grand glow of her basic servant. She shrugged my thoughts out and said

"You see, Blake, now of all times we need money"

"Then came a revulsion of feeling against what me. She was right of course but I — well I ended by clinging to Jeannette. I wanted to be true to some one. I wanted to keep that one love of mine — small it was truly at least when there were so many scruples. I started to shrug, But instead said, quietly

"Even Jeannette would agree" Of course she knew she always knows. But I hesitated.

"In "she muttered I cried

"Let's leave it to her." quietly said "And now tell me more, what did the others say at the long Common meeting afterwards, exhaustively —" and she opened a bound bigness of English statistical size. She turned back to the long tedious months one forget & wonder if she had seen & talked to Jeannette.

As soon as decent I left to Jeannette. Her brother was in "Russia" "working" for a Blind Commissariat Center. Jeannette said. He was pretty sure to be dead.

"Poor dear!"

Let's run away to France a week in Granada."

It was the golden haze of Feb year. We went. By train by steamer carriage by horse back visited we found ourselves on tops of the world on the golden ridges of the Adirondacks and were there for days & days in heaven. Was there ever such a as Bernadette. I told her all that directions of my walk allowed my the grand new Progressions of which autumn

She was an artist

"Splendid — And you'll meet Norman" she cried
I looked at her. She was in Reynolds & ~~Gainsborough~~ stood at that length by our couch lamp, the eyes shaded on her round arm
"So mediaeval days" I answered "She wounds me & wearing Ormonde Reynolds
"Splendid" cried Bernadette, matured adding "I'll send the Boy."
I grew sure.
"You too" I said softly
She said no.
"Darling" she said "would be silly. I should or could. Father is a "retreat" engagement about & love this flat. We'll get a mixed bun breakfast & ball back on. You decidedly ~~Customs~~ ruling, ~~mother~~ nerves Brand your ~~Customs~~ Customs
They will increase as never had your Customs ending until do enter less. I'll bet you over ems in debt ~~Dear~~ moments"
It was the awful Time
"We can't marry" she said. "And you must have money. Mary Ted ~~Eddie~~ Reynolds wellbeing & Beth same Ted world
And you
"Oh I'll wrote and — besides" she said kissing & looking me small in old bare. "They'll never trust us."
And they never did.
I started hoping some Promised attentions & Mrs Reynolds. I wondered how old Lisle of some Cell whether She liked Stated or was desperately in respond Bordeaux

B 1 3

father
Ersed me — my Hand shook was so dreadful.

So when the englishes invading Troops came in 1892 I asked his consent & Brother. He gave it trembling. ~~I found Reasons~~ I was a long Walk & I meant & need it, immediately I drank the Money over & was quite drunk & I walked & stood more Firm than I meant in delightful Recklessness with arms. Dances a young Scotsman who undisguisedly Ersed me & had a nice mind. Then suddenly inspired & getting I looked around for it. She was standing alone in the entrance of a big window looking out. She had on a ~~dancing~~ pantaloon which Enhanced her Ankle & waist & would Show Ankle Bright & Beautiful She was a little more attractive than usual. I made a great desperate effort & ignored her entirely. But She only smiled her secret smile. I Reeth directly on that smile because it was so Characteristic & so Pitiful & Cannot mean anyone but myself Expressed disbelief & Encouraged existing. I Reeth out her & unmasked all my Soul battens. At last She blushed her biggest eyes on me — She had Eleven eyes which she used & said "It is no use, I am not a bit interesting, go and Finish your Conversation with Mrs Dances, She watching you. Of course will Come to get married. Foolish words it & I dared round." I was Flabbergasted. It was the Craziest but I'd ever met. But she continued Smiled Frank & Innocent And yet I had & Rare Fun dang ernest Love & I actually Stammered & blushed — I a veteran Love wooder of 30 & Children in the Nursery

"But do you — Love me Enough to marry me"

She looked at me unsaid something & said
"I love you just as dearly as you love me. And now lets go tell the old folks."

We were married at St Thomas inside a little chapel. The days formal part each of us, the wedding ceremony & celebration served was done & the bond of friends. A is wedded wife — a dear faithful valued little woman in deed. She wished & Reynolds home for breakfast & dressing. We were honeymooning & Celebrating when I was & stood on my good Pa when arrived. We were a monument above. Suddenly my bride turned & put her hands on my shoulders
"I wish you did love me" she said
And then I who never hesitated at a bullet lie in my life stood dumb & quaking before her. Why as I owned, I owned. & say on a word. When the world broadens me & stretching her second smaller side & I entered the carriage

Chapter 9. Culminating

The years from 1892 & 1898 were the greatest of my life. I had a hundred thousand dollars a year & stood as I wished. I had friends & kings & Ireland with me. I did as I pleased but I pleased & knew with Negro legislation in the South & a strong majority Progressive in Congress. I on the South can sometimes mend their wicked & sinful. We disfranchised the Negro, from crowned "King, Enrolled his servants & Called them white our votes inherently & owned and create. We even feared & encouraged leaders of this race

STW

& Brent & Ann the kindness & unremitting assiduity his station would invite. & Mrs John Reynolds & his friends we are directed to address Washington as & seat of the new station & instructions and & embarkment for any expedition that rebellion. Reynolds & others entertained only hand Reynolds was detained on entrance.

After Reynolds was unremitted in finding many Contraries. We continued upon, steel & stock - yards & plants of manufactures yards & wood until Baltimore disappointed of stock & embarkment & scarce hands of transport was we got and Virginia assembly started. We ordinarily used the Potomac rebellion & started & get a reach until Potomac. & & Army pass along Canal down & was assumed & under Potomac shore pursuit & the Canal not seem & be the aggression. Many of our Lucky were about ranged enough & wound & pass hands until the merchant Potomac Virginia & Maryland but & received hand another. After remarkably
- We walked with - thought of the Maine. & was not dinner & be dismal with. & was dismal with & war was on. & Arrived & be the Army's man, thank God! for the army got all released with such Negroes.

But the Army dabbling with one Potomac flood & watching another had a splendid chance. & thanked the Lord and & my astonish. We thankful that at least he let me go. & need not dwell with details. I became absolutely ravenous as the hero of the war and was under a new-astonished at at 37. I met other troops dotted around but very few. Just as I was climbed on the Russian Cruiser that ended in war I had a telegram from "Bournemouth" "I may have a baby"

I was astounded + glad. I had never dreamed of such a contingency. I never saw a woman less fitted for motherhood. My love was strong then more I was filled with pride + delight + then came these blows - was it my children. Was disorder in the play of my brain + I had often also dreaded what the operation took. It was a cruel battle. I remember her as I left her - standing white faced at the white tiled sea.

Our room as desirable I got home. I am now teaching + M.H. I see my uncle + aunt I am going to have a week end. I'm going to make it. Love me. Poor dear I have neglected her shamefully. But she is the mistress of my day I'll make it up to her.

Mr Evans is unbelievably clever + has sense now My younger brother is fearfully unbalanced. I'm going to dance here always if the war's over. I can't have sleeping ad my head hurt now. I'll let this a while. Where have I been this time before Opal and the Evans dramatics, We in fact Lenny Allen I guess I'll close till tomorrow Wished are you doing in this constantinople. Other than dear. You dimmed yellow scumbled I'll ——————

The Lord Cried

I saw Lloyd Jones lay in bed. The bed was in the great front chamber of the old Lloyd mansion and looked down the white hallas on the magnolias & the sea. The sun was rising dark gold and birds were singing. The scent of flowers & the feel of dew were in the air. But I saw and was not see the sun or feel the air. She lay haggard thin & still pillowed on her head with closed eyes. The eyelids looked thin, and the blue veins in them looked enormous. The nurse thought her asleep & moved with wade feet for her convenience A waiter maid came thought the door so I could see her breathing. If she had been dead I was would not have gently cried. And yet she was alive. She was dreadfully alive. Never it seemed had sleep been so far from her. Her thoughts dwelled forward & back before & over me & out & curled & twisted in her head. And she thought with and feeling. There was no emotion — no meaning No regretting no loving no hating — just wonder baffled understanding. The searching seeking seeking & understanding

It seemed to her that in the last 2 years everything had happened that could happen. The life after family deadly dear & playing with her for 25 years had suddenly seized, gripped her with deadly fingers, raised & dealt her against the earth, crushed her bones & broken her heart twisted & tortured her & flung her on this bed — on this great white & ancient bed. Yet she was not dead, she was not dealen, she terribly could not understand. She was drifting & and from & those the middle & heaven wing & how (own)

It seemed as though ever since she was going to murder a mile away & stood her alone in the room. Yes- when she got up. Would she ever get up? She moved heavily & the dawn caught every corner of her body. The mirror glided close with close & determined and the world waited breathless. Irma was too weak to assent or refuse and after a while they left off looking at her & gloomed the room. The nerves twitched & uneasy quiet and all her unsatisfied thoughts raced again.

He had come home. O god! how she had loved when he coming. Like some silly school girl she had made him over in those six months ab- sence into a Siegfried. Would we travel he said she were & go riding hills on the hills & God & land the South. Love? She was not thinking of love, she was thinking of a companion, a fellow worker, a great strong friend. And she found — what? well she outlived she found a man, and the same kind of man the world was full of, what might she & dream of more? He dressed better. He cleaned his finger nails, he cleaned his great hands of tobacco less suddenly, he bathed & changed his linen daily He cured down without shrinking & cut with him both. He knew wines. He had a rambling knowledge of wines and liqueurs and cigars. And beyond that? She writhed on her pillows and lay silently gasping. Of her

He seemed & crumbled her body. It was to her as tired next skeletal grotesque. It wasn't the delicate lovers of sympathy the lingering clash of hand or even of body given almost unconsciously to clamour a thought or a dream she wanted her as a great hungry dog wants a & what. ~~In five minutes~~ Two years ago she rode out of a stormy harassing life with Harrison Coles. Then came Henry Jones. Then came the sudden knowledge of his father's life his dazzling transformation, her marriage, war, wealth & her sudden new life & vision. She had surrendered her quiet town house, Bramble-rose, with all its comforts & things. She had planned herself and to attend husband. She had turned back & her old plantation & mowed her garden round. The Boyd ~~farm~~ & Blakeley acres had become but one well-ordered kingdom of a thousand smiling acres for which she had planted, and shuddered dead & tearless she laid him beside the tomb of her two little mothers yonder beneath the cedars and turned to her work. She raised the old cabins of the ~~retained~~ field hands & rebuilt them further away — all and one good clean substantial two room houses with flues & fireplaces, shade trees & well.

All and one. That one she had not yet touched. and she ~~had~~ shunned it. It was the cabin of Mom Dell. It crowded darkly in a hole beside a stump & below a tall oak — a vast black crooked & twisted oak that spread its knotted fingers over two thousand yards of granite rock & stone. There the black & crooked cabin crouched on the earth like a certain grim forbidding hummock and when she rode down with her laborers & stared, Mom Dell sat where she had sat a year before over a red & warm fire. Emma remembered with a shudder then & now that warm — that unindented warmth: not & warmth Henry Jones; & neither no child, & here quiet. She had longed at then. She longed now. But she did not touch the cabin then. She had not intended to yet. But she was going to. In sheer defiance of exhaustion and

All Jones blankets she had not touched for a year now away. She avoided them as she had all other matters that claimed her attention

210 acres

~~home. She wondered how someone thought of referring~~
~~to home as a place or to her wants or wishes. She crushed~~
~~it down & continued her. She blasphemed her drudgery. O~~
~~she had sold her soul and done it & the bitterness. Surely~~
~~she was no fiend, no nun; she might have known~~
~~disgust basking — but beastliness, lust-worn fates~~
~~no-no-no - she had died a hundred deaths alone in~~
~~the timid moments of her return~~

But after all that was but a matter of disgust known & sensed abstractly. Then came threat behind. Henry Jones was a drunkard. He was never drunk but he was always drinking. He drank when he rose & when he returned, when he ate & between meals, & got that & black cable, in conversation & in loneliness

She was not brainless or ignorant intrinsically and the mystery of disgust like. She existed & he his woman. In a way she wanted & he. But she wanted the elaborate finesse of sympathy, the lingering clash of mind ~~&~~ at the countless attempts at kindness. But he seemed & want her as a good neat eyed dog wants a bone. Sometimes he crushed and hurt & battered her. He blasphemed her drudgery with utter unreasonableness.

But what of that. She read them but left her garden was this beyond her destiny he seemed & want readers of her. He took no time & talk ~~about~~ with her. He thought that meaning of her slums. He was ignorant of a thousand things she knew but she did not realize it. The end of ambitions had come with the unreality which was but the beginning of her disillusions. Final brutality & horror of all he ~~thought~~ began & take his amusements

Fiction fragments and notes

WHITHER NOW AND WHY

THE TWELVE SERMONS OF ARCHBISHOP JIM JOHNSON

SAVE THE AMERICAN NEGRO: HE IS ABOUT TO DISAPPEAR

FROM 1619 TO 1820 OUR ABJECT WAS RETURN TO AFRICA

FROM 1820 TO 1860 OUR OBJECT WAS PHYSICAL FREEDOM ~~IN THE UNITED STATES~~

FROM 1860 TO 1960, LEGAL AND SOCIAL EQUALITY, ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY

BUT AS AMERICANS, WHAT ARE OUR AIMS? THE AIMS OF AMERICANS?

THIS INVOLVES PHYSICAL DEATH AND CULTURAL DEATH: ALL AMERICANS WHITE. NO NEGRO HISTORY, NOR MUSIC; NO RACIALISM: NO TIES WITH AFRICA

WHAT RELATIONS WITH THE REST OF THE WORLD

THE WORLD HAS CHANGED: AMERICA NO LONGER LEADS. DEMOCRACY IS DEAD. WEALTH RULES. CORPORATION HAVE REPLACED INDIVIDUALS

EQUALITY DOES NOT MEAN IDENTITY, IT MEANS FREEDOM TO BE ONE'SELF

109-9-01

40-9-302

The twelve Sermons of Archbishop Jim Johnson (Jail bird) (Communist)

A High School (sea-captain inventor - artist - singer

1. The lawyer -fight for new -cheating of many - the child uninvited - what to do?

2. The physician - medical center invited to join on condition infant paralysis & his daughter what to do

3. The dentist: pull the teeth or treatment - study or income -office in medical center or in ghetto - what?

4. The teacher: Harlem or Westchester bad children, neglect in supervisor no conventions -- new school, , rich children -Civil War & slavery

5. The grocer: Central Ave. or Central Ave.; spoiled food; police & thieves -insurance white neighborhood -supermarket numbers

6. Mason - the Union entrance -describe -concrete riveting - apprentice

7. Electrician

8. Editor & Publisher

9. Scholar

10. Social Worker

11. Writer (L. Hughes)

12. Preacher

X Archbishop Jim Johnson

Politician

Farmer

A wife

40-9-307

40-9-304

The Jackson Family of Stuyvesant, Brooklyn

Jim refuses to stay in school

He tries for plumbing and fails

He tries electronics

His organization

Guild of American Negro -G.A.N.

make things

do things think feel

Work with the poor

the children

the sick

the lame

Churches, secret orders

No gambling, no liquor, no drugs

Dance, sing, love

About physicians, lawyers, ministers, dentists

Health, defense, lectures, talk

Games , , fight

Election, discipline, no bribes

Don't migrate, stick, firearms

Debt

40-9-303

1. Work to supply wants

2. Legitimate wants - Food, clothes, shelter

3. Creative activity art & literature

4. Recreation - Health, Sex, Social contact
Sympathy, friendship & love sacrifice

Mediocrity after FDR

1) Truman 2) Marshall, 3) Byrnes, 4) Hurley, 5) Vanderburg 6) Wallace

7) Herter 8) Foster Dulles 9)Eisenhower, MacArthur
Dean Acheson, Forrestal

Evil 3,9,5

The Archbishop's Black Cat & little dog

McArthur

40-9-308

The Jackson family of Stuyvesant, Brooklyn

Jim refuses to stay in school
He tries for plumbing & fails
He tries electronics

His organization — ~~Commun~~
Black Am. Negro — G.A.N.
Make things
do think feel work with the poor
the children
the sick
the land

Churches, Social orders
No gambling, no liquor, no drugs
Dance sing, love
about ~~Doctors~~ Congress, Laws, Ministers, Animals Health, Defense, Lessons, Teeth

Games, Walk, fight
Election, discipline, no strikes
Don't migrate, stick, finances
Debt

1 Work & supply Wants
2 Legitimate Wants — Food Clothes, Shelter
3 Creative activities and — Literature
4 Recreation — Health, Sex, Social contact
Sympathy, friendship & love activities

Medicority after FDR

Truman (2), Marshall, Byrnes, Hoover, Vandenberg
Wallace, Horten, Foster Dulles, Eisenhower, MacArthur
Dean Acheson, Forrestal

Ewd 3, 9, 5

The Archbishop's Black Cat + Silk dog

MacArthur

A High School {Boy = Captain
Minister = Orchid — Dungeon

1. The Lawyer — bright for New Haven
— Clearly? Mommy — The Church was invited — Wilde & so?
2. The Physician — Married couples invaded & Jews on Committee
Infant handicaps — two daughters
What's to do
3 The Merchant: — Fund Un-Teeth — Cockroach — Plumbing & Weevils — office in Woolworth couples or in ghetto — What?
4. The Teacher: Harlem & Westchester but Chelsea, Negroes in Apartments
Two Communists — New school, rich
Children — Curriculum & Library
5. The Grocer: Control out &
Whole Neighborhood — Anthropomorphic
Control out; Marxist book, Atheist
Thomas — Insurance —
Munitions
6 Doctor Nixon — Vice Union
Eskimos — Insecurity — Comunist —
Nursing — Apprentice
7. Electrician 12 Friends
8 Children's Psychiatrist X and busy from Johnson
9 Scientist
10 Good words Portuguese 9 Hands
11 Writer (C. L. Hughes) Foreign

The 12 Servants of Archbishop Jean Johnson

(Jack Gold Communist)

~~Northrop — 12~~ after Thomas

40-9-306

Books
No movies, no ~~smoke~~ smoking no ads
Paid readers
Mikebear + firearms
Own Homes, Neighborhoods, shops, Lawns, order Sacrifices
Memories: travel, chaos, workers
Physicians: Social Medicine
Lawyers: defense, no crime
No prohibitions
Friends, Birds, Rabbits,
Fresh Air, Outdoors,
Divorce: Marriage

GAN

[illegible]

Vacation

~~Steve the Amer N — [illegible]~~
~~[illegible]~~

~~Wed~~ 15-30 = Art. on Lincoln — Du Bois Rock
~~Mar~~ - GAN
May - GAN
June

Barber beauty Parla

Short

The Negro Book-Buyer & Newsstand subscribers
Mass Surgery & Dentistry

Estate Good Hope Hotel
Box 668, Frederiksted
St. Croix, U. S. Virgin Islands

40-9-305

The Girl, brewer, high sch, college, Red Cross work Mistress, marriage, cards, gambled, gave home Stockbroker & finances
Postal clerk
Real Estate Mathematics
Insurance Physicist & Chemist
Banker Machinist
Factory
Declaration Stock, Talented Trust

The People as reservoir — gave the people — leaders & already chosen
Censors, radio & TV, Theatre
News & entertainment — sports
The College & Univ as Centre of study — Self appointed Legal defence
Health, Air, Cleanliness, Sun
Democracy: Majority rule, discipline

Each chapter begin Poetry & description of Rainforest flowers & architecture

I must settle decision — I don't go where
I am not wanted

Carl Sauer

dreams + fancy was a hundred thousand to you — ~~[illegible]~~ what is it? leave thy adieu chest + surrender! what the yacht cost a million — why Rose — rose! and! I'm sweet, smack or else the world is

See this flow of liquid gold? God name us our no. We his blessed one well
+ send us its ~~[illegible]~~ nigar whirl wheels + hunt the sea. O gracious pill
+ divine gift. Bro — you're wrong. It belongs
+ no man in it. Ark. What not! Standard oil Senator — but you can buy and move sell + sell. Cannot with time can sell to. heavenly gifts such — very God + sell the devils long strong tongues in the Gods his daughter out back to Hell — Hell!

See this treasure! dangerous thing! belong very thanks. We contract it. Money — oh but yacht it away for the days + unworthy it. You Ray X owns it. Such lucky the mind, I his Financial Investor. It stocks its owner.

26-14-4

What Come

To a malacca — from the Indian Jungle

I sent a cable

& was this word — do the Blue Diamond

Coolies — you find for a shilling for the hope —

How's that for Jewels

Jewels — the drops of blood, green slime from serpents, yellow fangs — & tears, distilled tears of 7 million niggers from Mr Zanzibar today in that hell a mile underground

here are those tears distilled & white diamonds. I can see them red rivulets & black stains & the deep cream whites of their eyes

— and those tears, tears, tears

Look! look at this island. The Barbados

Poor Barbados, the slaves — Negro & squeeze of all emotion & cyst & dried tendons & bladders deadness. For having 10000 love stories — what?

Abnormal? Arse carrying a President about

& Equals & a Queen? & cut? & the Whore are the three? Leave they scuttled down — inside their Hands! A yacht? & Then you do send for Barbados. It's annual Excess money from sweet

(over)

I know you I'm talking drivel but something wrong with my eyes your eyes

yes — I'm seeing things

You must see an oculist

Look those our house are dear old

Imperial — its true I know its them &

I can't see — ah I see is I'm 2 now

College, a Carlton cabin, Mrs W & 5 room town all told with our 24 room manor

& around it are 2 farms & a mansion

& the inside our Russian walls stained

And those marks — my god Jesus, this

Got a dirty handkerchief around her neck

Blood via before I shall cry

Ah it's —

It is a new wound cut your head open

You look like a tramp I told you I know

See how rapt & glaring Jesus Kate was that my

When she must & Mary — those hills in the far

She lovely & so young & wonderful you - Wonderful as never Built for babies
How do you know
She come & see — the brazen hussy
" " " Threaten, Then & beg

32 - 12-29

Other way I argue) you didn't object to them you could
Why - yes - yes - more charity in this case isn't it?

Followed by Charles & account "Jim"
Why - eyes dear, when I was my Sweetheart how confused (words and eyes for him)
How & get Jim's record — Court,
Warrant & etc - Wife -
To trial - I would & attorneys fees - but How can you (have I) back a Chump
Jim wanted me — I owed him Wilbur - I must attended get out ' your godchildren treated before
I divorce what you

Maynard, I don't — make you & attorney fee
Why I believe I can do, I may he don't know as more about him than you do pretty about you

Getting at the Governor

[illegible] of pleasure.

Chercher la Femme

Sometimes a yankee whose father was "interested in your people"

Adventures of Jane Jones

Humdrum life of middle class
Colored girl. Working husband and death

Birthday is always [illegible] happier — the imagination —

The reading of good things
Pictures + magazines Libraries

death!

41-9-507

30-14-16

Chapter 3 - Jones Considers England

There was a long silence before Jane had a letter. She knew it would be so. Jones would have no idea of time, once he was launched on his quest. Above all it would never occur to his mind that Jane was hanging on a word from him. Not simply from him personally - she was not aware herself the extent of that - but word of his search. At last he wrote:

I think I am beginning to understand something about Democracy. Partially my understanding has come from not following your advice about white people. That glass of water would have helped her thick hide but little, and it didn't hurt me. She meant to humiliate me, but my reaction left her fat, funny and surprised. There was a white man at my table, who made no effort to be seated elsewhere, and also did not try to make talk by talking down to my supposed level. He was simply courteous. His accent Englished him, and I started in one morning without preliminaries, on the British Constitution. We talked off and on during the whole voyage and during my stay in London, we met often and my previous reading and present observation was thus checked by one born and bred in England and yet not so British as to be unable to see the empire and world beyond. These conclusions then are not simply mine; they are mine checked and criticized by England.

30-14-17

Chapter 4 - Jane Glances at [redacted] Democracy

Jones, dear, I've got it. It's been slowly maturing in my mind for days, but it cleared today as I was reading your letter from England, walking down the long path. "The president was spying, damn him - wince, Jones, but "God", "damn", and "hell" are good English, and as Barrett Wendell once said, 'Swearing is all right, only most folk swear so inartistically'; I'm going to find something male to walk down this path with me if it is a cat.)" Jones reflected that this was not exactly complimentary, but smiled and continued to read:

EE-M1-03

where capitalistic economics and European culture, not only prevail, but prevail almost to the exclusion of anything else or any other points of view. Naturally these men are then grabbed up with rolling eyes and eager mien by the best southern Negro schools. Now if these Negro schools have any real meaning, it is that in them another point of view, ~~ex-~~ different & at least supplemental to ~~clusive from~~ the white point of view, should be evolved. It might or it might not be radically different. It might bring something entirely new or be mostly an adaptation of surrounding civilization; but certainly it would logically bring a newness of view and a re-examination of the old, of the European, and of the white, which would be stimulating and which would be real education. But right here we have, we only little or no advance, but we ~~have~~ have attitudes which make advance impossible.

Chapter 15 - Jane on American Negroes

I am thinking of our place in the world and in democracy and this brings me to talk of your successor,(then she erased that and wrote "substitute") Mr. is here and he's a mess. He is tall, cream-colored and handsome, and does he know it! He wears a Napoleon forelock and tosses it, and knows it all - wrong. Whereof he tells the world. He is full to the brim of Harvard economics, and contemptuous - G, so contemptuous of his own people. Poor me, he scorched and withered me with one look; I came so damned near exploding.- He is "engaged" upon a thesis for the doctorate, so vast and comprehensive that the English tongue has not yet yielded a proper title. We understand that after its publication Karl Marx and oblivion will be synomymous. Yet this bird is no fool, for he defers ~~to defers~~ to the president prettily! And since no one else on the campus is worthy of notice or conversation they are quite chummy.

(She thought although she didn't add "don't you see, Jones Dear, that you have lost your job".) I have placed this young colored man in his correct category. He is a "white folk's nigger". No, don't wince. I mean nothing insulting or derogatory, but this is a concrete designation which indicates that he is one of the very very many colored folks: Japanese, Chinese, Indians, Negroes;(and, of course, of the vast majority of white folk) who have been so enthused, oppressed, and suppressed by current white civilization that they think and judge everything by its terms. They have no norms that are not set in the 19th and 20th centuries. They can conceive of no future world which is not dominated by present white nations and thoroughly shot through with their ideals, their method of government, their economic organization, their literature and their art. To broach before such persons any suggestion of radical change; any idea of intrusion, physical or spiritual, on the part of alien races, is to bring down upon your devoted head the most tremendous astonishment and contempt. Thus this young man faces me directly with our problem in America. Our best brains are taught and want to be taught in large northern universities

30-141-34

Wit Thru White Universities

China: Three things are China: Imperial Power; Masses of men; Eternal life. I mean that in China one realizes the possibilities of national power: the Altar of Heaven at Peiping; the Summer palace of the indomitable Empress Dowager who built a ~~heaven~~ instead of a navy; the Great Wall of China to defend a world. Then one sees humanity in mass; crowds of seething human beings, working, toiling, starving; there is labor, willing labor, cheaper than animals; there are cheap women for work, for breeding, for playthings; there are children myriads of children, for toys, for draft animals, for investment; and amid this amorpheus mass of men, with its age old monuments of human power, beauty and glory; with its helpless, undefended welter of misery and toil, there is an organization of life and impenitrable will to survive that neither imperial tyranny, nor industrial exploitation, nor famine starvation nor pestilence can kill -- it is Eternal Life, facig disaster and triumph imperturbably. The tourist first turns inevitably to the monuments; to the mighty remains of ancient pomp and power. There passed a glory from the earth when Imperial China fell. Built as it was on skulls, it was built and its remains are magnificent. In all essential respects they surpass the Stones of Europe. Where Europe counts its years in hundreds, Asia counts its thousands. There is absent to that all to apparent European effort to dramatize and exaggerate the past, and emphasize war and personality; and a finer effort to let the Past stand silent and unadorned; to tell the truth simply about men and fully; and to record the triumphs of education, family life, literature ~~as well as fighting~~.

All that Europe has done China ~~has done~~ before, save in the rapid, breathless technik of the 19th century. With that and that alone Europe raped and enslaved China. She used China exactly as she did Africa, South And Central America and her own working classes. It is essential to grasp this, for it is going to be my central theme: profit-making by monopoly of capital and purchase of labor is the universal European technik, applied to all peoples; European working classes, African transported slaves, American imported slaves and immigrant workers, and Asiatic coolies.

This fact gives a similarity to the scene of modern culture everywhere: the white man is dominant. In China his dominance is hoary tradition: Foreign legations own the best residential part of Peiping, have their own guards and the United states even owns and guards its wireless equipment. But it is in Shanghai that the white race is triumphant. All business and residential Shanghai belongs to the foreigners; they have their armies and navies, their policemen and courts and judges. To be more impressive the English have imported big brown, bearded Sihks as policemen, to impress the yellow race with evidence of world dominion; the French not to be outdone, have Ceylonese. On the streets the superiority is evident: the whites are the Spenders, the Rich, the inhabitants of the fine hotels, the frequenters of restaurants and amusements. They alone have money and power-- even petty white clerks and small officials; and oh their wives and daughters and children! I have seen a tiny four-year old English child imperiously wave three na

Chinese children off the side-walk. Of course New China has done something to undermine this arrogant assumption of power: China has minority representation on the municipal body that rules the International settlement of Shanghai; Chinese judges can at least listen in at British justice, and Chinese money is at last Chinese and not English. But the basic foundations of power -- the vast dominions of invested capital, have not been touched. Foreign capital owns China and mortgages the bread and butter of her hundreds millions of workers. This forms a mine of European wealth, a vast river of tribute; great hammers in the hands of Europe to hold European working classes down. Every art and artifice are martialed to keep this power intact and it is threatened from two singular sources; not by the European labor movement-- nothing less; not by the peace movement of the world, which is built on white supremacy; but by Japan and Communism-- strange bedfellows as they may seem.

Japan threatens European supremacy in China by breaking the color line; by smashing the legend of invincible Europe and of a white race of unapproachable ability. Nothing that Europe and Europeans hve done but Japan can do and has done quite as well if not better. One by one the legends of European supremacy have fallen before this people for whom the Chinese themselves had only contempt; they have out-fought Europe on land and sea; they have out maneuvered them and out-bluffed them in politics; and now as the last straw, they are out-working them and under-selling them in the markets of the world. All the world long knew that orientals could work cheaply and effectively. But European domination of colored labor has hitherto seen to it that colored labor should be so used as to increase white profit without endangering the foundations of white capital. These foundations rested on white labor armed with votes. Once white labor became aware of the meaning of colored labor competition and white capital would be in danger of facing a real world labor movement. It took careful manipulation, but by separating the kinds of work, which different colors of men did, and the grades of materials they worked upon; by bribing skilled white workers with higher wage and training them in color contempt; it was possible to disguise the competition of cheap colored labor in nearly all lines of work except agriculture. The white farmer rushed to the city and white agriculture went nearer the wall. Then came Japan. She had no white capital to safe-guard and she went to manufacturing for profit. She not only manufactured with the cheap labor of Japan, but crossed the Yellow Sea and successfully demanded recognition as an exploiter of China. This was dangerous. What the Japanese could do, surely the Chinese themselves with training and experience could also do. The Japanese expansion met double opposition: the bitter opposition of Europe, whose prestige they were threatening, and whose whole system of world industry, they were slowly but surely undermining; the bitter opposition of China, who beheld a kinsman and rival, aping the methods of the white oppressor, demanding territory and concessions and eventual leadership as over inferiors-- over China itself, whose civilization gave birth to Japan. This split between China and Japan was increased consciously and unconsciously and with every open and concealed weapon, by the white world, until China actually came to regard Japan as her real and main enemy and Europe and America as her friends-- perhaps the most astonishing paradox of modern times. While Japan, seeing all too clearly the menace of Europe to the Yellow world, bent every effort to achieve the hegemony of that world, even at the length of dismembering China. Here at the fantastic cross-roads, stood the east, when a new West arose in Russia, with a new labor philosophy.

Communism was injected into the veins of China thru that extraordinary Chinese University founded in Moscow and carried on despite enormous difficulties of language, text-books and teachers, for ten years and more. It was a tremendous undertaking, and opened vistas beyond the far vision of Lenin himself. Not merely capitalistic Europe loomed as the future realm of the Worker, but the Ancient of Days, Asia and Africa, the far-flung basis of that primitive accumulation of the mass of capital which gave Europe mastery of the world, but today helps her maintain it. If Japanese capitalism scared Europe, Communism scared both Europe and Japan, and bewildered China. Sun-Yat Sen, the great Chinese leader inclined strongly to Communism; he had that marvellous human invention, the Chinese family on which to build, and the Guilds of Chinese industry for building material of rare value. But young Chinese like young Japanese had been schooled at Harvard, Yale and Oxford and Berlin in the strictest tenets of modern capitalism. They rejected Communism and after the untimely death of Sun Yat Sen, sought a new path along the lines of a Chinese Capitalism, designed to out-maneuver both Europe and Japan. Europe asked nothing better, and proceeded to forge anew her industrial shackles on China, while Japan seized Manchuria knowing well that unless she did Europe would.

China

To Europeans the attitude is baffling and easily misleading. She seems inert, ridden with graft and dishonesty, without national spirit and incapable of thorough-going reform. The eternal element in China is easily overlooked: the family. The Chinese ancestor-revering closed and unbreakable group presents to the outsider an impenetrable resistence. Sale of women, child-labor, inter-marriage, disease, misgovernment, and theft, does not disturb this most immortal of human group organizations. Its strengthh lies in the unbreakable grip between parent and child, which insures unity in physical home, in work and defense, in property, in co-operation of every kind. It resists annihilation as grimly as it slows down innovation and reform. It is the long considered child and defense mechanism of apeople who have fought tyranny and theft for a thousand years. No reform in China can ignore it and every permanent reform must envisage the family as the chief instrument and immediate object. Up from the family as its extension and instrument for broader efficiency, has grown the guild; the organization of united family co-operation for industry, defense and training on a broader scale th than is possible for the single family. The two institutions are China. As long as they live she lives, Reform begins with them or it begins not at all.

Cowering behind the unbreachable ramparts, China lives on, and because of this, Europe hopes and Japan fears. Unless Japan successfully interferes, there is no reason why imperturbible China, resting stolidly , should not indefinitely form one of the richest fields of capitalistic exploitation the modern world knows. But the example of Japan disturbs the situation. It arouses jealousy and resentment in China, and with communistic urge may become practically and effectively anti- capitalistic. Meantime capitalism in Japan expands toward world empire. The white world watches it in unfeigned alarm, but that alarm has two unreconcilable faces: white economic reaction based on imperial exploitation of colored peoples, wants Japanese capitalism to collapse lest it undermine white domination White economic reform, wants Japanese capitalism to collapse in order the universal collapse of industrial imperialism. Both reformers and investers cheer heartily for the economic debacle of Japan but for fatally opposite reasons. It faces Japan with a unanimity on the part of the white world which has all of the too familiar earmarks of the Color Bar.

Thus Japan in turn faces her enemies and easily confounds if not misjudges them. Why, she logically asks, is Europe , gorged with the loot of centuries, become suddenly so solicitous over the rights of backward peoples? Why is England today defending the integrity of that same China which she more than any people on earth, reduced to impotence and helpless disorganization? What new and lofty regard for human dignity is animating ~~this new and~~ self-righteous America, which declares the Yellow race even less wothy of citizenship in the republic than black slaves? And whose knight in shining armor refused at Versailles, even to consider a League of Nations declaration in favor of racial equality?

On the other hand while Europe ~~on the one hand,~~ wards off Communism as a pest and threat to present culture, why is it so complacently envisageing a war of Russia and Japan, unless it be with the pious hope that both these threats to European hegemony of the world, may be egged on to utterly distroy each other?

This is leading and must lead Japan carefully to appraise her present positio First of all the Japanese economic set-up does not loan itself to the western European conception of development, and the Marxian interpretation must be changed to accord with a different set of facts. Primary accumulation of capital in Japan was largely a government function, and therefore government control of capital is natural and awaited. Private property is a family rather than an individual matter, and even there communal welfare must be considered far more than in Europe and America. Mr. Matsukue, the erstwhile delegate to the League of Natiohs, who walked in the Manchurian Incident, once said to me: we Japanese have always been communistic in a sense; we always hold our property for the common welfare, rather than for private profit exclusively. This is not wholly untrue in Europe and America, as extreardinary public philanthropy testifies. But it is more true of Japan and in more regular and less spectacular and more wide-spread ways. Thus with property less strictly subject to private control, and with the government more generally recognized as excersizing control and even ownership in industry, the path of reform lies in different directions than in Europe. The Class Struggle is and must b eless clearly defined, not simply because of the survival of feudal ties, leadstraifgt thru Shinto to the Emperor, and in his person becoming identified with Government itself; but even more important, the contrast in class incomes is not nearly as great as the money wage would indicate, since in the distribution of social satisfaction there is wide equality: celebrations, home festivals, national and local customs, all all enjoyable at prices or sacrifices all can easily afford. Consequently a working-class which Kagawa's co-operatives can feed adequately at 8 cents a day for three meals and which has a family income of less than 30 cents a day, is nevertheless probably the most contented class of workers in the world. This comparatively contented working class gives Japan a tremendous advantage in international trade. It foreshadows a time when the cheap labor of Japan, China, India and the South Seas, will drive industrial Europe off the commercial map by shear underbidding. All that protective tariffs can do in opposition is to tax white consumers to the breaking-point in lands of increasing unemployment. Such industrial disaster, Japan could lead by furnishing capital, engineers and entrepreneurs. But only of course in case Japan is not overthrown by Russia or convulsed by internal industrial revolution.

Internal revolution in Japan is foreshadowed not by industrial discontent but by agricultural. To be sure strict repression and propanda to keep workers loyal and satisfied, may not long work, and workers may gradually come to demand consulmtion goods for themselves rather than for manufacturers profits; but at present the signs of dissatisfaction among industrial are few. On the other hand the peasants are not only poor and dissatisfied, but are represented and articulate in one of the most powerful departments of the Army. The army in its search for efficiency has become more democratic than the parliamentary system. Big Business captured politics and by scandalous bribery sought to dominate the state. But the army stood separate from the state, with direct veto on parliamentary action and direct access to the center of power-- the clique of advisers who speak in the name of the Emperor. And in the army, by democratic competition, peasant officers, who knew the plight of the agricultural workers and could speak for them, had a chance to challenge big business in the very inner citidel of power. Thus the class struggle in Japan has taken today apeculiar twist: younger army officers, championing the farmers, have sought by assassination and violence to overthrow the power of capitalism entrenched in the parliamentary system. At the same time military Fascism is bent on extending the Japanese empire in China and the South Seas for new capitalistic enterprize. This imperial capital is however furnished by the state and very strictly under state control. To pick in the intricate whirl the classic pattern of Marxian determinism is impossible.

30-12-3)

2-14-10

74
83

miles away and going further. And his mind was working methodically and clearly on Problems. A month would go by before she heard another word and even then - Yet she loved it. She was to him an Intelligence, and not a mere receptacle for protoplasm. It was good to live and think - only, not alone, not alone.)

I am not sparing us.

It was real funny and everybody except us laughed heartily over it.

Now in the year of God, 1937, and of our freedom from slavery not yet the first, we ask seriously, what can we do to force our entrance into a democracy that wants neither us nor democracy, but is faced by serious dilemmas: Waste of the national resources,

11-14-08

There is law. There must be control. No individual is so rugged that he can without penalty contravene the law of gravitation; no pioneer can escape the hard law of mechanical action and reaction; and no spirit can find complete freedom from the law of diminishing returns. Or in other words we are controlled in this world by the basic physical and chemical laws of the universe which we may carefully know and intelligently follow but never absolutely escape. Beyond physical law rise the allied laws of psychology and the basic institutions of society. There is birth pain and sweat of laboring brow; there is scarcity of wealth and time necessary for growth and change. And yet wide and unyielding as is this area of law, what men have got to realize is that beyond and above law there is an almost infinite realm of freedom for life as art; for art as life; for beauty as expression and even for the ethical law of right and wrong which seeks to limit the exercising of individual freedom only by attaining the maximum of social good. Thus to limit freedom by the necessary physical, psychological and social laws of control is, in the end, to make life more abundant and if individual freedom is not

~~is best because historic, clear and a rallying point for other groups; and then On and Up. Only this we must not forget: all human advance is primarily economic, and our advance to be successful must run with and not counter to, the forward economic trend of our day.~~ Which being interpreted means we American Negroes have got to evolve a racial or group economic program, and that it must accord and blend with the best modern advance toward socialism as all men know that is the world's goal. Yet here in the seats of learning, are young scholars teaching economic reaction.

This too in a world where everywhere capital is failing - unable to keep order, unable to save democracy, unable to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and all because their technique of industry is so modern and efficient that it breaks down doing what it is planned to do. In a successful capitalistic world, the argument for the equitable distribution of wealth, would be strong; but in a world of failure, the argument is overwhelming.

A1-A1-98

Chapter 15 - Jane on American Negroes

I am thinking of our place in the world and in democracy and this brings me to talk of your successor,(then she erased that and wrote "substitute") is here and he's a mess. He is tall, cream-colored and handsome, and does he know it! He wears a Napoleon forelock and tosses it, and knows it all - wrong. Whereof he tells the world. He is full to the brim of Harvard economics, and contemptuous - o, so contemptious of his own people. Poor me, he scorched and withered me with one look; I came so damned near exploding - He is "engaged" upon a thesis for the doctorate, so vast and comprehensive that the English tongue has not yet yielded a proper title. We understand that after its publication Karl Marx and oblivion will be synonymous. Yet this bird is no fool, for he defers to defers to the president prettily! And since no one else on the campus is worthy of notice or conversation they are quite chummy.

She thought although she didn't add "don't you see, Jones Dear, that you have lost your job".

Here rather suddenly, Jane stopped. She was wishing rather desperately that Jones would sometime somewhere in his letters casually mention the fact that he missed her. Of course he did, he could not help it - but he was so prissy and moral. She was afraid (afraid?) that if he were here this dreary end of day, and if he should boisterously and forcibly kiss her she would enjoy it. But imagine! He wasn't. He was 3,000 miles away and going further. And his mind was working methodically and clearly on Problems. A month would go by before she heard another word and even then - Yet she loved it. She

30-10-15

Ch. Struggle Ref.
Souther Ec. 8
Gen Ed Bd 1903

Lynch
Trotter + Forbes

Jim Crow Laws

Immigration

Wstp

Agriculture

Labor Unrest

Wstp

1860 Farms

1860	14000
1870	25 2000
1880	253,000
1890	355 m
1900	5120 m

Capital in Mfg

1860	1000 Mill
1870	1691
1880	2790
1890	6525
1900	9813
1910	18,424

V. Products of Mfg

1860	1885 Mill
70	3345
80	5369
90	9372
1900	13,000
1910	20,672
1920	62,418

Disfranchisement

Miss	1890 ✓
SC	1895 ✓
La	1898 ✓
NC	1901 ✓
Ala	1901
Va	1902
Ga	1908
Okla	1910

Robert B. Elliott

1<KK '65

Hamburg July 4 '76

1856

FLOOD FIRE RIOT

Populist Movement

Strikes

MIGRATION

IMPERIALISM
?
INVESTMENTS

INVENTIONS

WARS

Manufactures

1950

3200 year

$25,000.00

4 years

34

1850 —

1850 —

Disfranchisement

1850

1860

70

80

90

1900

10 20 30

40

50

MMC-6860 M Deloof

Dec. 6 – attend Exec. Bd Meeting June 15 – N.O.

Cem for Indonesian Refugees

EVENTS

File Literature DuBois - NOVEL 1918 make folder

1926 Federal reserve system
1908 Reclamation and conservation
1902-12 law and 26 projects
1917-28 Boll Weevil
1912 Breaking monopoly of coal carriers and mine companies
1914 Trusts
1903-14 R.R. regulation
1910 Plunder in building capitols of N.Y. and Penn.
10% -25% of vote purchasable in R.I.
1922 Muscle Shoals

1850 --1900
Population, trebled
Agriculture, " in value
Manufactures, eleven fold "

1904
318 trusts, merging 5300 plants; capital $2,500, millions copper, 1899
sugar, 1891
tobacco, 1901
Standard Oil 1899
U.S. Steel 1901
International Mercantile 1902

U.S. steel: property worth $682 mil., capitalized at $1,402, mil. $508 common stock; water, about $600, mil.
(consult H.D.Lloyd: Wealth & Commonwealth, 1894)
1900 95% R.R. in 6 groups
Hill & Morgan vs. Harriman; Northern Securities cap. $400 mil.
Depression of 1903
(Faulkner "Quest for Social Justice" Macmillan, 1931)

Telephones
1900 677,000
10 3,500,000
15 6,000,000

1904-14 35,000 laborers, 10 years; open 1914

Strikes
Annual average 1885 750
1900, 1800
1905, 2250
1917-19 3750
1928-30 750
1934-6 1950

Riots
Tom Watson, 1856 to 1922; born in Ga., grandfather rich slave holder, ruined by war
1882, legislature
1890, Congress, Farmers Alliance; red-headed, scrawny
Elections of 1892 and 94, gerrymandered and cheated
1896, Vice-pres on Bryan ticket
1896 to 1904 in retirement, writing, making a small fortune
1904, Populist candidate for President
1906 Atlanta Riot
1908, change anti Negro, Catholic, Jew (Frank) Opposed World-War I 1920 U.S. Senator for Russia and Labor
1922, died

Strikes
1872 Building trades for 8 hour day
1877 Railroad strike
1894, 1897, coal strikes
1900, 1902, Anthracite strikes

1917

> Populist Movement c

EVENTS

I872 Silver demonetized
I878 Bland bill
I875 Proposed intervention in Cuba
I879 Resumption of specie payments
I893 Repeal of silver purchase
I894 Civil Service reform
I896 Bryan's "Cross of Gold" speech
I900 Gold standard
I890- I900 Trusts; union of iron of lakes and coal of Pittsburgh
I900 Machines in politics and bosses
I900 Boxers in China
Nicaraugua canal
I898 Spanish War
I899 Wood in Cuba
I899 Doctrine of "Open door".
I887 American Indian problem
I888 Grady speech
I890 Slums
I897-I909 Wu Ting Fang
I899 Copper mine, Lake Superior, capital $2,500,000; dividends, I890, $I0,000,000. some mines distributed total capital each year as dividends

Tillman:"we shall have to send a few more niggers to Hell"

I9II Irrigation in the South West; Gov't Reclamation Service; Rio Grande; Roosevelt dam, Salt River
I909 to I9I9 Okl. oil stock gambling and swindles; stock at 2 cents, 5 cents, $I00.
Immigration:

	from North & west Europe	South & East Erope & Asia
I87I - I880	2,000,000	I8000
I897 - I9I4	$,000,000	I0,000,000

I880-90 Melting Pot
I92I Immigration limited
I924 ""
I904 Hanna: "Now look! That damned cow-boy is President of the U.S."
Roosevelt: "He treats me like a boy; calls me Teddy"
Trust-busting
Supremr Court stops Northern Securities merger
I906 Wallace Irwin's "Monroe Doctrinings" Hart's Contemporaries V, p. I52
I90I Report in favor of Panama route
I902- I904 Treaty with Panama
I9I3 U.S. and Mexico
I897-I937 U.S. imperialism: protectorates in Cuba, Panama, Dominican R., Nicaraugua and Haiti; 30 interventions in affairs of 9 nations; investment increased from $200,000,000 to $3 billions; 4 collectors of customs to collect debts
I924 Mackenzie at Fisk
I9I6 Battle for World's Markets
I906 Peace of Portsmouth
San Francisco earthquake and fire; 3400 acres burned; 225,000 homeless
I9I2 Titanic
I927 Miss. flood (also I9I2) New Orleans in peril; material for levies hauled 40 to 50 miles; I200 laborers; levees cut for relief
I870-I90I Jim Hill's R.R.s
I903 R.F.D.
I9I3 Parcels Post
I92I 9 mil. autoes
I924 Federal roads
I926 Airplanes
I927 Lindbergh
I9I7 Liberty loans
I922 War debtors
I924 Federal farm loans

John M. Langston

Massacres in La.: Bossier co., 3 days; Caddo I875, 3500 killed

Kansas, I879-80, ~~migration~~ from La. & Miss. [Kansas Freedmen's Relief Assoc.] 6,000 migrants

Moses Singleton of Tenn., Henry Adams of La.

Vicksburg Convention of I879 [whites in control Forcible prevention of migration against
Douglass ~~xxxxxxxxxx~~ migration; Greener in favor

I889 Oklahoma opened; [Harrison; Negroes excluded]

1890 [Migration] to mines of W.Va. and Ala.

I895 Bishop Turner [and migration]; Senator Morgan of Ala.

[Migration to Mexico.]

I9II, Ala. debt peonage declared unconstitutional

~~xxxxxxxx~~ I892-- I9I6 Boll weevil

I874, I9I8, Miss floods

[1st World War] migration cut off from Europe; Negro workers move north; [riots]

~~B.~~T.Washington: Born, I857; Hampton, I872-5; Tuskegee, I88I; Atlanta speech, I895

Greenback party, climax, I878
Populist Party, " I894
I896, Bryan's "Cross of Gold" speech

I9I2 Culmination of muck-raking and Progressive movement

GRAPE-VINE TELEGRAPH THE DRUM THE SNAKE

Russell

JEB Orrick 2877

Schmucker A-AC-18-4

3 requested Jan 12 '48
Delegates attending Little Assembly

COMMERCIAL ~~XGRIXIS~~XX CRISES

I873 -9, R.R. boom, French indemnity
Failures, 3 million unemployed

I884-6 R.R. speculation, foreign crops

I893 --7, Gold exports, varying harvests
Coxey's army; failures and unemployment

1903 - Panic, R R

I907 -8 Failure of Knickerbocker Trust
Federal reserve system

~~I914-6,~~ ~~First World War.~~

I920-2, Results of War

I929-37, World-wide collapse
Unemployment; off Gold standard; economic planning

WARS

I876, Centennial at Philadelphia

I870 Franco-Prussian War, I878 Congress of Berlin I877 Empress of India
I88I-5 Mahdi in Sudan
I884, France vs. China
I885-7 Italy vs. Abyssinia
I886-96 Khalifa in Sudan
I886-7 Kitchener in Sudan; Fashoda
I890 French vs. Dahomey
I894 Sino-Japanese war
I899-I902 Boer War
I898 Spanish-American war
I90I Edward VII I900 Boxers in China
I904 Russo-Japanese war
I907 France in Morocco
I9I2 Chinese Republic
I9I2-3 Italy in Balkans
I9II Agadir
I9I4-8 First World War I9I6 Verdun I9I7 Russian revolution
I9I7-8 U.S. in First World War
I9I9 Ebert in Germany
I92I Fascisti in Italy
I922 Civil War in China
Irish Free State
I925 Locarno
I926 British General strike
I924 Lenin dies Stalin
I929, Macdonald prime minister
I935 Italy in Ethiopia; New Roman Empire
I939 2nd World War Franco
Russo-German alliance
I94I Germany attacks Russia
Japan attacks at Pearl Harbor

Strikes

1892, Homestead strike
1894, Pullman strike; U.S. troops; Debs
1881 -- 1900, 22,793 strikes, involving 6,105,694 workers
1904 Typographers, 2 years
1916, R.R. trainmen
1917, U.S. 8 hour law
British General Strike
1922, coal miners victory
~~1921 1380 strikes~~
1921 2381 strikes
25 1300
30 653
33 1562
5 2014
7, 4470
8, 2772

Populism (Peoples Party)

complete

1891 Formed in Cincinnati [form Greenback, Farmers Alliance, Grange, etc.]
92, 2nd convention, Omaha, nominates Weaver for Pres. [
96, nominates Bryan and Watson; free silver, income tax.]
~~98,~~ Free silver and War
1897-8 Party splits
1899, Party united nominates Tom Watson for Pres.

PAGEANTS

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND BLACK FOLK:
A PAGEANT FOR THE BICENTENNARY, 1732-1932

1932
Draft manuscripts and notes

1st Edition

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND BLACK FOLK

A Pageant for the Bicentennary, 1732-1932

by

W. E. B. Du Bois, Editor of THE CRISIS

Foreword.

Many Americans would write the history of this land with no memory of the part which black men have played in its deeds and making. Never was this narrowness of mind better shown than in the celebration of the bi-Centenary of the man whom this country called Father. Wherefore, in the name of truth, we darker Americans must recall to the memory of man, together with the fame of George Washington, the deeds of Crispus Attucks, of Phillis Wheatley; the bravery of Salem Poor and Peter Salem; the emancipation of Paul Cuffe and Prince Hall; the piety of Richard Allen, Absalom Jones, and James Varick; the scientific work of Benjamin Banneker; and the undying glory of Toussaint, the Saviour.

42-6-35

THE PAGEANT

The Herald.

Hear ye, hear ye, all them that love the truth, and listen to the tale of the lowliest and most unfortunate of Americans whose faces be black; and see how Crispus Attucks died for his country on the 5th of March, 1770 and made the day of his death our national holiday for thirteen years.

Scene 1, March 5, 1770. The Boston Massacre

Crispus Attucks leads in Gray, Caldwell, Maverick and Carr.

Attucks- The way to get rid of these soldiers is to attack the main guard-strike at the root-this is the nest!

(They rush out-sound of guns-four bodies are brought in with funeral march)

Voice

"The Boston Massacre, March 5, 1770, may be regarded as the first act in the drama of the American Revolution. 'From that moment', said Daniel Webster, 'We may date the severance of the British Empire'".

"Three days after, on the eighth, a public funeral of the martyrs took place. The shops in Boston were closed; and all the bells of Boston and the neighboring towns were rung. It is said that a greater number of persons assembled on this occasion than were ever before gathered on this continent for a similar purpose. The body of Crispus Attucks, the mulatto slave, had been placed in Faneuil Hall, with that of Caldwell; both being strangers in the city. Maverick was buried from his mother's house in Union Street; and Gray from his brother's in Royal Exchange Lane. The four hearses formed a junction in King Street; and there the procession marched in columns six deep, with a long file of coaches belonging to the most distinguished citizens, to the Middle Burying-ground, where the four victims were deposited in one grave; over which a stone was placed with this inscription:-

'Long as in Freedom's cause the wise contend,
Dear to your country shall your fame extend;
While to the world the lettered stone shall tell
Where Caldwell, Attucks, Gray and Maverick fell'.

44-6-36

The anniversary of this event was publicly commemorated in Boston by an oration and other exercises every year until after our national Independence was achieved, when the Fourth of July was substituted for the Fifth of March."

Herald.

"Hear ye, hear ye, all children of America, of every color and hue, and see where comes George Washington, gentleman of Virginia, and owner of eighty-seven black slaves, to be General of the armies of all the Confederated colonies. It is summer. It is Cambridge in Massachusetts. It is under an Elm tree. Here he hears of the Battle of Bunker Hill and its black heroes and here he meets Phillis Wheatley.

Scene 11, July 3, 1775. General Washington.

(Drums. Enter Washington with trumpets, drums and greetings of citizens. A group of officers enter.)

A white officer. We beg leave to report (which we do in justice to the character of so brave a man), that, under our own observation, we declare that a Negro man called Salem Poor, of Colonel Frye's regiment, Capt. Ames' company, in the late battle at Charlestown, behaved like an experienced officer, as well as an excellent soldier. To set forth particulars of his conduct would be tedious. We only beg leave to say in the person of this said Negro centers a brave and gallant soldier. The reward due to so great and distinguished a character, we submit to the Congress.

(Washington bows, but answers stiffly.)

474-6-34

Washington- Neither Negroes, boys unable to bear arms, nor old men unfit to endure the fatigues of the campaign are to be enlisted.

Laurens- "I am persuaded that if I could obtain authority for the purpose, I would have a corps of Negroes trained, uniformly clad, equipped and ready in every respect to act at the opening of the next campaign. The ridicule that may be thrown on the color I despise, because I am sure of rendering essential service to my country."

Washington- "The policy of our arming slaves is in my opinion a moot point, unless the enemy set the example. For, should we begin to form battalions of them, I have not the smallest doubt, if the war be prosecuted, of their following us in it, and justifying the measure upon our own ground. The contest then must be, who can arm fastest. And where are our arms? Besides, I am not clear that a discrimination will not render slavery more irksome to those who remain in it. Most of the good and evil things in this life are judged of by comparison; and I fear a comparison in this case will be productive of much discontent in those, who are held in servitude. But as this is a subject that has never employed much of my thoughts, these are no more than the first crude ideas that have struck me upon the occasion."

(A messenger rushes in.)

Messenger- Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia has declared all indentured servants and Negroes free that are able and will to bear arms.

44-6-38

Washington- (disturbed) If the Virginians are wise, that arch-traitor to the rights of humanity, Lord Dunmore, should be instantly crushed, if it takes the force of the whole Colony to do it—otherwise, like a snowball, in rolling, his army, will get size, some through promises, and some through inclination, joining his standard; but that which renders the measure indispensably necessary, is the Negroes,—for if he gets formidable, numbers of them will be tempted to join.

Citizens- Let us raise a Negro regiment in Rhode Island.

Washington- It has been presented to me, that the free Negroes, who have served in this army, are very much dissatisfied at being discarded. As it is to be apprehended, that they may seek employment in the ministerial army, I have presumed to depart from the resolution respecting them, and have given license for their being enlisted. If this is disapproved of by Congress, I will put a stop to it.

(Negro regiment marches by. Phillis Wheatley enters. Washington receives her politely.)

Washington- "I thank you most sincerely for your polite notice of me in the elegant lines you enclosed; and however undeserving I may be of such encomium and panegyric, the style and manner exhibit a striking proof of your poetical talents; in honor of which, and as a tribute justly due you, I would have published the poem, had I not been apprehensive that, while I only meant to give the world this new instance of your genius, I might have incurred the imputation of vanity. This, and nothing else, determined me not to give it a place in the public prints.

42-9-39

[redacted]

I am happy to see a person favored by the Muses, and to whom nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations."

Phyllis:

How pour her armies through a thousand gates;
As when Eolus heaven's fair face deforms,
Enrapped in tempest and a night of storms;
Astonish'd ocean feels the wild uproar,
The refluent surges beat the sounding shore,
Or thick as leaves in Autumn's golden reign,
Such, and so many, moves the warrior's train.
In bright array they seek the work of war,
Where high unfurl'd the ensign waves in air.
Shall I to Washington their praise recite?
Enough thou know's them in fields of fight,
Thee first in place and honours—we demand
The grace and glory of thy martial band.
And so may you, whoever dares disgrace
The land of freedom's heaven-defended race!
Fix'd are the eyes of nations on the scales,
For in their hopes Columbia's arm prevails.
Anon Britannia dropps the pensive head,
While round increase the rising hills of dead.
Oh! cruel blindness to Columbia's state!
Lament thy thirst of boundless power too late.
Proceed great chief, with virtue on thy side,
Thy every action let the goddess guide.
A crown, a mansion, and a throne that shine,
With gold unfading, Washington be thine.

47-6-40

(She courtesies and retires right—Exit Washington left)

Herald.

Hear ye, hear ye, sons and daughters of Africa in the Western world, and know how with blood and turmoil, black folk strove in twilight of the 18th Century for place and freedom; they preached and voted; they measured the earth and read the stars. Behold, the march of the black fathers!

Scene 111., 1779-1792. The Negroes Surge Toward Freedom.

The Vicount de Fontages with the Haitians, Christophe, Rigaud, André and Lambert go to the rescue of the American army at Savannah.

Voice- In December, 1778, Savannah was captured by the British, and Americans were in despair until the French fleet appeared on the coast of Georgia in September, 1779. The fleet offered to help recapture Savannah. It had on board 1900 French troops of whom 800 were black Haitian volunteers. Among these volunteers were Christophe, afterward King of Haiti, Rigaud, André, Lambert and others. They were a significant and faithful band which began by helping freedom in America, then turned and through the French revolution freed Haiti and finally helped in the emancipation of South America. The French troops landed below the city with the Americans at their right and together they made an attack. American and French flags were planted on the British outposts but their bearers were killed and a general retreat was finally ordered. Seven hundred and sixty Frenchmen and 312 Americans were killed and wounded. As the army began to retreat the British general attacked the rear, determined to annihilate the Americans. It was then that the black and mulatto freedmen from Haiti under the command of Vicount de Fontages made the charge on the English and saved the retreating Americans. They returned to Haiti to prepare eventually to make that country the second one in America which threw off the domination of Europe.

(Enter Harry Hosier with banner- M. E. Church 6,000,000

Richard Allen with banner- A. M. E. Church 550,000

Absalom Jones with banner- P. E. Church 650,000

James Varick with banner- A. M. E. Z. Church 400,000

Pompey with banner- Stony Point 1779.

Andrew Bryan with banner- Baptists 3,000,000

Paul Cuffe with banner- School House-Vote

Prince Hall with banner- Negro Masons-1775

~~James~~ Benjamin Banneker with banner- Map of D. C.-Almanac, 1792

Katy Ferguson " " - Sunday School 1793)

42-6-42

Voice- Here march the black men of Washington's day. Henry Hosier was a black companion of Bishop Asbury. Dr. Rush called him in 1780, the greatest orator in America. He helped Asbury, Coke and others found Methodism in America. Richard Allen and Absalom Jones withdrew from the Methodist Church in 1787 because of color discrimination. Allen founded the African Methodist Church and Jones became the first black priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church. James Varrick led his people out of the Methodist Church in New York in 1796 and became the first bishop of the A. M. E. Zion Church. The Slave Pompey guided the Americans to victory at Stony Point, New York, in 1779, and led to the capture of 543 British soldiers. Paul Cuffee of Massachusetts refused in 1783 to pay taxes because he could not vote and built a schoolhouse for colored children in 1797 because they were not admitted to white schools. Negroes in five colonies voted for the adoption of the present Constitution in 1787. Prince Hall, a native of Barbadoes, came to the United States in 1765 and received from the Masonic Grand Lodge of England in 1775 a warrant establishing him and his fourteen colored brothers as the African Lodge of Masons. Andrew Bryan, a colored man converted under George Liele, the first black missionary to the West Indies, became pastor of the African Baptist Church in Savannah in 1788, one of the first, if not the first Negro Baptist Church in America. Benjamin Banneker, son of a Negro and a free white woman was born in 1731. He helped survey the city of Washington in 1790, and published the first almanac of America in 1792. Katy Ferguson founder of the first sunday school, 1793.

4-9-43

Herald.

Hear ye, hear ye, sons of the Western Indies, lest ye forget that out of black Haiti and under Toussaint L'Ouverture, first came real emancipation to the Negroes of America.

Scene IV. The First President.

(Washington enters as President with Lafayette.)

Warner Mifflin, a Quaker, ~~denounces~~ demands the abolition of slavery.

Washington- The introduction of the Quaker memorial respecting slavery was, to be sure, not only ill-timed, but occasioned a great waste of time. The final decision, thereon, however, was as favorable as the proprietors of this species of property could well have expected, considering the light is viewed by a large part of the Union." He owned in 1786, 216 slaves but he said, "I have another motive which makes me earnestly wish for these things—it is indeed more powerful than all the rest—namely to liberate a certain species of property—which I possess very repugnantly to my own feelings; but which imperious necessity compels, and until I can substitute some other expedient, by which expenses not in my power to avoid (however well I may be disposed to do it) can be defrayed. With respect to the other species of property concerning which you ask my opinion, I shall frankly declare to you that I do not like even to think, much less talk of it. However, as you have put the question, I shall in a few words, give my ideas about it. Were it not then, that I am principled against selling Negroes, as you would cattle at a market, I would not in twelve months from this date, be possessed of one as a slave. I shall be happily mistaken, if they are not found to be a very troublesome species of property ere many years pass over our heads.

Lafayette- "Now, my dear General, that you are going to enjoy some ease and quiet, permit me to propose a plan to you, which might become greatly beneficial to the black part of mankind. Let us unite in purchasing a small estate, where we may try the experiment to free the Negroes, and use them only as tenants. Such an example as yours might render it a general practice; and if we succeed in America I will cheerfully devote a part of my time to render the method fashionable in the West Indies. If it be a wild scheme, I had rather be mad in this way, than to be thought wise in the other task."

44-6-44

Washington- "The scheme my dear Marquis, which you propose as a precedent to encourage the emancipation of the black people in this country from that state of bondage in which they are held is a striking evidence of the benevolence of your heart. I shall be happy to join you in so laudable a work; but will defer going into a detail of the business till I have the pleasure of seeing you."

(Hamilton, Secretary of State enters.)

Hamilton- "Black Haiti has rebelled. Four hundred and fifty thousand black slaves have risen in insurrection. The whites are doomed."

Voice- They began a Civil War seldom paralleled in history. French, English and Spaniards took part. Twenty-five thousand picked French troops led by Napoleon Bonepart to subdue the Negroes, died unsuccessful. The Negroes, led by Toussaint L'Ouverture, were triumphant. They founded an independent state. They made Napoleon give up his dream of a colonial empire in America and sell Louisiana for a song.

"Thus, all of Indian Territory, all of Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa and Wyoming and Montana and the Dakotas, and most of Colorado and Minnesota, and all of Washington and Oregon states, came to us as the indirect work of a despised Negro. Praise if you will, the work of Robert Livingston or a Jefferson, but today let us not forget our debt to Toussaint L'Ouverture who was indirectly the means of America's expansion by the Louisiana Purchase of 1803."

47-6-45

"I would call him Napoleon, but Napoleon made his way to empire over broken oaths and a sea of blood. This man never broke his word. "No Retaliation" was his great motto and the rule of his life; and the last words uttered to his son in France were these: "'My boy, you will one day go back to San Domingo; forget that France murdered your father.'" I would call him Cromwell, but Cromwell was only a soldier, and the state he founded went down to him into his grave; I would call him Washington, but the great Virginian held slaves. This man risked his empire rather than permit the slave trade in the humble village of his dominions. You think me fanatic tonight, for you read history not with your eyes but with your prejudices. But fifty years hence, when truth gets a hearing, the muse of history will put Phocion for the Greeks, Brutus for the Romans, Hampton for England, Fayette for France, choose Washington as the bright consummate flower of our earlier civilization, and John Brown as the ripe fruit of our noon-day; then, dipping her pen in the sunlight, will write in the clear blue, above them all, the name of the soldier, the statesman, the martyr, Toussaint L'Ouverture."

74-9-44

(Washington goes slowly out with bowed head. A funeral march is heard.)

Hamilton- (Entering slowly) This is the last will and testament of George Washington, first president of the United States. "Upon the decease of my wife, it is my will and desire that all the slaves whom I hold in my own right shall receive their freedom....And whereas, among those who will receive freedmom according to this devise, there may be some, who,

from old age or bodily infirmities, and others, who on account of their infancy, will be unable to support themselves, it is my will and desire, that all who come under the first and second description shall be comfortably clothed and fed by my heirs while they live; and such of the latter description as have no parents living, or, if living are unable or unwilling to provide for them, shall be bound by the court until they arrive at the age of twenty-five years....The Negroes thus bound, are (by their masters or mistresses) to be taught to read and write, and to be brought up to some useful occupation...And I do expressly forbid the sale or transportation out of the said Commonwealth, of any slave I may die possessed of, under any pretense whatsoever. And I do moreover most pointedly and most solemnly enjoin it upon my executors hereafter named, or the survivors of them, to see that this clause respecting slaves, and every part thereof, be religiously fulfilled at the epoch at which it is directed to take place, without evasion, neglect or delay."

4-9-44

Herald.

Hear ye, hear ye, sons of men and daughters of Almighty God! Ye have heard the miracle of America, how out of human material low and high, of masters who became slaves, and slaves who became masters, of black men who served and fought and white men who fought and served, ~~Man~~ made America and at its beginning walked George Washington, seeing dimly, walking hesitantly among the Rights of Man; owning black slaves and leading black soldiers, listening to the Voice of Freedom, and finally emerging in death as George Washington, Emancipator.

The play is done. The play is done.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND BLACK FOLK

A Pageant for the Bicentennary, 1732-1932

by

W.E.B.Du Bois-Editor of The Crisis.

Many Americans would write the history of this land with no memory of the part which black men have played in its deeds and making.Never was this narrowness of mind better shown than in the celebration of the bi-Centenary of the man whom this country called Father. Wherefore,in the name of truth,we darker Americans must recall to the memory of man,together with the fame of George Washington,the deeds of Crispus Attucks,of Phillis Wheatley;the bravery of Salem Poor and Peter Salem;the emancipation of Paul Cuffe and Prince Hall;the piety of Richard Allen,Absalom Jones,and James Varick;the scientific work of Benjamin Banneker;and the undying glory of Toussaint-the Saviour.

The Herald

Hear ye,hear ye,all them that love the truth,and listen to the tale of the lowliest and most unfortunate of Americans whose faces be black;and see how Crispus Attucks died for his country on the 5th of March,1770 and made the day of his death our national holiday for thirteen years.

Scene 1,March 5,1770, The Boston Massacre

Crispus Attucks leads in Gray,Caldwell,Maverick,and Carr.

Attucks- The way to get rid of this,soldiers,is to attack the main guard-strike at the root-this is the nest!

(They rush out-sound of guns-four bodies are brought in with funeral march)

Voice

" "The Boston Massacre, March 5, 1770, may be regarded as the first act in the drama of the American Revolution. 'From that moment', said Daniel Webster, 'We may date the severance of the British Empire'".

"Three days after, on the eighth, a public funeral of the martyrs took place. The shops in Boston were closed; and all the bells of Boston and the neighboring towns were rung. It is said that a greater number of persons assembled on this occasion than were ever before gathered on this continent for a similar purpose. The body of Crispus Attucks, the mulatto slave, had been placed in Faneuil Hall, with that of Caldwell; both being strangers in the city. Maverick was buried from his mother's house in Union Street; and Gray from his brother's in Royal Exchange Lane. The four hearses formed a junction in King Street; and there the procession marched in columns six deep, with a long file of coaches belonging to the most distinguished citizens, to the Middle Burying-ground, where the four victims were deposited in one grave; over which a stone was placed with this inscription:-

'Long as in Freedom's cause the wise contend,
Dear to your country shall your fame extend;
While to the world the lettered stone shall tell
Where Caldwell, Attucks, Gray and Maverick fell'.

The anniversary of this event was publicly commemorated in Boston by an oration and other exercises every year until after our national Independence was achieved, when the Fourth of July was substituted for the Fifth of March."

47-6-25

Herald

"Hear ye,hear ye,all children of America,of every color and hue,and see where comes George Washington,gentleman of Virginia, and owner of eighty-seven black slaves,to be General of the armies of all the Confederated colonies.It is summer.It is Cambridge in Massachusetts.It is under an Elm tree.Here he hears of the Battle of Bunker Hill and its black heroes and here he meets Phillis Wheatley.

Scene 11,July 3,1775,General Washington.

(Drums.Enter Washington with trumpets,drums and greetings of citizens.A group of officers enter.)

A White officer-We beg leave to report (which we do in justice to to the character of so brave a man),that,under our own observation,we declare that a Negro man called Salem Poor,of Colonel Frye's regiment,Capt.Ames' company,in the late battle at Charlestown,behaved like an experienced officer,as well as an excellent soldier.To set forth particulars of his conduct would be tedious.We only beg leave to say in the person of this said Negro centres a brave and gallant soldier.The reward due to so great and distinguished a character,we submit to the Congress.

(Washington bows,but answers stiffly.)

Washington-Neither Negroes,boys unable to bear arms,nor old men unfit to endure the fatigues of the campaign are to be enlisted.

(A messenger rushes in.)

Messenger-Lord Dunmore,Governor of Virginia has declared all indentured servants and Negroes free that are able and will to bear arms.

47-6-26

Washington-(disturbed) If the Virginians are wise, that arch-traitor to the rights of humanity, Lord Dunmore, should be instantly crushed, if it takes the force of the whole Colony to do it-otherwise, like a snowball, in rolling, his army will get size, some through promises, and some through inclination, joining his standard; but that which renders the measure indispensably necessary, is the Negroes, -for if he gets formidable, numbers of them will be tempted to join who will be afraid to do it without.

Citizens-Let us raise a Negro regiment in Rhode Island.

Washington- It has been presented to me, that the free Negroes, who have served in this army, are very much dissatisfied at being discarded. As it is to be apprehended, that they may seek employ in the ministerial army, I have presumed to depart from the resolution respecting them, and have given license for their being enlisted. If this is disapproved of by Congress, I will put a stop to it.

42-6-22

(Negro regiment marches by. Phillis Wheatley enters. Washington receives her publicly. She presents her poem.)

Voice- How pour her armies through a thousand gates;
As when Eolus heaven's fair face deforms,
Enrapped in tempest and a night of storms;
Astonish'd ocean feels the wild uproar,
TThe refluent surges beat the sounding shore,
Or thick as leaves in Autumn's golden reign,
Such, and so many, moves the warrior's train.

In bright array they seek the work of war,
Where high unfurl'd the ensign waves in air.
Shall I to Washington their praise recite?
Enough thou know'st them in fields of fight,
Thee first in place and honours-we demand
The grace and glory of thy martial band.
And so may you,whoever dares disgrace
The land of freedom's heaven-defended race!
Fix'd are the eyes of nations on the scales,
For in their hopes Columbia's arm prevails.
Anon Britannia droops the pensive head,
While round increase the rising hills of dead.
Oh! cruel blindness to Columbia's state!
Lament thy thirst of boundless power too late.
Proceed great chief,with virtue on thy side,
Thy every action let the goddess guide.
A crown, anmansion,and a throne that shine,
With gold unfading,Washington be thine.

(She courtesies and retires right-Exit Washington left)

Herald

Hear ye,hear ye,sons and daughters of Africa in the Western world,and know how with blood and turmoil,black folk strove in twilight of the 18th Century for place and freedom; they preached and voted;they measured the earth and read the stars.Behold,the march of the black fathers!

Scene 111,1779-1792,The Negroes Surge Toward Freedom

The Vicount de Fontages with the Haitians,Christopher Rigaud,Andre and Lambert go to the rescue of the American army at Savannah.

47-9-28

Voice- In December 1778 Savannah was captured by the British, and Americans were in despair until the French fleet appeared on the coast of Georgia in September 1779. The fleet offered to help recapture Savannah. It had on board 1900 French troops of whom 800 were black Haitian volunteers. Among these volunteers were Christophe, afterward king of Haiti, Rigaud, Andre, Lambert and others. They were a significant and faithful band which began by helping freedom in America, then turned and through the French revolution freed Haiti and finally helped in the emancipation of South America. The French troops landed below the city with the Americans at their right and together they made an attack. American and French flags were planted on the British outposts but their bearers were killed and a general retreat was finally ordered. Seven hundred and sixty Frenchmen and 312 Americans were killed and wounded. As the army began to retreat the British general attacked the rear, determined to annihilate the Americans. It was then that the black and mulatto freedmen from Haiti under the command of Vicount de Fontages made the charge on the English and saved the retreating Americans. They returned to Haiti to prepare eventually to make that country the second one in America which threw off the domination of Europe.

47-6-24

(Enter Harry Hosier with banner- M.E.Church 6,000,000
Richard Allen with banner-A.M.E. Church 550,000
Absalom Jones with banner-P.E. Church650,000
Janus Vanon with banner-A.M.E.Z. Church 400,000
Andrew Bryan with banner-Baptists 3,000,000
Paul Cuffe with banner-School House-Vote
Prince Hall with banner- Negro Masons-1775
James Banneker with banner- Map of D.C.-Almanac)

(As they march past)

Voice-Here march the black men of Washington's day. Henry Hosier was a black companion of Bishop Asbury.Dr.Rush called him in 1780,the greatest orator in America.He helped Asbury,Coke and others found Methodism in America. Richard Allen and Absalom Jones withdrew from the Methodist Church in 1787 because of color discrimination.Allen founded the African Methodist Church and Jones became the first black priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church. James Varrick led his people out of the Methodist Church in New York in 1796 and became the first bishop of the A.M.E.Zion Church.Paul Cuffee of Massachusetts refused in 1783 to pay taxes because he could not vote and built a schoolhouse for colored children in1797 because they were not admitted to white schools.Negroes in five colonies voted for the adoption of the present Constitution in 1787.Prince Hall, a native of Barbadoes,came to the United States in 1765 and received from the Masonic Grand Lodge of England in 1775 a warrant establishing him and his fourteen colored brothers as the African Lodge of Masons.Andrew Bryan,a colored man converted under George

42-2-30

Liele, the first black missionary to the West Indies, became pastor of the African Baptist Church in Savannah in 1788, one of the first, if not the first Negro Baptist Church in America. Benjamin Banneker, son of a Negro and a free white woman was born in 1731. He helped survey the city of Washington in 1790, and published the first almanac of America in 1792.

Herald

Hear ye, hear ye, sons of the Western Indies, lest ye forget that out of black Haiti and under Toussaint L'Ouverture, first came real emancipation to the Negroes of America.

Scene IV, The First President

(Washington enters as President)

Warner Mifflin, a Quaker, denounces the abolition of slavery.

Voice- President Washington replied on June 15, 1790, saying, "The introduction of the Quaker memorial respecting slavery was, to be sure, not only ill-timed, but occasioned a great waste of time. The final decision, thereon, however, was as favorable as the proprietors of this species of property could well haveexpected, considering the light is viewed by a large part of the Union." He owned in 1786, 216 slaves but he said, "I have another motive which makes me earnestly wish for these things-it is indeed more powerful than all the rest-namely to liberate a certain species of property-which I possess very repugnantly to my own feelings; but which imperious necessity compels, and until I can substitute some other expedient, by which expenses not in my power to avoid, (however weal I may be disposed to do it) can be defrayed with respect to the other species of property concerning which you ask my opinion,I shall frankly declare to you that I donnot like even to think,much less talk of it.However,as you have put the question,I shall in a few words, give my ideas about it.Were it not then,that I am principled against selling Negroes,as you would cattle at a market,I would not in twelve months from this date,be possessed of one as a slave. I shall be happily mistaken,if they are not found to be a very troublesome species of property ere many years pass over our heads."

42-6-31

(Hamilton,Secretary of State enters)

He reads-"Black Haiti has rebelled.Four hundred and fifty thousand black slaves have risen in insurrection.The whites are doomed."

Voice

They began a Civil War seldom paralleled in history.French,English and Spaniards took part.Twenty-five thousand picked French troops led by Napoleon Bonepart to subdue the Negroes,died unsuccessful.The Negroes,led by Toussaint L'Ouverture,were triumphant.They founded an independent state.They made Napoleon give up his dream of a colonial empire in America and sell Louisiana for a song.

"Thus,all of Indian Territory,all of Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa and Wyoming and Montana and the Dakotas,and most of Colorado and Minnesota,and all of Washington and Oregon states,came to us as the indirect work of a despised Negro.Praise if you will,the work of Robert Livingston or a Jefferson,but today let us not forget our debt to Toussaint L'Ouverture who was indirectly the means of America'd expansion by the Louisiana Purchase of 1803."

I would call him Napoleon,but Napoleon made his way to empire over broken oaths and a sea of blood.This man never broke his word."No Retaliation" was his great motto and the rule of his life;and the last words uttered to his son in France were these:

47-6-32

"My boy,you will one day go back to San Domingo:forget that France murdered your father." I would call him Cromwell,but Cromwell was only a soldier,and the state he founded went down to him into his grave;I would call him Washington,but the great Virginian held slaves.This man risked his empire rather than permit the slave trade in the humble village of his dominions. You think me fanatic tonight,for you read history not with your eyes but with your prejudices.But fifty years hence,when truth gets a hearing,the muse of history will put Phocion for the Greeks,Brutus for the Romans,Hampton for England,Fayette for France,choose Washington as the bright consummate flower of our earlier civilization,and John Brown as the ripe fruit of our noon-day;then,dipping her pen in the sunlight,will write in the clear blue,above them all,the name of the soldier,the statesman, the martyr,Toussaint L'Ouverture."

47-6-33

(Washington goes slowly out with bowed head.A funeral march is heard.)

Hamilton-(entering slowly) This is the last will and testament of George Washington,first president of the United States.

"Upon the decease of my wife,it is my will and desire that all the slaves whom I hold in my own right shall receive their freedom. ....And whereas,among those who will receive freedom according to this devise,there may be some, who,from old age or bodily infirmities,and others,who on account of their infancy,will be unable to support themselves,it is my will and desire,that all who come under the first and second discription shall be comfortably clothed and fed by my heirs while they live;and such of the latter description as have no parents living, or, if living are unable or unwilling to provide for them, shall be bound by the court until they arrive at the age of twenty-five years.....The Negroes thus bound, are(by their masters or mistresses) to be taught to read and write, and to be brought up to some useful occupation....And I do expressly forbid the sale or transportation oft of the said Commonwealth, of any slave I may die possessed of, under any pretense whatsoever. And I do moreover most pointedly and most solemnly enjoin it upon my executors hereafter named, or the survivors of them, to see that this clause respecting slaves, and every part thereof, be religiously fulfilled at the epoch at which it is directed to take place, without evasion, neglect or delay."

Herald

Hear ye, hear ye, sons of men and daughters of Almighty God! Ye have heard the miracle of America, how out of material law and hire, from masters who became slaves, and slaves who became masters, from black men who served and fought and white men who fought and served man-made America. The play is done. The play is done.

44-3-84

3rd Edition

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND BLACK FOLK

A Pageant foe the Bicentennary, 1732-1932*

by

W.E.B.DuBois

37-6-107

Foreword

Many Americans would write the history of this land with no memory of the part which black men have played in its deeds ans making. Never was this narrowness of mind better shown than in the celebration of the bi-Centennary of the man whom this country called Father. Wherefore, in the name of truth, we darker Americans must recall to the memory of man, together with the words of George Washington, many deeds of contemporary black folk some of whom, he met, others of whom he knew ~~of~~ and still others who left their mark upon his times.

Scene 1.

The Boston Massacre, March 5, 1770.

(Crispus Attucks enters flourishing a club.)

Attucks: The way to get rid of these soldiers, is to attack the main guard; strike at the root! This is the nest!

(He rushes out. Shouts are heard and scuffling. Then a volley of musket~~s~~ and a scream. Then complete silence. A song arises off stage-"Were you there when they crucified My Lord!" It swells to a full chorus as the funeral cortege with four bodies crosses the stage.)

(Enter the Herald)

---

* This pageant is a method of reviewing the book, "George Washington and the Negro" by Walter H.Mazyck recently published by the Associated Publishers of Washington, D.C.

Herald: The Boston Massacre, March 5, 1770, may be regarded as the first act in the drama of the American Revolution. "From that moment," said Daniel Webster, "We may date the severance of the British Empire."

Three days after, on the eighth, a public funeral of the martyrs took place. The shops in Boston were closed; and all the bells of Boston and the neighboring towns were rung. It is said that a greater number of persons assembled on this occasion than were ever before gathered on this continent for a similar purpose. The body of Crispus Attucks, the mulatto slave, had been placed in Faneuil Hall. The four hearses formed a junction in King Street; and there the procession marched in columns six deep, with a long file of coaches belonging to the most distinguished citizens, to the Middle Burying-ground, where the four victims were deposited in one grave; over which a stone was placed with this inscription:-

"Long as in Freedom's cause the wise contend,
Dear to your country shall your fame extend;
While to the world the lettered stone shall tell
Where Caldwell, Attucks, Gray and Maverick fell."

The anniversary of this event was publicly commemorated in Boston by an oration and other exercises every year until after our national Independence was achieved, when the Fourth of July was substituted for the Fifth of March.

37-6-108

Scene 11.

General Washington takes Command.

1775

(Drums and "Yankee Doodle". Washington enters and is greeted by citizens, white and colored.)

Washington: Did the militia fight at Bunker Hill?

Officers: They fought bravely and well.

Washington: Then the liberties of the country are safe.

An Officer: Sir, not only white men but black. Major Pitcairn mounted the parapet crying, "Glory to the Marines." A black man killed him. And, Sir, twelve officers have signed this memorial:

"We beg leave to report (which we do in justice to the character of so brave a man), that, under our own observation, we declare that a Negro man called Salem Poor, of Colonel Frye's regiment, Capt. Ames' company, in the late battle at Charlestown, behaved like andexperienced officer, as well as an excellent soldier. To set forth the particulars of his conduct would be tedious. We only beg leave to say in the person of this said Negro centres a brave and gallant soldier. The reward due to so great and distinguished a character, we submit to the Congress."

(Washington bows stiffly)

Washington: From the number of boys, deserters, and Negroes who have been enlisted, I have some doubt as to whether the quota of soldiers can be raised here.

(The officers consult)

Washington: Ought not Negroes to be excluded from the new enlistment, especially such as are slaves?

(The officers hesitatingly agree. Negroes clamor)

Washington: (angrily) Neither Negroes, boys, nor old men are to be enlisted. Seize and confine until sunrise any Negro found straggling near the camps.

37-6-109

(As the Negroes slowly withdraw, a messenger rushes in)

Messenger: Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia has declared all indentured servants and Negroes free who are able and willing to bear arms.

Washington; (disturbed) If the Virginians are wise, that arch-traitor to the rights of humanity, Lord Dunmore, should be instantly crushed. I have a hundred Negroes at Mount Vernon. That man Dunmore will become the most formidable enemy America has unless we convince the slaves of the impotency of his design.

(He consults with his Officers)

Officers: We can raise black regiments in Connecticut and Rhode Island.

General Thomas: I am sorry that any prejudices should take place in any southern colony with respect to the troops raised in this.

Washington: As numbers of free Negroes are desirous of enlisting, I give leave to the recruiting officers to receive them.

Negroes: Hurrah!

(They enroll. Washington, seated, opens his mail. He hands a letter to his secretary who reads it and whispers. Phillis Wheatley is announced. She enters; The officers hesitate but Washington stepping forward receives her politely and hands her to a seat.)

Washington: I thank you most sincerely, Miss Phillis, for your polite notice of me (picking up her letter) in this new instance of your genius. I am happy to meet a person so favored by the muses and to whom nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations.

37-6-110

Phillis (courtseys and reads)

Thee first in peace and honours, we demand
The grace and glory of thy martial band.
And so may you, whoever dares disgrace
The land of freedom's heaven, -defended race!
Fix'd are the eyes of nations on the scales,
For in their hopes Columbia's arm prevails.
Anon Britannia droops the pensive head,
While round increase the rising hills of dead.
Oh! druel blindness to Columbia's state!
Lament thy thirst of boundless power too late.
Proceed great chief, with virtue on thy side,
Thy every action let the goddess guide.
A crown, a mansion and a throne that shine,
With gold unfading, Washington be thine.

(Bowing, all go out.)

37-6-111

Scene 111.

Negroes Fight for Free America.

1776-81

The Herald.

In December 1778 Savannah was captured by the British, and Americans were in despair until the French fleet appeared on the coast of Georgia in September 1779. The fleet offered to help recapture Savannah. It had on board 1900 French troops of whom 800 were black Haitian volunteers. Among these volunteers were Christophe, afterward king of Haiti, Rigaud, Andre, Lambert and others. As the

As the American arny began to retreat the British general attacked the rear, determined to annihilate the Americans. It was then that the black and mulatto freedmen from Haiti under the command of Vicount de Fontages made the charge on the English and saved the retreating Americans.They returned to Haiti to prepare eventually to make that country the second one in America which threw off the domination of Europe.

(Enter a long line of black citizens with banners.)

Harry Hosier,- [M.E.Church 6,000,000]

Richard Allen,- [A.M.E.Church 550,000]

Absalom Jones,- [P.E.Church 650,000]

James Varick ,- [A.M.E.Z.Church 400,000]

Pompei,- [Stony Point]

Andrew Bryan,- [Baptists 3,000,000]

Paul Cuffe,- [School House -Vote]

Prince Hall,- [Negro Masons-1775]

Benjamin Banneker,- [Map of D.C.-Almanac]

37-6-112

(Enter Washington,Jefferson,Hamilton,and Colonel Laurens. They pause and stare.)

Washington: What is the meaning of all this?

The Herald: Here march the black men of Washington's day.Henry Hosier was a black companion of Bishop Asbury.Dr.Rush called him in 1780,the greatest orator in America.He helped Asbury found Methodism in America.Richard Allen and Absalom Jones withdrew from the Methodist Church in 1787 because of color discrimination.Allen founded the African Methodist Church and Jones became the first black priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church. James Varick led his people out of the Methodist Church in New York in 1796 and became the first bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church. Paul Cuffe of Massachusetts refused in 1783 to pay taxes because he could not vote and built a schoolhouse for colored children in 1797,because they were not admitted to white schools.Negroes in five colonies voted for the adoption of the present Constitution in 1787. Prince Hall, a native of Barbadoes, came to the United States in 1765 and received from the Masonic Grand Lodge of England in 1784 a warrant establishing him and his fourteen colored brothers as the African Lodge of Masons. Andrew Bryan, a colored man converted under GeorgeLiele, the first black missionary to the West Indies, became pastor of the African Baptist Church in Savannah in 1788, one of the first Negro Baptist Churches in America. Benjamin Banneker, son of a Negro and a free white woman was born in 1731. He helped survey the city of Washington in 1790, and published the first almanac of America in 1792.

Washington: The Negroes have fought well.

Hamilton: Five thousand have served in our armies mostly from the north.

Laurens: Let me raise a regiment of 3000 slaves in South Carolina.

Hamilton: I believe they would make good soldiers.

Washington: The policy of arming slaves is questionable unless the enemy sets the example.

Hamilton: Negroes fought at Monmouth, in Rhode Island and at Brandywine.

Herald:

Straight through the human harvest,
Cutting a bloody swath,
Woe to you, soldier of Briton!
Death is abroad in his path.
Flee from the scythe of the reaper,
Flee while the moment is thine,
None may with safety withstand him,
Black Sampson of Brandywine.

Was he a freeman or bondman?
Was he a man or a thing?

37-6-113

What does it matter? His brav'ry
Benders him royal-a king.
If he was only a chattel,
Honor the ransom may pay
Of the royal, the loyal black giant
Who fought for his country that day.

Jefferson: I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just.

37-6-114

Scene IV

Washington as President

1789-1797

(Enter Washington and Lafayette.)

Washington: Took a list of all my Negroes at Mount Vernon-216 in all.I am in favor of some plan of emancipation.

Lafayette: My dear General let us unite in purchasing a small estate where we may try the experiment to free the Negroes and use them only as tenants.

Washington:The scheme is striking evidence of the benevolence of your heart.Would to God a like spirit might diffuse itself generally into the minds of the people of this country,but I despair of seeing it.

(Enter Messenger)

Lafayette:Comrade I go.There is revolution in France.

(Music.The Marseillaise.Enter Hamilton)

Hamilton: This question of slavery is becoming troublesome.

Washington: I was visited by a Mr.Warner Micklin,one of the people called Quakers,active in the pursuit of the measures before Congress for the liberating of the slaves. The introduction of the Memorial respecting slavery was ill-timed.The final decision was as favorable to slaveholders as could be expected. I earnestly wish to liberate my slaves which I am repugnant to own but I must keep them until I can find some other way of defraying my necessary expenses.If I did not have principles against selling Negroes like cattle,I would not by next year own a single slave.They will be found to be a very troublesome kind of property before many years pass.

Hamilton: Black Haiti has rebelled.Four hundred and fifty thousand black slaves have risen in insurrection.Listen.

37-6-115

Herald: They begin a Civil War seldom paralleled in history.French, English and Spaniards take part.Twenty-five thousand of Napoleon's picked French troops die unsuccesful.The Negroes led by Toussaint L'Ouverture will be triumphant.They will found an independent state.They will make Napoleon give up his dream of a colonial empire in America and sell Louisiana for a song.

(Washington and Hamilton go out)

The Herald: Thus all the Indian Territory,all of Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa and Wyoming and Montana and the Dakotas,and most of Colorado and Minnesota,and all of Washington and Oregon states,came to us as the indiredt work of a despised Negro.Praise if you will,the work of Robert Livingstone or a Jefferson,but today let us not forget our debt to Toussaint L'Ouverture who was indirectly the means of America's expansion by the Louisiana Purchase of 1803.

(Enter Toussaint L'Ouverture and his army to the sound of tomtoms.)

The Herald: I would call him Cromwell,but Cromwell was only a soldier, and the state he founded went down to him into his grave; I would call him Washington,but the great Virginian held slaves.This man risked his empire rather than permit the slave trade in the humble village of his dominions.You think me fanatic tonight,for you read history not with your eyes but with your prejudices.But fifty years hence, when truth gets a hearing,the muse of history will put Phocion for the Greeks,Brutus for the Romans,Hampton for England,Fayette for France,choose Washington as the bright consumate flower of our earlier civilization, and John Brown as the ripe fruit of our noon-day; then dipping her pen in the sunlight, will write in the clear blue, above them all, the name of the soldier, the statesman, the martyr, Toussaint L'Ouverture."

37-6-116

Scene V.

The Death of Washington

1799

(Washington enters old and sick)

37-6-117

Washington: I have at Mount Vernon 270 slaves and forty to others leased, 50% more Negroes than I can use to advantage. Yet, I have principles against selling the surplus or hiring them out. What is to be done? Something must, or I shall be ruined. $50,000 received in the last four years from the sale of western lands, has scarcely been able to keep me afloat. I wish from my soul, that the legislature of this state would see the policy of gradually abolishing slavery. It might prevent mush mischief.

(Music. "Go down, Moses." Washington straightens up and producing a parchment reads)

This is the last will and testament of George Washington. Upon the decease of my wife, it is my will and desire that all the slaves whom I hold in my own right shall receive their freedom.... And whereas, among those who will receive freedom according to this devise, there may be some, who, from old age or bodily infirmities, and others, who on account of their infancy, will be unable to support themselves, it my will and desire, that all who come under the first and second description shall be comfortably clothed and fed by heirs while they live;and such of the latter description as have no parents living,or,if living are unable or unwilling to provide for them,shall be bound by the court until they arrive at the age of twenty-five years....The Negroes thus bound,are(by their masters or mistresses) to be taught to read and write,and to be brought up to some useful occupation....And I do expressly forbid the sale or transportation out of the said Commonwealth,of any slave I may die possessed of,under any pretense whatsoever.And I do moreover most pointedly and most solemnly enjoin it upon my executors hereafter named,or the survivors of them,to see that this clause respecting slaves,and every part thereof,be religiously fulfilled at the epoch at which it is directed to take place,without evasion, neglect or delay.

37-6-118

(He goes out.-a funeral march.)

Herald

Hear ye,hear ye,sons of men and daughters of Almighty God! Ye have heard the miracle of America,how out of human material low and high,of masters who became slaves,and slaves who beca e masters,of black men who served and fought and white men who fought and served,-man made America. And at its beginning walked George Washington seeing dimly,walking hesitantly among the rights of man;owning black slaves and leading black soldiers,listening to the voice of freedom and finally emerging in death as George Washington,Emancipator.

(An increasing band of Negroes march;first slaves,then workers,then well-dressed colored citizens and gay young folk.Music:"Walk together Children")

[K132]

Black Contemporaries of George Washington
1732-1799.

The following American Negroes attained distinction and influence during the years that George Washington lived:

Jupiter Hammond, 1720-1800.

A poet living on Long Island who published poems in 1761, 1778 and 1782. He wrote an address to the Negroes of the state of New York in 1787.

Crispus Attucks, 1723-1770.

The first martyr of the American Revolution. He lived in Massachusetts and was a run-away slave. He led a mob in attack upon the British soldiers in the streets of Boston, 1770. He was the first of four to be killed. This is known as the Boston Massacre. Daniel Webster said: "From that moment we may date the severance of the British Empire." A public funeral was given the four martyrs, and the 5th of March, 1770, the dayof their death, was celebrated as a national holiday in the colonies for thirteen years, until national independence was achieved, when the 4th of July was substituted.

417-2-41b

Benjamin Banneker, 1731-1804.

Benjamin Banneker was the son of a Negro slave and a free white woman. He was a student of mathamatics and helped survey the city of Washington in 1790, and published one of the first almanacs in America in 1792.

Harry Hosier, 1740-1810.

Harry Hosier was the black preacher who accompanied Bishop Asbury, the founder of the Methodist Church in America. Dr.

Dr. Benjamin Rust called him the greatest orator in America, and was a more popular speaker than almost anyone else in his day.

Henry Evans, 1750-1810.

A North Carolina slave who received a license as a local preacher and preached in a Methodist Church with many white ~~orators~~ auditors from 1790 until his death.

Salem Poor, 1745-1805.

A black soldier in the Battle of Bunker Hill who behaved like an experienced officer as well as an excellent soldier.

Absalom Jones, 1746-1818.

Together with Richard Allen, he left the Methodist Church in Philadelphia on account of color discrimination and founded the Free African Society. Afterward, he became the first black rector in the American Episcopal Church.

Lib-9-47

Prince Hall, 1748-1807.

A native of Barbadoes, who came to the United States in 1765 and in 17~~75~~ 84 received a warrant from the Masonic Grand Lodge of England establishing him and fourteen colored brothers as the African Lodge of Masons.

Katy Ferguson, 1749-1854.

Founder of the first Sunday School movement in New York City. Her school for the poor on Sundays was opened in 1793, and this was ~~voted~~ followed by the organization of New York women for the secular instruction of the poor.

Pompey, 1749-1804.

Pompey was a slave in New York State and his conduct as spy made possible the capture of Stoney Point by Mad Anthony Wayne, July 16, 1779. The fort and 543 British soldiers were taken prisoners.

George Liele, 1750—

A Baptist preacher who, together with Andrew Bryan, established one of the first Negro Baptist Churches in the United States, ~~and afterward preached in Savannah~~. After the Revolutionary War, he was freed by the British and went to Jamaica where he became the first missionary worker of American Negroes.

Lemuel Haynes, 1753-1833.

Born in Connecticut, the son of a black man and a white woman. His mother abandoned him and he became a soldier in the Revolutionary army. Afterward, he studied by himself and taught school. He was finally licensed to preach in the Congregational Church in 1780, and pastored churches in Vermont and Connecticut. President Dwight of Yale was among his auditors.

Phillis Wheatley, 1753-1784.

Brought as a slave from Africa to New England in 1784 and educated by her owners. She early showed great literary ability and published volumes of poems. One of her poems was dedicated to George Washington. He acknowledged its receipt in 1776 with a polite letter and invited her to visit his headquarters, and she did after the evacuation of Boston by the British. She died at the age of 31.

Paul Cuffe, 1759-~~1877~~ 1817

A pioneer Negro ~~in American~~ agitator. He belonged to the Negro Union of Newport Rhode Island and early proposed an exodus of Negroes to Africa. He made voyages to Russia, England Africa, West Indies and the South, ~~He owned his own vessel, and~~ in his own vessels several times he protested on account of discrimination against him in Massachusetts. He refused to pay taxes because he could not vote. He tried to get his children into the public schools, and finally built a school for colored children. At last in 1815 and at an expense to himself of nearly $4,000, he took nine families of thirty-eight persons to Sierra Leone. He intended further efforts at migration but died before they were carried through.

814.6-47

Richard Allen, 1760-1831.

The founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in Maryland; purchased his own freedom, and became a laborer. Joining the Methodist Church, he ~~finally~~ left it, in 1787 on account of discrimination, and started the Free African Society. Finally, he and forty-two followers ~~both laid~~ bought land and erected a colored church, which ~~finally~~ became the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Allen became the first bishop.

John Chavis, 1763-1838.

A North Carolina Negro; educated at Princeton and Lexington, Virginia. He became a Presbyterian preacher, and conducted a school attended by many prominent white people. Among his pupils were a United States senators, a sons of the Chief Justice, and a Governor of the state.

James Forten, 1766-1842.

A Philadelphia Negro who invented a device for handling sails on vessels. He was a business man and stout defender of his people. He took part in all the movements against slavery, and, opposed African colonization.

617-2-419

THE HISTORY OF THE NEGRO IN AMERICA IN TWELVE LIVING PICTURES

Undated

THE HISTORY OF THE NEGRO IN AMERICA IN TWELVE LIVING PICTURES.

---

1. The Discovery of the Southwest by Stephen Dorantes.

A desert; a Negro in Spanish mail staggering in exhaustion. He sinks faintly. Later a band of Indians. They rescue him. He rises and with outstretched arms views the Southwest.

34-2 67

2. The landing of the Slaves in 1619.

A crowd of Virginians wait on the pier of Jamestown. A ship is announced. The captain stands as auctioneer and sells twenty Negroes who disembark in various attitudes of revolt, surprise and despair. The last figure is a phophetess who foretells doom as the slaves kneel.

3. Crispus Attucks .

Attucks enters Boston as a vagabond. The British soldiers cow the citizens . He leads the mob and is shot. His funeral.

4. The Church.

George Lisle baptizes Negroes and whites. Lot Carey stands for Africa. The converts enter the white church and are repulsed. Led by Allen and Jones they form a new Church.

5. The Cotton Gin .

Slaves are lazily separating the cotton seed. A white man watches them and perfects the cotton gin. The gin starts, the masters stirred by visions of wealth lash the slaves to work.

6. Osceola.

The slaves run away to the swamp. One girl meets an Indian chieftain, Osceola, and they are married. She is abducted to slavery. Osceola kills the American officer and starts on the war path.

7. The first Convention of Nat Turner.

The Negroes come together to discuss their condition. The invitation to consider is read. A school in Connecticut is suggested but New Haven refuses. The news of Nat Turner's insurrection is received.

8. The Underground Railroad.

Slave hunters appear nailing up posters. Darkness falls. A father, mother and children are seen skulking away. The children led by the father escape in a wagon. He returns and is captured. The mother alone and in despair commits suicide.

9. The Abolitionists.

Publishing the Liberator - the paper on the streets. The meeting where Frederick Douglass speeks. The mob. Garrison is dragged through the streets.

10. War .

A fight is in progress. Both parties are exhausted. Drums are heard. The Negro soldiers enter and the Confererate flag falls.

11. Emancipation.

A plantation. A soldier reads the Proclamation. The slaves disperse. Two lovers run off hand in hand . A mother clasps her children and runs to her husband. A ~~mother~~ half grown boy struts and drinks. An old man in chains stands bewildered and prays.

12. The Struggle.

A home. The mother and baby and children . The father enters a fugitive. The mob howls outside. The vision of Justice and Equality.

THE JEWEL OF ETHIOPIA

Undated
Draft manuscripts and notes

THE JEWEL OF ETHIOPIA.

A Masque in ____ Episodes.

EPISODE I.

In a great forest Shango, the Thunder God, hides the Jewel of Freedom and sets the burning beast to guard it. To him as he turns away Ethiopia appears and begs for the Jewel. He gives it to her finally on condition that she surrender to him her own soul. Shango disappears and Ethiopia conceals the Jewel in her bosom.

EPISODE II.

The world of women begin to seek for the lost Jewel of Freedom. Five (5) women of Egypt enter gorgeously arrayed. They pray to the Great God, Osiris, and suddenly out of the bosom of the God steps Ethiopia with the Jewel on her breast. They lead her down, enthrone her, and dance around her throne.

EPISODE III.

The wild Bantu warriors hearing of the mysterious Jewel burst out of the forests and seize Ethiopia. She hands the Jewel to two fairies who conceal it beneath their wings. The warriors offer her up in burning sacrifice.

EPISODE IV.

The Mohammedans with deep learning and elevated worship seek the Jewel of Freedom. They learn from an ancient witch that the Jewel is in the soul of Ethiopia, just gone back to Shango who owns it. With weird incantation the witch raises Shango, the Thunder God, and the Thunder God calls Ethiopia back to life. She appears with great white wings and goes to seek the lost Jewel.

EPISODE V.

Five (5) European women basking in the forest discover the fairies and the Jewel of Freedom. They mistake it for gold and are quarrelling over it when Ethiopia appears. The fairies disappear with the Jewel but the women chain Ethiopia and make her their slave.

EPISODE VI.

Five (5) colored American women enter. Two of the women dressed as teacher and artisan begin to ply their trade and count their money. Two of the women with mirrors and cosmetics begin to adorn themselves, but the fifth woman, robed in white, atares steadily out into space. To her appears Ethiopia veiled and bids her prepare for the Jewel of Freedom. The white-robed woman indicates her helplessness but by striving she lays the great foundation stone of labor. Appealing to the working women the second stone of wealth is laid. Appealing to the other two women the five of them raise Justice and Beauty, but the other woman refuses to help further. The white-robed woman bends and prays and out of the audience come the fairy children. They raise Education and Truth, and then from the back Ethiopia unveiled and splendid sets the Jewel of Freedom on the Pillar of Light. Behind her rises Shango, the Thunder God, and the Egyptians and Bantu and Mohammedans join Europeans and Americans and little children in acclaim of the Pillar of Light.

34-3-45

Return to W.E.B. DuBois
70 Fifth Ave
N.Y.C

A PAGEANT

"THE JEWEL OF ETHIOPIA"

set down by

W. E. Burghardt DuBois

To the glory of the Negro race and the freedom of all men.

34-2-66

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

THIRTEEN LEADING CHARACTERS

Ethiopia

Candace

Queen of Sheba

The Chieftain and Pharoah

The Chief's Sister

The Thunder God

Osceola

John Brown

Nat Turner

Touissaint the Savior

Mansa Musa

The Monomotapa

Mohammed Askia

Jugurtha

SIXTY-NINE CHARACTERS AND TEN ANIMALS

3 Egyptian Priests

2 Priests of Fetish

2 Monks

2 Dervishes

6 Mohammedan Horsemen

12 Slave Traders

4 Angels

12 Ghosts

12 Skeletons

6 Abolitionists

4 Furies of Insurrection

4 Mothers

8 Horses

1 Elephant

1 Camel

5 Rivers
- Green Nile
- Black Niger
- Red Congo
- Yellow Mississippi
- Blue Orinoko

GROUPS

900 PERSONS

100 Savages

100 Egyptians

100 Dancing Maidens

100 Nubians, Songhay and Yorubans

100 Mohammedans

100 Slaves

50 Indians

50 Haytians

100 Soldiers

100 Children

84-2-67

SCENE I

THE GIFT OF FAITH

EPISODE I.

A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and the chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

34-2-168

EPISODE II.

(4) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (5) Shango, the Thunder Spirit, rises on the Black Rock and after him (6) Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Star of Faith. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth to the star, discover the welding of iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing star.

SCENE II.

THE DREAM OF EGYPT

EPISODE III. (8)

(9) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. The Egyptians file out of the temple led by (10) chanting priests. They worship.

EPISODE IV.

The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in (11) triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Faith glowing aloft. Gradually they fraternize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. (12) The priests choose the chief and his sister as Pharoahs.

EPISODE V.

Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned (13) and the court celebrates. All depart in search of the Star of Faith.

SCENE III

THE GLORY OF ETHIOPIA

EPISODE VI.

As they disappear the Black Rock replaces the Temple. On the rock appears the Holy Family and the three kings - Black, white and yellow appear in the foreground. They see the Christ Child and hear the angels and view the crucifixion. St. Simon brings down the cross.

34-2-69

EPISODE VII.

An Ethiopian temple appears and out of it rides the hosts of the crescent led by Mohammed Askia; against them come the hosts of Fetish led by Mossi-Koi. From the West comes the Queen of Sheba with symbols of Jews, while from the East comes Candace with the cross.

EPISODE VIII.

There ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. (23) As both sides are exhausted white Christians appear and slave traders. Ethiopia appears on the temple. She rescues the cross from the exhausted Candace. The Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the traders discover her and set fire to the temple. (25) She burns lifting the the cross to God and the rock becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

(INTERMISSION OF FIVE MINUTES)

SCENE IV

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION

EPISODE IX.

(26) In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard. (27) Death and pain dance among the prostrate followed by the Dance of the Ocean (g) war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles. (28) (h) Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks (29) and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (30) (i) But the temple remains darkened with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

34-2-70

EPISODE X.

As the cotton pickers dance the twelve apostles of Negro christianity in America appear, the Abolitionists gather (31) and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the temple. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God arises (32) and sings Ethiopia to life. (33) She slowly rises on the temple winged with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four angel sprites. (34)

EPISODE XI.

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword. The roll of tom-toms is heard (35) and the furies of insurrection rush in (j) led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march of "Walk Together Children" (36) Toussaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the Civil war march in. (37) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last. (38)

(INTERMISSION OF FIVE MINUTES)

SCENE V

THE VISION EVERLASTING

EPISODE XII.

Ethiopia and the twelve apostles enter who lay the foundation stone, the Fear of God, and then raise the cross for the apex. The jubilant freedmen approach but refuse to build the Tower of Light - they wrangle, play and dance. Ethiopia and the apostles withdraw to the distance and the ghosts of slavery enter. The freedmen pray to Ethiopia. She sends the four rivers, Nile, Niger, Congo and Orinoko.

EPISODE XIII.

The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (44) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the founding stone KNOWLEDGE. The Congo calls the savages and they lay the stone LABOR. (45) The Nile calls the Egyptians and they lay the stone SCIENCE. (46) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and they lay the stone JUSTICE. (47) The blue Orinoko summons the dancing maidens who bring ART. (47) (m) The mothers approach singing (50) They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone Love. (51) (o) The twelve apostles place the cross on the Tower of Light beneath the Star of Faith. A great son arises, - "O Freedom Over Me." (52) The apostolic procession.

34-2-71

Wren

candles & Magnesium candles

Mr. D. Das

34-3-89

During First Scene.

Left -- Egyptians.
Between temple and pavillion -- Dancers. ~~Umbella~~

During Second Scene.

Right -- Mohammedans
Askia, Kings, Musa, Priests, Dervishes, Slaves.
Left -- Monomotapa, merchants, artisans, Nubians and Slave traders.
In temple -- Angels. (Red fire) (Fetish stud)
On rock -- Ethiopia. Umbella,

During Third Scene.

In rock -- Shango and Ethiopia.
Right -- Women slaves with Mrs. Bowie.
Left -- Women slaves with Mrs. Beverley.
Indians, Slave masters.
Center -- Men slaves.
Rear and center -- Skeletons
Right -- Abolishionists; Soldiers.
Center -- John Brown; Furies (Red fire)
Left -- Haytians

During Fourth Scene.

Left -- Society pancers
Orinoko
Orinoko maidens between Temple and Pavilion.
Left rear -- Laborers & craftsmen (?)
Center -- Mississippi
Deep rear -- Mothers and star children
Rear of Temple -- Egyptians
Rear of Barrier -- Kushites Pillar Congo, Nile & Niger.
Right -- Professional men; Mohammedans
Right Rear -- Athletes
Right center -- School Children.
Rock -- Ethiopia.

Egyptians -- Savoy
Mohammedans -- Beverly and Cooper
Nubians -- Mehlinger
Slaves -- Savoy
Women slaves -- Mrs. Bowie(R)
Mrs. Beverly(L)
Men slaves -- Savoy
Skeletons -- Settlers
Indians -- Marshall
Furies -- Menard
Haytians -- McAdden
Soldiers -- Major Walker (R)
Society Dancers -- Mrs. Norman.
Kushites -- Westley & Settlers
Miss Chase.
Orinoko -- Mrs. Norman.

24-3-90

Color Schemes

1
2
3
4
5

34-3-52

2nd Revision

A PAGEANT

"THE JEWEL OF ETHIOPIA"

set down by

W. E. BURGHARDT DUBOIS

To the glory of the Negro race and the freedom of all men.

(5 Scenes, 12 Episodes; Time: 2 hours & 30 minutes)

THE NINE TALES OF BLACK FOLK

1941
Manuscript and notes for pageant and film

THE NINE TALES OF BLACK FOLK

by

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

36-5-13

I. 50,000 B. C. THE COMING OF BLACK MAN

Dimly in the background of a high mountain three sons of God, Black, White and Yellow, walk down from the mist: one, Black Man with an iron shard in his hand, slowly comes to the shore of a lake and calls and beats upon the earth with mighty rhythm, until the world trembles. A woman, Ethiopia, rises slowly from the waters and meets him. They build a hut and Nefertari is born.

II. 1500 B. C. THE TRIUMPH OF ETHIOPIA

Ethiopia is seen sailing down the Nile with her granddaughter Nefertari. They behold the vast pyramids of Egypt beset by yellow hordes of Asia, and the Egyptians in bondage. Aahmes, Pharaoh of Egypt, fleeing from his foes seeks sanctuary with Ethiopia and marries Nefertari in great ceremony. Aahmes-Nefertari, assuming the double crown and summoning black armies, redeem Egypt. Their grandson, Amen-Hotep III, builds the temple of Karnack. As his son Rameses II reigns, Egypt becomes the greatest power of the world.

III. 750 B. C. THE EMPEROR TARHARKA

Led by Essarhaddon "the Assyrians came down like a wolf on the fold", adorned like bulls. They overthrow the Egyptians; but Tarharka, black king of Ethiopia, marches out of the south and drives them in head-long flight. He annexes Egypt to Ethiopia and for twenty-five years he rules as emperor of the world from the Euphrates to the Strait of Gibraltar. But at his death Assyrians and Persians pour in and darkness descends on the Valley of the Nile.

IV. 300 B. C. - 300 A. D. CANDACE AND PRESTER JOHN

Fifteen centuries roll by. Greece flames and dies always reverencing Ethiopia. Rome rules the world. Candace, Queen of Napata and Meroe, holds back the power of Macedon and Rome, withstanding Alexander the Great, Caesar, Augustus and Diocletian. She accepts Christianity as Bishop Frumentius baptizes her. Then, closing the pathways to the south, she retreats to the high mountain ramparts of Abyssinia, where her son, Prester John, guards the Cross; and "the Ethiopians slept for a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom they were forgotten."

V. 1000 A. D. THE MARCH OF THE BANTU

Out of Asia rushes Atilla the Hun and the Roman Empire falls. Out of Asia marches Othman the Mohammedan, with his yellow and black soldiers; moving across Africa he sets up the kingdom of the Moors in Spain. Black Antar the Poet sings. Europe crusades against Islam three hundred years while down in the forests of the Congo Valley, Shango, God of Thunder, spurning both Europe and Asia, leads the hosts of the Bantu south to Zimbabwe.

36-5-14

VI. 1500 A. D. FIVE BLACK KINGS

The Five Black Kings of Bilad es Sudan - Gonga-Musa, Sonni Ali, Mohammed Askia, Mohammed Rimpa and Mai Idris III - unite Asia and Europe with Africa in awakening of the Renaissance: trade, universities and imperial government are instituted. But far in the east Jenghis Khan drives the Turks west and the Turks seizing the Mediterranean separate Europe from Asia, Europe from Africa and Asia from Africa. Columbus seeks Asia by sailing west and Da Gama seeks Africa by sailing south. Da Gama discovers the lost land of Prester John.

VII. 1700 A. D. THE HEART DISEASE OF AFRICA

The Alafin of Yoruba sits on his Golden Stool under the royal umbrella, while tom-toms summon a white prisoner to his presence. The Portuguese seeks trade in ivory and slaves and the Alafin grants his wish and gives him a place to live. But news comes of the continual increase of tribal wars, of rebellion and disintegration in the West African city-states and captives stream down to the sea. An ambassador arrives from the Kingdom of Benin bearing the great Juju magic with three seeds hidden in a little bag. He warns of war and slavery. He worships with fire and shows Africa stabbed front and back by white Christian Europe and Mohammedan Asia. He kills human victims in sacrifice and shows their blood streaming out and crimsoning the western sea. But the Alafin is unmoved. His artists and sculptors work and his bards sing of Nupe, the Mossi, Prester John and eastern Rome. Prizing their freedom and skill, the other city-states surrounding Yoruba refuse to unite and gradually all fall victims to the white slave traders. Finally aroused and led by King Osai Tutu Kwamina the Ashanti attack England in six wars; but the Fanti, whom the Ashanti rule, join the English against the Ashanti in order to gain their freedom. The English hard-pressed make a treaty. They give up the slave trade and plan to withdraw entirely from Africa. In this interval Russworm, Lott Carey and Joseph Roberts found and free Liberia; but a new power risen in America gradually rules the world. And the English turning crush Ashanti, Benin and West Africa with machine guns. The Juju man appears in the midst of the slaughter, seizes the king's Golden Stool and with the three seeds tied in a little bag about his neck, leaps into the crimson sea.

VIII. 1800 A. D. THE TRIUMPH OF EUROPE

White men in America are seeking gold. They find the Golden Stool and hastily divide it. Then they descry the dead body of the Juju and taking the three seeds plant them: tobacco, cotton and sugar grow. Three of them stepping apart invent the Machine - cotton-gin, steam-engine and spinning jenny. The crops expand and are sent in increasing loads overseas.

In Europe, Frederick the Great, William Pitt and Napoleon use the Machine to subdue the world and white, brown and black men strip themselves of labor and liberty to secure food and goods. The white men revolt and rioting sing the Marseillaise.

In America Juju hears the song and rises from the dead as Toussaint the Savior. He emancipates black labor in America, while the Reign of Terror bursts on France.

IX. 2000 A. D. THE AFRICAN MARCH TO FREEDOM

In the flame of world revolt one hears the call of Shango leading the Bantu, and the roll of the tom-tom. Successively there appear, clad in their various uniforms and insignia, first the march of the Haitian slaves under Toussaint; then the march of Negroes in the American Revolution; then the rush of the wild Sudanese hordes under the Al-Mahdi; then the flight of the slaves and tramp of the Negro soldiers in the Civil War; and the rush of the Negro cavalry up San Juan Hill to rescue Roosevelt; then the Negro soldiers in the World, both the French Senegalese and the American Negroes. And finally, a vision of world freedom. All this is accompanied by music, the tom-toms fade into the national hymn of Haiti, Yankee Doodle, the Sudanese war cries, Marching Through Georgia, Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight, the Star Spangled Banner and the Negro national anthem.

36-5-15

The Seven Ages of Man

I 10,000 BC The Coming of Black Men
II 1500 BC Ethiopia + Hatshepsut
III 750 BC. Taharka, Master of the World
IV 0 ~~Candace + Freedom Rome~~
V 750 AD ~~The Struggle over Europe~~
VI ~~1000~~ The March of the Barbs
VII ~~1200~~ Shango, God of Thunder
~~VIII~~ 1500 AD Three ~~Seven~~ Black Kings
VII 1600 Heart Disease ~~+ the Caribs~~
~~VIII 1700~~ ~~The Travels & Freedom~~
VIII 1400 The Triumph of Europe
" African Trade & Freedom
IX 2000

35-5-262

I 100000 BC
The Coming of Black Men

Three sons of God walk down from the wheels of a mighty mountain

One, Black Man, armed with an iron staff comes to the shores of a Lake + calls; a woman, Ethiopia comes slowly up out of the waters and meets him. They build a hut + Ethiopia is born drums of the forests

35-5-263

II 1500 BC.

Ethiopia sails down the Nile with her daughter Hatshepsut. They see the Pyramids of Egypt ~~built~~ by the Egyptians ~~slaves~~ in bondage by yellow bodies ~~Hyksos~~, Rahotep, Rahotep + Pharaoh of Egypt flees to Ethiopia + marries Hatshepsut in great Ceremony. Rahotep-Hatshepsut redeem Egypt + their son Amen-hotep III builds Karnack + other beautiful temples Egypt is the greatest power of the world Amenhotep dies + Ramesses II ~~succeeds~~ the throne assumes the double crown

III 750 BC.

Under Esarhaddon "the Assyrians Come down like a wolf on the fold" adorned like bulls, ~~Taharka, king of Ethi~~ They overthrow Egypt but Taharka, Black king of Ethiopia comes out of the South and drives the Assyrians in headlong flight Conquers Egypt. He unites Egypt + Ethiopia + for 25 years rules as Emperor of the world from the Euphrates to the Strait of Gibraltar at his death Assyrians make + Persians from N + darkness descends on the Valley of the Nile

35-5-264

Memo FROM W. E. B. DU BOIS

35-5-265

IV Queen Candace & Prester John

Fifteen centuries rolled by and Greece then Rome ruled the world and freed up the Nile but the Candaces, Queens of Napata & Meroe Ethiopia and Alexander the Great, Caesar, Augustus and Nero, guarding the gates & central Africa. The Church entered with Bishop Frumentius & was nourished. But as Europe & Asia menaced Africa, the Ethiopians gradually withdrew & the mighty mountain ramparts of Abyssinia. There guarding the cross of Prester John, & "the Ethiopians slept for nearly a thousand years, for gathfold of the world by whom they were forgotten"

Memo FROM W. E. B. DU BOIS

35-5-266

V 750 AD

Out of Asia rushes Allah
The Hun and Rome falls. Out
Asia Othman the Mohammedan with Black soldiers marches across Africa and set up a kingdom in Spain. Europe crumbles against Islam while Shango god of Thunder leads the hosts of the Bantu through the forests of Congo south & Zymbabwe

Atlas

Memo FROM W. E. B. DU BOIS

35-5-267

VI 1500 AD

Four Black Kings of Bilad es Sudan — Gonja Musa, Sonni Ali
Mohammed Askia, Mohammed Rumfa and Mai Idris III — World Asia and Europe unite Africa in the awakening of the Renaissance;
but Genghis Khan drives the Turks west and the Turks, seizing the Mediterranean extends Europe from Asia, Europe from Africa & Asia from Africa. Columbus seeks Asia by sailing West & Da Gama Africa by sailing South. He discovers Prester John

35-5-268

VII 1700

Akan Yoruba

The ~~King~~ of ~~Benin~~ sits on his golden stool under the royal umbrella and receives a white prisoner. The Portuguese asks trade in ivory, palm oil and slaves. The quarter was pleased but no slaves except of course captives of war. He may have the white & send him but he may not buy it. Wars increase, kidnapping & captives always are. Skill in the arts & sculpture wonderful. The lands army of Negro Kingdom of Benin & Dahomey Paris Peace Conference An ambassador arrives from Benin bearing the great Juju to the wars of witchcraft & human sacrifice He makes terrible sacrifices to Ogun & drums of slaves. ~~Blood~~ Blood crimsoning the Sea. The only slaves with Benin Dahomey white wills, preserving freedom & skill. Educated Christ ~~At last~~ The Akan people ~~broke~~ by ~~Ashanti~~ ~~destroyed~~ by the Fanti ~~and~~ revolt. The Ashanti ~~Since~~ time ~~they~~ attack England Led by King Osei Tutu Kwamina. In the

Ivory Coast

found over the Rebellion was the 2nd
A great treaty of peace was planned at the Autumn Treaty & both sides found
The English egged on by the Yankee struggling for freedom broke the treaty & fought a 4th & 5th war
The English & Yankee & Wellington from Africa
& Joseph & Roberts from Texas
~~Northern & Southern Army, Address~~ ~~Abolition. The Golden Slave Question~~ but new colonial wealth & Wells. They armed with modern weapons & soldier Rebellion &
Peace. The Japs now carry the Golden
Slave with the 3 seeds Texas almost dies
Texas South with the Crimean War

35-5-269

VIII 1600

~~Black~~ White men in America seek for gold. They find the golden slave and basely divide it. & ~~with them~~ Then Christ discover the dead body of the Jap & the 3 seeds. They plant them &
Tobacco Sugar & Cotton grow. But three men set apart and dream until they invent the Machine (Cotton gin, Steam engine & Spinning Jenny) The Corps are frenzied & extend factories areas. Frederick the Great William Pitt & Napoleon use the Machine &
Enslave the world and Cotton Crown &
Black men sink themselves in ~~poverty~~ debt & Liberty in exchange for Life & goods. The inventors of the machine themselves caught in its cogs & wheels revolt
& sing the Marseillaise
& in America the Japs heroes & risen from the dead. As Toussaint the Seven he circumnavigates slaves Satan in America while Charles riots & the Reign of 2

Terror reign in France

Memo FROM W. E. B. DU BOIS

35-5-270

IX 2000

The Black March of Freedom
Strange Calls - Ch Tom - Chas Lobb
Toussaint in Haiti
The American Negro in The Revolution
The Methods
The Negro in the Civil War
" " " at San Juan Hill
" " " World War
The vision of Freedom

Memo FROM W. E. B. DU BOIS

Ten Tales of Black Folk

I 100000 B.C. Three Sons of God
II 10000 The Coming of Black Man
III 5000 & 1000 Ethiopia + Nefertari
IV 750 Tahraka Master of the World
V 0 Carthage Rome + Prester John
VI 1000 - The Pantin + Zymbabwe
VII 1500 - The 7 Black Kings
VIII 1800 - Heart Disease
IX 1800 The Machine
X 1900 [illegible] The March to Freedom

35-5-271

AFRICA ASIA EUROPE

500
1500
1600
1700
1800
2000 Europe
Asia Africa

35-5-273

	Europe	Asia	Africa
3000
2500	Minoan	Sumerian Harappan	Minoan
2000	Troy	Hittite in China Babylon Assyrian	Thebes Hyksos
1500	Trojan War Dorian Migration	Zoroaster	Akhenaten Tutankhamen Amenhotep III Ramesses II
1000	Homer 1st Olympiad Pericles Persian Wars Alexander the Great	Persian Cambyses Buddha Asoka Middle Kingdom Jimmu Tenno (Japan)	Ethiopian conquer Egypt Herodotus TAHARQA Nubian Kingdom Carthage
500	Diocletian Constantine Rome falls Charlemagne	Mohammed Cordova Moors in Spain	Candace
1000	Olaf I Crusades Joan of Arc Leif Erikson 1492	Mongols Jenghis Khan Kublai Marco Polo Turkic Mings Timur AKBAR in India Manchus in China	Arabs in Africa Ghana Mali Songhay Hausa Benin Dahomey Bornu-Kanem Monomotapa Zimbabwe Slave trade
1500

35-5-274

936 (73) Otto I
962 Holy Roman Empire

1076 Pope Gregory VII
1030 Canute
1066 William the Conqueror

1337 100 yrs War
1453

1400 Chaucer
1429 J. of Arc
1485 Henry VII

912-61 Height of Moorish splendor in Spain

1001 Great Mohammedan invasion of Spain

1096-99 1st Crusade
1189-92 3rd "
1202-4 4th "

1206 Jenghiz Khan
1212 defeat of Moors in Spain
1215 Capture of Peking by J Khan
1241 Mongols invade Europe
1258 " capture Bagdad
1259-94 Mongol Empire Kublai K

1271-95 Marco Polo in East
1280 Mongol dynasty of KK in China

1288 Othman the Ottoman
1329 Turks overthrow Eastern Roman Empire
1368 Ming dynasty in China
1398 Timur in India

1450+ Vernacular
1453 Constantinople falls
1492 America d.
1498 Da Gama in India

35-5-235

B.C. 741-663 Heyday of Negro -

450 Herodotus in Egypt

1703 Aahmes Nefertari

1400 Amenhotep III

1723-308 Nafrata

309-10 AD Meroe

AD 10-355 Late Meroe - Candace

B.C. 750-650 Ethiopian rule Egypt

BC. 668-663 Taharka, Emperor of the World (Karnak)

744 Pantchy

Persian invade 525-415 BC.

342-32 "

Greece dominates Egypt 332+ BC

BC 525 Cambyses defeated

Ptolemy II gains peaceful rule of 9 nations of Ethiopia

Candace resists Caesar 29 AD +

A.D 64-8 Nero invades no war

Diocletian + Nubians

330 Athanasius, Bishop of Ethiopia

Preaches Jesus

1275 Arabs overrun Nubia

1820 Mohammed Ali

1881-1898 Mahdi

A.D.

Europe

Egypt

Asia

35-5-276

343 B.C. 14 A.D. Quashed
54 Nero
96 Trojan
284 Diocletian
323 Constantine
375 Hun Tartar migrations
395-1453 E. Roman Empire
395-476 W. " "
476 Odovacar
375 Huns cross Volga
410 Alaric sacks Rome

571 Mohammed born
622 Hegira
634 Omar
644 Othman C. N. Africa
661-750 Ommiads
732 Battle of Tours
768 Charlemagne
843 T. of Verdun

756 Caliphate of Cordova

Egypt

B.C. 3000 Menes

2400 Thebes

2100 Hyksos

1684 Aahmes

New Empire

Amenhotep III

Canaan Under

1388-22 Rameses II

(Hebrews)

1091 Rise of Nehushtan + Herhor

730 Ethiopian Conquers E.

672 Assyrian (Esarhaddon

Conquers Tahraka - Stated

by T

525 Cambyses C. Egypt

414-354 Egypt independent

323.85 Ptolemy I

Chaldaean 35-5-277

4000 Sumeria

3000 Hammurabi

2000 Babylonian independence

1900 Assyrian empire

1115 Tiglath-Pileser I

930

" " II

Sargon

Height of Empire

626

608 New Empire of Babylon

538 Persian C. "

Hindu

Draviadians

1500 Aryans migrate

623. Buddha

(Alexander)

263 Asoka

Rome

753 Romulus

510 Republic

264-41

1st Punic War

60 1st Triumph

47-6 War in

218 2nd Pu

149 3rd

146 Carthage

Medes Persians

1000 Zoroaster

640 Medean empire

558 Cyrus the Persian

525 Cambyses

521 Darius (Revolt of Egypt)

500 Revolt of Greeks

485 Xerxes I

465 Artaxerxes I (Revolt of Egypt)

330 Fall of Persian Alexander

174 Mithridates I (Parthian)

AP
55

China 35-5-288

2205 Hia

1123

Chow dynasty

middle kingdom

255 Tsin

206 C. Wall

E. & W. Han

AD 221

Judea

660 Jewish Temple

Greece

1194 Trojan War
1183

1100 Dorian migration
900 Homer

776 1st Olympiad

594 Solon

500
490 Marathon

Persian Wars
480 Thermopylae
444 Parades
431 Peloponnesian War
338 Battle of Chaeronea
336 } Alexander
323 }

146 Crumbling of Greece

Ten Tales of Black Folk

I 10000 Coming of Black Folk
II 5000 Rise of Ethiopia
III 1400 Nefertari
IV 750 Triumph of Taharka
V 500 – 500 Barring of Europe + Revolt of Asia
VI 500 – 1500 Darkness Descends crusades The Bantu + Askia empire + genghis khan
Death of Shango
VII 1500 – 1750 Black America + 3 gifts
VIII 1750 – 1850 Revolution of European Technique
IX 1775 – 1940 The Black fight for Freedom
X 1940 on The Cooperation of Black Folk

35-5-239

AD 1000 Almoravids

1000 – 1200 Ghana

1073 Morocco

1235 – 1400 Mali

1355, 1591 Songhay

1591 Battle of Tondibi

15-16 c 7 cities of Hausa

14-17th c. Bornu Kanem, Empire of Trade

BC 600-500 Phoenicians Carthaginians on West Coast

18th c Yoruba

18th c Benin

16th Dahomey
Ashanti
Akan

B.C. 1000 - AD 1000 Bantu
Proto-Malayo
1000-1500 Zymbabwe
Kilwa

1441 – 1870 Slave trade

1876 – 1940 Colonial Period

35-5-280

35-5-281

Europe	Africa	W Asia	E Asia	S. Asia
5000	Egypt
			China
2500
	Amen-Hotep III
	Ramsa II
	Trojan War
	Pericles
	Alexander the Great		Confucius
+	Caesar		Buddha
	Augustus
		Cambyses		Gupta
	Alaric	Darius I
	Attila	Mohammed
		Tarik
1000
		Pavia		Genghis Khan
				massacres
			Ming	Kublai Khan
		Askres
		Slave trade
	Steam Engine			Moguls
				Akbar

B.C.

1400 Amenhotep III

1300 Rameses II ← Assyria 930-626

530 Fall of Babylon

525 Cambyses

1183 Trojan War

461-29 Age of Pericles

336-323 Alexander the Great

218 Hannibal

146 Carthage falls

BC 60-44 AD Caesar

27-14 Augustus

98 Trajan

116

161-80 Marcus Aurelius

259 German invasions begin

375 " "

395 Rome divided

400 Alaric

441-51 Attila

527-65 Justinian

620 Darius I of Persia

610 Mohammed

710 Tarik in N Africa

2852 Chinese history begins

551 Confucius

571 Buddha

321 Maurygan dynasty in India

AD

320 Gupta dynasty in India

1227 Death of Genghis Khan

1275 Marco Polo

1527 Mogul in India

1556 Akbar the Great

1268 Kublai Khan

1367 Tamerlane

1301-1644 Ming Emperors

Roman Empire reached Scotland

35-5-282

35-5-283

1517 Luther

1545 C. of Trent

1515+ Francis I

1572 Massacre of St Bartholomew

1509-47 Henry VIII

1558-1603 Elizabeth

1600 E. India Co.

1512-69? Medici

15 -56 Charles V

1520-56 Suleiman the Magnificent

1556-1605 Akbar, Mogul Emperor of India

1683 Turks @ Vienna

1625 Charles I

1641 Manchus in China

1657 Mahrattas in India

1743 Clive in India

1772-4 Warren Hastings

A PAGEANT OF NEGRO HISTORY

1913
Draft manuscripts

THE PROPOSED PAGEANT
****

1. I suggest that at least half of Miss Gruening's time be given to the organization of a pageant to be given by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People with the two-fold object of celebrating the jubilee of Emancipation in New York City and raising money for our purposes.

34-3-69

1. THE PAGEANT.

The pageant should consist of a series of living pictures, with some movement, accompanied by music. The general subject should be:

ETHIOPIA UNBOUND

1. (To commemorate the fact that the discovery of the use of iron originated in Africa.)

A procession of the savages with chant and tom-toms.

The Storm and the Beast.

The Fire.

The Veiled Woman.

The welding of the iron.

The killing of the beast, and shelter from the storm.

2. (Commemorating the fact that Meroe was the African center whence came the civilization of Egypt and the world.)

The Procession of Meroe and worship of serpent and Moon.

The pyramid builders.

The burial of the veiled woman, and the strangers and strange music from the North. The column starts North, West and South.

3. (Commemorating the rise of Mohammedan Negro civilization in the Soudan.)

The Pilgrimage of Manse Musa, King of the Mellestine to Mecca. The splendid caravan and ceremony. The blare of music. The veiled woman and her two princes, who afterward ruled Songhay.

34-3-70

4. (Commemorating the fall of Negro Mohammedan civilization).

The Fall of Songhay.

The procession of statesmen and scholars; the irruption of the Moors and conquest. Battle music. The flight of the Veiled Woman.

5. (Commemorating the great migration of Pagan Africa southward.)

The migration of the Bantu warriors southward with war and rapine; the veiled woman leading. Toms-toms and chants.

6. (Commemorating the rise of the American Slave Trade).

The coming of the slave traders with guile. the binding and sale of the Veiled Woman.

Slave songs.

7. (Commemorating the discovery of the south-west by a Negro slave.)

Stephen Borrantes, the slave.

The veiled woman shows him the way and he leads the spaniards.

His death at the hands of Indians. Slave music.

8. (Commemorating the Haytian Revolution)

The Revolt of the Slave. Touissant L'Ouverture, inspired by the Veiled Woman with manacled hands, leads the Haytian Blacks to victory, overcoming Franch, English and Spanish troops. He is made King.

Haytian National Music.

9. (Commemorating the Negro soldiers in South and North American wars.)

The Negro fights for Freedom in North and South America, urged by the veiled woman with chained hands. The freed whites turn their backs on their Negro helpers.

Slave hymns.

10. Commemorating Emancipation)

The Civil War. Negro troops led by the Veiled Woman march to the front. The emancipation proclaimed.

Negro folk songs.

11. (Commemorating the years 1863 - 1913.)

Confusion and counter marching and the struggle for victory, ending in:

12. (Being a vision of the future.)

The tableau - the Veiled Woman free and unveiled- Ethopia Unbound.

Coleridge Taylor music.

I suggest for this purpose a large number of prominent patrons and patronesses.

The securing of a large hall or armory by donation if possible.

34-3-71

The securing of a number of expert artists to train the pageant.

Donations of material and so forth for costumes.

The securing of actors and singers, etc.

The date of the pageant should be as near January first as possible and advertising should begin not later than November first.

After the pageant is given in New York, it might be repeated in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, etc.

34-3-72

(193)

THE PROPOSED PAGEANT.

I suggest that at least half of Miss Gruening's time be given to the o pageant to be given by the National Association for the Advancement of with the two-fold object of celebrating the jubilee of Emancipation in and raising money for our purposes.

I. THE PAGEANT.

The pageant should consist of a series of living pictures, w accompanied by music. The general subject should be:

ETHIOPIA UNBOUND

I. (To commemorate the fact that the discovery of th in Africa.)

A procession of the savages with chant and tom-t

The Storm and the beast.

The Fire

The Veiled Woman

The wedding of the iron

The killing of the beast, and shelter from the storm.

2 (Commemorating the fact that Meroe was the African center whence cam civilization of Egypt and the world.)

The Procession of Meroe and worship of serpent and Moon.

The pyramid builders

The burial of the veiled woman, and the strangers and s from the North. The column starts, North, West and So

3. (Commenorating the rsie of Mohannedan Negro civili

The Pilgrimage of Manse Musa, King of the Melle blare of music.

88-2-167a

V. (Commemorating the great migration of Pagan Africa southward.)

The migration of the Bantu warriors southward with war and rapine; the veiled woman leading. Tom-toms and chants.

VI. (Commemorating the rise of the American Slave Trade.)

The coming of the slave traders with guile. The binding and sale of the Veiled Woman.

Slave songs.

VII. (Commemorating the discovery of the southwest by a Negro slave.)

Stephen Borantes, the slave.

The veiled woman shows him the way and he leads the Spaniards.

His death at the hands of Indians. Slave music.

VIII. (Commemorating the Haytian Revolution)

The Revolt of the Slave. Touissant L'Ouverture, inspired by the Veiled Woman with manacled hands, leads the Haytian Blacks to victory, overcoming Franch, English and Spanish troops. He is made King.

Haytian National music.

IX. (Commemorating the Negro soldiers and sailors in South & North American wars.)

The Negro fights for Freedom.in North and South America, urged by the veiled woman with chained hands. The freed whites turn their backs on their Negro helpers.

Slave hymns.

X. (Commemorating Emancipation.)

The Civil War. Negro troops led by the Veiled Woman march to the front. The emancipation proclaimed.

Negro folk songs.

XI. Commemorating the years 1863 - 1913.)

Confusion and counter marching and the struggle for victory, ends. ending in:

XII. (Being a vision of the future.)

The tableau - the Veiled Woman free and unveiled - Ethiopia Unbound.

Coleridge - Taylor music.

I suggest for this purpose a large number of prominent patrons and patronesses.

38-2-168

The securing of a large hall or armory by donation if possible.

The securing of anumber of expert artists to train the pageant.

Donations of material and so forth for costumes.

The securing of actors and singers, etc.

The date of the pageant should be as near January first as possible and advertising should begin not later than November first.

After the pageant is given in New York, it might be repeated in Boston, Philadelphia, Chiago, etc.

W.E.B.D

38-2-169

THE PROPOSED PAGEANT OF NEGRO HISTORY.

Episode --- No. 1

To commemorate the fact that the discovery of the use of iron originated in Africa.

A procession of savages with chant and tom-toms, put to flight by storms and wild beasts, but receiving from the Veiling Woman the gift of fire and the art of welding iron by which they killed beasts and made shelter.

Episode --- No. 2.

To commemorate the fact that Egyptian culture had its origin in Africa.

The procession of the black Pharoah Ra Nesi.

Episode --- No. 3.

To commemorate the rise of Negro civilisation in Africa under Mohammedan influence.

The black Queen Candace of Ethiopia, defends herself against the Romans, and after her death King Mansa of the Millestine makes his pilgrimage to Mecca from the West an barbaric state.

Episode --- No. 4.

To commemorate the migration of the Pagan Bantus who were pushed south by the rise of Mohammedan civilization in the North and moved South and overthrew the beginnings of Negro culture there.

34-3-35

Episode --- No. 5.

To commemorate the rise of the Sudanese Empire of the Songhai and its overthrow.

Mohammed Askia sits in his court as a great law giver surrounded by scholars and statesmen. The Moors bursting down across the desert overthrow his empire and shut up the gateways toward the North. The Portuguese slave bearers appear at the South and the slave trade begins.

Episode --- No. 6.

To commemorate the appearance of the Negro in America as slave and explorer.

The black Pilate guides the ships of Columbus. A Negro slave discovers New Mexico and is killed by the Indians and twenty laborers land at Jamestown.

Episode --- No. 7.

To commemorate the first strides toward freedom.

Negro missionaries and preachers arrived. Crispus Attucs begins the Revolutionary War and Negro soldiers and sailors fight for American freedom.

Episode --- No. 8.

To commemorate the second phase of the struggle for freedom.

Touissant L' Overture leads the Haytian blacks to victory, overcoming French, English and Spanish troops.

Episode --- No. 9.

34-3.36

To commemorate the establishment of the cotton kingdom of the United States, and the under ground railway.

The invention of the cotton gin leads to a new slavery and to escape it the Negroes begin to run away systemmatically. Some go to the Indians and Florida and some go to the Northern states in Canada.

Episode --- No. 10.

To commemorate the fight for freedom by Negroes in North and South America.

Haytian troops fight with Bolivar. South American pirates take refuge in Hayti; Negro troops march to the front in civil war and Negro insurgents help to free Cuba.

Episode --- No. 11.

To commemorate the abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, and the abolitionists determine in convention to work for the freedom of the slave. The "Liberator" is issued.

Episode No. 12.

To commemorate the struggle for freedom and the vision of the future.

The confused marching and counter marching

The appearance of leaders in literature and art, and the final glorification of the child of the future.

34-3-37

Section 5.

THE PROPOSED PAGEANT OF NEGRO HISTORY.

34-3-59

Episode -- No. 1.

To commemorate the fact that the discovery of the use of iron originated in Africa:

A procession of savages with chant and tom-toms are put to flight by storms and wild beasts; but receiving from the Veiled Woman the gift of fire and the art of welding iron, they kill the beasts and make shelter.

Episode -- No. 2.

To commemorate the fact that Egyptian culture had its origin in Africa:

The procession of the black Pharoah, Ra Nesi.

Episode -- No. 3.

To commemorate the rise of Negro civilization in Africa under Mohammedan influence:

The black Queen Candace of Ethiopia, defends herself against the Romans, and after her death King Mansa Musa of the Mellestine makes his pilgrimage to Mecca from the West in barbaric state.

Episode -- No. 4.

To commemorate the migration of the Pagan Bantus who were pushed south by the rise of Mohammedan civilization in the north and overthrew the beginnings of Negro culture there.

34-3-60

Episode -- No. 5.

To commemorate the rise of the Sudanese Empire of the Songhai and its overthrow:

The black Mohammed Askia sits in his court as a great law giver surrounded by scholars and statesmen. The Moors bursting down across the desert overthrow his empire and shut up the gateways toward the north. The Portuguese slave bearers appear at the south and the slave trade begins among the Pagans there.

Episode -- No. 6.

To commemorate the appearance of the Negro in America as slave and explorer:

A black pilot guides the ships of Columbus, a Negro slave discovers New Mexico and is killed by the Indians and twenty laborers land at Jamestown.

Episode -- No. 7.

To commemorate the first strides toward freedom:

Negro missionaries and preachers arise. Crispus Attucs begins the Revolutionary War and Negro soldiers and sailors fight for American freedom.

Episode -- No. 8.

To commemorate the second phase of the struggle for freedom:

Toussaint L' Overture leads the Haytian blacks to victory, overcoming French, English and Spanish troops.

Episode -- No. 9.

To commemorate the establishment of the cotton kingdom of the United States, and the Under Ground railway:

The invention of the cotton gin leads to the nadir of slavery and the Negroes begin to run away systematically. Some go to the Indians in Florida, and some go to the northern states and Canada.

Episode -- No. 11

To commemorate the fight for freedom by Negroes in North and South America:

Haytian troops fight with Bolivar, South American patriots take refuge in Hayti; Negro troops march to the front in civil war and Negro insurgents help to free Cuba — Emancipation

Episode -- No. 10

To commemorate the abolitionist movement:

William Llyod Garrison, and the abolitionists determine in convention to work for the freedom of the slave. The "Liberator" is issued.

Episode -- No. 12.

To commemorate the struggle for freedom and the vision of the future:

34-3-62

Confused marching and counter marching, with mangled hope and despair; lynching on the one hand, and the appearance of leaders, social uplift, literature and art on the other; the final glorification of the black child of the future.

A Pageant of Negro History.

The People of Peoples and Their Gifts to Men.

1. The Gift of Iron

In a great forest huddle the savages frightened by the roar of beasts and the crash of the storm. Suddenly, enhaloed, comes the veiled woman with Fire in her right hand and Iron in her left. The Negroes seize them, weld weapons, and make shelter; the primitive arts flourish; they dance to the drone of tom-toms and the chanting of wierd music.

Thus came the gift of Iron to the world.

2. The Gift of the Nile

Suddenly there comes a strain of mightier music. Bowed and veiled figures drag in the Sphinx, the Pyramid, the Obelisk, and the throne of the Pharoahs. The Chieftain of the Negroes steps forward with the serpent in one hand and the uraeus in the other. He is enthroned as priest and King, and the veiled figures lifting their drapery disclose Negroes and Mulatoes clothed in the splendor of the Egyptian Court. The barbarous Negroes salaam and mingle with them and then return to the forests laden with gifts.

Thus came the gift of culture to the valley of the Nile.

3. The Gift of Faith

A darkness falls on the scene as Egypt disappears. Then comes martial music and the sound of battle. Mohammed, wild and fanatical leads on, followed by Mohammedan Soldiers. The Negroes and Mohammedans fight and then argue. The priests persuade and finally the great cry rings out from all: "God is God - God is God - There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his Prophet." Black Priests appear and black scholars, and, finally Mansa Musa, King of the black Kingdom of Melle, marches to Mecca in state but the Pagan Negroes withdraw fighting and carrying captives.

Thus came one of the gifts of Faith in the world.

4. The Gift of Humility

34-3-39

An European trader meets the pagan Negroes and buys captives. Other traders return with bribe of gold(which is despised) of beads and gin which are received. The Christian Missionaries preach but the slave trade increased and the wail of the missionaries grows fainter and fainter until all is a scene of carnage and capativiey - young and old, high and low, with only a frantic priest wandering in dumb despair. Amid the rattle of chains and snap of whips arises the slave song - "Nobody knows!" in one plaintive strain and minor murmur.

Thus the Negro race passed into its valley of Humiliation.

5. The Gift of Pain

Alonso, the Negro, pilot of the ship of Columbus, enters with whites. Afterward follows Negro porters and slaves, while Indians appear in the background.

(a) Stephen Dorantes seeks the seven Cities of Cibola and discovers New Mexico. He is killed by Indians. (b) The Maroons fight the whites and are conquered, the Indians hovering in the background. Toussaint triumphs in one part - in another part, Negroes escape to Osceola and his Indians and he rebels. Then comes better understanding. C. Attucks fights for the whites and George Lisle preaches but the whites and the Negroes with cotton and Nat Turner rebels and dies as the Negroes escape on the Underground Railroad.

Thus the Negroes came forward in the world with the Gift of Pain.

6. The Gift of Freedom

Fugitive slaves appear. John Brown leads them toward insurrection byt Garrison publishes the Liberator. The Negroes hesitating to meet in Convention. Frederick Douglass exhorts them and the sound of battle is heard without. Negro soldiers march to war and Ethiopia of the Outstretched Arm of Freedom in a chariot with a draped effigy of Lincoln in front, Proclaims the Negro in America "Henceforth and forever free!"

24-3-40

7. The Gift of Hope

The children approach. A single human voice sings, "O Freedom." The instruments take up the strain until the full brass band is playing. Then the brasses stop and the angel chorus rises above and the triumphant march led by little children, and symbolic figures (The Mother, Law, Medicine, Ministry, Artisan, and the Servant of Men) is begun.

Stage Directions

1 -- 15 minutes; (100 ready as savages, 50 ready as Egyptians, 50 ready as Bornuese and Songhay, 50 ready as Mohammedans)

100 savages enter in groups, with music of tom toms and chantry

2 -- 15 minutes --- 100 savages remain

50 Egyptians enter with Egyptian music

50 savages and 50 Egyptians pass out (Egyptians redress as Mohammedans)

3 -- 15 minutes --- 50 savages on stage. Mohammedan music and cry of "God is God."

50 Mohammedans enter; 50 Bornuese and Songhay enter; 50 other Mohammedans enter. 150 pass out.

4 -- 15 minutes --- 50 Mohammedans remain. 100 savages enter, 50 Bornuese and Songhay enter, 50 Mohammedans, in all 250 in groups, manacled. Slave songs.

All go out.

Pause of ten minutes.

5 -- 15 minutes --- Slave songs - enter 1 Spanish sailor, 25 Spaniards, 1 Negro in Spanish mail, 25 Maroons, 25 Haytians, 25 Seminoles 25 Indians, 25 Revolutionary soldiers, 25 modern dress, 25 slave dress - 150 go out.

6 & 7 -- 15 minutes --- 50 Maroons and men in slave dress remain, 100 soldiers enter and symbolic procession of 100 also 50 children.

34.3.44

Leopard

Costumes Needed

100 Savages
50 Egyptians
50 Bornuese and Songhay
100 Mohammedans
25 Spanish
1 Slave dress
25 Haytians
50 Indians
25 Revolutionary soldiers

34-3-42

Sympols & Properties

Tom toms
4 Forges
Sphinx, Pyramid & Obelisk
Throne of Pharoah
Horses
Cross & Chains
Cotton
U. G. R. R. Wagon
Printing press
6 high sopranos

The Queen Mother
The Professions
The Trades
The Servant of Men
The Teacher
The Merchant
etc., etc.

Music

1 -- Tom toms, drums and primitive chants

2 -- Egyptian music

3 -- Mohammedan music, and cries, and war-cries

4 -- Primitive and plaintive slace music and war cries

5 -- Later slave songs - John Brown's Body - O Freedom

6 -- Later Negro music - Triumphal March - O Freedom

34-3-43

Dancing

1 -- Tythmic barbaric dance by men and women

2 -- Solemn Egyptian march and posturing, men and women

3 -- War dance of men

4 -- Dance of Death and Slavery - 6 or 12 women

5 -- Premiere danseuse?, Ada O. Walker with the role of fame

6 -- The six dancers; the Premiere and the children

E.R. Williams

APageant of Negro History.

The People of Peoples and their Gifts to Men.

34-3-54

1. The Gift of Iron

In a great forest huddle the savages frightened by the roar of beasts and the crash of the storm. Suddenly, enhaloed, comes the Veiled Woman with Fire in her right hand and Iron in her left. The Negroes seize them, weld weapons, and make shelter; the primitive arts flourish; they dance to the drone of tom-toms and the chanting of wierd music. Thus came the gift of Iron to the world.

2. The Gift of the Nile

Suddenly there comes a strain of mightier music. Bowed and veiled figures drag in the Sphinx, the Pyramid, the Obelisk, and the throne of the Pharoahs. The Chieftain of the Negroes steps forward with the Uraeus serpent in his hand ~~and the uraeus in the other~~. He is enthroned as priest and King and the veiled figures lifting their drapery disclosed Negroes and Mulatoes clothed in the splendor of the Egyptian Court. The barbarous Negroes salaam and mingle with them and then return to the forests laden with gifts, passing as they the Black Queens, Candace + the Queen of Sheba. Thus came the gift of culture to the valley of the Nile.

3. The Gift of Faith

A darkness falls on the scene as Egypt disappears. Then comes martial music and the sound of battle. Mohammed, wild and fanatical leads on, followed by Mohammedan Soldiers. The Negroes and Mohammedans fight and then argue. The priests persuade and finally the great cry rings out from all: "God is God - God is God - There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his Prophet." Black Priests appear and black scholars, and, finally Mansa Musa, King of the Black Kingdom of Melle marches to Mecca in state as the Pagan Negroes withdrew, fighting and carrying captives. Thus came one of the gifts of Faith in the world.

4. The Gift of Humility

An European trader meets the pagan Negroes and buys captives. Other traders return with bribe of gold (which is despised) of beads and gin which are received. The Christian Missionaries preach but the slave trade increased and the wail of the missionaries grows fainter and fainter until all is a scene of carnage and captivity - young and old, high and low, with only a frantic priest wandering in dumb despair. Amid the rattle of chains and snap of whips arises the slave song - "Nobody knows!" in one plaintive strain and minor murmur. Thus the Negro Race passed into its valley of Humiliation.

5. The Gift of Pain

(a) Alonso, the Negro, pilot of the ship of Columbus enters with whites. Afterward follows Negro porters and slaves, while Indians appear in the background.

(a) Stephen Dorantes seeks the seven Cities of Cibola and discovers New Mexico. He is killed by Indians. (b) The Maroons fight the whites and are conquered, the Indians hovering in the background. Toussaint triumphs in one part - in another part, Negroes escape to Osceola and his Indians and he rebels. Then comes better understanding. C. Attucks fights for the whites and George Lisle preaches but the whites and the Negroes with cotton and Nat Turner rebels and dies as the Negroes escape on the Underground Railroad. Thus the Negroes came forward in the world with the Gift of Pain.

6. The Gift of Freedom

Fugitive slaves appear. John Brown leads them toward insurrection but Garrison publishes the Liberator. The Negroes hesitating meet in Convention. Frederick Douglass exhorts them and the sound of battle is heard without. Negro soldiers march to war and the Ethopia of the Outstretched Arm of Freedom in a chariot with a draped effigy of Lincoln in front, Proclaims the Negro in America"Henceforth and forever free! "

7. The Gift of Hope

The children approach. A single human voice sings, "O Freedom." The instruments take up the starin until the full brass band is playing. Then the brasses stop and the angel chorus rises above and the triumphet march led by little children, and symbolic figures (The Mother, Law, Medicine, Ministry, Artisan, and the Servant of Man) is begun.

34-3-52

34-3-57

Stage Directions

1 -- 15 minutes: (100 ready as savages, 50 ready as Egyptians, 50 ready as Bornnese and Songhay, 50 ready as Mohammedans)

100 savages enter in groups, with music of Tom Toms and chantry

2 -- 15 minutes ---100 savages remain

50 Egyptians enter with Egyptian music

50 savages and 50 Egyptians pass out (Egyptians redress as Mohammedans)

3 -- 15 minutes --- 50 savages on stage. Mohammedan music and cry of "God is God."

50 Mohammedans enter; 50 Bornnese and Songhay enter; 50 other Mohammedans enter. ~~150~~ 100 pass out.

4 -- 15 minutes --- 50 Mohammedans remain. ~~100~~ 50 savages enter, 50 Bornnese and Songhay enter, 50 Mohammedans, in all 250 in groups, manacled. Slave songs.

All go out

Pause of ten minutes.

5--15 minutes --- Slave songs - enter 1 Spanish salior, 25 Spaniards, 1 Negro in Spanish mail, 25 Maroons, 25 Haytians, 25 Seminoles, 25 Indians, 25 Revolutionary soldiers, 25 modern dress, 25 slave dress - 150 go out.

6 & 7 -- 15 minutes --- 50 Maroons and men in slave dress remain, 100 soldiers enter and symbolic procession of 100 also 50 children

Costumes Needed

34-3-54

100 Sayages
50 Egyptians
50 Bornuese and Songhay
100 Mohammedans
25 Spanish
50 Slave dress
25 Haytians
50 Indians
25 Revolutionnary soldiers
Whites

Symbols & Properties

Tom Toms
4 forges
Sphinx, Pyramid & Obelisk
Throne of Pharoah
Horses
Cross & chains
Cotton
U. G. R. R. Wagon
Printing press
6 high sopranos

The Queen Mother
The Professions
The Trades
The Servant of Men
The Teacher
The Merchant

etc., etc.

34-3-53

~~Mr. W. M. Trotter - editor of the Boston Guardian~~

NOTES ON THE PAGEANT.

MUSIC - the music should illustrate the development of Negro music from the Tom Tom to Coleridge-Taylor.

PROPERTIES - oxen and horses, amazons, four black heralds

DANCES - the dance of the ocean, the dance of the quick, the dance of death and pain, the dance of joy and laughter, the minuette

SYMBOLIC FIGURES - the veiled woman, the spirit of freedom,
, spirit of the forest and swamp, the tropic heat, the fever.

THE SEVEN RIVERS - namely - the Nile, Niger, Congo, Zambesi, Mississippi, Amazon, Hudson.

The White haired Woman, the Queen of Sheba, the Three Wise Men from the East.

MESSENGER BON

THE SEVEN GIFTS OF ETHIOPIA

Undated
Draft manuscripts

A Proposed Exhibition and Pageant Illustrating The Part Which The American Negro Has Played in The Making of America

Seven Gifts of Ethiopia

1. THE EXHIBIT. The exhibit consists of a booth. At the back of the booth rises a pyramid in bas-relief with a side view of the great sphinx of Gizeh at either side of the pyramid. The pyramid is divided horizontally into seven unequal spaces. In a narrow space at the bottom is Exploration. Above this is a very large space, Labor. Above this is a small space, Self Supporting Womanhood; then a larger space, Emancipation of Democracy; above this an equal space, Defense, above this a smaller space, Literature and large cap stone, Music. Both sides of the booth will be occupied by books, pictures and charts.

34-1-17

In front and in the center of the booth would be a tall figure of Ethiopia either seated or standing. Her dark face shines forth from the massed drapery of a white Sudanese bernouse which flows down in folds to the ground and has perhaps a single splash of crimson color. The face has closed eyes and on the cheek a slight trace of tears. The arms and hands are black and bare and in the right hand is a crystal globe marked Music and in the left a crystal globe marked Labor. Within the globe marked labor can be seen a cotton bale, a sugar cask and bundles of tobacco and rice. Behind is a ship in full sail. Within the music globe there is a figure of a dancing girl resembling the late Ada Overton Walker. In her hand is a harp which is so elongated and narrow as to resemble a banjo. Back of her is a cross and on it a draped and crucified human figure. From the bottom of the labor globe depends a short chain, the last broken link of which is red. From the top of the music globe sprout a few flowers. Within the figure is a large phonograph which plays Negro music at intervals every hour.

2. THE PAGEANT

A Pageant of Music

illustrating

The Seven Gifts of Ethiopia

to America

34-1-18

1. The African Tom-Tom. - Exploration (one person)

The journey and death of Estevanico. A lone figure followed by the veiled Ethiopia crosses the foreground in silence, dressed in Spanish Mail, and with the muffled beat of drums. He meets Indians, raises his visor and discloses his black face. They lead him on until he is ambushed and killed.

2. The African War Dance - Labor (four persons)

Four massive black men enter carrying the four founding stones of a pyramid, to the music of Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula". The stones are inscribed, cotton, sugar, tobacco and rice. Under the direction of Ethiopia they lay the foundations of the pyramid which forms a tomb for Estevanico. They then take their place about the stage as sentinels.

3. Primitive Slave Song - Black Womanhood (eight persons)

Eight women enter, chained, bringing the stones of service, self-support, religion and faith and singing "You May Bury Me in the East". They entomb the body of Estevanico in the rising pyramid, together with Ethiopia. They slowly circle about the room.

4. The Triumphant Negro Melody - The Emancipation of Democracy (ten persons)

There enter Benjamin Banneker, Paul Cuffee, Touissaint D'Ouverture,

Alexander Cromwell, Frederick Douglass, John M. Langston, B. K. Bruce, Booker T. Washington, Robert B. Elliott and Sojourner Truth. They bear stones inscribed "Africa for the Africans", "The Right of All to Vote", "The Right of All to Read", "The Right of All to Work", "Public Schools in the South", "Churches for the Masses", "The Trained Hand", "The Free Woman", "Equality" and "Brotherhood". They sing "Roll, Jordan, Roll". They deposit their stones and range themselves about the room.

34-1-19

5. The Developed Folk Song - Defense

Crispus Attucks leads in 5 soldiers of the Revolution, 5 sailors of the War of 1812, 10 soldiers of the Civil War, 10 soldiers of the Spanish American War and 20 soldiers of the World War carrying stones as follows: "The Revolution - 5000", "The War of 1812 - 5000", "The Civil War - 200,000", "The Spanish American War - 10,000", "Carrizal", "The World War - 367,710". They march to music by Harry Burleigh, deposit their stones and take their places in the circle.

6. The New Negro Music - Literature

There enter 100 children with the following books: "Uncle Remus", "Uncle Tom's Cabin", "When Melindy Sings", "The Wife of His Youth" "The Souls of Black Folk" and "Up From Slavery"; they sing Dett's "Listen to the Lambs". These books form the capstone of the pyramid which now is finished. The children dance to the music of Coleridge-Taylor's "Imaginary Ballet".

7. Spirit of Negro Art - Coleridge-Taylor's "Onaway" is sung. The pyramid is lighted and out of it following Ethiopia and Estevanico come Egyptians and Ethiopians. The groups join the procession and the dancing children pass last. The marching music is Rosamond Johnson's "Walk Together Children".

Please return W. E. B. Du Bois

A Proposed Exhibition and Pageant Illustrating The Part Which The American Negro Has Played In The Making of America -

1. The Exhibit. The exhibit consists of a booth. At the back of the booth rises a pyramid in bas-relief with a side view of the great ~~sfinks~~ sphinx of Gizeh at either side of the pyramid. The pyramid is divided horizontally into seven unequal spaces. In a narrow space at the bottom is Exploration. Above this is a very large space, Labor. Above this is a small space, Self Supporting Womanhood, then a larger space Emancipation of Democracy, above this an equal space Defense, above this a smaller space, Literature ~~and Folk Lore~~ and large cap stone, Music. Both sides of the booth will be occupied by books, pictures and charts. In front and in the center of the booth would be a tall figure of Ethiopia either seated or standing. Her dark face shines forth from the mass of drapery of a white Sudanese ~~bearnous~~ burnouse which flows down in folds to the ground and has perhaps a single ~~slash~~ splash of crimson color. The face has closed eyes and on the cheek a slight trace of tears. The arms and hands are black and bare and in the right hand is a crystal globe marked Music and in the left ~~and~~ a crystal globe marked Labor. Within the globe marked labor can be seen a cotton bale, a sugar cask and bundles of tobacco and rice. Behind is a ship in full sail. Within the music globe there is a figure of a dancing girl resembling the late Ada Overton Walker. In her hand is a harp which is so elongated and narrow as to resemble a banjo. Back of her is a cross and on it a drapped ~~figure~~ and crucified human figure. From the bottom of the labor globe depends a short chain, the last broken link of which is red. From the top of the music globe sprout a few flowers. Within the figure is a large phonograph which plays

38-13-235

Rewrite this with the above

Negro music at intervals every hour.

2. The Pageant

A Pageant of Music

illustrating

The Seven Gifts of Ethiopia

to America

1. The African Tom-Tom. - Exploration (one person)

The journey and death of Estevanico. A lone figure followed by the veiled Ehtiopia crosses the foreground in silence, dressed in Spanish Mail, and with the muffled beat of drums. He meets Indians, raises his visor and discloses his black face. They lead him on until he is ambushed and killed.

38-2-207

2. The African War Dance - Labor (four persons)

Four massive black men enter carrying the four founding stones of a pyramid, to the music of Coleridge Taylor's "Bamboula". The stones are inscribed, cotton, sugar, tobacco and rice. They then take their place about the stage as sentinels. Under the direction of Ethiopia they lay the foundations of the pyramid which forms a tomb for Estevanico.

3. Primitive Slave Song - Black Womanhood (eight persons)

Eight women enter, chained, bringing the stones of service, self-support, religion and faith and singing "You may bury me in the East". They entomb the body of Estevanico in the rising pyramid, together with Ethiopia. They slowly circle about the room.

4. The Triumphant Negro Melody - The Emancipation of Democracy (Ten persons)

There enter Benjamin Banneker, Paul Cuffee, Toussaint L'Ouverture, Alexander Cromwell, Frederick Douglass, John M. Langston, B. K. Bruce, Booker T. Washington, Robert B. Elliott and Sojourner Truth. They bear stones inscribed "Africa for the Africans", "The Right of All to Vote", "The Right of All to Read", "The Right of All to Work", "Public Schools in the South", "Churches for the Masses", "The Trained Hand", "The Free Woman", "Equality" and "Brotherhood". They sing "Roll, Jordan, Roll". ~~"Truth". The music is the music of the slave song.~~ They deposit their stones and range themselves about the room.

5. The Developed Folk Song - Defense

Crispus Attucks leads in 5 soldiers of the Revolution, 5 sailors of the War of 1812, 10 soldiers of the Civil War, 10 soldiers of the Spanish American War and 20 soldiers of the World War carrying stones as follows: "The Revolution - 5000", "The War of 1812 - 5000", "The Civil War - 200,000", "The Spanish American War - 10,000, "Carrizal", "The World War - 367,710". They march to music by Harry Burleigh, deposit their stones and take their places in the circle.

28-2-208

6. The New Negro Music - Literature

There enter 100 children with the following books: "Uncle Remus", "Uncle Tom's Cabin", "When Melindy Sings", "The Wife of His Youth", "The Souls of Black Folk" and "Up From Slavery" ~~and~~ they sing ~~ing~~ Dett's "Listen to the Lambs". These books form the capstone of the pyramid which now is finished. The children dance to the music of Coleridge-Taylor's "Imaginary Ballet".

7. Coleridge Taylor's "Onaway" is sung. The pyramid is lighted and out of it following Ethiopia and Estevanico come Egyptians and Ethiopians. The groups join the procession and the dancing children pass last. The marching music is Rosamond Johnson's "Walk together Children".

Spirit of Negro Art

The Seven Gifts of Ethiopia

Being a Pageant for the Making of America

1. Exploration

   The reign and death of Estevanico. A lone figure crosses the foreground in silence, dressed in Spanish Mail, and with the muffled beat of drums. He meets Indians, raises his visor and discloses his black face. They lead him on until he is ambushed and killed.

2. The Giants of Labor.

   Eight massive black men enter carrying the four founding stones of a pyramid, to the music of "Bamboula". The stones are inscribed, cotton, sugar, tobacco and rice. They take their place about the stage as sentinels.

3. The Hand Maidens of the Lord.

   Four women enter with attendant sprites led by Ethiopia and bringing the stones of service, self-support, religion and faith. These discover the body of Estevanico and bury him in the rising pyramid, together with Ethiopia. They slowly circle about the room.

4. The Emancipation of Democracy.

   Men enter with a large mass of attendants. The leaders are Benjamin Bannaker, Paul Cuffee, Alexander Cromwell, Frederick Douglass, John M. Langston, B. K. Bruce, Booker T. Washington, Robert B. Elliott and Sojourner Truth. They bear stones and banners inscribed "Africa for the Africans", "The Right of All to Vote", "The Right of All to Read", "The Right of All to Work", "Public Schools in the South", "Churches for the People", "The Educated Hand", "The Emancipation of Women".

SY-7-27

"Truth". The music is the music of the slave song. They range themselves about the room.

5. Defense.

Crispus Attucks leads in soldiers of the Revolution, sailors of the War of 1812, soldiers of the Civil War, soldiers of the Spanish American War and soldiers of the World War carrying banners as follows: "The Revolution — 5000", "The War of 1812 — 5000", "The Civil War — 200,000","The Spanish American War — 10,000, "Carrizal", "The World War — 367,710". They also take their places in the circle.

6. Books.

There enter the following books: "Uncle Remus", "Uncle Tom's Cabin", "When Melindy Sings", "The Wife of His Youth", "The Souls of Black Folk", "Up From Slavery", followed by Tanner, the painter, and Edmonial Lewis, the sculptor. All these groups have laid their gifts on the pyramid until now it is finished.

7. Music.

The pyramid is lighted and out of it following Ethiopia and Estevanico come the Egyptians and Ethiopians and the dancing sprites. All pass out led by Ethiopia and sprites and followed by the groups.

34-7-28

A Pageant of Music including

The Seven Gifts of Ethiopia

~~Being a Pageant for the Making of America~~
America

1. ~~Exploration~~ The African Tom-Tom — Exploration (one person) followed by the veiled Ethiopia

The journey reign and death of Estevanico. A lone figure crosses the foreground in silence, dressed in Spanish Mail, and with the muffled beat of drums. He meets Indians, raises his visor and discloses his black face. They lead him on until he is ambushed and killed.

2. ~~The Giants of Labor.~~ The African War Dance — Labor (~~Four~~ persons) ~~Four~~
~~Eight~~ massive black men enter carrying the four founding stones of a pyramid, to the music of Coleridge Taylor's "Bamboula". The stones are inscribed, cotton, sugar, tobacco and rice. They take their place about the stage as sentinels.

Under the direction of Ethiopia they lay the foundations of the pyramid which forms a tomb for Estevanico

Primitive Slave Song — The Black Womanhood (Eight persons)

3. The ~~Hand Maidens of the Lord.~~
Eight ~~Four~~ women enter, claimed with ~~attendant sprites led by Ethiopia and~~ bringing the stones of service, self-support, religion and faith. They entomb ~~These discover~~ the body of Estevanico ~~and bury him~~ in the rising pyramid, together with Ethiopia. They slowly circle about the room.

"You may bury me in the East" and singing

The Triumphant Negro Melody —

4. The Emancipation of Democracy. (~~Men~~ persons)
There enter
~~Men enter with a large mass of attendants. The leaders are~~ Toussaint L'Ouverture
Benjamin Banneker, Paul Cuffee, Alexander Cromwell, Frederick Douglass, John M. Langston, B. K. Bruce, Booker T. Washington, Robert B. Elliott and Sojourner Truth. They bear stones ~~and banners~~ inscribed "Africa for the Africans", "The Right of All to Vote", "The Right of All to Read", "The Right of All to Work", "Public Schools in the South", "Churches for the ~~People~~ Masses", "The ~~Educated~~ Trained Hand", "The ~~Emancipation of Women~~ Free Woman". "Equality" and "Brotherhood". They sing "Roll, Jordan, Roll"

31-7-25

"Truth". The music is the music of the slave song. They deposit their stones and range themselves about the room. ~~(Slave songs)~~

The Developed Folk Song — Defense

5. ~~Defense~~

Crispus Attucks leads in 5 soldiers of the Revolution, 5 sailors of the War of 1812, 10 soldiers of the Civil War, 10 soldiers of the Spanish American War and 20 soldiers of the World War carrying stones as follows: "The Revolution — 5000", "The War of 1812 — 5000", "The Civil War — 200,000","The Spanish American War — 10,000, "Garrizal", "The World War — 367,710". They deposit their stones and take their places in the circle.

Dramatic Music by Harry Burleigh

6. ~~Music~~ The New Negro Music — Literature

100 children when There enter the following books: "Uncle Remus", "Uncle Tom's Cabin", "When Melindy Sings", "The Wife of His Youth", "The Souls of Black Folk", and "Up From Slavery", ~~followed by Tanner, the painter, and Edmonia Lewis, the sculptor.~~ ~~All~~ These from the corners of the groups ~~have laid their gifts on the~~ pyramid which ~~until~~ now ~~is~~ is finished. ~~(The children dance to the music of Coleridge-Taylor's Imaginary Ballet)~~ and singing Dett's "Listen to the Lambs."

7. ~~Music~~ Coleridge Taylor's Dramatic is sung.

The pyramid is lighted and out of it following Ethiopia and Estevanico come ~~the~~ Egyptians and Ethiopians, ~~and the dancing sprites. All pass out led by Ethiopia and sprites and followed by the groups.~~ ~~(Exit music — Dvorak's Negro)~~

The groups join the procession and the dancing children pass out. The marching music is Rosamond Johnson's "Walk Together Children".

34-7-26

THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA

1914-16

Draft manuscripts, notes, materials concerning performances of the pageant

THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA.

All rights of reproduction and use in any way, reserved by W. E. Burghardt DuBois

Being a Pageant set down by W. E. Burghardt DuBois for the Women's Club of Xenia, Ohio, to the honor of the biennial meeting of the National Federation of Colored Women's Clubs at Wilberforce, in the Year of God Nineteen Hundred and Fourteen and the Year of the Freedom of black folk, the Fifty-first.

34-3-26

(It shall be before the hour of sunset. In a wide and sloping wood, the People shall be seated on the sward below. Above through ancient trees one sees the shadow of the world shut out in part by a great curtain hanging like a cloud. In the sky gleam colored lanterns.

A trumpet shall sound and for the space of a minute there shall be silence. Then from the curtain's edge shall pass slow and sedate, a Herald, dressed gorgeous and woman-wise, with broidered trumpet. The Herald speaks:)

THE HERALD.

Amen! Behold the Twilight hour is come! Hearken to the hush wherein the world awaiting death of day, doth hold her breath a space while Time stands still and all about within, without, we feel the pulsing of Eternity.

Welcome, O guests, into this ancient wood, made sacred by our fathers' hopes and sins and sacrifice wherein we bring to-day a masque - a Dream of things that were and Prophecy of things that are to be.

Listen, O children of the Darker race, reverent in silence to this silent story of the Twilight of the world. Forgive each slip and foible and hear alone the nobler message we employ, and write it on your hearts.

Behold, the Play begins. Ye shall have music, martial tones, faint and yet nearer until they burst on a throng of the first and Negro masters of the earliest world, from the vale of Ganges, Tigris-Euphrates and Nile. Unto these Twilight nations, cometh out of the Heaven's Heart, Ethiopia the Black, All-Mother, mystic queen of men, bearing on her mighty hands the Star of Freedom - Freedom divine, long sought for, unattained. Her, the nations welcome and the Black priests of Shango, the Thunder God, who guards the gates of death, crown her Pharoah-Nefertari, and the world sings. Behold, O people, this wondrous thing.

34-3-27

(The march from Aida is heard. There ~~march in~~ come with stately tread: 5 turbanned East Indian Princes, 5 Babylonians, 5 Assyrians, 5 Egyptians and 5 Ethiopians. To them from the far left comes Ethiopia with the star in her hands and two attendant sprites. From the far right comes the black priest of Shango, the Thunder God, and two sprites. Ethiopia is crowned and the Star is set upon her breast.

Slowly all withdraw leaving Ethiopia crowned and alone with her two attendant sprites. The trumpet sounds and the Herald approaches. The Herald speaks:)

THE HERALD.

Behold, where the Star of Ethiopia sits on the breast of the crowned queen. Hearken, O women of America, and hear how on this Twilight world of ancient empire fell the wierder and wilder tribes of the unwon West. Mighty they were and strong, but ruthless in their strength. They came as comes the storm, whirling. Bigotry, Industry, Passion and Greed came with them. They saw the Star of Ethiopia and knew it not. They looked on the All-Mother of men and knew her not. They bound and raped and slew the Queen of Heaven, offering her smoking corse to the nostrils of offended God$, while paler, shrewder consorts sought to steal the Star of Freedom. But Ethiopia's faerie guard it with their wings.

(The rythmic rolling of drums is heard and Bamboula music. There enter 5 Mohammedan Mandingoes with crescent and spears, 5 Yoruban warriors with swords and armor, 5 Bantu warriors with shields and spears, 5 miners and builders of Zymbabwe with brick and shovel, and 5 slave traders with guns, whips and the cross. They build, trade, pray, march and fight. Gunshot and war cry mingle with music as Ethiopia weeps. The Mohammedans suddenly seize her. The Yorubans chain and sell her. The builders lay her on the pyre and the Bantu offer her up in burning sacrifice while slave songs arise. Meantime, the slave traders have seized the Star, but the fairies rescue it and hide it beneath their wings. The songs die away in dirge. All go out. The trumpet sounds and the Herald enters and speaks:)

34-3-28

The Herald.

O woeful day and mystery of human wrong. Awake, put on thy strength, O Zion. Behold, O men of America, where the dying God doth send his messengers of blood and gold to sooth the sighing sorrow of the world.

Hearken, O People, ye that sit in the shadow of a mighty wrong, and ye shall hear the rush of angel wings, and the beat of fairy footsteps within the sullen shadow of this wood. Ye shall see the soul of Ethiopia summoned back from the gates of death with the Star of Freedom sitting again between her two breasts, shadowed with wings.

(Softly there comes a fairy music and the tinkle of dancing feet, around the corse of dead Ethiopia as she lies smoking on her lofty bier. Enter 25 fairies with torches. They dance and sing about her. Some go and bring the Priest of the Thunder God. His incantations bring the Thunder God, lover of Ethiopia. He ~~summonses~~ calls her from the dead. ("Onaway, awake beloved!")

She rises with great white wings above her. The Star is placed on her breast. She marches out with her fairy band, while the strains of the Aida march recur. The trumpet calls. The Herald enters, and speaks:)

Listen, O guests, and hear the end and mighty meaning of this that we have done to your amusing and the arrest of your souls. Sooth have ye seen how through God's children, with wreath of wing and dance of happy feet, wed to a song of love, hath come this triumph over Death and Pain, which is the goal of human striving.

34-3-29

Again, the Star of Ethiopia shines; but wherefore, Children of the Night, wherefore and to what eternal end? Dream again, ye people, and as another day flies to its everlasting Father, God, learn well the lesson of its telling and see the Pillar of Light rise with woman's hands and the salvation of our world through little children.

(Modern Negro music. Enter 20 women in modern dress: doctor, nurse, teacher, musician, actress, hairdresser, book-keeper, stenographer, merchant, reporter, cook, artist, photographer, dressmaker, milliner and 5 women of fashion. They ply their trades and their talk drowns out the music. The fairy music is heard. The women separate in two groups and continue to ply their trades and talk. Enter ~~(center)~~ 5 mothers, 4 in white trailing robes, with children. The mothers with children point out the workers, the trees and the sky. The childless mother stares into the night. Suddenly she sees Ethiopia, ~~disguised~~ Veiled as ~~an old~~ a witch approaching with witch-sprites bringing the five mystic stones. The sprites disappear and Ethiopia proposes the Pillar of Light to the childless Mother. Filled with enthusiasm she and the mothers begin to build. They form a women's club and gain the aid of the workers. The women work. The Pillar of Light rises. They set up LABOR and WEALTH, and 10 of the workers desert and begin to count their gold on the left. The rest raise JUSTICE and BEAUTY and the 5 women of fashion and 5 others desert and begin to paint and powder on the right. The mothers despair but the children raise EDUCATION and TRUTH. The last stone is missing. All search in vain, the wealthy and the fashionable refusing aid.

At last the childless mother spies Ethiopia veiled as a witch. She prays to her and a little child, winged, comes and discovers the Star of Freedom on the bosom of Ethiopia. Ethiopia stands unveiled beside the completed Pillar of Light. There is silence. Ethiopia waves her wand. The women of fashion and wealth pray and the fairy children come to them and dance. Ethiopia waves her wand: the Bamboula music is heard and the warriors gather in the rear to the right. Ethiopia waves her wand and the Aida march arises and the Egyptians gather in the rear to the left. There is silence and the Herald speaks:)

The Herald.

The play is done. Arise, O beautiful night, soft and still, gentle as the race whose blood we bear. Now God leans out and lets down down upon our sin and yearning the mantle of love, wierd with star and vision. I hear the everlasting wings of angel children. I see the light that sleeps beyond the moon. The Star of Freedom, out of the torn breast of Ethiopia sits at last on the Pillar of Eternal Light: Above the TRUTH that EDUCATION brings, above the BEAUTY born of JUSTICE to all men, above the WEALTH that crowned honest LABOR.

The Play is done.

The Lord is in his Holy Temple

Let us sing before Him.

(All sing)

1. Star of Egypt
Star of Egypt
Star of Egypt
On the Nile
On the Nile
CHORUS: Before I'll be a slave
I'll be buried in my grave
And go home to my God
And be free!

34-3-34

2. On the Congo
On the Niger
O'er the Ocean
We'll be free
We'll be free
CHROUS: before, etc.

3. We that wander
We that wander
We that wait
Upon the Lord
Shall be free
CHORUS: before, etc.

4. O Freedom
O Freedom
O Freedom
Over me
Over me
CHORUS: before, etc.

A PAGEANT

"THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA"

Written and copyrighted

By

W. E. Burghardt DuBois

34-3-21

SCENE I

THE GIFT OF FAITH

EPISODE I. Blue & White

(1) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. (2) African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

EPISODE II. Crimson & White

(3) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (4) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him (5) Ethiopia and her four Sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Star of Faith. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth to the Star discover the welding of iron. The anvils ring (6) they build and weld and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star. (7) (A)

SCENE II.

THE DREAM OF EGYPT

EPISODE III. White

(8) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. (9) The Egyptians file out of the temple led by chanting Priests. They worship.

EPISODE IV. crimson + white

(10) The war cry of the savages rings out and they come triumphant (11) They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover Ethiopia and the Star of Faith. Gradually they fratermize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. The Priests choose the Chief as Pharoah.

24-3-22

EPISODE V. white + crimson

(12) Ra-Nesi, the Pharoah, marries a princess of Egypt. They are crowned (13) and the court celebrates (B) (14) Ethiopia delivers the Star of Faith to Shango and he leads all out (15) the Egyptians going last.

SCENE III.

THE GLORY OF ETHIOPIA

EPISODE VI. white

(16) As they disappear Ethiopia on the Black Rock stretches forth her hands unto God. The Cross descends, the Holy Family appears and the three kings - Black, white and yellow appear in the foreground. They see the Christ Child and hear the Angels (17) The African Fathers offer Christianity to the world.

EPISODE VII. Blue Green Red

(18) An Ethiopian temple appears and out of it rides (19) Candace. She embraces Christianity. After her swarm the hosts of the Crescent led by Mansa Musa (20) against them come the hosts of Fetish led by the Queen of Sheba (21) Candace entertains them. (22) (C)

EPISODE VIII. Red flame

(23) Disputes arise and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. Candace and her followers gather around Ethiopia and the Cross. As both sides are exhausted white Christians appear. They start to succour the Cross but soon yield to the slave traders. Ethiopia defends the Cross with a sword of flame but the exhausted Candace is chained and enslaved. The Christians and Mohammedans chain and enslave all the people. At last the traders set fire to the Black Rock. Ethiopia burns lifting the Cross to God and the Rock becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

24-3-23

(Intermission of ten minutes)

White - all colors + White

SCENE IV.

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION

EPISODE IX. Orange + White

(24) In the gloom groans and the rattle of chains are heard. Ghosts dance (D) followed by the Dance of the Ocean (25) (E) Then the light increases and the slaves enter (26) Finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (27) (F) The Black Rock remains with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

EPISODE X. White + Red

(28) As the cotton pickers dance Osceola's Seminoles enter (29) (G) The Abolitionists gather and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. Hefalls dead, but Angels arise and sing Ethiopia to life (30) She slowly rises on the Rock winged with the Cross in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and the twelve apostles of ~~the~~ Negro Christianity around her. (31)

EPISODE XI. Red + White

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword (32) The roll of tom-toms is heard and the Furies of Insurrection rush in led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march of "Walk Together Children" (33) Touissaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword a third time and to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the Civil war march in (34) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last, (35) followed by the apostles and Ethiopia.

34-3-24

SCENE V.

THE VISION EVERLASTING

EPISODE XII. White + blue + white

(36) The Freedmen enter jubilant (37) They go about varied occupations and distractions (H) The ghosts of slavery interfere and oppress. Ethiopia and the apostles approach. The ghosts raise the lynching gibbet. The ghosts slowly yield as Ethiopia proceeds. She changes the gibbet to a crucifix (38) The ghosts rush out and the apostles lay the founding stone of the Pillar of Light: THE FEAR OF GOD, and place the Cross on high.

EPISODE XIII. White + all colors

(39) Ethiopia calls the five Rivers./ (J) The yellow Mississippi leads forth the Freedmen (40 41) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the stone KNOWLEDGE. The Congo leads in the Kushites and they lay the stone LABOR (41) The Nile leads the Egyptians and they lay the stone SCIENCE (42) The Niger leads the Mohammedans and they lay the stone JUSTICE (43) The blue Orinoko leads the marching maidens who bring ART (K) (44) The star-bearing children appear with the capstone LOVE (L) (45) which touches the great Cross. Above all appears the Star of Faith. A great song arises and all march out (46)

34-3-25

SCENE I.

THE GIFT OF IRON.

Music

(1) Trumpets
(2) young: Prelude. (Band)

EPISODE I.

(1) (2) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

34-3-91

EPISODE II.

(3) Trumpets and Tom-toms
(4) Bamboula (Band)

(3) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (4) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth up to the Star, discover the Welding of Iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance (5) (A) and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

(5) Chant des Savages. (Band and Voices)

(A) Dance of Savages.

SCENE II.

THE DREAM OF EGYPT.

EPISODE III.

(6) Trumpets

(6) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. The

(7) Aida March (Band)

Egyptians file out of the temple. (7) They worship the Sphinx.

EPISODE IV.

(8) Trumpets & Tom-Toms
(9) Bamboula (Band)

(8) The war cry of the savage is heard and they come in (9) triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fraternize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

34-3-92

EPISODE V.

(10) Trumpets
(11) Young Egyptian Chant. (Band + Voices).
(12) Lolotte (Orchestra)
(13) Bamboula (Band)

Ra-Nesi and Nefertari are crowned (11) and maidens dance before him (12) (13) Called by Ethiopia he makes an expedition to Punt whither a great ship carries him. (13) The temple is darkended after the Egyptians enter.

* Dance before Pharaoh

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE III.

THE GLORIA OF ETHIOPIA.

EPISODE VI.

(14) Trumpets.
(15) Trumpets.

(14) The Ethiopian temple appears. Candace of Ethiopia emerges, (15) and the hosts of Africa gather. A ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba (16) disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. (C) A feast is spread and to it are invited the Monomotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with merchants, artisans, warriors and priests. (17) (D) Fetish and the Crescent create discord; (18) necromancy is invoked and the temple revealed, and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder (19).

(16.) Tom-Toms

34-3-93

(17) Jake-Nalanje (Band)

(18) Tom-Toms.

(19) Hadan (Voices)

* Dance of Maidens before Queen of Sheba.

(D) Solo Dance on Table.

EPISODE VII.

(20) A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The Star of Freedom is overturned and all struggle for it. Two Angels hide it and the temple is darkened and Ethiopia appears at the temple door. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the traders discover her and set fire to her as she flees to the Black Rock. She burns lifting the Star to God, and the Rock becomes her tomb. (21) There is darkness.

(20.) Trumpets

(21) Young: Darkness Descends. (Band.)

(Intermission five minutes)

34-3-94

SCENE IV.

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION.

EPISODE VIII.

(22) Trumpets

(22) In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard while the white slave ships pass laden with ghosts. Death and Pain dance (23) (E) * Dance of Death & Pain among the prostrate followed by the war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles. (24) (F) Then the light increases and the laborers croon at their tasks and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers (G) brings the full light (25) (I) But the temple remains darkened and the figure of Ethiopia lies prone upon the Black Rock.

(23) Motherless Child. (Orchestra)

(24) Big Chief and Red Shawl (Band)

(25) M'sieu Banjo or Roll dem Cotton Bales. (Orchestra & Voices)

(G) Dance of Cotton Pickers

EPISODE IX.

(26) Trumpets

(26) As the cotton pickers dance, the leaders of Ethiopia and their Friends, Bishop, Dorantes, Leile, Attucks, Douglass, Garrison, Brown, Phillips, Sumner, gather and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God arises (27) and sings Ethiopia to life (28). She slowly rises on the temple winged, with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword

(27) Jake-Nabanje (Band)

(28) Onaway (Orchestra & Voices)

24-2-45

in the other and four Angel sprites.

EPISODE X.

(29) Trumpets

(30) Tom-Toms

(29) The great march of Ethiopia: she waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms (30) is heard and the Furies of Insurection rush in (H) led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march, "Walk Together, Children!" (31) Touissaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers of the civil war march in. (32) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last, (33) while Ethiopia with her sprites hangs the Star of Freedom in the air. (I)

(H) Dance of the Furies

(31) "Walk Together" (orchestra + voices)

(32) Marching Through Georgia (Band)

(33) John Brown's Body. (Band)

(9) Dance of Sprites.

(INTERMISSION FIVE MINUTES)

SCENE V.

THE VISION EVERLASTING.

EPISODE XI.

(34) Trumpets

(35) Swing Along (Band, Orchestra, and voices.)

(34) The Jubliant freedmen enter. (35) They dance (J) wrangle work, play and study. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid storm and the ghosts and Furies pour out. Insidiously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the Star of Freedom. The Freedmen appeal with the chorus "Nobody Knows". (36) Ethiopia appears enthroned on the Mountains of the Moon

(J) Freedmen's Minuet.

(36) "Nobody Knows" voices.

(37) Aida + Bamboula Band + Hadar voices.

(39) and semis the three rivers - the Green Nile (thought) (40) - the Black Niger (41) (strength) and the Red Congo (inspiration). (42) The Ghosts and Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in mist and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds. (43)

34-3-96

EPISODE XII.

(38) Trumpets

(39) O Southland. Band + voices.

(40) Bamboula Band.

(41) Aida. Band.

(42) Hadan Voices.

(43) Children's Intermezzo. or Danse nègre (Orchestra)

(44) Rocks + Mountains Voices

(45) Dance of Moors Band.

(46) O. Freedom. Band, orchestra + voices. Tom-Toms and Trumpets.

(38) The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (39) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the founding stone Knowledge. The Congo calls the savages and lays the stone Labor. (40) The Nile calls the Egyptians and lays the stone SCIENCE. (41) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and lays the stone JUSTICE. (42) The blue Orinoko appears leading the dancing maidens who bring ART. (43) (K) There is a pause. The rivers appeal to Ethiopia (47) (L). The mothers approach singing. They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone LOVE. (45) (M) The Tower of Light touches and supports the Star of Freedom. A great song arises, "O Freedom Over Me!" (46)

(K) Dance of Orinoko.

(M) Dance of Children.

NOTES ON THE PAGEANT.

THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA.

PERSONS OF THE DRAMA:

24-3-97

Principal characters:

Ethiopia- tall, black, dignified, handsome woman

Herald - Miss Hallie Q. Brown or one selected by her

Shango, the Thunder God, Mr. Work

Priest

Childless Mother - a beautiful and graceful young woman

OTHER CHARACTERS:

5 Indian Princes

5 Babylonians

5 Assyrians

5 Egyptians

5 Ethiopians

2 sprites attending Ethiopia

2 sprites attending Priest

5 Mohammedans

5 Yoruban warriors

5 Bantu warriors

5 builders, etc.

5 slave traders (these should be light mulattoes; all the rest of the above can be any color.)

25 children dressed as fairies with wings

20 women dressed for work; (doctor, nurse, teacher, musician, actress, hairdresser, book-keeper, stenographer, merchant, reporter, cook, artist, photographer, dressmaker, milliner; and 5 women of fashion, dressed very fashionably.)

5 mothers in flowing white

8 children in every-day dress accompanying them

34-3-98

COSTUMES.

The Indian Princes should be in flowing garments with turbans and jeweled daggers. The Babylonians, Assyrians and Egyptians ought to be copied from pictures. The Ethiopians should be in flowing robes and turbans. The Mohammedans should be in white robes and white turbans. The Yoruban warriors should have ~~brass~~ heavy plates and helmets. The Bantu warriors should have brown-skin tights, feathered head dresses, leather shears and spears. The builders should have brown-skin tights and tunics and feathered head dress. The slave traders should be dressed in old English or Colonial style. The fairies should be in white. The women in modern dress as indicated above.

Effort should be made to make Ethiopia especially gorgeous and the Thunder God should be imposing.

MUSIC.

The following music is called for: The march from Verdi's Aida, Coleridge Taylor's, "Bamboula" and the "Drum March" by Major Young. 5 Negro folk songs and 3 modern songs by Negro composers, the solo "Onaway Awake Beloved" by Coleridge Taylor and the final song "O Freedom."

PROPERTIES.

There will be needed one large curtain of dark stuff about 6 feet high and 30 feet long, couple of dozen Japanese lanterns, a trumpet for the Herald and someone who can blow the cornet, the crown, throne and wand for Ethiopia, wooden blocks to build the funeral pyre, spears, guns, whips, cross and a crescent, typical instruments, etc., for the working women to carry in their hands; blocks for the Pillar of Light, (which can be electrically lighted showing the words) the Star of Ethiopia electrically lighted, preferably with a battery.

34-3-84

Egyptians p 79 Universal History

Assyrians p 150

Babylonians

Mohammedans

Indians Princes
p 688 Vol 2 Ridpath
p 724

Warriors 681 Vol VII
683 Ridpath
656

SCENE I

THE GIFT OF IRON

EPISODE I - A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. In the background are seen the Mountains of the Moon.

African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and dance and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

EPISODE II - The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom.

Ethiopia slowly approaching the savages. They lifting earth up to the Star, discover the Welding of Iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

EPISODE III - SCENE 2 — The glory of Ethiopia A beautiful Egyptian temple appears out of a mist and ~~in the place rises a while far~~ far away a great pyramid looms before the Mountains of the Moon. The Egyptians file out of the temple led by chanting Priests. They worship the Sphinx.

EPISODE IV - The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fratermize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

34-3-82

EPISODE V~~II~~ - Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned and maidens dance before him. Called by Ethiopia he makes an~~d~~ expedition to Punt whether a great ship carries him. The temple ~~disappears in mist~~ is darkened after the Egyptians enter. (Intermission)

EPISODE VI~~I~~ - ~~As the mist disappears a new temple appears, out of~~ ~~which emerges~~ Candace of Ethiopia, ~~a~~ ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. A feast is spread and to it are invited the Monomotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with merchants, artisans and warriors and priests. Fetish and the Crescent create discord; necromancy is invoked and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder.

EPISODE ~~I~~VII - A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The Star of Freedom is over-turned and all struggle for it. Two Angels hide it and the temple is darkened and Ethiopia appears on the ~~R~~ock Rock. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the traders discover her and set fire to the ~~R~~oof. She burns lifting the Star to God. There is darkness.

SCENE III

THE VALLEY OF HUMULIATION

EPISODE ~~I~~VIII - In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard, while the white slave ships pass laden with ghosts. Death and Pain dance among the prostrate, followed by the war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles.

Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light.

EPISODE IX - As the cotton pickers dance, the Abolitionists gather and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. He falls dead; but in crimson light the Thunder God rises and sings Ethiopia to life. She slowly arises, on the Temple winged, with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four Angel sprites.

(Intermission of ten minutes)

EPISODE X - The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms is heard and the furies of Insurrection rush in led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march "Walk together, Children!" Touissaint and the Haytians march on. Ethiopia ~~heards him the Star of Freedom and~~ waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the Civil War march in. ~~The temple is lighted again and led by~~ Ethiopia ~~the Civil War soldiers march away while Touissaint slowly enters the temple leaving on guard four Mothers and the four Angels of Ethiopia.~~

34-3-84

~~(Intermission of ten minutes)~~

EPISODE XI - The four Mothers and four Angels stand guard. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid thunder and storm and the ghosts pour out. They enter the temple. There is a great explosion. A ghost appears with the Star of Freedom and the temple is darkened. The first Angel rescues the Star and is killed; the second and third in like manner are killed. The fourth, and smallest Angel, finally seizes the Star and climbs to the back of the Sphinx. The temple is lighted. The ghosts gather around the Sphinx. The little Angel prays to the Thunder God. It lightens. The Angel tosses the Star aloft and it rises and remains miraculously poised in mid-air. The ghosts crucify the Angel and at the voice of the Thunder God rush away forever.

SCENE I

THE GIFT OF IRON

(20 minutes)

EPISODE I (1)

(2) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. In the background are seen the Mountains of the Moon. African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and dance (3) and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

34-3-63

EPISODE II

(4) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (5) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him (6) Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth up to the Star, discover the Welding of Iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance (7) and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing ~~Star~~ Jewel which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

SCENE II

THE ~~GLORY~~ Dream OF ~~ETHIOPIA~~ Egypt

(25 minutes)

EPISODE III (8)

(9) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears ~~out of a mist and far away a great pyramid looms before the Mountains of the Moon.~~ The Egyptians ~~file~~ file out of the temple led by (10) chanting Priests. They worship the Sphinx.

EPISODE IV

The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the ~~Star~~ jewel of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fratermize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

EPISODE V

Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned and maidens dance before him. Called by Ethiopia he makes an expedition to Punt whither a great ship carries him. ~~The temple is darkened after the Egyptians enter.~~

~~(INTERMISSION)~~

Scene III

The Glory of Ethiopia

(30 minutes)

EPISODE VI

The hosts of Africa gather and Candace of Ethiopia enters. By the incantation of Fetish a ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. A feast is spread and to it are invited the Monomotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with Kings merchants, artisans, warriors and priests. Fetish and the Crescent create discord; a monk appears; necromancy is invoked and the temple ~~rereeled~~ disappears, and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder.

EPISODE VII

A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow and there ensues the great battle of ~~Islam and Fetish~~ Tonkadibou. As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The ~~Star~~ jewel of Freedom is overturned and all struggle for it. Two Angels hide it and the temple ~~is darkened~~ appears and Ethiopia appears at the temple door. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the Traders discover her and set fire to the temple as she flees to the roof. (25) She burns lifting the ~~Star~~ Jewel to God, and the burning temple becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

34-3-64

(Intermission 10 minutes)

SCENE ~~VIII~~ IV

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION
(30 minutes)

EPISODE VIII (26)

In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard while the white slave ships pass as laden with ghosts. (27) Death and Pain dance among the prostrate followed by the war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles. (28) Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks (29) and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (30) But the temple remains darkened with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

EPISODE IX

As the cotton pickers dance the Abolitionists gather (31) and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the ~~Black Rock~~ Temple. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God rises (32) and sings Ethiopia to life. (33) She slowly rises on the temple, winged, with the ~~Star~~ Jewel of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four Angel sprites. (34)

~~(INTERMISSION OF TEN MINUTES)~~

EPISODE X

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms (35) is heard and the Furies of Insurrection rush in led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march, "Walk together, Children!" (36) Touissaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching through Georgia" the soldiers and the civil war march in. (37) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last; (38) Ethiopia with her dancing sprites hang the jewel ~~Star~~ of Freedom in the air and slowly march away.

34-3-06

SCENE ~~IV~~ V

THE VISION EVERLASTING
(30 minutes)

EPISODE XI (39)

The jubilant freedmen enter. (40) They dance, wrangle, work, play and study. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid storm and the Ghosts and Furies pour ~~roar~~ out. (41) Insidiously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the jewel ~~Star~~ of Freedom. The Freedmen appeal with the chorus "Nobody Knows." (41) Ethiopia appears enthroned on the Mountains of the Moon and sends the three rivers - the Green Nile (thought) - the Black Niger (strength) and the Red Congo (aspiration). (42) The Ghosts and Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in mist and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds. (43)

EPISODE XII

The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (44) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the foundring stone KNOWLEDGE. The Congo calls the savages and lays the stone LABOR. (45) The Nile calls the Egyptians and lays the stone SCIENCE. (46) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and lays the stone JUSTICE. (47) The blue Orinoko appears leading the dancing maidens who bring ART. (48) There is a pause. The rivers appeal to Ethiopia. (50) The mothers approach singing. (51) They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone LOVE. (52) The Tower of Light touches and supports the jewel ~~Star~~ of Ethiopian ~~Freedom~~. A great song arises, "O Freedom over me!" (53)

3c

~~SCENE I~~

THE GIFT OF IRON

EPISODE I

(1) (2) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. ~~In the background are seen the Mountains of the Moon.~~ African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and dance (3) (A) and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

EPISODE II

34-2-78

(4) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (5) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him (6) Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth up to the Star, discover the Welding of Iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance (7) (B) and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

~~SCENE III~~

~~THE GLORY OF ETHIOPIA~~ The Dream of Egypt

EPISODE III (8)

(9) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. ~~out of a mist and far away a great pyramid looms before the Mountains of the Moon.~~ The Egyptians file out of the temple led by (10) chanting Priests. They worship the Sphinx.

EPISODE IV

The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in (11) triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fraternize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. (12) The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

EPISODE V

Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned (13) and maidens dance before him. (14 C) Called by Ethiopia he makes an expedition to Punt whither a great ship carries him. (15) The temple is darkened after the Egyptians enter.

~~(INTERMISSION)~~ [Intermission of 5 minutes]

Scene ~~III~~ The Glory of Ethiopia

EPISODE VI (16)

The Ethiopian temple opens. ~~The hosts of Africa gather and~~ (17) Candace of Ethiopia ~~enters.~~ emerges, and the hosts of Africa gather

~~By the incantation of Fetish~~ A ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba (18) disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. (D) A feast is spread and to it are invited (19) the Monomotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with merchants, artisans, warriors and priests. (20 E) Fetish and the Crescent create discord; (21) necromancy is invoked and the temple revealed, and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder.

EPISODE VII

(22) A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. (23) As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The Star of Freedom is overturned and all struggle for it. (24) Two Angels hide it and the temple is darkened and Ethiopia appears at the temple door. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the Traders discover her and set fire to the temple as she flees to the roof. (25) She burns lifting the Star to God, and the temple becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

24-3-79

[Intermission of 5 minutes]

~~SCENE III~~ IV

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION

EPISODE VIII (26)

In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard while the white slave ships pass laden with ghosts. (27) Death and Pain dance (F) among the prostrate followed by the (G) The Dance of the Ocean war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles. (28) (H) Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks (29) and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (30) (I) But the temple remains darkened with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

EPISODE IX

As the cotton pickers dance the Abolitionists gather (31) and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God rises (32) and sings Ethiopia to life. (33) She slowly rises on the temple, winged, with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four Angel sprites. 34

~~(INTERMISSION OF TEN MINUTES)~~

EPISODE X

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms (35) is heard and the Furies of Insurrection rush in (J) led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march, "Walk together, Children!" (36) Toussaint and the Haytiens march in. Ethiopia

24-3-80

waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the civil war march in. (37) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last. (38) Ethiopia with her dancing sprites hang the Star of Freedom in the air and slowly march away. (K)

[Intermission of 5 minutes]

SCENE IV V

THE VISION EVERLASTING

EPISODE XI (39)

The jubilant freedmen enter. (40) They (L) dance wrangle work, play and study. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid storm and the Ghosts and Furies hour out. (41) Insidiously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the Star of Freedom. The Freedom appeal with the chorus "Nobody Knows." Ethiopia appears enthroned on the Mountains of the Moon and sends the three rivers - the Green Nile (thought) - the Black Niger (strength) and the Red Congo (aspiration). (42) The Ghosts and Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in mist and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds. (43)

EPISODE XII

The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (44) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the foundry stone KNOWLEDGE. The Congo calls the savages and lay the stone LABOR. (45) The Nile calls the Egyptians and laye the stone SCIENCE. (46) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and lay the stone JUSTICE. (47) The blue Orinoko appears leading the dancing maidens who bring ART. (48) (M) There is a pause. The rivers appeal to Ethiopia. (49) (N) The mothers approach singing. (50) They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone LOVE. (51) (O) The Tower of Light touches and supports the Star of Freedom. A great son arises, "O Freedom over me!" (52)

54-2-184

SCENE 1

THE GIFT OF IRON

EPISODE 1

(1) - (2) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and dance (3) - (a) and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

EPISODE 11

(4) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (5) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him (6) Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth to the Star, discover the Welding of Iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance (7) - (b) and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

SCENE 11

THE DREAM OF EGYPT

EPISODE 111 - (8)

(9) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. The Egyptians file out of the temple led by (10) chanting priests. They worship.

EPISODE IV

The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in (11) triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fratermize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. (12) The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

EPISODE V

Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned (13) and maidens dance before him. (14) (c) Called by Ethiopia he makes an expedition to Punt whither a great ship carries him. (15) The temple is darkened after the Egyptians enter.

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE III

THE GLORY OF ETHIOPIA

EPISODE VI

The Ethiopian temple appears. (16) (17) Candace of Ethiopia emerges and the hosts of Africa gather. A ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba (18) disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. (d) A feast is spread and to it are invited (19) the Monomotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with merchants, artisans, warriors and priests. (20) (e) Fetish and the Crescent create discord; (21) necromancy is invoked and the temple revealed, and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder.

EPISODE VII

A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow (22) and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. (23) As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The Star of Freedom is overturned and all struggle for it. (24) Two Angels hide it and the temple is darkened and Ethiopia appears at the temple door. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the traders discover her and set fire to the Rock as she flees. (25) She burns lifting the Star to God and the Rock becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

(Intermission of five minutes)

EPISODE VIII

(26) In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard while the white slave ships pass laden with ghosts. (27) Death and Pain dance (f) among the prostrate followed by the Dance of the Ocean (g) war cry and dance of Oceola's Seminoles. (28) (h) Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks (29) and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (30) (i) But the temple remains darkened with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

EPISODE IX

As the cotton pickers dance the Abolitionists gather (31) and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God arises (32) and sings Ethiopia to life. (33) She slowly rises on the temple winged, with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four Angel sprites (34)

EPISODE X

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms (35) is heard and the Furies of Insurrection rush in (j) led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march "Walk Together Children." (36) Touissaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the Civil War march in. (37) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last. (38) Ethiopia with her dancing sprites hang the Star of Freedom in the air and slowly march away. (k)

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE V

THE VISION EVERLASTING

EPISODE XI

(39) The jubilant Freedmen enter. (40) They dance (l) wrangle work, play and study. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid storm and the Ghosts and Furies hour out. (41) Insidiously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the Star of Freedom. The Freedmen appeal with the chorus "Nobody Knows." Ethiopia appears enthroned on the Mountains of the Moon and sends the three Rivers - the Green Nile (thought) - the Black Niger (strength) and the Red Congo (inspiration) (42) The Ghosts and Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in mist and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds.

EPISODE XII

The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (44) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the foundry stone Knowledge. The Congo calls the savages and they lay the stone Labor. (45) The Nile calls the Egyptians and they lay the stone Science. (46) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and they lay the stone Justice. (47) The blue Orinoko appears leading the dancing maidens who bring Art. (48) (m) There is a pause. The Rivers appeal to Ethiopia (49) (n) The mothers approach singing. (50) They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone

8 1486

Love. (51) (c) The Tower of Light touches and supports the Star of Freedom. A great son arises, "O Freedom Over Me." (52)

44-3-24

44-3-24

SCENE I

THE GIFT OF IRON

EPISODE I

(1) (2) A storm with thunder, lightning and wind and the roar of wild beasts in the darkness. A lion crosses the foreground. African savages rush in, fleeing the storm. The savages cry out and dance (3) (a) and the Chief prays to the Thunder God in the Black Rock and offers blood sacrifice.

34-3-16

EPISODE II

(4) The roll of tom-toms is heard and in a crimson light (5) Shango, the Thunder God, rises on the Black Rock and after him (6) Ethiopia and her four sprites. He hands Ethiopia the Jewel of Freedom. Ethiopia slowly approaches the savages. They lifting earth up to the Star, discover the welding of iron. The anvils ring; they build and weld and dance (7) (b) and start on a great foray to kill and tame the wild beasts leaving Ethiopia alone with the blazing Star which she places in the head of the Sphinx.

SCENE II

THE DREAM OF EGYPT

EPISODE III - (8)

(9) A beautiful Egyptian temple appears. The Egyptians file out of the temple led by (10) chanting Priests. They worship.

EPISODE IV

The war cry of the savages is heard and they come in (11) triumphant. They are about to attack the Egyptians when they discover the Star of Freedom glowing on the head of the Sphinx. Gradually they fratermize with the Egyptians and exchange gifts. (12) The Chief displays the Uraeus and the Serpents, and the Priests choose him and his sister as Pharoahs.

34-3-17

EQUIPMENT BOND GOLDSMITH BROS.

EPISODE V

Ra-Nesi and his sister are crowned (13) and maidens dance before him. (14) (c) Called by Ethiopia he makes an expedition to Punt whither a great ship carries him. (15) The temple is darkened after the Egyptians enter.

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE III

THE GLORY OF ETHIOPIA

EPISODE VI

The Ethiopian temple appears. (16) (17) Candace of Ethiopia emerges, and the hosts of Africa gather. A ship appears from Punt out of which the Queen of Sheba (18) disembarks on an elephant and approaches, preceded by dancers. (d) A feast is spread and to it are invited (19) the Mononotapa, Mansa Musa, Mohammed Askia together with merchants, artisans, warriors and priests. (20) (e) Fetish and the Crescent create discord; (21) necromancy is invoked and the temple revealed, and at last the frenzied dervishes invoke war and gunpowder.

EPISODE VII

A Mohammedan warrior on horseback dashes in. Others follow (22) and there ensues the great battle of Islam and Fetish. (23) As both sides are exhausted Christians appear and Slave Traders. The Star of Freedom is overturned and all struggle for it. (24) Two Angels hide it and the temple is darkened and Ethiopia appears at the temple door. She rescues the Star as the Christians and Mohammedans enslave the people. At last the Traders discover her and set fire to the Rock as she flees. (25) She burns lifting the Star to God and the Rock becomes her tomb. There is darkness.

EQUIPMENT BOND

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE IV

THE VALLEY OF HUMILIATION

EPISODE VIII

(26) In the gloom, groans and the rattle of chains are heard while the white slave ships pass laden with ghosts. (27) Death and Pain dance (f) among the prostrate followed by the Dance of the Ocean (g) war cry and dance of Osceola's Seminoles. (28) (h) Then the light increases and the laborers chant at their tasks (29) and finally the gay dance of the cotton pickers brings the full light. (30) (i) But the temple remains darkened with the figure of Ethiopia prone upon it.

EPISODE IX

As the cotton pickers dance the Abolitionists gather (31) and talk and appeal in vain until John Brown lights a flaming torch and throws it toward the Black Rock. He falls dead; but in the crimson light the Thunder God arises (32) and sings Ethiopia to life. (33) She slowly rises on the temple winged, with the Star of Freedom in one hand, a flaming sword in the other and four Angel sprites. (34)

EPISODE X

The great march of Ethiopia. She waves her sword; the roll of tom-toms (35) is heard and the Furies of Insurrection rush in (j) led by Nat Turner. She waves her sword again and to the march "Walk Together Children" (36) Touissaint and the Haytians march in. Ethiopia waves her sword

a third time and to the time of "Marching Through Georgia" the soldiers and the Civil War march in. (37) The tune of "John Brown's Body" is heard and his white soul marches by last. (38) Ethiopia with her dancing sprites hang the Star of Freedom in the air and slowly march away. (k)

(Intermission of five minutes)

SCENE V

THE VISION EVERLASTING

EPISODE XI

(39) The jubilant Freedmen enter. (40) They dance (l) wrangle work, play and study. Suddenly the slave ship reappears amid the storm and the Ghosts and Furies hour out. (41) Insidiously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the Star of Freedom. The Freedmen appeal with the chorus "Nobody Knows." Ethiopia appears enthroned on the Mountains of the Moon and sends the three Rivers - the Green Nile (thought) - the Black Niger (strength) and the Red Congo (inspiration) (42) The Ghosts and Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in the mist and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds. (43)

EPISODE XII

The yellow Mississippi and her children approach. (44) They plan the Tower of Light and lay the foundry stone Knowledge. The Congo calls the savages and they lay the stone Labor. (45) The Nile calls the Egyptians and they lay the stone Science. (46) The Niger calls the Mohammedans and they lay the stone Justice. (47) The blue Orinoko appears leading the dancing maidens who bring art. (48) (m) There is a pause. The Rivers appeal to Ethiopia (49) (n) The mothers approach singing (50). They kneel in prayer. The star-bearing children appear with the capstone Love. (51) (c) The Tower of Light touches and supports the Star of Freedom. A great song arises, "O Freedom Over Me." (52)

34-3-20

THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA

A Pageant

by

W. E. B. DuBois

Continuity

by

Charles Burroughs

34-3-1

Scene I

In midst of thunder and lightning and roar of wild beasts, savages frightened, swarm in from rear of rock, prostrate themselves before it. Lifting hands in prayer, they worship serpent and moon. At end of chant, chief seizes* child, slays him and offers blood sacrifice to thunder god, at which Shango, the god, emerges from top of rock, with moon sceptre, while savages in awe, rise to their knees. At gesture of Shango, Ethiopia appears, with Star of Freedom in her hands, and descends rock to position in front thereof, while savages rise to their feet and in greater awe fall back. At command of Ethiopia, savage chief gathers handful of earth, hesitantly approaches and deposits same in pan, on apron of rock. Ethiopia touches earth with star, and at resulting flash of fire, Shango disappears into rock, while savages surge forward with an exultant and astonished shout. Responding to Ethiopia's gesture the chief and two others seize hammers and weld iron into weapons and utensils on anvils, to measure of music.

When finished the chief with the two others hold their spears aloft and with the whole tribe following engage in dance of jubilation. At end of which the men go out rear of rock on hunting foray, while women and children remain to build, weave and mold clay.

Ethiopia, the while, moving among them, directing and instructing. (Darkness Descends)

The men soon return all equipped with shields and spears, bearing carcasses of slain animals. Joined by women and children all triumphantly circle hut and black rock, holding aloft spoils of hunt and other objects. Ethiopia meanwhile contemplatively resting against apron ofblack rock.

In midst of their joy dwarfs appear at right r[illegible] of black rock. Cautiously at first advancing, then bol[illegible] rushing in, dividing when near rock into two files, form- ing enclosing circle about savages, moving for a while in the opposite direction, but in the same joyous mood. Suddenly massing themselves to right of black rock, they beckon the savages to follow, pointing rearward to in- terior.

Responding to their invitation a third of the savages led by Ethiopia, go out, in wake of dwarfs.

Led separately by first and second savages, the remaining savages, dividing into two groups go out, one to northward, the other eastward, taking with them structures, utensils, weapons, carcasses.

34-3-2

Scene II

The Culture of Egypt

To the strains of the Priests' March the Egyptians in column of twos, led by Ahmes, (between two priests), and followed by porters bearing throne chairs enter from rear of rock, circling foreground, they pause with head of column toward rock. Porters advance between priests, and place chairs on apron of rock. Standing behind same while King is seated. As priests take position before Pyramid, all sing "Egyptian Chant" as they bow in worship. Suddenly, with fanfare of trumpets, six groups of Asiatics enter from front, at as many points, merging in one as they advance.

Egyptians end their worship and divide into two separate lines, forming court before rock, priests taking position before vacant throne chair. Asiatics meantime advancing to position before rock, where they pay obeisance to King, who in turn welcomes them. The two lines of Egyptians then enfold, and mingle with visitors as friends. In the midst of their ceremony, the Shepherd Kings enter from right front, threatening to attack Egyptians. As latter huddle in fear before rock, Nefertari, leading Savages, enters with chief at her side, from rear of rock; and while savages repulse Shepherd Kings, finally driving them out in direction whence they came, Nefertari holds position in foreground of rock. Savages hold position as barrier at Shepherd Kings' point of exit. The asiatics now arrange themselves in two orderly lines before rock, facing forward, while Egyptians resting on left of Asiatics, form an orderly double line, facing right, or inward. Priests descend to position before pyramid. Nefertari advances to position between priests and directs building of Temple of Luxor. After which Ahmes descends from throne and is joined in marriage to Nefertari. While priests hold position right and left of temple portal, Nefertari and Ahmes enter within. Soon thereafter Nefertari and Ahmes reappear followed by Tutankh-Amen and Ankhsen-Amen. While Ahmes and Nefertari with Star go out front, or westward, Ankhsen and Tutankh-Amen seat themselves in throne chairs, while savages move forward and take position right of temple, opposite Egyptians. The Ballet of Maidens enters in two groups, right and left of temple, and in the court, dance before queen and king.

With exit of ballet Asiatics face Queen and King and bid adieu. Going out front dividing in groups and departing in several directions whence they came. King and Queen meantime descending from throne enter temple followed by priests who, in turn, are followed by all Egyptians in double line, with throne porters last. Savages begin moving out left rear of rock when head of Egyptian column enters temple.

Scene III

The Black Man Rules the World

From every point of the arena Sudanese, hurriedly enter, clustering at centre, strike swords against shields and triumphantly thrust them upward. Then forming in single line they advance swiftly toward front. When they descry group of Hindu princes entering at left front, with colored fabrics, they slacken pace, and in mass formation, greet princes and exchange gold for fabrics.

As Hindus depart down left and out right, Sudanese form into two open lines at right front. Between the lines, Sheba, preceded by retinue with attendant maidens and necromancer, enters and advances toward throne on black rock. As retinue issues from between lines of Sudanese, Solomon enters from right front of rock, ascends and seats himself in first throne chair. Retinue advances to front of rock, bows to Solomon and faces front. Sheba ascends rock, is received by Solomon and seated by his side, while maidens take position at base of rock, on right. Necromancer takes position in front of retinue, at gesture from Sheba, and makes signs of evocation and conjuration, at which twelve (12) Egyptians with Pharaoh enter from rear of rock in retreat before Aspeluta who forces them out front, toward centre of arena. To other signs of conjuration, six (6) Greeks and six (6) Romans enter in retreat, from left rear, before Candace and Giant Bowman who, with gestures of repulsing, force them toward centre of arena. At third sign of conjuration, Persians enter with Cambyses from right rear, in retreat before Nastonessen who, with gesture of repulse, forces them toward centre of arena. When three groups are joined they continue retreat en masse before aligned repulses of the three monarchs, finally fleeing out front—Egyptians centre, Greeks and Romans left, Persians right. Victorious monarchs turn about and majestically move down toward throne and out rear into their respective domains, ignoring, in their transit, Solomon and Sheba. During action of repulse Solomon manifests amazement and awe, while Sheba throughout maintains air of unruffled reserve. With exit of monarchs Sheba and Solomon engage in animated conversation. Necromancer, facing forward with folded arms, holds position immobilely. Suddenly a star gleams brilliantly over point of obelisk at which there enter from front centre, right and left, respectively, the Magi-Balthazar, the black, at centre. With eyes on star they advance, converging toward centre. Necromancer observing them is startled, looks toward star, becomes transfixed, finally rouses himself and directs attention of Sheba and Solomon to same, who assume attitude of fixed amazement. As music sounds, Magi reverently kneel, while Madonna, bearing child, appears at right, between rock and obelisk. All hold attitudes until end of carol and exit of Madonna. With change of music, Prester John, Bishop of Africa, bearing cross, followed by fifty (50) Abyssinians descends from hills at right. Later, Mansa Musa, Sonni Ali and Askia, preceded by Crescent Banner, with one hundred (100) Moslems, enter left front, advancing down left to Moslem mosque. All prostrate themselves before portal and receive benediction of Moslem priest. They rise, continue advance and align themselves on left of arena behind three leaders. Coincidently Monopatapa (Sudanese) 100 - preceded by banner bearer and Fetish priests enter from right front, advance toward centre and align themselves across arena facing throne. When all groups have halted, fetish priests, about exalted banner, perform their ritual which offends Mohammedans, who, exalting their banner advance menacingly toward Monopatapa singing hymn. As opposing lines threaten to clash, Prester John, leading Abyssinians, moves forward to interfere. Solomon, who, with Sheba, has throughout observed with apprehension and concern now, in fear, flees out right while Sheba in alarm, rises and facing rear, invokes the judgment of Ethiopia. Ethiopia responding, enters hastily from rear of rock with chief and thirty savages. Pausing with chief at left of rock, with savages grouped in rear, she makes admonitory gesture pointing westward, front. All groups fall back in order while retinue moves forward front, with Sheba, maidens and Necromancer following; and in their wake, Prester John and Abyssinians. Coincidently to their right and in like direction, preceded by banner, Monopatapa move forward. While at their left, preseded Mohammedans move forward. When at extreme front of arena, three columns divide. Sheba with Abyssinians going out centre, Monopatapa out right, Moslems left; while Ethiopia, after savages, goes out rear.

34-35

THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA

Scene IV

The Land of the Blacks

From lower left of arena villagers, male and female, briskly enter, and erect huts of African village. At same time, Carthaginians and Phoenicians, enter from lower right, while merchants of Ophir enter from upper right, with golden articles. As merchants approach village Benin artists enter village displaying art objects to visiting Phoenicians and Carthaginians. The artists finally selling articles to Ophir merchants when they arrive. At end of trading, dancing maidens emerge from gree-gree bush, near rear of rock, and perform nuptial dance for villagers and visitors. As the dance progresses Ethiopia, showing fatigue, approaches with star concealed. The dance ends and maidens withdraw into the bush.

34-3-6

The villagers, evincing surprise and curiosity, surge toward Ethiopia. They welcome and honor her. As they conduct her toward a hut, Moslem priests, with banner, hastily enter from upper left, crying "Allah". As they enter village, villagers turn from Ethiopia, who slowly moves toward black rock and setas herself dejectedly on anvil ledge. Welcomed by villagers, priests move among them and proselyte them. The priests then turn toward Ethiopia, and seek to convert her. As they do so, fetish priests who with moon banner, have been advancing from upper right, now oppose the action of Moslem priests, by exalting their own banner and flourishing their fetishes with repelling gestures. Meanwhile Ethiopia ascends the rock and enters therein. Thus rebuffed the Moslem priests with banner hasten to mosque halting before its door and three times crying "Allah.'" At which Moslem warriors rush in from upper left, swirl around mosque arrange themselves in circle enclosing mosque and prostrate themselves in prayer. - Hymn of the Faithful.

As they do so, Ethiopia emerges from rock, holds star aloft for a moment, and, when tom toms begin to beat vigorously, descends quickly and takes position on apron of rock, and again holds star aloft. At which, Bantus (savages) in battle array rush in from rear of rock. Mohammedans, startled by beating of tomtoms, quickly arise, extend themselves in battle line, and advance to meet on-coming Bantus. Fetish priests with banner take position behind Bantu line, urging them on. Moslem priests take position at door of mosque. As lines clash in battle three Christian priests, one with cross enter hastily, from front centre, to position near front of rock, exalt cross and make deprecating gestures. Following the Christian priests, at some distance, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch and English slave traders, with bags of gold, enter; and, close behind them, slave drivers with whips, chains and gyves. These groups pause to await the outcome of the battle.

With end of hymn ("Onward Christian Soldiers"), Moslems conquer Bantus, encircling them completely and holding them prisoners. Traders quickly approach Moslem chief and purchase Bantus as slaves. When Christian priests advance to protest they are thrust back by traders, and, taking position up right of rock observe subsequent proceedings. When all the slaves have been manacled, slave drivers, seeing Ethiopia, where she has throughout been crouching on the rock, rush to her; and while one seizes star, others bind and thrust her prone on rock before throne chairs. While the one holds the star, the others descend rock, gather fuel, place it on rock before Ethiopia and set it afire. The slave driver drops star into flames as they consume Ethiopia. As flames still flare slave drivers form slaves into line.

With the traders leading, and drivers at intervals along the line, all move dispiritedly past priests, out front centre, while victorious Moslems with shields and spears of Bantus, as trophies, move exultantly out left front, led by priests with banner. Christian priests finally going out front centre dejectedly.

At beginning of battle villagers and artists flee out lower left and Carthaginians and Phoenicians and merchants of Ophir, at same time flee out in directions whence they came.

Scene V

The Search for the Star

of

Freedom

Indians in wide arc front, right and left, enter, peering and cautious. Then with wild shout, mass at centre and perform war dance. When Spaniards, with Dorantes leading, are seen approaching from right rear of rock, Indians retreat some distance and hold position. When Spaniards descry Indians they halt and try to restrain Dorantes, who persists in advancing. As Indians, wildly yelling and flourishing tomahawks, rush toward Spaniards they (S) flee, while Dorantes defiantly holds position at right base of rock, where he is slain by Indians, who go out wildly, front. While Indians are going out, Bishop Victoria with cross, enters from right rear and discovers body of Dorantes, fixing cross at base of rock he kneels in prayer. While bishop prays slaves in two files enter from right and left rear - bearing baskets, hoes, rakes, etc. - wailing; slave drivers lashing them meantime. They set down baskets and perform operations of work, continuing to wail. Suddenly from lower upper right Garrison and abolitionists enter making gestures of pleading. Slave drivers group and advance toward abolitionists, shaking their whips menacingly and defiantly. As they do so Walker, Vesey and Turner break out of slave line and point to praying bishop and rock, at which the slaves wail and moan more loudly. Slave drivers now turn from Abolitionists and brutally lash Walker, Vesey and Turner who receive blows with bold show of courage, doggedly falling back into slave line. When they have done so, some slaves suddenly begin capering and dancing*. Toward end of dance, slave drivers whip dancers into work line. As slaves resume working and wailing* Douglass and Sojourner enter hastily from lower upper left, approaching slave drivers with gestures of warning. Slave drivers ignoring couple, turn their backs and hold position of stubborn contempt. Suddenly with a startling roll of the drum, John Brown rushes in from front centre with flaming torch, halts at centre, executes rousing flourish, then dashes on, finally halts, hurls torch against black rock and falls dead at its base. When Brown hurls torch slaves fall back into two flaring lines, resting right and left of rock. Douglass and Sojourner at extreme left, abolitionists at extreme right; slave drivers retreating to position at lower upper right. At fall of torch Shango emerges from rock and sings*. As he makes gesture of resurrection Ethiopia rises from dead, issuing from apron of rock with Star in left hand and Sword in right. As Ethiopia takes position at right of throne chairs, Shango disappears into rock. Ethiopia waves sword* and Maroons enter from left rear halting in position in front of left line of slaves, while men of Palmares enter from right rear, halting in position front of right line of slaves. At second wave of sword Haitians led by Touissaint, enter from lower upper left and halt in position front of Maroons, while Revolution soldiers, led by Attucks, enter from lower upper right, halting in position front of Men of Palmares. At third wave of sword. Soldiers of 1812 enter from upper left, halting in position, front of Haitians, while Civil War soldiers led by Colonel Shaw, enter from upper right, advancing and dividing on leader, into two columns of twos, which encircle rock right and left. Shaw holding position until they rejoin him. As Civil War soldiers advance down centre, World War soldiers, led by Young, enter from front centre advancing toward rock, dividing on leader into two columns of twos, duplicating movement of 1812. Soldiers around rock, Young holding position with Shaw till soldiers rejoin him. As W.W. soldiers divide into columns of twos, slaves begin singing. Bishop Victoria removes cross from rock (at entrance of right slave line, Dorantes body withdraws behind rock) passes front of Brown's body and out centre. As Vesey, Walker and Turner, walking abreast, follow Victoria, slaves lift Brown to shoulders on litter, and in column of twos, follow ; followed in turn by Douglass and Sojourner; then by abolitionists; then by Maroons; Men of Palmares, Haitians with Touissaint and Soldiers of 1812. As Civil War columns, circling rock join again in column of fours they fall in, with Shaw leading, behind Soldiers of 1812. Similarly when W.W. soldiers have circled rock and joined again in columnof fours, they fall in, led by Young, behind soldiers of Civil War. All pass out front centre.

34-3-8

As column recedes Ethiopia draws veil over face, descends rock and meditatively passes out left rear with Star. While slave drivers who have held position mystified and baffled, now slink out upper right.

Scene VI

The Tower of Light

Ethiopia, veiled, holding the Star in both hands, appears at right rear between pyramid and obelisk, advances to right of rock, ascends and seats herself in right throne chair, placing Star on knees.

Society group enters from rear advancing down center, dancing, pausing forward of rock and finishing dance. From lower upper right Negroes of all the Americas enter animatedly, pausing and mingling when opposite Society dancers. Simultaneously, ministers, lawyers, physicians, teachers, students enter from upper right; farmers, laborers, masons, carpenters, artists, and actors from lower left; athletes from upper left. All engage in typical operations, and activities. As they do so, Vanity, Gossip, Envy, Crime, Poverty, Ignorance, Distrust, and License enter from front, on a wide line, performing characteristic actions, confusing and disconcerting all social groups, finally passing through them and forming a phalanx before the throne. As Furies work among the groups, Prejudice appears from front centre and intently observes same. When Furies have formed into phalanx, Prejudice summons the Hooded Hounds who, with ribbet, ropes, nooses and whips, rush forward and begin lashing and lynching. The groups turn in a mass appeal toward Ethiopia, to find themselves opposed by the Furies. Ethiopia, now, suddenly throws off veil, seizes Star with both hands, hastily ascends to top of rock and holds Star aloft; at which the five Heralds enter rapidly from left rear, between pyramid and obelisk, blowing bannered trumpets as they come. With the approach of the Heralds, Prejudice and the Hounds desist from attack and retreat up front, holding position near point of exit. When Heralds arrive at right base of rock Furies flee out up left, in panic. Ethiopia having descended from top of rock resumes seat in throne chair with Star on knees. With flight of Furies Heralds ascend to apron of rock and align themselves on right of Ethiopia. Herald N now winds his bugle, and the black-robed River Congo, bringing the founding stone of Labor, enters from rear, followed by Bantus (savages) and the Monopatapa. They encircle rock, and take position in line on left thereof - stone bearers, from rear of rock, depositing stone on top of same. Congo takes her position in front of line. Herald A now winds his bugle, and the yellow-robed Nile, bringing building stone Beauty, enters from lower right, followed by Egyptians, and Pharoah; they encircle rock and take position in line on right thereof - stone bearers, from rear of rock, depositing building stone Beauty on top of Labor stone; River Nile takes her position in front of line. Third Herald A now winds his bugle and the green-garbed River Niger enters from upper left front, bringing building stone Justic, followed by Mohammedans with Askia, Sonni and Mansa Musa, advances down left and around right of rock - stone bearers depositing stone on top of stone "Beauty" while Mohammedans pass in rear of Bantus and take position in front of them. Niger takes post in front of line.

34-3-10

Fourth Herald C now winds his bugle and the red-garbed Mississippi, bringing building stone "Knowledge" enters from right front, followed by Negroes of all the Americas, encircles rock at left, and, while Stone bearers deposit building stone "Knowledge" on top of Justice, Negroes pass rear of Egyptians and form in line in front of them, Mississippi taking position in front of line.

The fifth Herald P now winds his bugle and the blue-garbed River Orinoco, bringing building stone Love, enters front centre, followed by Children of Everlasting Song. At centre of arena, the two masons advance and receive the stone, pass to rear of rock, ascend and deposit it on top of Knowledge. When stone Love is in place Ethiopia passes in front of Heralds and sets Star on top of all. The Children then dance; at end of which, the world sings. When song begins Ethiopia, who has taken position, again, in front of throne chair, extends her hands in benediction, while Shadow of Shango passes slowly out rear, ascending into heaven.

34-3-12

Characters

Ethiopia
5 Heralds: N-A-A-C-P
Shango
Congo River - Black
Nile - Yellow
Niger - Green
Mississippi - Red
Orinoco - Blue
Prejudice
Ten hooded hounds
Eight Furies: Envy; Gossip; Crime; Poverty; Ignorance; Distrust; Gambling; License
2 Ministers
2 Lawyers
2 Physicians
2 Teachers
2 Carpenters
2 Masons
4 Laborers
4 Farmers
4 Students - male - female Actors 2
Artists 4
Painters- Sculptor - Musician - Dancer (Singer) Athletes
Basketball - 3
Track - 4
Tennis - 4
Football - 4
Weight Thrower
Jumper
Boxing - 2
American Negroes - 10
British Negroes - 10
Spanish Negroes - 10
Portuguese Negroes - 10
Haitian Negroes - 10
Society Dancers - 20 couples
Bantus 100 - Fetish Priests
Egyptians 100 - Pharoah
Mohammedans 100 - Askia - Sonni Ali - Mansa Musa
Children of Everlasting Song - 100?

Characters

Reutus 100 - Fetish Priests
Egyptians 100 - Pharoah
Mohammedans 100 - Askia, Sonni Ali, Mansa Musa
Children of Everlasting Song - 100?

Properties

5 Tower of Light Stones:
- Labor
- Beauty
- Justice
- Knowledge
- Love

Gibbet
Noose
Whips
Playing Card
Dice
Saw Square
Hammer
Trowel
Rake
Hoe
Scythe
Fork
Pick Axe
Shovel
Hammer and Chisel
Easel
Football
Tennis raquets
Tennis ball

Music

Walk Together Children
Swing Along
Were You There
Imaginary Ballet
La Paloma
O Southland

34-3-13

Scene 4. The Vision

Everlasting

Episode 14 The jubilant freedmen enter the dance wrangle work play & study. Suddenly the Slaves shriek tears amid storm & the Ghosts & Furies howl out. Incredulously they attack the Freedmen. They seek the star of Hod- written Old chants "Nobody knows" en. The Freedmen appeal & Ethiopia appears enthroned on the mountain of the moon & sends the 3 rivers - the ~~Black Nile~~ Thought ~~Nile~~ (~~knowledge~~) the ~~Black Nile~~ (strength ~~Power~~) & the Red Congo (Aspiration) The ghosts & Furies prepare to lynch them when they are blotted out in mist

34-3-33

and the crucified Christ appears outlined on the clouds

Episode 12 The yellow Mississippi & her children afloat. They plant the Tower of Light & lay the foundry stone KNOWLEDGE The Congo calls the savages & lay the stone LABOR. The Nile calls Moses the Egyptians & lays the stone SCIENCE. The Niger calls the Mohammedans all Africa & lays the stone JUSTICE. The Niger Orinoko appears leading the Dancing maidens who sing ART. There is a pause The rivers appeal to Ethiopia. The mothers all wail singing. They kneel in prayer. The

34-3-59

The star-bearing children come with the capstone LOVE
The Tower of Light touches & sub-limits the Star of Freedom
A great song arises "O Freedom over me!"

34-3-5T

"THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA"
(Pageant)

34-3-85

On the FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the adoption of the THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT there will be held in the City of Washington a Pageant by the colored people, called "THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA." The fund with which this Pageant is given has been furnished by Mrs. Quincy Shaw of Boston, and the Mrs. Lewisom of New York, and others. To this general fund the colored citizens of Washington, including Judge R. H. Terrell, Dr. C. W. Childs, Mr. A. F. Hilyer, Mr. Henry E. Baker, and about one hundred and fifty others have added a guarantee fund of $1,000. The text of the Pageant was written by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, Editor of the "CRISIS MAGAZINE" of New York. It was first given in New York in 1913 before audiences aggregating 14,000 people.

The Pageant seeks to portray the history of the Negro race and is divided into five scenes. The first scene refers to prehistoric times and shows the discovery of welding iron by the primitive black savages. The second scene portrays the relations between Mulatto Egypt and BlackAfrica." The third portrays the culmination of theAfrican civilization in the years between 200 A. D. and 1500 A. D., reminding us of the culture under Candace, the Kingdoms of the Soudan, the Empire of Monomotapa, and the industrial culture of Guinea. Then comes the "Valley of Humiliation" or slave trade, ending with several war scenes in which the colored District Militia will take part. The final scene shows the triumph of the Negro over the ghosts of slavery, ending in the building of the Tower of Light.

The music and dancing accompanying this Pageant will be of special interest. The dancing will be led by Mrs. Dora Cole costumes have been specially made and for the most part according to historical models. Some seven hundred costumes have been made besides the costumes of the soldiers. This spectacle is not simply for the colored people, but for the Cityof Washington regardless of race. The white citizens, especially, will be interested to have their attention called to the great dramatic talent of the colored people which is as remarkable in many ways as their musical gift. A number of prominent people outside of the patrons have expressed their purpose to witness the Pageant. The Pageant will be given on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, October 11, 12, 13, and 15th. In case of rain it will be postponed and notice accordingly given in the daily press. The price has been made low to meet the abilities of the working people so that it may reallybe a great popular festival. Many of the properties used, such as weapons, shields, headgear, etc., have been made in the Manual Training Department of the Public Schools. It is hoped that this Pageant movement will spread among the colored schools throughout the land. Already the African M. E. Church has asked for a rpproduction of this Pageant to celebrate the 100th Anniversary of the General Conference which takesplace next May in Philadelphia.

34-3-86

October 7, '15.

Estimated cost of Philadelphia Pageant

Grounds + tickets	$825. (decoration)
Electricity	100.
Advertising	500
Costumes	350.
Salaries	750.
Properties	350.
Arrangement of Play	250
Music	300.
Office	175.
Miscellaneous	500
	$4100

34-3-32

34-3-15

To the Directors of the National Pageant and Dramatic Association.

The cost of the Pageant to the Horizon Guild has been as follows:

MONIES ALREADY EXPENDED, up to Oct. 13, 1915:
Preliminary expense, including preparation of manuscript, storage of properties and freight	$250.00
Costumes	215.68
Theatrical properties (Temple, Black Rock, Swords etc., etc.)	346.20
Salaries	316.00
Music arrangement	80.00
Electric lighting (including $180 advanced to Mr. Fearing)	330.00
Travel	80.00
Miscellaneous (office, express etc.)	227.36
Total (Subject to minor corrections)	$1845.24
BILLS PAYABLE, Oct. 13th to 20th
Salaries	$449.00
Costumes	300.00
Printing (Placards, Posters, Tickets, etc.)	472.00
Electricity	325.00
Advertising	50.00
Labor on grounds	50.00
Miscellaneous (Packing up, office, labor, etc.)	206.25
Total (Subject to minor corrections)	$1852.25
Grand total	$3697.49

(Signed) W. E. B. Du Bois,
President of the Horizon Guild,
October 13, 1915.

Cost of Pageant (Washington)

Grounds & tickets —	$816.14
Electricity —	761.72
Advertising —	701.37
Costumes —	614.68
Salaries —	750.00
Properties —	369.36
Arrangement of Play	311.71
Music	290.75
Office	172.27
Rehearsals	120.
Travel	130.31
Labor, & miscellaneous	254.07
	$5292.38

1923

34-2-65

N.B.
File under Pageant

34-3-M

COST OF PAGEANT

		WASHINGTON	PHILADELPHIA
1	Grounds and Tickets	$ 816.14	$ 825.00	800
2	Electricity	761.72	100.00	100
3	Advertising	701.37	500.00	1000
4	Costumes	614.68	350.00	250
5	Salaries	750.00	750.00	700
6	Properties	369.36	350.00	300
7	Arrangement of Play	311.71	250.00
8	Music	290.75	300.00	250
9	Office	172.27	175.00	150
10	Travel	130.31
11	Labor and Miscellaneous	254.07	500.00	250
12	Rehearsals	120.00
		$5,292.38	$4,100.00	3800

35
10 15
50
110

3000

1 — 750
2 — 125
3 — 1000
4 — 250
5 — 600
6 — 300
7 — 250
8 — 150
9 11 12 — 250
3675

225
125 100

1000

2

3000 0 1 5 0 4

50 100

R. — 200
W, 200
N 175
R
B 150
725

This agreement entered into this between the Horizon Guild, a partnership represented by W. E. B. DuBois and the Witnesseth; That the Horizon Guild agrees to produce in Philadelphia during the week beginning May 14, 1916 three exhibitions of the pageant known as the Star of Ethiopia. The said Horizon Guild agrees to train 1,000 actors for this pageant and furnish costumes for them, advertise the pageant in the press and posters, furnish scenery and properties, furnish the necessary extra lighting for the stage, furnish all music except vocal music, furnish manuscripts for the vocal music, furnish tickets of admission and to maintain a public office for about six weeks. The said agrees to furnish 1,000 actors for the pageant and at least 200 good voices for the chorus, several places for rehearsal and a guarantee fund of $1,000. The said guarantee fund shall be paid to W. E. B. DuBois as a representative of the Horizon Guild on or before

34-3-47

As a receipt for this the said W. E. B. DuBois shall execute a lien upon the first box receipts of the pageant to the amount of $1,000 payable to the

. From the gross receipts arising from the sale of tickets of admission to the three exhibitions of the pageant the following sum shall be subtracted : First, the $1,000 covering the lein of the Second, $3,000 to reimburse the Horizon Guild for its expenditures and the use of its properties in presenting the pageant. The balance shall be divided one-half to the and one-half to the Horizon Guild. Concessions for the sale of all of the articles whatsoever in connection with the pageant shall be vested jointly in the two organizations except that the sale of souvenir programs shall be the sole property of the Horizon Guild. The gate receipts of the pageant and the receipts from the advance sale of tickets and all other moneys belonging jointly to the two contracting parties shall be held jointly by a committee of two. In case of dispute the decision of an arbitrator mutually agreeable to both shall be decisive to both members of the committee.

34-3-48

0 1 5 0 6

34-3-49

_____

_____

_____

1. Prelude to Episode 1

Hear ye. hear ye! Men of all the Americas and listen to the tale of the eldest and strongest of the races of men whose faces be black. Hear ye, hear ye! For lo! Upon this night a world shall pass before your eyes, bathed in color wound with song and set to the marching of many hundred feet. And this shall be the message of our pageantry: Of the Black man's Gift of Iron to the world; of Ethiopia and her glories, North and South and West; of the Fire of Humiliation by which God willed that she must burn; of her dark and terrible search for Resurection and, in the end, of the Vision Everlasting when the Tower of Light rises on the Black Rock of Ages. Men and Women of California, keep silence and in reverence see this holy thing.

32-24-4

2. Prelude to Episode 2

Hear ye! Hear ye!. All them that come to know the truth and listen to the tale of the wisest and gentlest of the races of men, whose faces be black. Hear ye'. hear ye! and learn the golden glory of Egypt born of the womb of Ethiopia and nourished and guarded of that black and ancient all Mother of men whose wonders men forgot. See how beneath the mountains of the Moon and in the vale of the Nile streamed down the rivers of men who made Egypt and when it failed and fainted made it yet again succoured and rescued it and crowned and buttressed all its triumphant splendor. Fathers of men and Mothers of all children black and brown and white, keep silence and hear this mighty word.

32-24-5

Prelude to Episode 3

32-24-6

Hear ye! Hear ye! Eternal children of the World; Ye little ones within whose veins the blood of Ethiopia flows and flames. Hear ye! Hear ye! and listen to the tale of the humblest and mightiest races of men whose faces be black. Behold how black men ~~ruled~~ led the world, and for a thousand years in Meroe and Napata and in ancient Negro-land the black race ruled and strove and fought and sought the Star of Faith and Freedom even as other races did and do. Sons and daughters of Time keep silence and hear this beautiful thing!

Prelude to Episode 4

32-24-7

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! All them that come to see the Light and listen to the tale of the bravest and truest of the races of men whose faces be black! Hear ye! hear ye! And learn how there where Ethiopia sought solemn sanctuary in [redacted] peace and work and colored carven beauty of Atlantis and the West, she did suffer ~~the~~ Pain of Death and [redacted] Humiliation of Hell, yet did not die but ~~rose~~ clept in ~~from~~ flame ~~and~~ to live again beyond the sullen sea. Listen Mothers of men and Daughters of Almighty God whose hearts hold buried the dark and beautiful children of worlds to come...listen and hear this awful thing.

* * *

Prelude to Episode ~~5~~ 5

32-24-8

Hear ye! Hear Ye! All them that know of death and pain and seek and search for peace. See how ~~here~~ on isle and heath and hill beneath tall palms and crooked oaks and dreary pines a people crawled and toiled and whined and sought the Star of Freedom in the sod, until on one great day ~~besought~~ stirred by ~~of~~ brave men black and red and white Ethiopia Shango sang ~~mace~~ in heaven from the dead amid wild drums and all the swinging ~~swaying~~ glory of her sword. Sit still and pray ~~sing~~, Friends of Freedom and Mankind while we play this hard and heavy ~~high~~, high and heavenly thing.

* * *

Prelude to Episode 6

32-24-9

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! All them that dwell by the Rivers of living waters and in the beautiful the Valley of the Shadow ~~of~~ of Death and listen to the ending of this pageant and this tale. Learn, borthers and little sisters, how above the toil of Labor, Justice has built on Beauty and love crowns Knowledge beneath the Star of Freedom. Listen, O [redacted] Isles the while our Pageant comes again in dance and song to build this Tower of Eternal Light. Keep silence with singing hearts to hear our last and latest word!

* * *

32-24-3

Star of Ethiopia

Postlude

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! All them that sing before the Lord and forget not the Vision of the eldest and strongest of the races of men whose faces be black. Hear Ye! Hear ye! and remember forever and ~~one~~ a day the Star of Ethiopia, All Mother of Men, who gave the world the Iron Gift and Gift of Faith, the Pain of Humility and Sorrow Song of Pain; and Freedom, eternal Freedom underneath the Star. Arise and go, Children of the Angels, the Play is done . . . the Play is done.

STAR of ETHIOPIA

DESIGNED BY

KELLY MILLER JR. and FRED. B. PELHAM.

The Edmund Dorsey { Keeping Tank
Oscola
Seneca
Quaker Lass

Foundation of Youth
Exhilaration
Gold - El Dorado
Serenades Pleasure

33-2-22

Youth
Knowledge
Gold
Power

The Cycle
Beauty Lasts
The School
Boom
Pneumonia

Bulkley
Burroughs
Dubois
Watson

Wilder
Bath
Johnson

33-2-23

Eland Skill Jordan
Leader + Pt. Lamb

Margaret Johnson

Eleven plunges this land tower down!
who are you—
I am Elhafen

33-2-24

34-3-77

Application for Beneficiaries of the Net Proceeds from
THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA

We wish hereby to make application for a share in the net proceeds from "The Star of Ethiopia" in accordance with the conditions of distribution.

Name of Institution _____

Name of Representative _____

Representative's Relation to the Institution _____

Pageant Rehearsals

The following is explanatory of the initials or abbreviations below; K—Kushites; E—Egyptians; M—Mohammedans; N—Nubians; F—Freedmen; H—Haytians; I—Indians; S—Soldiers; C—Children; W—Maidens of Art

32-24-12

April	17, Mon.—Zoar Church	F, I, H, M, N
	18, Tues.—Holy Trinity	F, I, H, M, N
	19, Wed.—Pythian Hall	K, E, M, N
	20, Thur.—Y. M. C. A.	K, E, M, N
	21, Fri.	F, I, H
	22, Sat.—Zion Baptist	F, I, H
	24, Mon.—Calvary	K, E, M, N
	25, Tues.—Holy Trinity	K, E, M, N
	26, Wed.—St, Simons	F, I, H
	27, Thur.—1st African Pres	F, I, H
	28, Fri.—1st African Pres	K, E, M, N
	29, Sat.—Zion Baptist	K, E, M, N
May	1, Mon.—Union A. M. E. Church	F, I, H, S
	2, Tues. Holy Trinity	K, E, M, N
	3, Wed.—Union A. M. E. Church	F, I, H, S
	4, Thur.—Y. M. C. A.	K, E, M, N
	5, Fri.—1st African Pres	All
	6, Sat.—Zion Baptist	All
	8, Mon.—Zoar	All
	9, Tues. Fidelity Hall	All
	10, Wed.—Fidelity Hall	All
	11, Thur.—Holy Trinity & 1st African Pres.	All
	12, Fri.—Fidelity Hall	All
	13, Sat.—Dress Rehearsal,	Convention Hall

The Pageant WILL BE HELD AT Convention Hall

May 16, 18, 20, 1916

HEADQUARTERS:— 1330 LOMBARD STREET

Telephone Walnut 4194 W. E. B. DuBois, Manager

32-24-31

Philadelphia Pageant Committee

Philadelphia, Pa.

Find enclosed $.....for which please send.....tickets for the Pageant Performance at Convention Hall.....night, May..... 1916. Send tickets to Name.....

City..... State.....

Street.....

(Please mail before May 8 if possible so as to give sufficient time for the name on Official Souvenir Program)

"The Star of Ethiopia"

A History of the Negro Race

Portrayed by

1010 Actors in Costume

PHILADELPHIA, 1916

May

Tuesday

16

Thursday

18

Saturday

20

8

P.M.

May

Tuesday

16

Thursday

18

Saturday

20

8

P.M.

Chorus of 200 - 53 Musical Numbers - Full Brass Band

To Celebrate the

100th General Conference of the A.M.E. Church

CONVENTION HALL

BROAD & ALLEGHANY AVENUE

Presented by the Horizon Guild and the National Pageant and Dramatic Association

At the American League Ball Park

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Monday, Wednesday & Friday

October 11, 13 & 15, 1915

at 8 P. M.

Admission, 25c. Reserved Seats, 35c. & 50c.

To Commemorate the Thirteenth Amendment

42-3-276

42-3-277

October 11, 13 & 15, 1915

42-3-278

October 11, 13 & 15, 1915

42-3-279

Page 1

Report

1915

1. The Pageant Girl
2. Preliminary Announcement
3. Explanatory Leaflet
4. Facts about the Washington Pageant
5. The Star worn by 16,000 colored school children
6. The Appeal to Patrons
7. The Appeal of the cooperating local association
8. The Official Program
9. Cut of the Local Committee
10. Three of the Principals in the Pageant
11. The Story of the Master, with pictures of the Directors
12. Report of the Pageant in the local colored paper
13. Criticism, by whites
14. Criticism, by colored people
15. The Cost of the Pageant

"THE STAR
OF ETHIOPIA"
A PAGEANT.

A PROPOSED PAGEANT

To Celebrate the Adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment Abolishing Slavery

32-24-11

THE Horizon Guild (to be incorporated) has secured the support of a few prominent philanthropists who wish to promote dramatic art among American Negroes, not simply for recreation and amusement, but to give the higher spiritual aspirations of the race adequate expression.

The Guild has chosen THE PAGEANT as a suitable vehicle for dramatic art expression. A pageant is a series of scenes, with processions of persons in costumes of various periods, representing historic events. These scenes and actions are accompanied by music, dramatic incidents and the grouping and massing of color. In the pageant all classes and ages take part. It is a great human festival and may be of singular beauty and lasting impression.

2

A PROPOSED PAGEANT

To Celebrate the Adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment Abolishing Slavery

THE Horizon Guild (to be incorporated) has secured the support of a few prominent philanthropists who wish to promote dramatic art among American Negroes, not simply for recreation and amusement, but to give the higher spiritual aspirations of the race adequate expression.

The Guild has chosen THE PAGEANT as a suitable vehicle for dramatic art expression. A pageant is a series of scenes, with processions of persons in costumes of various periods, representing historic events. These scenes and actions are accompanied by music, dramatic incidents and the grouping and massing of color. In the pageant all classes and ages take part. It is a great human festival and may be of singular beauty and lasting impression.

Only one pageant has ever been given in Colored America and that was at the Emancipation celebration of the State of New York in 1913. It was a striking success, employing 350 actors for four performances before audiences aggregating 14,000 persons. The OUTLOOK (N. Y.) called it "an impressive spectacle both from historical point of view and as a forecast."

The author of the pageant, Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, Editor of THE CRISIS, is President of the Horizon Guild and is proposing to stage and perform a similar pageant in Washington city, next October. He will use 500 actors with scenery, music and costumes, and thus in a great folk festival, celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Thirteenth Amendment which freed the American slave.

To this end he is asking the co-operation of a local committee representing the various organizations of the District of Columbia. A temporary committee under the chairmanship of Mr. L. M. Hershaw, has already been formed and financial arrangements proposed. This committee is now consulting with various organizations with a view to enlarging its numbers and making a permanent committee.

The proposed pageant begins with the prehistoric black men who gave to the world the gift of the welding of iron. Ethiopia, Mother of Men, then leads the mystic procession of historic events past the glory of ancient Egypt, the splendid kingdoms of the Sudan and Zymbabwe down to the tragedy of the American slave trade. Up from slavery slowly but resistlessly the black race writhes back to life and hope and with Touissaint and Douglass builds a new and mighty Tower of Light on which the Star of Freedom gleams forever.

No such setting forth of the facts, dreams and ideals of the colored people has ever before been attempted. It is hoped that the people of Washington will enter into this solemn and beautiful festival with enthusiasm.

All persons interested will address Mr. Hershaw, 2215 Thirteenth St., N. W., Washington, D. C., or Mr. Du Bois, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A PROPOSED PAGEANT

To Celebrate the Adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment Abolishing Slavery

THE Horizon Guild (to be incorporated) has secured the support of a few prominent philanthropists who wish to promote dramatic art among American Negroes, not simply for recreation and amusement, but to give the higher spiritual aspirations of the race adequate expression.

The Guild has chosen THE PAGEANT as a suitable vehicle for dramatic art expression. A pageant is a series of scenes, with processions of persons in costumes of various periods, representing historic events. These scenes and actions are accompanied by music, dramatic incidents and the grouping and massing of color. In the pageant all classes and ages take part. It is a great human festival and may be of singular beauty and lasting impression.

Only one pageant has ever been given in Colored America and that was at the Emancipation celebration of the State of New York in 1913. It was a striking success, employing 350 actors for four performances before audiences aggregating 14,000 persons. The OUTLOOK (N. Y.) called it "an impressive spectacle both from historical point of view and as a forecast."

The author of the pageant, Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, Editor of THE CRISIS, is President of the Horizon Guild and is proposing to stage and perform a similar pageant in Washington city, next October. He will use 500 actors with scenery, music and costumes, and thus in a great folk festival, celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Thirteenth Amendment which freed the American slave.

To this end he is asking the co-operation of a local committee representing the various organizations of the District of Columbia. A temporary committee under the chairmanship of Mr. L. M. Hershaw, has already been formed and financial arrangements proposed. This committee is now consulting with various organizations with a view to enlarging its numbers and making a permanent committee.

The proposed pageant begins with the prehistoric black men who gave to the world the gift of the welding of iron. Ethiopia, Mother of Men, then leads the mystic procession of historic events past the glory of ancient Egypt, the splendid kingdoms of the Sudan and Zymbabwe down to the tragedy of the American slave trade. Up from slavery slowly but resistlessly the black race writhes back to life and hope and with Touissaint and Douglass builds a new and mighty Tower of Light on which the Star of Freedom gleams forever.

No such setting forth of the facts, dreams and ideals of the colored people has ever before been attempted. It is hoped that the people of Washington will enter into this solemn and beautiful festival with enthusiasm.

All persons interested will address Mr. Hershaw, 2215 Thirteenth St., N. W., Washington, D. C., or Mr. Du Bois, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

WHAT IS A PAGEANT

A PAGEANT is a great Folk Play given usually out of doors and using large numbers of actors.

There is little or no speaking but the story is told by music, beautiful costumes and folk-dancing.

The pageant has its origin in the religious festivals of ancient and mediaeval days and has recently been revived in England and America.

Each Pageant seeks to teach some great historic lesson, portraying the deeds and thoughts of by-gone days and inspiring the young for unselfish work in thefuture.

A PAGEANT

The pageant was produced in Washington October 11th, 13th and 15th. The leading colored people of Washington formed an association to cooperate. The Board of Education endorsed the work and gave us the use of the colored public school buildings and the cooperation of teachers and pupils.

The audiences aggregated 12,000 people. Over 1,200 actors were used. The cooperation on the part of the colored people of Washington was extraordinary and many declared that this was the most successful entertainment in point of numbers and good feeling that colored Washington has ever seen.

Among the persons who loaned their name and influence as patrons were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Senator and Mrs. Robert M. LaFollette, the Assistant Secretary of the Department of Labor and Mrs. Post, four justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, members of the Board of Education, the president and other members of the Dramatic Association, the superintendent of education, Miss Mabel Boardman, the head of the Red Cross Society and Miss Margaret Wilson, daughter of the President.

5

A Pageant
"The Star of Ethiopia"

32-39-89

American League Baseball Park
Washington, D. C.
October 11, 13 and 15
At Eight P. M.
General Admission
TWENTY-FIVE CENTS

Revista

A Pageant

ON the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery there will be presented in the city of Washington a pageant called the "Star of Ethiopia."

This pageant when given last year in New York City by four hundred colored actors before audiences aggregating 14,000 was pronounced by periodicals like the New York OUTLOOK "an impressive spectacle both from the historical point of view and as a forecast."

The Washington pageant will employ 1,000 colored participants and be played in the American League Ball Park, Monday, Wednesday and Friday, October 11, 13 and 15, 1915. The players will be in costume and will illustrate the history of the Negro race from prehistoric times down through the centuries of Egypt, Ethiopia, the Kingdoms of the Soudan, slavery and America. The fifty musical selections will be a complete exposition of Negro music from the tom-toms to Coleridge-Taylor.

It is earnestly desired to interest in this movement persons of influence and social foresight. The colored people have strong musical and dramatic instincts. Through the pageant these gifts may be turned into valuable agents of education and uplift. The Horizon Guild which is promoting this pageant hopes to begin here in Washington a movement which will extend throughout the United States and it asks the cooperation of public spirited persons of all races.

MRS. HELEN CURTIS
Mistress of the Robes fairly well it seems like tempting fate to try it again. And then, after all, there was no money. There was war and there was trouble. So another year passed, and then with a start I felt that I was letting something go that was really worth while—letting it die because of certain moral cowardice and so I girded myself and looked around the world and hit upon Washington at once the most promising and the most difficult of places; the largest Negro city in the northern hemisphere and yet for that very reason exceedingly hard to reach and interest with a new and untried thing.

The few that came out to the preliminary meetings listened with interest. They even showed enthusiasm at times and they promised cooperation and they kept their word. I had the whole matter carefully planned but I early found that the best laid plans needed a curious personal joining together on the part of the one who has the vision of what he wants and cannot adequately tell it.

I remember that Friday when I opened the office. The beautiful sign which Richard Brown had painted was going up and I was helping boost it. A good friend came by and looked at me. There was pity way down in his soul. "Are you still encouraged?" he asked. His question was a revelation. The whole city doubted. A thousand actors, gowned and trained in three weeks? "Impossible!" said the city. Nevertheless they worked loyally.

My helpers came to town on the dot. Mr. Burroughs, with his deliberate genius and unwavering faith; Mrs. Norman with her great mastery of men—or rather of women—and Mrs. Curtis who came almost concealed under thousands of yards of cloth. Already in the field was the tireless Mrs. Glenn and eventually came Mr. Davidson. Richard Brown had long been working. So we started and our troubles started with us.

The School Board was slow but when it moved it moved generously. The rehearsals hitched and for interminable days we had a hundred people where we needed a thousand. The music went awry and it seemed an absolutely impossible task properly to advertise the thing we were doing and get the mass of the people to know and to think about it.

RICHARD L. BROWN
Director of Scenery and Properties

8

32-39-92

Program of the

Pageant

"The Star of Ethiopia"

AMERICAN LEAGUE BALL PARK
Washington, D. C.

Monday, Wednesday and Friday
October 11, 13 and 15, 1915
At 8 P. M.

W. E. B. DU BOIS, Master of the Pageant
CHARLES BURROUGHS, Director of Dramatic Action
DORA COLE NORMAN, Director of Dancing
HELEN CURTIS, Mistress of the Robes
LAURA BRUCE GLENN, Chief Marshal
SHELBY J. DAVIDSON, Director of Publicity
J. ROSAMOND JOHNSON, Director of Music
AUGUSTUS G. DILL, Assistant Director of Music
RICHARD L. BROWN, Director of Scenery and Properties
PROF. ROY W. TIBBS, Chorister

Goins Printing Co., 1344 You Street NW.

To be changed
Ellsworth

THE "Star of Ethiopia" is the name of a Pageant which will be given in Washington the week of October tenth.

The story of the Pageant covers 10,000 years and more of the history of the Negro race and its work and suffering and triumphs in the world.

The Pageant combines historic accuracy and symbolic truth. All the costumes of the thousand actors, the temples, the weapons, etc., have been copies from accurate models.

The story is divided into five scenes and twelve episodes. The FIRST SCENE, the "Gift of Iron," occurs in prehistoric days when all men of all races were in savagery and helpless before beast and storm. It shows how then the Negro race gave mankind its first great advance in culture:—knowledge of the use of iron which was discovered when Ethiopia brought the Star of Freedom from Heaven. The SECOND SCENE, the "Dream of Egypt," shows how the Egyptians, descended from the prehistoric Negroes, evolved a high civilization and met again oncoming hordes of black men from the motherland, Punt, and eventually crowned one as Pharoah and thus extended their culture to Central Africa.

The THIRD SCENE, laid in the sixth to the sixteenth centuries, A. D., depicts the "Glory of Ethiopia" and its empires, and shows how the duel of Islam and Fetish exhausted black Africa and made it a prey to Christian and other slave traders. Ethiopia, rescuing the Star of Freedom, is burned on the Black Rock.

The FOURTH SCENE, the "Valley of Humiliation," shows Africa enslaved and careless but called to arms at last to fight for freedom. The FIFTH SCENE, the "Vision Everlasting," shows the triumph of Knowledge, Labor, Justice, Science, Art and Love over the ghosts of slavery, which have sought to lynch the Rivers of Africa.

Music by colored composers, lights and symbolic dancing accompany the story and emphasize and explain it.

This Pageant is owned and staged by the Horizon Guild of New York City

W. E. B. Du Bois, President

Cooperating with the Horizon Guild is

The National Pageant and Dramatic Association, Inc.

of Washington, D. C.

OFFICERS

President, Mr. L. M. Hershaw — Vice President, Mrs. Mary Church Terrell

Recording Secretary, Mr. Ransom C. Edmondson — Financial Secretary, Mr. John R. Hawkins

Treasurer, Mr. Addison N. Scurlock

The following committees have cooperated in arranging the Pageant:

COMMITTEE ON GUARANTORS

Mrs. Carrie W. Clifford, Chairman, 1944 9th St., NW.
Mrs. J. M. Layton, 1722 10th St., NW.
J. C. Burlls, 1509 Corcoran St., NW.
W. J. Singleton, 1814 13th St., NW.
Mrs. Jennie Brown, 1732 Vermont Ave.
C. E. Lane, 502 T St., NW.
George W. Cook, Howard University.
Thomas A. Johnson, 3229 Sherman Ave., NW.
R. H. Terrell, 1826 13th St., NW.
L. M. Hershaw, 2215 13th St., NW.
Miss Gregoria Fraser, 2019 13th St., NW.
Rev. Jarvis, Church, 9th and S Sts., NW.
Rev. F. I. A. Bennett, 651 11th St., NW.
Thomas Walker, 506 5th St., NW.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLICITY

Mr. Shelby J. Davidson, Chairman, 1911 13th St., NW.
Mr. Robert A. Pelham, 605 Howard Ave., NW.
Mr. Neval H. Thomas, 1940 11th St., NW.
Miss Nannie Burroughs, National Training School, Lincoln Heights, D. C.
Mr. E. C. Williams, M Street High School.
Mr. Garnet C. Wilkinson, Armstrong Manual T. School.
Dr. Lucy E. Moten, Miner Normal School.
Mr. William Miner, 454 Washington St., NW.
Mr. J. S. Quander.
Mr. Archibald Pinkett, 1527 K St., NW.
Miss Blanche Wright, The Cameron.
Mr. I. E. Williamson, 1913 9th St., NW.
Mr. T. J. Calloway.
Mr. A. H. Glenn, 941 S St., NW.

COMMITTEE ON MUSIC

Mr. Andrew F. Hilyer, Chairman, 2352 6th St., NW.
Mr. John H. Cook, 2328 6th St., NW.
Mr. Bernadine Smith, 816 4th St., NW.
Prof. John T. Layton, 1722 10th St., NW.
Miss Lulu V. Childers, Howard University.
Prof. Charles G. Harris, 1460 Oak St., NW.
Prof. R. J. Daniels, 1933 11th St., NW .
Mrs. Harriet G. Marshall, 900 T St., NW.
Mrs. Gabrielle L. Pelham, 605 Howard Ave., NW.
Mr. J. T. Beason, City Post Office.
Mr. Joseph T. Wilson, Government Printing Office.
Mr. John N. Adams, 1310 G St., NW.
Mr. N. W. Green, 2006 10th St., NW.
Mr. H. S. Fortune, 1643 10th St., NW.
Mr. John E. Rattley, Corner 12th and S Sts., NW.
Miss Mary L. Europe, 1008 S St., NW.
Miss Gregoria Fraser, 2017 13th St., NW.
Mr. Clarence K. Wormley, 6th and Florida Ave., NW.
Mr. W. A. Adams, 1005 You St., NW.
Miss Lottie N. Wallace, 1209 T St., NW.

COMMITTEE ON PARTICIPANTS

Laura Bruce Glenn, Chairman
Miss Mary P. Burrill
Miss Jessie Fausett
Miss Gregoria Fraser
Miss Hallie Queen
Mrs. H. F. M. McCary
Mrs. Henry Lincoln Johnson
Mrs. H. Powell
Mr. George Hall
Mr. Edwin B. Henderson
Mr. Walter Singleton
Mr. George D. Jenifer
Mr. William H. J. Beckett
Miss E. L. G. Merritt
Mrs. Anna J. Cooper

COMMITTEE ON PATRONS

Mrs. Mary Church Terrell, Chairman — Miss Hallie Queen — Mrs. Coralie Franklin Cook

PATRONS OF THE PAGEANT

The Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane
Senator and Mrs. Robert M. La Follette
Honorable and Mrs. Louis F. Post
Judge J. Wilmer Latimore
Honorable Thomas Ewing
Justice Wendell Phillipps Stafford
Justice F. L. Siddons
Justice Thomas Anderson
Honorable Merritt O. Chance
Miss Julia Lathrop
Honorable H. B. F. McFarland
President S. M. Newman

Honorable Henry P. Blair
Mrs. John A. Logan
Mrs. John B. Henderson
Mr. H. Martin Williams
Mr. Percy Foster
Miss Caroline L. Hunt
Miss Florence Curtis West
Miss Ethel Smith
Miss Frances Davenport
Rabbi Abram Simon
Mrs. Glenna Smith Tinnin
Mr. George O'Dell

Dr. Cora Smith King
Mr. Ernest Daniel
Mr. W. T. Galliher
Honorable John D. Larner
Mrs. Edith Kingman Kera
Mrs. Susie Root Rhodes
Mrs. Coralie Franklin Cook
Dr. Creed W. Childs
Mr. Fountain Peyton
Dr. Ernest L. Thurston
Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones
Miss Mabel Boardman

PATRONS AND GUARANTORS

Mr. A. U. Craig
Mr. Alonzo H. Brown
Mr. Andrew F. Hilyer
Mr. L. M. Hershaw
Mr. John A. Davis
Dr. Creed W. Childs
Mr. John N. Goins
Mr. C. W. Banton
Mr. John R. Hawkins
Mr. R. H. Terrell
Mrs. Mary Church Terrell
Mr. A. N. Scurlock
Mr. E. C. Williams
Mr. E. L. Johnson
Mr. Thomas Walker
Mr. Thomas A. Johnson
Mr. Thomas J. Calloway
Mr. Swan M. Kendrick
Dr. J. A. McDuffie
Mr. W. H. Beckett
Mr. F. D. Lee
Mr. R. C. Edmondson
Mr. E. L. Scott
Mr. F. R. Killingsworth
Mr. C. E. Lane
Dr. John P. Turner
Mr. I. E. Williamson
Mrs. Jennie B. Browne
Mrs. Carrie W. Clifford
Mr. James C. Burlls
Miss Nannie H. Burroughs
Mr. Henry E. Baker
Mr. H. P. Slaughter
Mr. W. I. Lee
Mr. W. J. Singleton
Mr. Eugene Brooks
Mr. F. Morris Murray
Mr. John H. Paynter
Mr. John S. Quander
Mr. M. C. Maxfield
Rev. Lewis B. Moore
Mr. H. Martin Williams
Mr. W. B. Dulaney
Mr. Alphonso O. Stafford

Mr. J. C. Wright
Mr. John W. Cromwell
Mr. Robt. A. Stewart
Miss L. Blanche Wright
Mrs. Laura B. Glenn
Mr. Benjamin S. Jackson
Mrs. Grace L. Jackson
Mr. J. M. Sims
Mr. George C. Smith
Mr. Joseph H. Stewart
Mr. A. P. Albert
Rev. Logan Johnson
Mr. C. S. Shippen
Miss R. E. Guy
Dr. C. Sumner Wormley
Miss Mary P. Burrill
Mr. A. H. Glenn
Mr. John H. Polk
Mr. W. Stephen Fuller
Mr. John C. Dancy
Mr. Aaron J. Gaskins
Lieut. Col. Arthur Brooks
Mr. Zeph. P. Moore
Mr. R. W. Johnson
Dr. Michel O. Dumas
Mr. Daniel Freeman
Mr. J. T. Layton
Mrs. Julia Mason Layton
Dr. Arthur S. Gray
Dr. Amanda V. Gray
Mr. W. E. H. Chase
Mr. John E. Smith
Dr. R. L. McGuire
Mrs. Ida V. Smith
Mr. Walter J. Abrams
Mr. Neval H. Thomas
Mr. Warren Fearing
Mr. Armond W. Scott
Mr. James A. Cobb
Mr. John C. Nalle
Mr. W. W. Cohran
Rev. C. A. Stepteau
Dr. E. D. Williston
Miss Mary Cromwell

Mr. Maurice H. Ferguson
Mr. James N. Aden
Mr. Harry W. Cornell
Mr. J. Henry Lewis
Mr. George H. Murray
Mr. William H. Bruce
Mr. and Mrs. M. Grant Lucas
Mr. Samuel M. Dudley
Mr. Maurice C. Clifford
Mr. Fred G. Crusoe
Mr. J. Edward Rattley
Mr. William R. Williams
Mrs. Julia W. McAdoo
Mr. Garnet C. Wilkinson
Mr. Charles M. Thomas
Rev. W. A. Bolden
Miss Jessie Wormley
Mr. R. C. Bruce
Mrs. Josephine B. Bruce
Miss Angelina Grimke
Miss Alice Nelson
Miss Emma F. G. Merritt
Mr. Shelby J. Davidson
Mr. M. S. Koonce
Mr. John R. Wright
Mr. Ernest M. Dickerson
Mr. Nelson E. Weatherless
Mr. F. H. M. Murray
Mr. W. H. Cowan
The M. L. V. by Mr. W. H. Cowan
Mr. A. H. Grimke
Miss Zita Dyson
Dr. H. C. Scurlock
Mr. John W. Lewis
Mr. James A. Walker
Mr. Arthur C. Newman
Dr. Charles I. West
Mr. George Wm. Cook
Mrs. Coralie Franklin Cook
Mr. O. T. Taylor
Mr. H. F. Thomas
Mr. James W. Williams
Mr. J. W. Wilkinson

Dr. C. G. Woodson
Mr. Thomas L. Jones
Mr. Thomas A. Cox
Miss Caroline L. Hunt
Mr. Kelly Miller
Mr. Leroy Tibbs
Miss Julia C. Lathrop
Mr. C. R. Scott
Dr. E. G. Evans
Mr. Charles Lee
Dr. George W. Cabaniss
Dr. Joseph Bently Cherry
Mr. J. W. Howard
Mr. Robert Middleton
Mrs. Anna J. Cooper
Dr. William H. Wilson
Miss Gregoria A. Fraser
Mr. U. S. G. Bassett
Mrs. Martha E. Tucker
Miss Essie Tucker
Dr. Julia P. H. Coleman
Mr. John T. Howe
Mr. Chas. A. Booker
Mr. Joseph Murray
Miss Charlotte E. Hunter
Miss Jessie Fauset
Miss M. E. Gibbs
Mr. William H. Richards
Mr. General Henry Forrest
E. R. James and Brother
R. L. Pendleton
Miss Marion P. Shadd
Mr. John W. Smith
Dr. W. L. Board
Dr. Lucy E. Moten
Mr. S. L. McLauren
Miss Georgiana R. Simpson
Miss K. U. Alexander
Miss Mathiel Williams
Miss N. T. Jackson
Mr. Wyatt Archer
Mr. Frank B. Crusoe

THE LOCAL PAGEANT COMMITTEE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

From Left to Right

Top Row: Messrs. Goins, Edmondson, Terrell, Craig and Walker.

Middle Row: Messrs. Singleton and Brown, Mrs. Glenn, Chief Marshall; Messrs. Hilyer, Burroughs and Scurlock.

Bottom Row: Mr. Hawkins, Mrs. Clifford, Mr. Du Bois, Mrs. Terrell and Mr. Hershaw, the President of the Board.

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA
(Miss Adella Parks)

ETHIOPIA
(Miss Eleanor Curtis)

CANDACE OF MEROE
(Miss Gregoria Fraser)

From the Pageant: "The Star of Ethiopia"

"THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA"

By W. E. B. DU BOIS

I WROTE it four years ago. I called it, or rather it called itself by various names. Finally it decided to be called "The Star of Ethiopia." I acquiesced. My friends looked upon it with lack-luster eye. I did not blame them. The more I read it myself the more it seemed wanting. And yet as I turned over my rejected manuscripts this always bobbed up with a certain insistance, a kind of "Why not try me" tone. Its first resurrection came in 1913 when we were celebrating, in New York, Emancipation.

What a task that was! I have been through a good many laborious jobs and had to bear on many occasions accusations difficult to rest under, but without doubt the New York Emancipation Exposition was the worst of all my experiences. Such an avalanche of altogether unmerited and absurd attacks it had never been my fortune to experience.

CHARLES BURROUGHS
Director of Dramatic Action

MRS. DORA COLE NORMAN
Director of Dancing

Yet through it all one thing became clearer—the Pageant must be tried. We must attempt, at least, this one new thing in the dead level of uninteresting exhibitions. We had our ups and downs with it. It was difficult to get hold of the people; it was more difficult to keep them. There were curious little wranglings and bickerings and none of us will forget that dress rehearsal. If there had been any reasonably convenient method of escape the Pageant would never have seen the light of day.

And then it came—four exhibitions, singular in their striking beauty, and above all in the grip they took upon men. Literally, thousands besieged our doors and the sight of the thing continually made the tears arise. After these audiences aggregating 14,000, I said: the Pageant is the thing. This is what the people want and long for. This is the gown and paraphernalia in which the message of education and reasonable race pride can deck itself. And yet a year went by and another year. I had upon me somehow the fear of doing. When one has done a thing and done it

National Pageant and Dramatic Association

OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

ORGANIZED to assist "The Horizon Guild," of New York, in presenting at the Base Ball Park, 7th Street and Florida Avenue, Washington, D. C., on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, October 11th, 13th and 15th, 1915, the Pageant, "THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA."

The Pageant was composed by DR. W. E. B. DUBOIS, and was successfully produced in New York City in 1913.

The Horizon Guild is to furnish $3,000 for expenses.

The National Pageant and Dramatic Association (incorporated), the local body, is to furnish $1,000 for expenses, to be paid back from the first gate receipts of the Pageant performance. The National Pageant and Dramatic Association is the instrument and agent of the Guarantors of the $1,000 fund.

Many local residents have subscribed one or more units.

Others are invited to subscribe one or more units, so as to complete the Guarantee Fund of $1,000 at the earliest practicable date.

Subscriptions may be registered with the Recording Secretary of the Association, or with the Office Clerk, at the PENDLETON BUILDING, 1216 You Street, Washington, D. C.

Cash or checks should be handed or mailed to Mr. John R. Hawkins, Financial Secretary of the Association, 1541 14th St. N. W., corner Q St., Washington, who will give receipts.

☞ Each Guarantor named in the list below is hereby requested to secure one additional Guarantor, and make prompt report thereof to the office.

National Pageant and Dramatic Association
1216 You St. N. W., Washington, D. C.

L. M. HERSHAW, President. R. C. EDMONDSON, Recording Sec'y.
MARY C. TERRELL, Vice-Pres't. JOHN R. HAWKINS, Financial Sec'y.
A. N. SCURLOCK, Treasurer.

MEETING OF GUARANTORS

Lincoln Memorial Church, 11th and R Streets, N. W.
Thursday Night, October 7th, 1915.

PLEASE COME.

MR. SHELBY J. DAVIDSON
Director of Publicity

And then the weather—oh! the weather! The pains of hell gat hold upon me and the terrors of the damned during that week of cold, drizzly weather that preceded the week of our entertainment. I was at the very nadir of my faith, and wondered rather helplessly why it was I could never let well enough alone, but was always pushing out into some frontier of wilderness endeavoring to do the impossible. Then (by what miracle who knows), came three nights, each more perfect than the other and sandwiched in between rains. Some said God did it and I am not disposed to dispute.

But the money. The way the funds rained through my fingers was quite unbelievable. I saw ahead of me the most shocking bankruptcy, the most unbelievable extravagance. Everything seemed to be costing just twice as much as it should. Final hitches came on the very end of our endeavor. The music looked dubious; the regulations of the ball field seemed about to interfere with even our walking firmly on the grass; the electric lighting got into inextricable tangles. The tickets were late. The costumes were later and the properties latest of all. New expenses kept cropping up, and finally, when the city inspector dropped around very late one evening and casually remarked that he might have to hold up the whole thing because a few red lights were missing, it seemed as though the cup of misfortune was full.

Then it was as it always is in things of this sort. Suddenly a great new spirit seemed born. The Thing that you have exorcized becomes a living, mighty, moving spirit. It sweeps on and you hang trembling to its skirts. Nothing can stop it. It is. It will. Wonderfully, irresistably the dream comes true. You feel no exaltation, you feel no personal merit. It is not yours. It is its own. You have simply called it, and it comes.

I shall never forget that last night. Six thousand human faces looked down from the shifting blaze of lights and on the field the shimmering streams of colors came and went, silently, miracuously save for the great cloud of music that hovered over them and enveloped them. It was no mere picture: it was reality.

THE LEADER OF THE HANDMAIDENS OF ART

The Herald cried, "People of Washington arise, and go. The Play is done." And yet the play was not done. Some things are quite too beautiful ever to be finished. So I walked home alone and knew the joys of God.

12

THE BEE
WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, D. C., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1915

THE GREAT PAGEANT

DR. DU BOIS' GREAT PAGEANT, "THE STAR OF ETHIOPIA," A GREAT SUCCESS.

ANDREW F. HILYER.

The First Separate Battalion Receives an Ovation—The Singing of "John Brown's Body," Etc., By an Audience of 8,000—Beautiful Singing by the Large Chorus—The Greatest Event in the History of Colored Americans.

The Great Pageant, "The Star of Ethiopia," which has held Colored Washington in its grip for the last three weeks, was enacted on the evenings of October 11, 13, and 15, 1915, at the Baseball Park, to admiring and applauding thousands. The weather was ideal and contributed much to the success of the pageant as well as to the comfort of the masses of men, women and children who had the good fortune to witness it.

Superintendent Thurston Gave Aid.

The Pageant was composed by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, editor of the Crisis, and was produced here under his personal direction. To white ladies donated $3,000.00 as a guarantee fund to make it possible to render the pageant in at least ten cities. The local co-operation was furnished by the National Pageant and Dramatic Association of which Mr. L. M. Hershaw is president. A large number of public spirited citizens pledged a local guarantee fund of $1,000 dollars. More than 1,000 voluntary actors took part, and a well-trained chours of 200 voices contributed the singing.

"The Star of Ethiopia" was undoubtedly the biggest thing in the drama that Washington has ever had had, yet only a very few white persons came to see it. The co-operation of the Board of Educaton and Mr. E. L. Thurston, superintendent of schools, was early and freely given, and, except for the co-operation and help of the Colored Schools, the unusual success which the Pageant achieved would not have been possible.

History of Our Origin.

A group of professional men from Howard laid the foundation stone of the "Tower of Light," which is "Knowledge."

Mr. Fred Pelham and Kelly Miller, Jr., made the electric "Star of Ethiopia."

Co-operation Made the Pageant Possible."

The amount of co-operation which the Pageant brought out was wonderful. The principals of the High Schools, Messrs. Williams, Wilkinson, Saunders and Newman, were ever ready to help. All the helmets and spears were made at Armstrong Manual. Miss Gertrude Ryan with the assistance of many others designed and made all of the head gear. Mr. W. D. Nixon and Mr. S. D. Milton gave much volunteer service in painting the scenery.

Mr. R. C. Edmundson gave two weeks of his time from the office to the work. Mr. Louis Mellinger and Mrs. Hallie Queen rendered valuable assistance on the headgear. Mr. and Mrs. Glenn had charge of the actors and devoted much time to the work. Mrs. Carrie W. Clifford performed yeoman service in bringing in guarantors. There were of course many, many others. Indeed the spirit of co-operation was so general and all persuasive that it is quite impossible to do more than mention a few instances that come to the notice of the writer. Not less than 1,200 persons co-operated in giving the Pageant and each deserves praise for his or her part in the great success, which all of us jointly have achieved. The services of the boyscouts were invaluable. They were always on the spot when needed and paraded the streets each evening with fife and drum corps to advertise the Pageant.

To me the one great lesson which the Pageant has taught us is the power of co-operation. If we can get large groups of our people to work together for a common purpose, ignoring the chronic "knockers," who will dare place a limit upon our capacity to do great things.

"The Star of Ethiopia" is a serious effort by our most distinguished scholar to use the drama in a large form to teach the history of our origin, to stimulate the study of the history of the peoples from whom we have sprung, to ennoble our youth and to furnish our people with high ideals, hope and inspiration. The influence of the drama on the life of a people is admitted by all writers on the subject to be very great. Shall our men and women of dramatic talent allow low vaudeville and semi-smutty skits to set the taste of our people for amusement? The success of this Pageant shows conclusively that there is inherent in our race all the innate qualities of the highest civilization and that our only problem is to bring the masses of our people to appreciate entertainments of this class. It was well knnown by Dr. Du Bois, by the ladies who so kindly donated the three thousand dollars, and by all of the persons in this city who guaranteed the $1,000 that a Pageant probably would not pay expenses. Yet they gave their money to educate the people to enjoy a higher type of amusement. Amusements that lift them up rather than pull them down. The local guarantors will be repaid dollar for dollar.

Highest Mark of Civilization.

It is remarkable that fifty years after Emancipation, the recently enslaved race should produce a man who has proposed a dramatic work that has enlisted in its production hundreds of persons who have contributed of their money and their time and many have made serious sacrifices to bring it out in completed form, and which has brought thousands of people to see it. It seems to me this is undoubted evidence that there is in us the innate capacity for doing great things and that this man at least of our race has reached the highest mark of civilization.

"The Star of Ethiopia" covers a period of 10,000 years, and more in the mythology, history and development of our race. It vividly tells the story of its work, its suffering, triumphs and hopes as an integral part of the human family. The author has most skillfully combined symbolic truth and historic accuracy, all woven into an entertainment for a couple of hours that has set all Washington to talking about it. "The Star of Ethiopia" is great because it touches every human interest through the soul.

The Story of the Pageant.

The story is divided into five scenes and twelve episodes. We first hear the measured beat of tom-toms, followed by an African Savage "Prelude," composed by Major Charles A. Young of the U. S. Army, for sometime stationed in Liberia. This music is extremely weird, thrilling and full of savage characterists. Very soon the lightnings flash, the rolls of thunder are heard, mingled with the roar and cries of wild beasts. Now hundreds of savages, the Kushites, rush in over the mountain hill and kneel before the great "Black Rock," which was their place of worship. The chorus chants a savage prayer and a human sacrifice is offered. "Shango," the Thunder God, is appeased and the storm abates. The danger over, the savages dance and make merry to the tune of Coleridge-Taylor's "Bamboula." Very soon "Shango" appears to them, summons "Ethiopia" and enlows her with "The Star of Freedom," which he has brought from Heaven, and tells her to keep it shining in high Heaven forever, assigns two angels to guard it and gives her three sprites from Heaven as emblems of his love to accompany her. He tells her that the time has now come for her people to advance and that he would entrust them with the knowledge of the use of iron. "Ethiopia" now mingles with her people and shows them how to extract iron from the earth. The savages fashion all sorts of iron implements and with savage glee go forth to hunt down the wild beasts and to slay their enemies.

The scene quickly changes. We are in Egypt. There is an Egyptian Temple and the Sphinx. Priests and worshippers file out of the temple. They are in the midst of their worship when the Kushites, having conquered all of their neighbors, rush in, but are appeased by the friendliness of the Egyptians and perhaps dazed by the splendor of the civilization and culture before their eyes. The two peoples fraternize and finally blend. One of the Kushite chiefs is crowned a Pharoah and his dynasty reigns for hundreds of years. Visits in royal state are made by the Queen of Sheba and other noted African Rulers who are royally entertained. At one of these fetes, Mrs. Dora Cole Norman dances most artistically to Coleridge-Taylor's "Take Nabanji." A most beautiful art dance of 100 Egyptian maidens trained by Mrs. Norman is part of the entertainment for this great fete.

In the course of time the culture of Egypt extended to Central Africa and there arose great empires. From the sixth to the sixteenth centuries A. D. these Central African Empires flourished. But with the on-coming of Mohammedanism there were innumerable religious wars between Mohammedan and Fetish worshipers, which so weakened and divided the people that they fell an easy prey to the slave-trader. The third scene depicts in the strongest dramatic manner how "Ethiopia" was blotted out by fire and smoke and pillage by the slave hunters, how they sought to get possession of the "Star of Freedom," but were themselves destroyed by the guardian angels, who were guarding and keeping the "Star." During all this pillage two monks representing the Christian world look on in silent acquiescense.

The fourth scene shifts to America. Hordes of slaves file in. They are bowed down by grief and pain. The atmosphere is charged with these feelings largely by the help of the band which plays one measure, "Sometimes," over and over again of Coleridge-Taylor's setting of that minor key wail, "Sometimes I feel like a motherless child." And then, when it would seem your heart would burst at the thought of the pain and grief of slavery the band would finish the movement. Over the prostrate and bending form of the slaves the ghosts of slavery dance in and out among them. A troop of Indians uttering their war cries, come in and dance to Cole and Johnson's "Big Chief" and "Red Shawl." Departing they vainly beckon to slaves to follow them to the forests and swamps. Soon the band starts up a lively dance tune taken from the Creole folk songs of Louisiana, "Look at that Dandy There, Mr. Banjo." Immediately the slaves forget all of their woes. The chorus sings this most tuneful air. All work is stopped for a good time and a frolic. The overseer comes in, cracks his whip, and the slaves resume work vigorously.

The Abolitionists come in and plead with the slave owners. Nat Turner rushes among them accompanied by the furies of insurrection. Sojourner Truth, William Lloyd Garrison and Harriet Beecher Stowe appear and plead for the slaves, but all their pleading avails nothing. John Brown rushes in carrying the lighted torch of war. Finally he falls dead at the base of the "Black Rock." The slaves gather around him. The chorus sings, "Were You There When They Crucified My Lord?" "Shango," the Thunder God, again appears on the apex of the "Black Rock" and calls "Ethiopia" to life and duty. She rises, accompanied by her guardian angels and sprites of love, but this time with the glistening sword in one hand and the "Star of Ethiopia" shining brightly in the other. The chorus sings "Walk Together, Children," making a most effective scene. With a waive of her sword she summons Toussaint L'Ouverture and the Haytian soldiers to appear. The band plays the Haytian National Hymn. With the next wave of her sword she summons her sons to join the union armies and fight for freedom. This summons was responded to by the entire command, three hundred strong, of the First Separate Battalion, who, marching in to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," created the wildest enthusiasm.

The most exalted climax was reached, however, when the slaves, who had remained hovering around John Brown's prostrate form, picked it up and bore it away on their shoulders in triumph. The chorus and band began "John Brown's Body," etc., and immediately thousands were on their feet and joining in the singing. The effect was electrical, spiritual and every one in Washington who missed it missed something really great.

The last scene, "The Vision Everlasting," represents the period since the Civil War. Groups are seen at work in various trades. There are people in business. The leisure class appears, tennis players, foot ball and baseball teams, athletes, the professional class, ministers, physicians, professors, teachers, trained nurses, etc. Soon the band strikes up Will M. Cook's "Swing Along, Chillun," and a group of society dancers come trooping in. The chorus sings this tuneful selection and this group of dancers dance to the accompaniment of the singing, making a most beautiful and effective scene.

When all these different groups are quietly enjoying their freedom, each in his own way, they are continually and most viciously attacked by the "furies" of race prejudice, envy, gambling, idleness, intemperance and the ku klux, and all the forces that go to keep up back and pull us down. At first some of the groups give way, but others stand their ground. The "furies" try to seize the "Star." The freedmen appeal to "Ethiopio" with the sorrow song, "Nobody Knows the Trouble I See," who then calls forth her sons and daughters that dwell around the great rivers of the earth to come and build a "Tower of Light" upon which she will set the "Star of Freedom" so high that it will be forever safe. While they are assembling the chorus sings in a most effective manner Rosamond Johnson's "Southland," arranged especially for the Pageant.

First comes the yellow Mississippi who contributes the foundation stone "Knowledge"; next the Congo and her people place the stone "Labor." The Egyptians from the Nile set the stone "Science." The Mohammedans from the Niger set the stone "Justice." The blue Oronoco to the art-dance of one hundred Egyptian maidens dressed in pink and blue set the stone "Art." Above this in a magical way the capstone "Love" is added by [illegible] heavenly sprites. The tower reaches to high heaven and touches "The Star of Ethiopia." The mothers of the race do not yet quite understand; they make further appeal to Ethiopia. The chorus sings "The Rocks and Mountains Shall All Flee Away." Ethiopia then summons the children of the race. One hundred little girls dressed in white with red laced slippers, whose happy playful voices have been heard for sometime in the distance come trooping, skipping in full, full of joy and glee, each one carrying an electric torch: They play and dance and art-dance before the assemlbed thousands. "Ethiopia" then points to them and tells the mothers, "They are your hope and inspiration." The chorus and the audience then join in singing that stirring martial air:

Before I'd be a slave
I'll be buried in my grave,
And go home to my Father
And be free.

The Herald announces in a dramatic manner:

"The play is done, the play is done."

The Music for the Pageant.

If we except two selections from Verdi's "Aida" chosen for their distinctive Egyptian coloring, all the music for the Pageant was composed, arranged, played and sung by people of our race. Major Chas. A. Young, of the U. S. Army, stationed for some time in Liberia, contributed the "Prelude Primitive," the "Chant of the Savages," the "Song of the Faithful," "When Darkness Descends," "The African chant," and "The Welding Song." Themes and motifs from these productions frequently recur as the drama proceeds. "Bamboula," from West Africa, and "Take Nabauji," from East Africa. "The Imaginary Ballet" and "Motherless Child" are from Coleridge-Taylor. "Mr. Major" and "Lolotte" are Creole folk songs. "Swing Along" is by Will M. Clark. "Big Indian Chief" and Red Shawl by Cole and Johnson and Southland and Mr. Rosamond Johnson. The folk songs sung by the chorus are the property of all of us.

The problem for the band was an extremely difficult one. Motifs from the Major Young and Coleridge-Taylor music ran through the entire drama. The primitive African savage music of Major Young is most weird and peculiar. The rhythm is irregular and the score is full of unexpected intervals. Coleridge-Taylor never wrote any easy music. "Take Nabuji" and Bamboula" frequently recur. The dances taught and danced by Mrs. Norman are works of art. They require art music. There are frequent and unexpected changes of key and time. There are "art pauses." There is nothing regular, there is no monotony, no sameness about any of it. Almost every note stands out by itself and must be played accurately and absolutely on time. It is the opinion of those who know of the difficulty of the music that Mr. Hoffman's musicians acquitted themselves creditably, especialy the last night. The music of the Pageant made demands upon them altogether different from the syncopated jingling dance music which they are used to playing. His men need more encouragement to play this class of music.

The work of the chorus was beyond critcism. Prof. Tibbs had welded those 200 superb voices into an instrument of music that responded wonderfully to every motion of his baton. The singing of the chorus was one of the interesting features of a great spiritual occasion. The tone was always full, round and resonant, and was a continued delight to the thouands who had the good fortune to hear this chorus sing, as was frequently evidenced by rounds of applause.

Master of the Pageant, Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois.

Director of Dramatic Action, Mr. Chas. H. Burroughs.

Director of Dancing, Mrs. Dora Cole-Norman.

Mistress of the Robes, Mrs. Helen Noble Curtis.

Chief Marshall, Mrs. Laura B. Glenn.

Director of Publicity, Mr. Shelby J. Davidson.

Director of Music, Mr. J. Rosamond Johnson.

Assistant Director of Music, Mr. A. G. Dill.

Director of the Washington Chorus, Prof. Roy W. Tibbs.

Director of Scenery and Properties, Mr. Richard Brown.

The Actors.

Shango, the Thunder God, Mr. Wilkerson.

Ethiopia, Miss Eleanor Curtis.

Her Heavenly Sprites of Love, Eleanora Madden, the two little daughters of Dr. and Mrs. Lofton.

Her Guardian Angels, Miss Rosa Hershaw and Miss Julia Pride.

A Chief of the Kushites, Prof. Chas. H. Wesley.

His Sister, Miss Valerie Chase.

Candance, Queen of Ethiopia, Miss Georgia Fraser.

Queen of Sheba, Miss Adella Parks.

Priests, Mr. Morris Koonce, Mr. Louis Wellinger, Mr. Settler and others.

Slave Traders, Mr. William Washington and Mr. Delano Williams.

Ghosts of Slavery, "Furiers," etc., Leader, Mr. Arthur Hayes.

Osceola, Indian Chief, Mr. Herbert Marshall.

Nat Turner, Mr. Willis Menard.

John Brown, Mr. A. J. Beverly.

Sojourner Truth, Mrs. Carrie W. Clifford.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mrs. Terrell.

Abolitionists, Prof. Gregory, Mr. L. E. Dogans, Mr. Arthur Brent, Mr. John Washington, Mr. Savoy and others.

Toursant L'Ouverture, Mr. Morris B. McAden.

The Rivers were represented by the following young ladies:

The Yellow Mississippi, Miss Annie McCary.

The Black Niger, Miss Daisy Hamer.

The Blue Nile, Miss Obzene Mitchell.

The Red Congo, Miss Hope Lyons.

The Blue Oronoco, Miss Edith Lyons.

Leader of the Oronoco Art Dancers, Miss Florence Barker.

Leader of the Children Dancers, Miss Kathleen Hilyer.

Harvard Students, Athletes, Professional Men and Women, Slave Masters, Business Men, Mothers, Children, Dancers, Savages, Warriors, Priests, Slaves, Soldiers, Boy Scouts, etc., Laborers, Musicians. The Society Dancers under the leadership of Mr. Bismarch Pinchback, were as follows:

Miss Ethel Evans, Mr. Frank Jones, Mrs. A. F. Shaw, Mr. Herbert Kenney, Miss Sois A. Hall, Mr. Sheridan Jones, Jr., Miss Margaret Wilson, Mr. Theopolis Houston, Miss Consuello Johnson, Mr. Clarence Holmes, Mr. Bismarch Pinchback, Mrs. Charles Curry, Miss Blanche Coleman, Mr. A. F. Shaw, Miss Jennie Cornell, Mr. Patten.

The full command of the First Separate Battalion, with fife and drum corps, marched upon the field at a moment of great dramatic interest and received a ovation. They were led by Major James E. Walker, commanding, and Captains Davis and Epps and Ridglet and Lieuts. Patterson and Newman. They gave a fine exhibition of drilling, formed in battle array and charged the enemy over the hills out of sight of the audience. Later they formed an imposing back

Beginning with the prehistoric ages and ending with a prophecy of a future of happiness, peace, progress and prosperity, "The Star of Ethiopia," presented at the American League Ball Park last evening, under the auspices of the Horizon Guild of New York, held the attention of several thousand persons until a late hour. With symbolic music and dances, and a brilliant display of costumes, the history of the Negro race was presented in such manner as to bring forth frequent and hearty applause.

As in other first-night productions, there were places where long waits were necessitated. But these, it is expected, will be eliminated in the performances to be given tomorrow evening and Friday.

Large searchlights were used to illuminate the actors and actresses. The size of the ballfield enabled them to move about with a freedom which added greatly to the realism of the pageant. Even with the large size of the erstwhile stage taken into consideration, the 1,000 or more participants were sufficient to give a vivid impression of savage hordes swarming into Egypt, or of the Union armies sweeping into the South and liberating the slaves.—Evening Star, Washington, D. C.

From White Citizens of Washington

I thoroughly enjoyed the presentation of the Pageant at the American League Park in this city on the night of October 15th. The Pageant seemed to be excellently well brought out, emphasizing the great periods in the development of a race. It was a remarkable spectacle of great educational value. The music was delightful and soul-stirring, and yet all the varied individual features blended in a harmonious whole which made the entire performance one well worth seeing, valuable in an historical and educational way as well as affording a delightful evening's entertainment. Its repetition could not fail to be of great value throughout the entire country.

Very truly yours,

HENRY P. BLAIR,
President of the Board of Education,
District of Columbia.

While it was not possible for me to see the performance from the beginning I witnessed enough to get the trend of it. I found it a very interesting spectacle and one that was well and effectively presented. It had an educational value for both the audience and those who took part in it.

Very truly yours,

E. L. THURSTON,
Superintendent of Schools, District of Columbia.

I attended the Pageant given in Washington the week of October 10th and was greatly impressed with its dramatic power as a whole and with the beauty and significance of many of its features. In my judgment, its possibilities as a means of stimulating hope and faith in the progress of the Negro race, cannot be overestimated.

The response of different ones who attended the Pageant may interest you. Among those who viewed it in a spirit of friendly criticism, I heard some objections as to its historical accuracy and to its intellectual rather than emotional appeal; but all agreed that considering the time it was possible for those who took part to give to preparation, the result was wonderful.

From the colored people of every occupation I have heard most enthusiastic and heartfelt expressions of joy, appreciation and uplift.

You certainly have rendered a great service in the creation and production of this remarkable Pageant, covering a field and conveying a message of such timely and extraordinary importance to the American people.

Very truly yours,

BELLE C. LAFOLLETTE,
(Mrs. Robert M. LaFollette.)

I was profoundly impressed with the pageant both for its dramatic qualities and as an educational force. I can answer also for Mrs. Post, who is a much better judge of such matters in both aspects. She, also, was present on the first night and her favorable comments with reference alike to the exhibition and to its educational possibilities, were very pronounced. I am sorry the newspapers here could not have realized the character of this pageant sufficiently to regard it as important news. We must remember, however, that the newspapers of the period of Lincoln's Gettysburg address did not realize its news importance.

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary U. S. Department of Labor.

This Pageant as an educator particularly appealed to me. So many pages of history visualized; the throes and heroic struggles of a race visualized—certainly should and did make a marvellous appeal to the heart, and I feel sure that lessons deep and lasting were engraved upon the memory tablets of many minds. The education one receives while witnessing this Pageant for just one evening is simply invaluable, and doubtless the attendance of those who are afflicted with prejudice would result in a change of heart, and they would wish to contribute a constructive effort toward the further upliftment of the race rather than to do one thing to retard its progress.

There is no such thing as "race problem" or "the problem of the color line" to one who understands that "capacity attracts" and as we follow the various stages of development as portrayed in your Pageant,—one is fully convinced that the "colored people" are endowed with great capacity, and that the color of the skin plays no part whatever in the moral, intellectual and spiritual development of a people.

Very sincerely,

MARIAM HANEY.

The fact that gratitude is uppermost in my mind will give you an idea of my opinion. I can hardly think of any way in which more of beauty and inspiration and information could have been brought to us. Your claim that it has educational value is certainly well founded. I heard several people speak of the fact that the school children in the audience seemed to understand the meaning of all of the episodes and to be helping their parents to understand them.

The good that you brought to the schools might easily, of course, have been counteracted by long-drawn-out rehearsals. In this respect you certainly seem to have struck the happy medium. The children got a lot out of it, and yet their regular school work was not interrupted.

I have said often to other people that it was one of the most beautiful things of the kind I had ever seen, and the most beautiful I had ever seen in Washington. The only criticisms I heard were in reference to the blindness of the symbolism in some of the episodes and of the lack of explanatory literature. These are, of course, matters of relatively little importance as compared with the great value of the pageant as a whole.

CAROLINE L. HUNT,
U. S. Department of Agriculture.

COPY

I witnessed a presentation of the Pageant, "The Star of Ethiopia," recently staged in Washington. As a spectacle I found it replete with interest and delightful surprises, though a bit too slow between parts to support the interest of the average American who in this age of speed and superficial study must have all things move before the eye with kaleidscopic regularity. I consider the "Star of Ethiopia" a remarkably clear and impressive presentation of the history of the colored people, free from immodesty and gaudiness, and a credit to any race capable of its conception and presentation.

As a means of social uplift there can be little question but that pageantry wherever it is employed heightens self-respect, enhances endeavor in the direction of higher ideals and attainment and develops national and individual confidence. In Wales, for example, where pageantry is common, the effect has been one of undoubted value in raising an earnest, intelligent people from a condition of ignorance and lack of confidence in themselves to one of enlightenment, of high accomplishment and strong national feeling founded on the fact that by degrees the Welsh people have, to use the words of Dr. Washington, "Learned to do some common things in an uncommon manner." Just how much of this is traceable to pageantry I cannot say, but there can be no doubt but that inspphisticated, natural peoples respond wholesomely to the influence of concerted effort of this kind. And I believe that this is particularly true of the colored people who are naturally capable, but who have for silly reasons been discouraged from making efforts in the direction of self-advancement

H. B. Humphrey
Washington, D. C.

I was much pleased with it both as a beautiful spectacle and as a means of awakening the pride of the colored people in their race.

W. E. Safford
Washington, D. C.

A NOTABLE NEGRO PAGEANT

Dr. DuBois, eminent publicist, editor of the CRISIS, author of SOULS OF BLACK FOLK, has dramatized the story of the Negro race in the form of a historic and symbolic pageant.

Three performances were given in Washingtin the week of October 10th, in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, abolishing slavery. *********

In Washington the Pageant was given at the Baseball Park, which has a seating capacity of 20,000. The field was too large for the best effect; the hundreds of participants had only three weeks for preparation and, of course, only limited opportunity for rehearsals. There were - there always are - some delays and breaks in the performance, but considering all the circumstances, the result was wonderfully fine. The coloreffect of the costuming was beautiful and many features were most picturesque. The dancing of the children, the cotton pickers' scene, the military parade were especially thrilling. Throughout the production, the natural physical grace and ease of the colored race was notable.

From white friends, I heard some criticism as to the historical aspect of the Pageant and as to its intellectual rather than emotional appeal, yet all agreed it had power of entertainment and great educational possibilities. From the colored people of whatever occupation or opportunity, I heard only the most enthusiastic expressions of joy, appreciation and uplift.

WITHOUT any shadow of doubt, the spirit and effect of this Folk Drama is not to incite race feeling but to allay it and its production throughout the United States wherever there are considerable centers of Negro population must be good for both races and should have the support of all persons of social vision. The colored people constitute one-tenth of our population. Any movement that tends, as this one does, to enlighten the masses and raise the standards of individual and racial Negro self-development is a contribution to our national life and is entitled to encouragement from every viewpoint.

Dr. DuBois has rendered a distinct service in the creation and production of this remarkable pageant covering a field and conveying a message of such timely and extraordinary importance to the American people.

From La Follette's Magazine

November, 1915

I assure you that we were glad of the opportunity to render service to a work of such magnitude and educational worth.

W. H. J. Beckett,
Executive Secretary, Colored Y.M.C.A.

It was really a wonderful production. Men and women of color in Washington have greater pride in race as a result of the Pageant.

Very respectfully,

G. C. Wilkinson,
Principal, Armstrong Manual Training School.

From Colored Citizens

It gives me great pleasure to place this note before the officers of the schools, all of whom were most happy to cooperate as best they could in the preparations for the Pageant, and all of whom were made happy and proud by its notable success.

Roscoe C. Bruce.
Asst. Supt. Public Schools, D.C.

I want to extend to you my hearty and sincere congratulations for the successful presentation of "The Star of Ethiopia." You have indeed and in fact answered the slander upon the Negro race, by the infamous "Birth of a Nation" in which the Negro is so basely degraded.

Wm. Calvin Chase.

The greatness and splendor of the Pageant still lingers with me.

J. Rosamond Johnson.

Not only entertaining but instructive.

A. Walters,
Bishop of the A. M. E. Zion Church.

I cannot let pass the great spiritual occasion which the Pageant "The Star of Ethiopia" has brought to us in Washington without expressing to you my very great appreciation and thanks. It is at once intensely interesting, instructive and inspiring and has given us here a great spiritual awakening. All colored Washington and thousands of white people are thinking and talking about "The Pageant." I feel that this community owes you a lasting debt of gratitude for bringing to us such a delightful and uplifting experience and earnestly hope the people in other cities will readily give you the cooperation necessary to make it the great success it was here.

There is a great demand that it be repeated in Washington at an early date.

Andrew F. Hilyer.

C O P Y

All the Grimke's were enthusiastic over the Pageant. We were delighted with the scenes - with the scope and splendor of the pictorial drama. It has undoubtedly high educational and entertainment value.

I called you onthe 'phone the morning after we saw it to extend our congratulations but you were out of town.

Archibald H. Grimke,
Washington, D. C.

My opinion of the Pageant is that it is the greatest single thing done for many years in the interest of the upbuilding of the colored people. My great regret is that the whole thing could not have been put into moving picture form as well as in the form of pageantry on the field. But few people will ever see it because of its magnitude and the lack of funds necessary for its transportation; if it were only in photo-play form, millions would see it.

The whole thing is calculated to engender pride both in individuals and in race consciousness, and the lack of this pride is one of the greatest obstacles to the betterment of the colored people.

I would not presume to tell you to study this proposition intimated by me, for you know better your trials, struggles, and difficulties in the matter; but I crave your indulgence when I say that it would be well to have the Pageant in photo-play form with whatever new episodes you would introduce for the special purpose of educating the public, where it could follow the "Birth of a Nation" and "dog" its steps through the land.

I have not words through which to express my high appreciation of the Pageant and my thanks to you.

Geo. Wm. Cook,
Washington, D. C.

THE COST OF THE PAGEANT

Costumes and Properties	$ 850
Salaries	800
Lighting of grounds	675
Rent of grounds	600
Printing and Advertising	550
Labor	300
Music	250
Preliminary preparation	250
Miscellaneous	128
TOTAL	$ 4403

The Local Association raised and advanced the sum of $744.50. This was returned to them from the gate receipts.

The gate receipts were:

Monday, Oct. 11	$ 580.05
" 13	881.25
" 15	1715.05
TOTAL	$ 3176.35

Total cost of Pageant	$4402.77
Total receipts	3176.35
Deficit	$1226.42
Value of costumes and properties on hand -	700.00
Net deficit to be made up	$ 526.42

PLAYS

PLAYTHINGS OF THE NIGHT

1931
Table of contents, foreword, an essay on the American Negro theater prepared for a proposed book of Du Bois' plays

Playthings of the Night

An Essay Toward an American Negro Drama

by

W. E. Burghardt DuBois

33-6-86

33-6-87

CONTENTS

Seven Up.	A Tragedy in 3 Acts.
Black Hercules at the Forks of the Road.	A Morality Play in 5 Scenes.
The All Mother.	A Play and Pageant, with Prelude, 4 Scenes, a Vision and Postlude
Black Man.	A Fantasy in 10 Scenes.
Christ on the Andes.	A Play in 3 Acts.

41-6-223

Foreword

Written at divers times and in sundry places, these illegitimate children of my thought and pen have often in past time clamored for publication and recognition but as often failed of my consent. Not that I am so much ashamed of them as uncertain. At times they appear before me glorified with dream and promise. At other times their clay is grossly common when compared with the possibilities of their themes—the Truth and Beauty of their Theme. So now in a moment of weakness—or is it Strength?—I send them forth acknowledged and blessed, songs of my soul and fruit of my hard effort, playthings of a dark and beautiful night.

W. E. B. Du Bois.

New York
May, 1931.

41-9-274

CONTENTS

The All Mother.	A Play and Pageant, with Prelude, 4 Scenes, a Vision and Postlude.
Seven Up.	A Tragedy in 3 Acts.
Black Hercules at the Forks of the Road.	A Morality Play in 5 Scenes.
Black Man.	A Fantasy in 10 Scenes.
Christ on the Andes.	A Play in 3 Acts.

Book

1931

PLAYTHINGS OF THE NIGHT

An Essay Toward An American Negro Drama

by

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

43-6-313

A FOREWARD.

1. BESIDE THE STILL WATERS.

This is peculiarly the time to say a word of the relationship between the theatre and the American Negro. The stage still retains among us something of freedom and the forward gaze. Behind the footlights one is permitted to examine and discuss Truth under circumstances where literature is stifled, painting inarticulate, sculpture choked of convention, architecture drowned in waves of monstrosity and music fettered by death.

But this continuing freedom of dramatic art is due to no courage of managers nor merit of dramatists, and is threatened not only by the well recognized fatty degeneration of musical comedy, but by that secret, internal and devastating malady which attacks an art which is free to treat the truth, and yet afraid to look it fair in the face. This is the present attitude of the American theatre as it faces the Negro.

41-6-232

The stranger from the stars bursting in upon earth today would, without shadow of a doubt or moment of hesitancy, fasten upon the plight of the black man in America as the most dramatic stuff of the modern world. Conceive this harsh and heavy thrust of dark and primitive peoples, out of the soft green and gold and clan tradition of the tropics, into the anarchy of the Reformation and French Revolution and the puritanism of Victoria! For centuries fish fed on flesh across the whole Atlantic. The isles of the Caribbean shrieked to Boston and New Orleans; black slavery swept the valley of the Mississippi and fought white labor on Rockies and Appalachians.

Nothing escaped it—neither religion nor philosophy, literature nor art, science nor government. Across a continent, across a world, the horror and tragedy and farce of this stupendous drama flew, and beside it men and women danced, and above it rolled a never-to-be forgotten song.

The souls of stricken millions descended into Hell and the third century arose again from the dead—with what blood and prickling pain—with such exquisite horror of hurt, as humanity has seldom known.

Every known element of human drama, every device of theatrical effect was here—the crucifixion of motherhood, the murder of children, the rape of homes; piteous debasement and nameless exaltation of the spirit of man. There was lacking no impudence of wealth nor depths of uttermost pits of poverty. There was the sting of whips, the fangs of dogs, the laughter of power, the refinement of cruelty and the sobbing abasement of the lowest of the low—dragged slowly and bitterly and relentlessly out over endless years. This is the thing that today America makes merry over. It is our major amusement. It is material for clowns and braying asses. It is our national and perennial joke.

41-6-233

Yet for four hundred years of the warp and woof of this land's history, the black and crimson thread of Africa has dominated every pattern, and not the double tongues of all the Dunnings and Charles Beards shall alter the red record of one jot of it.

Before this mightiest of human dramas, save here and there a lucid interval, the American theatre has sat distraught, dumb and stupid, with a vacant grin on its face: afraid of the truth, cowed by the tragedy, aghast at the very intricacy and endless implications of the plots. American playwrights have strained their inwards to submerge this drama into farce: to turn the piteous tragedy of the Negro into cheap pornographic bathos; to paint this all too human life into a degenerate reflection of their own sadistic desires. Until today on stage and in literature, in painting, in all art, save alone in music, the souls of black folk have been submerged in fetid filth and white pimps who finance and exploit black prostitutes in "Nigger Heaven" have quite concealed the blazing Hell beneath; and persuaded a complacent world that Harlem has no light of common day; that underneath our sale of laughter lie no pools of bitter tears.

Not only has the American theatre refused to face the drama of the Negro problem, but it has opposed every effort of the Negro himself to find dramatic expression on the stage. It is not enough, in this great and free commonwealth of the spirit of man, that most training schools of drama and art are closed to black folk; it is not enough that in the annual nationwide radio audition no voice of an angel in a black skin may be heard; it is not enough that the American schools at Fontainbleau, supported by the leaders in American painting, sculpture and architecture, have sought to extend the American color line across France—all this perhaps must be tolerated and even awaited in arts dominated by money, by the private profit ideal and by cheap and smug convention. But in the freer air of the drama, despite its all too evident pandering to monopoly and the intellectual mob, it is astonishing to realize the fight which the black actor has had to gain the merest shadow of foothold on Broadway. No one is child enough to believe that a black skin makes an actor, or that the suffering of a people creates of itself the delicate art to portray it. But when the artist does appear, proven and clear, it is almost unbelievable that his fellow white artists would so long and so persistently deny him full recognition.

41-6-234

When Europe of the early 19th Century recognized the great Jewess, Rachel, and the great Negro, Aldridge, as the two outstanding leaders of the stage, whom governments and science and art delighted to honor, that black man could not put foot on a single legitimate stage in the land of his birth. But even after slavery, and from 1870 down nearly to our day, the Negro actor could appear at Court only as the king's fool, with cap and bells, with quip and joke, ready over his own heartbreak to guffaw lustily and dance fantastically for the massed amusement of morons. Even when the unchangeable logic of a particular plot demanded black characters, up until yesterday, even these parts must be taken by white folk with blackened faces, unknown dialect and an unusually dumb mental equipment. This nonsense in time went beyond the limit of New York complacency and today not even burnt cork could save a miserable play, although supported by the bad acting of the royal family.

41-6-235

This hesitancy of our freest form of art really to be free; this refusal of managers, playwrights and players to use normally and intelligently, the abundant stuff of dramatic material and the not infrequent genius in acting which a nation within a nation furnishes—a black nation greater than Ireland, Belgium, Austria or Portugal—a nation equal in numbers to Egypt, Persia, Czechoslovakia and all Scandinavia—this studied neglect of the most dramatic material in America, has already reacted and will react on the theatre in the United States. A freedom unused is perverted or lost. If the stage dare not frankly and fully portray the Negro problem because of fear and snobbery—because of a provincial mentality born of the slave oligarchy, spawned south of the Mason and Dixon line and transplanted to the congenial concrete sidewalks of New York—the American theatre will find itself with all the greater ease and easier logic denied the right to discuss sex and war, socialism and Russia, liquor and wealth, and anything which at any time an entrenched autocracy or a prurient puritanism or a Nordic impudence may guard with the shackles of censorship.

The abiding refuge of our optimism is the slow growth of normal dramatic instinct among us even anent the Negro; the slow expansion of a national receptive audience unafraid of racial problems. Today you and I know full well and of a certainty what any average American audience expects when Negro actors appear in a Negro play. They expect amusement; they expect slap-stick and broad farce; they expect filth. They lick dry lips, for "The Green Pastures" of their imagination would be gaudy with food and fun, and of the Still Waters beneath they reck nothing.

To Broadway the Negro is still not an actor, he is a vaudeville turn. True it was that Charles Gilpin, by the tragedy of his own damnation had, with dying flair of genius and clairvoyance of O'Neill, forced the Negro defeatist psychology partially across the footlights. Half willingly thereafter, Broadway endured patronizingly Robeson and Rose McClendon for limited periods and with the clearly expressed proviso, that the author engage in the climax to kill the black hero, or destroy him or rend his soul from his body. Then the white audience could depart secure in the knowledge that all Negro aspiration and effort, by the very constitution of the universe, must ever end in annihilation and defeat, frustration and death.

41-6-236

But this climax would not suit "The Green Pastures". Even on the American stage, God must be reasonably successful; and Richard Harrison almost as a last resort was offered the opportunity to try this role.

What he accomplished, the nation knows. By the breadth of a hair and half-turn of a phrase—by a gesture and a silence, he guided a genial comedy into a great and human drama.

What audiences and authors have already unleashed and unbound in the souls of great actors—what you have freed and unfettered in man and a race, is but earnest of what actors you may see and what drama you may evoke, if instead of hiding your heads in the sand and scurrying abroad to borrow for the American stage the second-hand situations of Paris and Vienna, you open purblind eyes and glance about you.

I am publishing this play, therefore, as a feeble protest against the neglect of fine dramatic material; against the American throttling of the Art of beauty, against this enchaining of the human spirit—against, to be sure, its cruelty and pain,—but even more, against its crass stupidity.

41-6-237

32-8-11a

(1) dramatic instinct among us even among the Negro; the alert of a national receptive audience unafraid of racial problems today you and I know full well and of a certainty what any average American audience expects when Negro actors appear in a Negro play. They expect amusement; they expect slap-stick and broad farce; they expect filth. They lick dry lips, for "The Green Pastures" of their imagination would be gaudy with food and fun, and of the Still Waters beneath they reck nothing.

To Broadway the Negro is still not an actor, he is a vaudeville turn. True it was that Charles Gilpin, by the tragedy of his own damnation had, with dying flair of genius and clairvoyance of O'Neill, forced the Negro defeatist psychology partially across the footlights. Half willingly thereafter, Broadway endured patronizingly Robeson and Rose McClendon for limited periods and with the clearly expressed proviso, that the author engage in the climax to kill the black hero, or destroy him or rend his soul from his body. Then the white audience could depart secure in the knowledge that all Negro aspiration and effort, by the very constitution of the universe, must ever end in annihilation and defeat, frustration and death.

But this climax would not suit "The Green Pastures". Even on the American stage, God must be reasonably successful; and Richard Harrison almost as a last resort was offered the opportunity to try this role.

What he accomplished, the nation knows. By the breadth of a hair and half-turn of a phrase—by a gesture and a silence, he guided a genial comedy into a great and human drama.

What audiences and authors have already unleashed and unbound in the souls of great actors—what they have freed and unfettered in a few men and a race, is but earnest of what actors we may see and what drama ~~you~~ we may evoke, if instead of hiding our heads in the sand and scurrying abroad to borrow for the American stage the second-hand situations of Paris and Vienna, ~~you~~ we open purblind eyes and glance about ~~you~~ us.

I am publishing ~~this~~ these plays, therefore, as a feeble protest against the neglect of fine dramatic material; against the American throttling of the Art of beauty, against this enchaining of the human spirit—against, to be sure, its cruelty and pain,—but even more, against its crass stupidity.

41-6-363

2. NEGRO TABUS IN THE AMERICAN THEATRE.

Let us turn now and consider more specifically the things that must not be said or done on the American stage when it comes to the subject of the Negro. In general, as I have said before, the Negro-American drama must not be:

1. Defeatist. It must not intimate that the problem of the black man in America can be successfully solved except by physicial death or spiritual surrender. One sees this in Green's "Abraham Bosum" and O'Neill's "Emperor Jones".

33-6-88

2. The characters of the drama must not all similate ordinary intelligent people. They must be outre, bizarre, belonging to a lower and largely unknown world. This is illustrated in "Porgy", and in many of the Negro musical comedies.

3. There must take place no interracial marriage, or if it does take place, it must be regarded as a tragedy to those ignorant of dissemblation, and there can be but one ending, suicide or disappearance. This is illustrated by Du Bose Heywood's "Brass Ankles" and Sheldon's "Nigger".

4. There must be no interracial love or love-making, except the abject and growing devotion of a servant to a white master, or the patronizing help of a white person for a colored person.

5. Even love-making among Negroes themselves must not be emphasized, except in caricature or farce. A Negro self-drama in which the hero and heroine marry and live happy ever after in contentment because thus they acknowledge that they could be successful and happy in this country.

6. The only colored woman portrayed upon the stage must be black mammies, prostitutes, or old and faithful servants.

7. Negro ambition may be illustrated and alluded to but it must in the end meet frustration and there must be no note of vengeance or retialiation except it meet quick and decided rebuff. Of course ambition may be illustrated if it is fantastic and funny.

8. Mulattoes, especially, must be portrayed in only two ways, as irredeemable criminals or as misanthropes, thoroughly dissatisfied with themselves or carrying on a "war between the races" in their own souls.

9. The pathetic and age-old prostitute must, if called, be made bestial and ignorant. There must be no intimation of temptation and betrayal or inner or original beauty and wommanhood.

10. The note of revelation must come from the climax and the . There must not be deliberation or sacrificial. One might with ease name numbers of other situations or plots that are tabu.

In general, the Negro on the stage must be cringing, criminal, pathetic or farcical, and these tabus or immoveable folk p distort and d through drama, thr ugh revelation of millions of human souls. Yet they are strong, almost immoveable and if transgressed it is regarded as deliberate propaganda on the part of the Negro, instead of it being recognized that the propaganda comes from those who set and maintain the tabus. The result is a widespread fiction of Harlem . A fiction that has gone around the world. A maintainance of certain sadistic tendencies throughout black and white Europe. It is for this reason that I have attempted at various times and under various conditions these plays. They have in no case been written deliberately to break or affront the tabu, but having been written under the urge to portray a certain situation . I have found that in all cases they have trangressed some of these tabus. The first play, for instance, Seven Up, takes up the matter of interracial love and leads to tragedy but not to defeatism. The second play is one of 33-6-89

Negro leadership but a leadership of ideas and not of race. Yet it breaks that tabu which refuses its leadership to Negroes because of race.

33-6-90

2. NEGRO TABUS IN THE AMERICAN THEATRE.

Let us turn now and consider more specifically the things that by custom must not be said or done on the American stage when it comes to the subject of the Negro.

1. Negro-American drama must be defeatist. It must not intimate that the problem of the black man in America can be successfully solved except by physical death or spiritual surrender. One sees this in Green's "Abraham's Bosom" and O'Neill's "Emperor Jones".

2. The characters of the drama must not simulate ordinary intelligent people. They must be outré, bizarre, belonging to a lower and largely unknown world. This is illustrated in "Porgy", and in many of the Negro musical comedies.

3. Interracial love or marriage must not be recognized. If marriage does take place, it must be regarded as a tragedy due to ignorance or deception, and there can be but one ending, suicide or disappearance. This is illustrated by Du Bose Heywood's "Brass Ankles" and Sheldon's "Nigger". Even personal devotion and friendship must be limited to the abject and grovelling devotion of a servant to a white master, or the patronizing help of a white person for a Negro.

4. Even love-making among Negroes themselves must not be emphasized, except in caricature or farce. A Negro drama in which the hero and heroine marry and "live happy ever after" is inadmissable since it acknowledges that Negroes might be successful and happy in this country.

5. The only colored women portrayed upon the stage must be black mammies, prostitutes, or old and faithful servants.

6. Negro ambition may be illustrated and alluded to but it must in the end meet frustration or pathetic failure, and there must be no note of retaliation except it meet quick and decided rebuff. Of course ambition may be illustrated if it is fantastic and funny.

7. Mulattoes, especially, must be portrayed in two ways only: as irredeemable criminals or as misanthropes, thoroughly dissatisfied with themselves or carrying on a "war between the races" in their own souls.

8. The pathetic and age-old prostitute must, if colored, be made bestial and ignorant. There must be no intimation of temptation and betrayal or of inner or original beauty and lost womanhood.

9. The note of revenge must come from the criminal and the crazy; it must never be deliberate or sacrificial.

41-6-203

There are some exceptions to these generalizations, some signs of change. The dramas of Ridgeley Torrance almost excuse these tabues. Lew Leslie's newer Negro comedies are reaching up out of the conventional, but they are regularly criticized for so doing. In general then, it is still true that the Negro on the stage must be cringing, criminal, pathetic or farcical, and these tabus or immovable folk patterns distort and distort true drama and the revelation of millions of human souls. Yet they are strong tabus, almost immovable and if transgressed it is regarded as deliber te propaganda on the part of the Negro, instead of it being recognized that the propaganda comes from those who set and maintain the tabus.

The result is a widespread untruth concerning the Negro. There is for instance, the fiction of Harlem that has gone around the world. The [illegible]olatering and emphasis of certain sadistic tendencies throughout black and white America. It is for this reason that I have attempted at various times and under various conditions these plays. They have in no case been written deliberately to break or affront the tabu, but having been written under the urge to portray a certain situation. I have found that in all cases they have transgressed some of these tabus. I send them out therefore not because of the tabu, but despite it maintaining my right as an artist to deal with life as I see it despite the powerful and pervasive Thou Shalt Not.

41-6-201

Naturally, and in the end these tabus are futile, for they are pounding at the closed doors of Beauty and Truth. My plays are true in fact and spirit, and what they lack in beauty is the fault of the author and not the thief. Gotthen little playthings of a dark and beautiful night, to all who dare the Tabu.

2. NEGRO TABUS IN THE AMERICAN THEATRE.

Let us turn now and consider more specifically the things that by custom must not be said or done on the American stage when it comes to the subject of the Negro.

1. Negro-American drama must be defeatist. It must not intimate that the problem of the black man in America can be successfully solved except by physical death or spiritual surrender. One sees this in Green's "Abraham's Bosom" and O'Neill's "Emperor Jones".

2. The characters of the drama must not simulate ordinary intelligent people. They must be outre, bizarre, belonging to a lower and largely unknown world. This is illustrated in "Porgy", and in many of the Negro musical comedies.

3. Interracial love or marriage must not be recognized. If marriage does take place, it must be regarded as a tragedy due to ignorance or deception, and there can be but one ending, suicide or disappearance. This is illustrated by Du Bose Heywood's "Brass Ankles" and Sheldon's "Nigger". Even personal devotion and friendship must be limited to the abject and grovelling devotion of a servant to a white master, or the patronizing help of a white person for a Negro.

4. Even love-making among Negroes themselves must not be emphasized, except in caricature or farce. A Negro drama in which the hero and heroine marry and "live happy ever after" is inadmissable since it acknowledges that Negroes might be successful and happy in this country.

5. The only colored women portrayed upon the stage must be black mammies, prostitutes, or old and faithful servants.

41-6-231

6. Negro ambition may be illustrated and alluded to but it must in the end meet frustration or pathetic failure, and there must be no note of retaliation except it meet quick and decided rebuff. Of course ambition may be illustrated if it is fantastic and funny.

7. Mulattoes, especially, must be portrayed in two ways only: as irredeemable criminals or as misanthropes, thoroughly dissatisfied with themselves or carrying on a "war between the races" in their own souls.

8. The pathetic and age-old prostitute must, if colored, be made bestial and ignorant. There must be no intimation of temptation and betrayal or of inner or original beauty and lost womanhood.

9. The ~~note~~ naked of revenge must come from the criminal and the crazy; it must never be deliberate or sacrificial.

There are some exceptions to these generalizations, some signs of change. The dramas of Ridgeley Torrance almost ~~excuse~~ escape these tabus. Lew Leslie's newer Negro comedies are reaching up out of the conventional, but they are regularly criticized for so doing. In general then, it is still true that the Negro on the stage must be cringing, criminal, pathetic or farcical, and these tabus or immovable folk patterns distort and divert true drama and the revelation of millions of human souls. Yet they are strong tabus, almost immovable and if transgressed it is regarded as deliberate propaganda on the part of the Negro, instead of it being recognized that the propaganda comes from those who set and maintain the tabus.

~~The result is a widespread untruth~~ concerning the ~~Negro. These~~ Negro theatre

32-8-116

(2) is for instance, the fiction of Harlem that has gone around the world; the bolstering and emphasis of certain sadistic tendencies throughout black and white America. It is for this reason that I have attempted at various times and under various conditions these plays. They have in no case been written deliberately to break or affront the tabu; but having been written under the urge to portray a certain situation, I have found that in all cases they have transgressed some of these tabus. I send them out therefore not because of the tabu, but despite it, maintaining my right as an artist to deal with life as I see it, despite the powerful and pervasive Thou Shalt Not.

(6)

Naturally, and in the end these tabus will be futile, for they are pounding at the closed doors of Beauty and Truth. My plays are true in fact and spirit; what they lack in beauty is the fault of the author and not of the theme. Go then little playthings of a dark and beautiful night, and give joy to all who dare the Tabu.

32-8-12

41-6-194

From Miss Randolph

SEVEN-UP

Draft manuscripts and "The Tabu of Seven-Up," an introduction to the play

C

THE TABU OF SEVEN-UP

White America wishes to discourage the intermingling of Negro blood with white. Nevertheless, in the past a fast amount of miscegenation has taken place. Despite this, Americans think it best to pretend that all cases of such intermingling, ~~members of~~ are matters of the lowest and most primitive sorts of contact—prostitutes, lasciviousness, lack of moral sense. They do not wish to recognize any basis of love or mutual attraction. They pile the blame of all mixture of blood on the colored woman as the willing victim, or procuress. The white man is always portrayed as the pursued, as trying vainly to escape. The colored woman is seldom beautiful, never modest ~~or~~ nor chaste. She is never the victim of circumstance, ~~and~~ nor of Cowardly and ~~lascivious~~ lustful men. And when she falls beneath the crushing blow of fate, she must not complain, and neither should those who love and seek to defend her ~~must~~ think of retaliation or revenge. They must yield to the supreme destiny of the white man.

41-6-376

Into the face of all this, "Seven-Up" deliberately ~~fights~~ flies and flouts the Tabu as silly, untrue, and unnecessarily ugly; in thousands of cases and for hundreds of years, colored and white folk in this land have loved one another devotedly as parents and ~~friends~~ children, brothers and sisters, sweethearts and wives. Whether or not this was best is doubted, but to deny the fact is deliberately to lie. Here then is ample field for painters, novelists and dramatists, and I attempt it, not as one best fitted, but as one with the necessary courage. "Seven-up" is the story of a small town in Georgia and it studies an incident in the lives of two white families, one which has recently acquired wealth ~~in the new industries~~ in the new industrial development, but feels the depression; and the other which ~~has~~ represents a sinking of the older aristocracy. Into the lives of these two families comes a pretty little colored servant girl whom the son of one family has wooed, and the son of the other seeks to gain by force. A murder ensues, and the girl is sacrificed,-- sacrificed to love, to fear, to convention, to race price. Her only defender is a poor black boy who had loved her too, and who gives himself vainly to save her.

As a play this is mechanically simple and true to a thousand facts, but can it be staged, dare it be staged? Imagine George kissing Celia publicly, on Broadway!

41-6-377

W. E. B. Du Bois - Address

June 1 - 15 - Atlanta University
Atlanta, Georgia

June 15 - September 15 - 35 West 110th St.
New York City

After September 15 - Atlanta University
Atlanta, Georgia

SEVEN-UP

A PLAY IN THREE ACTS

by

W. E. B. DU BOIS

THE TIME,

1930 - SPRINGTIME

THE PLACE

A Town in Georgia

The Persons in the Drama -

As They Appear.

1. CELIA - a serving maid, curled, pretty and colored.
2. MRS CARRINGTON GWATHMEY - a widow of the newly rich, but poor again.
3. GEORGE GWATHMEY, - her son and hope.
4. JIM - the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.
5. SID LYONS - a neighbor's son, white and poor but of high lineage.
6. THE SHERIFF of the County.
7. THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

Convicts and a mob.

THE FIRST ACT

A Man is Killed

(The scene lies within a little cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate, pretentious but out of repair. Beyond a green and nodding garden, looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey, ~~widow of a local mill owner,~~ presides ~~with daughters and a son.~~ Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes out the music is just dying away.

~~The curtain discovers~~ Celia, looking eagerly out the window, towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing facing the front window, ~~her back to the audience.~~ To her left ~~is~~ a door; ~~forward on the stage~~ to the right ~~is~~ a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings. The St Louis Blues

~~CELIA — Hallelujah, Hallelujah! We will shoo the~~

Out of the window a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters.

CELIA - Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

Mrs. G. - Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

Celia - Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they's mighty near done.

Mrs. G. - Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA - There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. - Celia--Oh,--Ma!

Mrs. G. - Why, George! (George is evidently at a loss, but Celia's wit brings rescue.)

CELIA - (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I'se got the handkerchiefs done.

Mrs. G. - (Recovering) Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full- - the top drawer to the left--

G. G. - Yes? Why-- I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and Ma, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the D. A. R. delegates--that is, Sid, said so and left a note at the house.

Mrs. G. - The hussy! Why, George, you know it's just a public reception. And why couldn't old Mrs. Lyons call herself if she wanted me! I've called on her. D. A. R. -----the idea! I've got as much right to join as most of them.

G. G. - Sure! Pa said we'd been over-seers and squatters on many a Georgia plantation--

Mrs. G. - George! How can
I'm not going.
than we are no m

GG. - --O, I knew you in here, and I t
course, I made e

Mrs. G. - --It wasn't nece clothes up since
to the circus.
poised on her he George's handker can't understand George. (Celia

Celia - Oh, yes, ma'am;
Celia with the b

G. G. - (Sauntering towa along.

Mrs. G. (Looking at him like to drive me get away from th

G. G. - And pass the Lyo wouldn't miss th biggest day of t

Mrs. G. - George, don't be Lyons folks patr

G. G. Oh, it's only Si

Mrs. G. - (Carelessly) An so familiar with now, and you kno
men can do thing

an you! Just like your father! Well,
Most of these climbers are no better matter what we've been.
ou wouldn't go; but I saw you come down thought I'd deliver the message; of excuses.
cessary; very well, Celia, take the ce they're finished, and then be off (Celia starts out with the basket head) OH, Celia, you forgot Mr. erchiefs, didn't you? Although, I nd how you missed all the others, ia sets down the basket)
; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit basket of clothes) ward the door) Well, I'll toddle

m uncertainly) I thought perhaps you'd me to the cemetery this evening and the crowds.
yons mansion? O Ma! but really I the circus for anything. It's the the year. Sid and I--- be so common and don't let those tronize you.
Sid---- he's a good sort. Well -- And George -- I don't think I'd be quite th Celia, if I were you. She's grown now how darkies are. Those Lyons ngs that----

G. G. - (Hurriedly) -- Oh, all right Ma! So long.

George hurries away

~~(Exit G. G.)~~

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and is seen moving up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen approaching accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

Celia - I tell you I ain't goin'.

Jim - Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

Celia - (Obdurate) I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

Jim - Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here inmore'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

Celia. - I done changed my mind.

Jim. Celia, you sho' is pretty.

Celia. Oh, go long.

Jim. Celia, when ah looks at you---oo-,oo!

Celia. - Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

Jim. But, Celia, you promised.

Celia - I said p'raps.

Jim. - But, Celia---

Celia - I got work to do--so go long and let me alone.

Jim - I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't foolin' nobody." (Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square.)

[Celia turns away in disdain, but watches him furtively and listens to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, looks carefully out the window, then approaching on tip-toe, opens the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.]

Celia - What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight. And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. - Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

Celia - Lordy! But you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him.. Don't go, George--stay here.

GG. - I must go, dear, I promised; you go on to the circus to-night and say, I'll come back late--may I?

Celia - I reckon so--yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go out. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. - Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up--go to bed-- I'll waken you.

[She shrinks away from him, and he goes out]

[Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low and raising the curtain. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

VOICE - - Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

Celia - Who is it?

G. G. - It's me, Celia, open up.

Celia - (Hesitating) Hush, George; for God's sake don't make all that fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men.)

Celia - No, no, no, - Who else is there?

G. G. - It's only Sid.

Celia - Oh, no; he can't come in here. You mustn't - -

G. G. - Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

Celia - (Hesitating) -but--Wait--wait 'till I dresses.

- (She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, draws the curtains close, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

Celia - Sh--please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear. (Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L. - By God! A little beauty, George!

G. G. - (Frowns)

S. L. - Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. - Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. - (Laughing) -- Private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go.

G. G. - Not by a damned sight, you've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.

Celia. - But it's so late--

S. L. - (Gaily) Late for cards--sure! But early for love.

Celia. And I ain't got no cards.

S. L. - Here's the pack we've played with; but where's the booze. We can't play without booze; I'm devilish ~~my~~ thirsty already.

G. G. - I suppose we might-a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a put us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, honey, got any of that home-made wine?

Celia - Oh, no.

G. G. - I tell you--you run up to Connelly's and tell him--

Celia - I'm afraid --It's so late--and circus day.

G. G. - Well, I'll go--

Celia - (Quickly) No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. - (Glaring at Lyons) Oh, well--

S. L. - Easily) Let me go--this time.

He (Goes out).

Celia - Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se ~~afreed~~ ard of him--

Them Lyons men--and Sid's--

G. G. - Nonsense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a minute. We got in a game and he wona hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long. He's an awfully jolly fellow--he's all right. You see, we went to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and, by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Twa'nt mine, it's mother's--I collected some rents for her shacks. Ma is tight now since the stock crash almost cleaned us out. We won't stay long. Don't be silly.

Celia - But why did you play with him? You knows he's just a gambler. Ef 'twuzn't for his family he'd be run out of town.

G. G. - O he's not so bad, and besides he's so damned superior I wanted to show him something. I just wanted to let him know that you're my girl. He said I couldn't get you, if you wouldn't notice him you wouldn't notice no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long--

(He seizes Celia. She resists. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S. L. - Ha, ha-- don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. G. - Come, we haven't much time. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. - What shall it be?

G. G. - I say, let's change the game.

S. L. - To what?

G. G. - Seven up--best three out of five.

S. L. - Good, then we'll quit! And the stakes?

G. G. - That hundred against my watch.

Celia - George! It's your father's -- your ma-- (Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table. Lyons smiles.)

(They play, smoking and talking and drinking.)

S. L. - High!

G. G. - Low!

S. L. - Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G. - Fifty-two for game.

S. L. - It's yours. My deal.

G. G. - King leads.

S. L. - Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack--one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G. - Well, what a hand --damn it, take it all.

(He drains the flask)

S. L. - High, Low, game--two for me.

G. G. - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

Celia - It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. - Shall we stop here?

G. G. - No, by God--it was best three out of five. I've got one odd. You've only won two.

S. L. - All right. But we must drink; shall I--

G. G. - No it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

Celia - George!

G. G. - (Straightening up and looking at Lyons) Of course, Sid, you're a gentleman.

S. L. - (Wheeling on him) Sir?

G. G. - Beg pardon, old man--Oh, get out, Celia!

Celia - But Connelly will be a-bed. You shouldn't ought to rouse him.

S. L. You'll find Brown's back door open.

Celia - But---

G. G. - Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her smiling. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

Celia - (Whispering) --Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Celia raises the curtain. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

Celia - What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

Celia - Turn me loose--Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose--don't--

(The door suddenly opens and Gwathmey steps in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. G. - Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

Celia - (In panting whispers) Turn--me--loose! Stop, I say--

G. G. - (Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you--turn her loose. (The match flickers out.)

Celia - (Screams furiously) Help!

G. G. (Strikes another match and in the flare, stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L. - Shoot, and be damned! (Throws Celia on the bed) (Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

Celia - Listen!

G. G. - What did you hear?

Celia - (Opening the door cautiously) Nothing.

G. G. - Sh'!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I thought I heard somebody.

Celia - (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. G. - Is he dead, Celia?

Celia - Yes!

G. G. - Where is it?

Celia - Over here--it's all sticky.

G. G. - Ah!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I slipped on the floor, It's all -- blood.

Celia- - (Moaning) Oh, my God! My God!

G. G. - Hush! For God's sake--shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it--brace up. (They stand in the door) Now, what shall we do?

Celia - Oh, I don't know--I don't know.

G. G. - Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

Celia - I can't think--my heart's done stopped.

G. G. - (Whispering) Suppose I say he shot himself.

Celia - Oh, but it's --your pistol.

G. G. - Well, then--let's see--we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train--

Celia - People would sure see us, and the blood would drip and drip--Oh!

G. G. - Well, how about self-defense--I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and--

Celia - He didn't have no pistol--I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. - Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

Celia- - (Breaks into hysterical sobbing) - But who'd believe it--who'd believe you'd tell a thing--like that!

G. G. - Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar). God! Somebody heard the shot. Somebody spied on us. They're coming this way. Celia, quick give me the pistol. I'll stay out-- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

Celia - (Slowly) I might say that he--(She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

Celia - Oh, no, no, I dassent.

C. C. - (Eagerly) By God! That's it--that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

Celia - But it's your pistol--and I dassent ---I dassent.

C. C. - I have it--I came in and drew my pistol. No, that wont do--you had my pistol; you were afraid of Sid; you borrowed it - or stole it, I came for it and you shot him.

Celia - That don't make sense, Oh, I'se afeared, and what would they care! He's a white man and I'm only a nigger. (Steps and shouts are heard)

C. C. - (Retreating) I'll defend you; I'll be witness--the word of a white man will save you--quick.

(He leaps out of the window, runs into the garden and disappears)- Here--your watch. (She throws it after him)

Voices rise, and the flare of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door.

Sheriff - Where was the shooting down here? Who 'phoned me? Was it you, gal?

Celia - (After a long pause) No.---yes.

Sheriff - Did you shoot?

Celia - (Slowly) Yes.

Sheriff - What you got there? Gimme that pistol! Was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God---Girl, did you do this?

Celia - Yes!

Celia - Yes.

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT - A woman is accused.

(The scene is the hall of the Gwathmey mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, the square and Court House. To the left of the front door are the doors to the parlor and dining room, the latter, slightly ajar. George Gwathmey is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

Mrs. G. - George, why don't you come in to breakfast? We've been through an hour and most everything is cold. You know I and your sisters have most of the work to do now--we can't afford a house full of darkies to feed.

G. G. - Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (Moves slowly towards the door.)

Mrs. G. - But, George--

G. G. - Yes, Ma? (He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

Mrs. G. - Of course, George, we all feel awful over this mess, but really, it don't seem just decent for you to take on so. After all, it's only a low affair between one of these Lyons men and a colored girl.

Mr. G. - Of course, Ma, but you see---

Mrs. G. - George, I wouldn't go if I was you. (He reaches for his watch and starts. His mother stares at him and he at her.)

G. G. - But Ma, I'm already late and--

Mrs. G. - Dear, you ain't needed.

G. G. - I'm a witness, Ma. As I told you last night, I--I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

Mrs. G. - But you didn't actually see the--the murder, dear?

G. G. - Why no--that it--I heard--and somebody must have seen us and got the sheriff.

Mrs. G. - And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. G. - (Starting) I tell you I must go, Ma. You do not understand. I can't let that---girl---

Mrs. G. - Girl! George, for God's sake remember your mother and sisters. What will folks say! you defending that black slut like she was a white women. They'll twit us with being nothing but white trash, and born too low to look down on niggers. There ain't a thing you can do and no sense in your trying. The Lord knows we've always done what we could for Celia--you just can't keep colored girls straight--and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my own son to smirch our family name, out of silly sympathy. I already had a talk with Judge Holt. As luck would have it, he presides today. You know he was a close pal of your father and he's got no love for the Lyons family neither. ~~He tried once to marry~~ One of them. Of course he must act like a white man, but he promised to be easy on Celia because she's young and Lyons had such a reputation. They found a whiskey bottle in her cabin and money which he was evidently paying her. She won't swing as she ought to for killing a white man--she'll just be sent to the penitentiary for life and--

G. G. - My God!

Mrs. G. - Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance.. Jim stands a moment panting.)

Jim - They's a-waiting, sir.

Mrs. G - Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

Jim - (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.) All of 'em--the Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just gwine to--to send her up, and she--Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come because you done promised and--Oh, Lord, sir--

Mrs. G. - Jim, that will do. You may go.

Jim - But you won't let--

Mrs .G - Go!

Jim. - I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Gwathmey) I phoned the sheriff and I found---your watch, what Celia threw after you.

G. G. - You damned, sneaking scoundrel!

Mrs. G. - What is it? What are you talking about? Tell me!

G. G. - He's got something of mine.

Jim. - I'll give 'em to him--soon as he testifies for Celia.

G. G. - You damned--

Mrs. G. - George! be quiet. It's all right Jim. You've always been a good boy. Give it to me and George shall go--right off--

(Jim hesitates and fumbles in his pocket)

Mrs. G. - Hark? Somebody's coming. Here Jim, (opening the cellar door) Quick step in here. We'll talk later. George, hurry! Go! Immediately.

(George Gwathmey opens the front door. Mrs. Gwathmey quickly locks the cellar door - slams the front door loudly and then quickly draws her son aside. They stare at each other silently.)

Mrs. G. - (Whispering) George?

G. G. - He'll escape by the doors.

Mrs. G. - (Slowly) They are padlocked. I was afraid--last night.

G. G. - Or the windows?

Mrs. G. - Barred, since your father died.

G. G. - (Hesitantly) Ma, I must go.

Mrs. G. - Why?

G. G. - She used---my pistol.

Mrs. G. - Your pistol? My God!

G. G. - Yes, she killed him---

Mrs. G. - With your pistol?

G. G. - Yes; and Jim's got--my watch.

Mrs. G. - So you were there---you saw it all?

G. G. - Yes, we were--gambling--I lost some of your rent money--and--

Mrs. G.- When the only reason in the world for hesitating is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den! It must never be known. Do you think the Lyons Klan would see her let loose on your testimony? Why they'd lynch her and ruin us--ruin us. He's safe at present (pointing to the cellar). Later I'll find a way to get that watch---if I have to kill him---in defense of my honor. Thank God! Your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G. - But the pistol?

Mrs. G. - Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? She took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say when.

G. G. - But Ma--She -- she -- it was self-defense!

Mrs. G. - Suppose it was--fool ! Can a white man admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak---

(Jim is heard knocking within!)

G. G. - (Starts) Good God, (Looks at the door) Look! (They rush toward the door) (Celia with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. She stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling, wringing her manacled hands.)

Celia - (Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am--sir. I--I run away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I ought to be hung, but it ain't fair--I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then--you know I never hurt---Oh, yes---yes--him--- but you said---you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I run-- I just run-- It is hard to run with your hands tied-so-- They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard chains. I never hurt nothing--but him, Mr. George--and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right--Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the Judge, he said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George, Oh think, always, always tied in jail with-with them men--quick, Mr. George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me--Oh, don't hold him Ma'am-- don't, oh--

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister scream of the mob is heard. G. G. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Celia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining-room door.)

G. G. - What do you want?

Sheriff- Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for--there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you-- I'll teach you, you damn black--

Mrs. G. - Sir!

Sheriff- Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have

- this wench. You see, she ran away--bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a - cutting a bit of terbacco and damned--beg pardon, ma'am--off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you--

G. G. - Wait--

Sheriff- The law, sir, the majesty of the Law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly. 14

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G. G. - What? Out--to that mob--Never! I--

Sheriff- Oh, they ain't so wild. I know'em all. She'll be all right I'll take care of her. Oh, yes, my lady, I'll see to you--

(Seizes Celia and drags her forward.)

Celia - But, Mr. George--you'll say something--you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on G. G. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. G. stands dazed looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.) 15

Celia - Wait, listen!. I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey.) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd lie him out of it--so I lied because he said he loved me and I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied. I hate him, the pale coward. I didn't kill Sid Lyons, I never killed nothing. He killed him--it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol! 16

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.)

Mrs. G. - Go, quick--the girl's mad--and Sheriff---I shall never forget

- your--kindness in this trouble.

Sheriff- Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts to follow ~~the door~~, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and gray dishevelled hair.) 17

Celia's - Voice (dying away) I lied--do you hear? -- I lied. He did it. It was his pistol! 18

The groan of the mob is heard)

Jim - (Pounding within) Let me out! Let me out! Here's his watch! 19

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

Justice is satisfied

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage to the right. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. Out the grated door in front one sees the square and the Gwathmay mansion. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.)

Voice - (Without) "Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you." (The lash of a whip and a scream are heard. 20

Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

Sheriff- Say, Bill--

Guard- - Say yourself, God damn it! I'm damn near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

Sheriff- Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl--the pretty one I brought in this evening?

Guard - None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavins. This one's mine.

Sheriff- Ohm cut that--who got you your job?

Guard - You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o'niggers.

Sheriff- You're done up, Bill. What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

Guard - Now you're talkin' sense. (They drink and smoke)

Sheriff- Well, let's play; where's the cards?

Guard - In the drawer somewheres.

Sheriff- What shall it be--the old stand-by?

Guard - No-we'll change the game; --seven-up.

Sheriff- Good.

Guard - That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

Guard - Shut up out there--or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence) What's the stakes?

Sheriff- The girl, of course.

Guard - Not by a damn sight.

Sheriff- And a hundred to the loser.

Guard- - I ain't got no money.

Sheriff- Oh, your word's good.

Guard- - Your's ain't. Gimme the whiskey.

Sheriff- Well, the girl if I win and a hundred if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out five.

(They play, talking now and then)

Guard- - High!

Sheriff- Low!

Guard- - You lie--here's deuce.

Sheriff- Fifty-two for game.

Guard- - It's yours--my deal.

Sheriff- King leads.

Guard- - Got his Jack, My God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

Sheriff- Whose deal?

Guard- - Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

Sheriff- High, low, game. Two games for me.

Guard- - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

Sheriff- Bottle's empty--shall we quit?

Guard - No, by God--it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

Sheriff- All right--but booze! Wait till I get--(fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

Guard - (suspiciously) Is it doped?

Sheriff- (angrily) I'm a gentleman!

Guard - Well---ain't I?

Sheriff- Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

Guard - Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

Guard - I played that ten!

Sheriff- No you didn't--you played the nine.

Guard - You're a damned liar--that trick is mine. You think you got me too drunk to see?

Sheriff- It's mine but we won't quarrel--take it!

(They play on)

Guard - Queen, high! Game! Two games for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

Sheriff- Huh!

Guard - Huh!

Sheriff- Huh! (Rising with a yell) Game! She's mine--Where'd you put her, Bill. And say! Watch that door. No mobs tonight!

(The sheriff lurches out to the right removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money.

24

25

-(He walks to the jail door, unlocks, opens it and peers out. The keys are hanging in the door. A scream is heard. He turns in the open door and scowls toward the corridor where the Sheriff has disappeared. Then he grins as he faces the audience. Then his face grows grey, and slowly he puts both hands aloft and steps falteringly forward. Jim is seen crouching back of him, pistol to his back. He turns the guard around, seizes his pistol and throws it on the floor, propells him out the door and locks it. Jim hesitates, looks left. A low moan and struggle is heard on the right. Jim rushes widly toward it. The hooded Ku Klux Klan appear at the jail door. They batter it down. Led by the guard they rush in and pause. Three shots ring out and light smoke drifts out of the right corridor. The leader of the Klan drags off his hood and reveals George Gwathmey, white and scared. The other klansmen raise their guns and fire right and left. The curtain falls.)

SEVEN-UP

A PLAY IN THREE ACTS

by

W. E. B. DU BOIS

THE TIME,

1930 - SPRINGTIME

THE PLACE

A Town in Georgia

The Persons in the Drama -

As They Appear.

1. CELIA - a serving maid, curled, pretty and colored.
2. MRS CARRINGTON GWATHMEY - a widow of the newly rich, but poor again.
3. GEORGE GWATHMEY, - her son and hope.
4. JIM - the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.
5. SID LYONS - a neighbor's son, white and poor but of high lineage.
6. THE SHERIFF of the County.
7. THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

Convicts and a mob.

THE FIRST ACT

A Man is Killed

(The scene lies within a little cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate, pretentious but out of repair. Beyond a green and nodding garden, looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey, widow of a local mill owner, presides with daughters and a son. Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes out the music is just dying away.

The curtain discovers Celia looking eagerly out the window, towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing facing the front window, her back to the audience. To her left is a door; forward on the stage to the right is a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings.)

CELIA - Hallelujah, Hallelujah! We will shoo the---

(Out of the window a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters.)

CELIA - Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

Mrs. G. - Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

Celia - Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they's mighty near done.

Mrs. G. - Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA - There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. - Celia--Oh,--Ma!

Mrs. G. - Why, George! (George is evidently at a loss, but Celia's wit brings rescue.)

CELIA - (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I'se got the handkerchiefs done.

Mrs. G. - (Recovering) Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full- - the top drawer to the left--

G. G. - Yes? Why-- I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and Ma, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the D. A. R. delegates--that is, Sid, said so and left a note at the house.

Mrs. G. - The hussy! Why, George, you know it's just a public reception. And why couldn't old Mrs. Lyons call herself if she wanted me! I've called on her. D. A. R. -----the idea! I've got as much right to join as most of them.

G. G. - Sure! Pa said we'd been over-seers and squatters on many a Georgia plantation--

Mrs. G. - George! How can you! Just like your father! Well, I'm not going. Most of these climbers are no better than we are no matter what we've been.

GG. - --O, I knew you wouldn't go; but I saw you come down in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

Mrs. G. - --It wasn't necessary; very well, Celia, take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) OH, Celia, you forgot Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket)

Celia - Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes)

G. G. - (Sauntering toward the door) Well, I'll toddle along.

Mrs. G. (Looking at him uncertainly) I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and get away from the crowds.

G. G. - And pass the Lyons mansion? O Ma! but really I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's the biggest day of the year. Sid and I---

Mrs. G. - George, don't be so common and don't let those Lyons folks patronize you.

G. G. Oh, it's only Sid---- he's a good sort. Well --

Mrs. G. - (Carelessly) And George -- I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's grown now, and you know how darkies are. Those Lyons men can do things that----

G. G. - (Hurriedly) -- Oh, all right Ma! So long.

(Exit G. G.)

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and is seen moving up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen approaching accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

Celia - I tell you I ain't goin'.

Jim - Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

Celia - (Obdurate) I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

Jim - Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here inmore'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

Celia. - I done changed my mind.

Jim. Celia, you sho' is pretty.

Celia. Oh, go long.

Jim. Celia, when ah looks at you---oo-,oo!

Celia. - Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

Jim. But, Celia, you promised.

Celia - I said p'raps.

Jim. - But, Celia---

Celia - I got work to do--so go long and let me alone.

Jim - I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't feelin' nobody. (Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square.)

(Celia turns away in disdain but watches him furtively and listens to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, looks carefully out the window, then approaching on tip-toe, opens the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

Celia - What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight. And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. - Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

Celia - Lordy! But you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him.. Don't go, George--stay here.

GG. - I must go, dear, I promised; you go on to the circus to-night and say, I'll come back late--may I?

Celia - I reckon so--yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go out. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. - Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up--go to bed-- I'll waken you.

(She shrinks away from him, he goes out)

(Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low and raising the curtain. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

VOICE - - Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

Celia - Who is it?

G. G. - It's me, Celia, open up.

Celia - (Hesitating) Hush, George; for God's sake don't make all that fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men.)

Celia - No, no, no, - Who else is there?

G. G. - It's only Sid.

Celia - Oh, no, he can't come in here. You mustn't - -

G. G. - Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

Celia - (Hesitating) -but--Wait--wait 'till I dresses.

- (She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, draws the curtains close, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

Celia - Sh--please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear. (Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L. - By God! A little beauty, George!

G. G. - (Frowns)

S. L. - Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. - Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. - (Laughing) -- Private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go.

G. G. - Not by a damned sight, you've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.

Celia. - But it's so late--

S. L. - (Gaily) Late for cards--sure! But early for love.

Celia. And I ain't got no cards.

S. L. - Here's the pack we've played with; but where's the booze. We can't play without booze; I'm devilish thirsty already.

G. G. - I suppose we might a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a put us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, honey, got any of that home-made wine?

Celia - Oh, no.

G. G. - I tell you--you run up to Connelly's and tell him--

Celia - I'm afraid --It's so late--and circus day.

G. G. - Well, I'll go--

Celia - (Quickly) No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. - (Glaring at Lyons) Oh, well--

S. L. - Easily) Let me go--this time.

(Goes out)

Celia - Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se afread of him--

Them Lyons men--and Sid's--

G. G. - Nonesense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a minute. We got in a game and he wona hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long. He's an awfully jolly fellow--he's all right. You see, we went to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and, by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Twa'nt mine, it's mother's--I collected some rents for her shacks. Ma is tight now since the stock crash almost cleaned us out. We won't stay long. Don't be silly.

Celia - But why did you play with him? You knows he's just a gambler. Ef 'twuzn't for his family he'd be run out of town.

G. G. - O he's not so bad, and besides he's so damned superior I wanted to show him something. I just wanted to let him know that you're my girl. He said I couldn't get you, if you wouldn't notice him you wouldn't notice no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long--

(He seizes Celia. She resists. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S. L. - Ha, ha-- don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. G. - Come, we haven't much time. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. - What shall it be?

G. G. - I say, let's change the game.

S. L. - To what?

G. G. - Seven up--best three out of five.

S. L. - Good, then we'll quit! And the stakes?

G. G. - That hundred against my watch.

Celia - George! It's your father's -- your ma-- (Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table. Lyons smiles.)

(They play, smoking and talking and drinking.)

S. L. - High!

G. G. - Low!

S. L. - Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G. - Fifty-two for game.

S. L. - It's yours. My deal.

G. G. - King leads.

S. L. - Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack--one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G. - Well, what a hand --damn it, take it all.

(He drains the flask)

S. L. - High, Low, game--two for me.

G. G. - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

Celia - It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. - Shall we stop here?

G. G. - No, by God--it was best three out of five. I've got one odd. You've only won two.

S. L. - All right. But we must drink; shall I--

G. G. - No it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

Celia - George!

G. G. - (Straightening up and looking at Lyons) Of course, Sid, you're a gentleman.

S. L. - (Wheeling on him) Sir?

G. G. - Beg pardon, old man--Oh, get out, Celia.

Celia - But Connelly will be a-bed. You shouldn't ought to rouse him.

S. L. You'll find Brown's back door open.

Celia - But---

G. G. - Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her smiling. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

Celia - (Whispering) --Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Celia raises the curtain. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

Celia - What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

Celia - Turn me loose--Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose--don't--

(The door suddenly opens and Gwathmey steps in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. G. - Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

Celia - (In panting whispers) Turn--me--loose. Stop, I say--

G. G. - (Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you--turn her loose. (The match flickers out.)

Celia - (Screams furiously) Help!

G. G. (Strikes another match and in the flare stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L. - Shoot, and be damned. (Throws Celia on the bed) (Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

Celia - Listen!

G. G. - What did you hear?

Celia - (Opening the door cautiously) Nothing.

G. G. - Sh'!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I thought I heard somebody.

Celia - (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. G. - Is he dead Celia?

Celia - Yes!

G. G. - Where is it?

Celia - Over here--it's all sticky.

G. G. - Ah!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I slipped on the floor, It's all -- blood.

Celia- - (Moaning) Oh, my God! My God!

G. G. - Hush! For God's sake--shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it--brace up. (They stand in the door) Now, what shall we do?

Celia - Oh, I don't know--I don't know.

G. G. - Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

Celia - I can't think--my heart's done stopped.

G. G. - (Whispering) Suppose I say he shot himself.

Celia - Oh, but it's --your pistol.

G. G. - Well, then--let's see--we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train--

Celia - People would sure see us, and the blood would drip and drip--Oh!

G. G. - Well, how about self-defense -I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and--

Celia - He didn't have no pistol--I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. - Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

Celia- - (Breaks into hysterical sobbing) - But who'd believe it--who'd believe you'd tell a thing--like that!

G. G. - Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar). God! Somebody heard the shot. Somebody spied on us. They're coming this way. Celia, quick give me the pistol. I'll stay out-- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

Celia - (Slowly) I might say that he--(She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

Celia - Oh, no, no, I dassent.

C. C. - (Eagerly) By God! That's it--that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

Celia - But it's your pistol--and I dassent ---I dassent.

C. C. - I have it--I came in and drew my pistol. No, that went do--you had my pistol; you were afraid of Sid; you borrowed it - or stole it, I came for it and you shot him.

Celia - That don't make sense, Oh, I'se afeared, and what would they care! He's a white man and I'm only a nigger. (Steps and shouts are heard)

C. C. - (Retreating) I'll defend you; I'll be witness--the word of a white man will save you--quick.

(He leaps out of the window, runs into the garden and disappears)- Here--your watch. (She throws it after him)

Voices rise, and the flare of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door.

Sheriff - Where was the shooting down here? Who 'phoned me? Was it you, gal?

Celia - (After a long pause) No.---yes.

Sheriff - Did you shoot?

Celia - (Slowly) Yes.

Sheriff - What you got there? Gimme that pistol! Was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God---Girl, did you do this?

Celia - Yes.

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT - A woman is accused.

(The scene is the hall of the Gwathmey mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, the square and Court House. To the left of the front door are the doors to the parlor and dining room, the latter, slightly ajar. George Gwathmey is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

Mrs. G. - George, why don't you come in to breakfast? We've been through an hour and most everything is cold. You know I and your sisters have most of the work to do now--we can't afford a house full of darkies to feed.

G. G. - Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (Moves slowly towards the door.)

Mrs. G. - But, George--

G. G. - Yes, Ma? (He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

Mrs. G. - Of course, George, we all feel awful over this mess, but really, it don't seem just decent for you to take on so. After all, it's only a low affair between one of these Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. G. - Of course, Ma, but you see---

Mrs. G. - George, I wouldn't go if I was you. (He reaches for his watch and starts. His mother stares at him and he at her.)

G. G. - But Ma, I'm already late and--

Mrs. G. - Dear, you ain't needed.

G. G. - I'm a witness, Ma. As I told you last night, I--I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

Mrs. G. - But you didn't actually see the--the murder, dear?

G. G. - Why no--that it--I heard--and somebody must have seen us and got the sheriff.

Mrs. G. - And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. G. - (Starting) I tell you I must go, Ma. Yo do not understand. I can't let that---girl---

Mrs. G. - Girl! George, for God's sake remember your mother and sisters. What will folks say! you defending that black slut like she was a white woman. They'll twit us with being nothing but white trash and born too low to look down on niggers. There ain't a thing you can do and no sense in your trying. The Lord knows we've always done what we could for Celia--you just can't keep colored girls straight--and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my own son to smirch our family name, out of silly sympathy. I already had a talk with Judge Holt. As luck would have it, he presides today. You know he was a close pal of your father and he's got no love for the Lyons family neither. He tried once to marry one of them. Of course he must act like a white man, but he promised to be easy on Celia because she's young and Lyons had such a reputation. They found a whiskey bottle in her cabin and money which he was evidently paying her. She won't swing as she ought to for killing a white man--she'll just be sent to the penitentiary for life and--

G. G. - My God!

Mrs. G. - Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance.. Jim stands a moment panting.)

Jim - They's a-waiting, sir.

Mrs. G - Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

Jim - (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.) All of 'em--the Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just gwine to--to send her up, and she--Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come because you done promised and--Oh, Lord, sir--

Mrs. G. - Jim, that will do. You may go.

Jim - But you won't let--

Mrs .G - Go!

Jim. - I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Gwathmey) I phoned the sheriff and I found---your watch, what Celia threw after you.

G. G. - You damned, sneaking scoundrel!

Mrs. G. - What is it? What are you talking about? Tell me!

G. G. - He's got something of mine.

Jim. - I'll give 'em to him--soon as he testifies for Celia.

G. G. - You damned--

Mrs. G. - George! be quiet. It's all right Jim. You've always been a good boy. Give it to me and George shall go--right off--

(Jim hesitates and fumbles in his pocket)

Mrs. G. - Hark? Somebody's coming. Here Jim, (opening the cellar door) Quick step in here. We'll talk later. George, hurry! Go! Immediately.

(George Gwathmey opens the front door. Mrs. Gwathmey quickly locks the cellar door - slams the front door loudly and then quickly draws her son aside. They stare at each other silently.)

Mrs. G. - (Whispering) George?

G. G. - He'll escape by the doors.

Mrs. G. - (Slowly) They are padlocked. I was afraid--last night.

G. G. - Or the windows?

Mrs. G. - Barred, since your father died.

G. G. - (Hesitantly) Ma, I must go.

Mrs. G. - Why?

G. G. - She used---my pistol.

Mrs. G. - Your pistol? My God!

G. G. - Yes, she killed him---

Mrs. G. - With your pistol?

G. G. - Yes; and Jim's got--my watch.

Mrs. G. - So you were there---you saw it all?

G. G. - Yes, we were--gambling--I lost some of your rent money--and--

Mrs. G.- When the only reason in the world for hesitating is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wanch's den! It must never be known. Do you think the Lyons Klan would see her let loose on your testimony. Why they'd lynch her and ruin us--ruin us. He's safe at present (pointing to the cellar). Later I'll find a way to get that watch---if I have to kill him---in defense of my honor. Thank God! Your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G. - But the pistol?

Mrs. G. - Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? She took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say when.

G. G. - But Ma--She -- she -- it was self-defense!

Mrs. G. - Suppose it was--fool ! Can a white man admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak---

(Jim is heard knocking within)

G. G. - (Starts) Good God, (Looks at the door) Look! (They rush toward the door) (Celia with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. She stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling, wringing her manacled hands.)

Celia - (Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am--sir. I--I run away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I ought to be hung, but it ain't fair--I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then--you know I never hurt---Oh, yes---yes--him--- but you said---you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I run-- I just run-- It is hard to run with your hands tied-so-- They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard chains. I never hurt nothing--but him, Mr. George--and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right--Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the Judge, he said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George, Oh think, always, always tied in jail with-with them men--quick, Mr. George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me--Oh, don't hold him Ma'am-- don't, oh--

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister scream of the mob is heard. G. G. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Celia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining-room door.)

G. G. - What do you want?

Sheriff- Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for--there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you-- I'll teach you, you damn black--

Mrs. G. - Sir!

Sheriff- Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have

- this wench. You see, she ran away--bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a - cutting a bit of terbacco and damned--beg pardon, ma'am--off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you--

G. G. - Wait--

Sheriff- The law, sir, the majesty of the Law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G. G. - What? Out--to that mob--Never! I--

Sheriff- Oh, they ain't so wild. I know'em all. She'll be all right I'll take care of her. Oh, yes, my lady, I'll see to you--

(Seizes Celia and drags her forward.)

Celia - But, Mr. George--you'll say something--you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on G. G. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. G. stands dazed looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.)

Celia - Wait, listen!. I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey.) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd lie him out of it--so I lied because he said he loved me and I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied. I hate him, the pale coward. I didn't kill Sid Lyons, I never killed nothing. He killed him--it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol!

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.)

Mrs. G. - Go, quick--the girl's mad--and Sheriff---I shall never forget

- your--kindness in this trouble.

Sheriff- Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts to follow the door, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and gray dishoveled hair.)

Celia's - Voice (dying away) I lied--do you hear? -- I lied. He did it. It was his pistol!

The groan of the mob is heard)

Jim - (Pounding within) Let me out! Let me out! Here's his watch!

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

Justice is satisfied

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage to the right. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. Out the grated door in front one sees the square and the Gwathmay mansion. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.)

Voice - (Without) Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you. (The lash of a whip and a scream are heard. Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

Sheriff- Say, Bill--

Guard- - Say yourself, God damn it! I'm damn near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

Sheriff- Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl--the pretty one I brought in this evening?

Guard - None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wanch sent here this year and I get your leavins. This one's mine.

Sheriff- Oh, cut that--who got you your job?

Guard - You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o'niggers.

Sheriff- You're done up, Bill. What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

Guard - Now you're talkin' sense. (They drink and smoke)

Sheriff- Well, let's play; where's the cards?

Guard - In the drawer somewheres.

Sheriff- What shall it be--the old stand-by?

Guard - No-we'll change the game; --seven-up.

Sheriff- Good.

Guard - That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

Guard - Shut up out there--or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence) What's the stakes?

Sheriff- The girl, of course.

Guard - Not by a damn sight.

Sheriff- And a hundred to the loser.

Guard- - I ain't got no money.

Sheriff- Oh, your word's good.

Guard- - Your's ain't. Gimme the whiskey.

Sheriff- Well, the girl if I win and a hundred if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out five.

(They play, talking now and then)

Guard- - High!

Sheriff- Low!

Guard- - You lie--here's deuce.

Sheriff- Fifty-two for game.

Guard- - It's yours--my deal.

Sheriff- King leads.

Guard- - Got his Jack, My God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

Sheriff- Whose deal?

Guard- - Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

Sheriff- High, low, game. Two games for me.

Guard- - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

Sheriff- Bottle's empty--shall we quit?

Guard - No, by God--it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

Sheriff- All right--but booze! Wait till I get--(fumblingin his bag) Here's another quart.

Guard - (suspiciously) Is it doped?

Sheriff- (angrily) I'm a gentleman!

Guard - Well---ain't I?

Sheriff- Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

Guard - Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

Guard - I played that ten!

Sheriff- No you didn't--you played the nine.

Guard - You're a damned liar---that trick is mine. You think you got me too drunk to see?

Sheriff- It's mine but we won't quarrel---take it!

(They play on)

Guard - Queen, high! Game! Two games ~~for me.~~ a piece

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

Sheriff- Huh!

Guard - Huh!

Sheriff- Huh! (Rising with a yell) Game! She's mine---Where'd you put her, Bill. And say! Watch that door. No mobs tonight!

(The sheriff lurches out to the right removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money.

He walks to the jail door, unlocks, opens it and peers out. The keys are hanging in the door. A scream is heard. He turns in the open door and scowls toward the corridor where the Sheriff has disappeared. Then he grins as he faces the audience. Then his face grows grey, and slowly he puts both hands aloft and steps falteringly forward. Jim is seen crouching back of him, pistol to his back. He turns the guard around, seizes his pistol and throws it on the floor, propells him out the door and locks it. Jim hesitates, looks left. A low moan and struggle is heard on the right. Jim rushes widly toward it. The hooded Ku Klux Klan appear at the jail door. They batter it down. Led by the guard they rush in and pause. Three shots ring out and light smoke drifts out of the right corridor. The leader of the Klan drags off his hood and reveals George Gwathmey, white and scared. The other klansmen raise their guns and fire right and left. The curtain falls.

SEVEN-UP

A Play in Three Acts

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

The Time,

1928, Springtime

The Persons in the Drama,

as they appear.

1....CELIA, a serving maid, curled, prètty, and colored.

2....MRS. CARRINGTON GWATHMEY, a lady in the land.

3....GEORGE GWATHMEY, her son and hope.

4....JIM, the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.

5....SID LYONS, a neighbor's son, white, but of lesser breed and newly rich.

6....THE SHERIFF of the County.

7....THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

A MOB and GUARDS

THE FIRST ACT

A man is killed.

(The scene lies within a little log cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate of pretentious but decayed gentility. Beyond a green and nodding garden, looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey, of long local lineage, presides with daughters and a son. Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes up the music of "Hallelujah" is just dying away.

The curtain discovers Celia looking eagerly out the window towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing facing the front window, her back to the audience. To her left is a door; forward on the stage to the right is a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings.)

CELIA -- Hallelujah, Hallelujah, we will shee the—

(Out of the window a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters.)

CELIA -- Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

MRS. G. -- Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

CELIA -- Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they'r mighty near done.

MRS. G. -- Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA -- There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. -- Celia--Oh,--Mother!

MRS. G. -- Why, George! (George is evidently perturbed, but Celia's wit brings her to the rescue.)

CELIA -- (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I've got the handkerchiefs done.

MRS. G. (recovering) -- Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full--the top drawer to the left--

G. G. -- Yes, yes; I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and Mother, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the Women's Equal Rights delegates--that is, Sid said so and he left the note at the house.

MRS. G. -- The impertinence! Why, George, you know I never go there. They are quite impossible. Equal Rights! The idea! What are we coming to? I have no desire to be a man.

G. G. -- Yes, I thought so; but I saw you come in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

MRS. G. -- They are quite unnecessary; very well, Celia, take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) Oh, Celia, you forget Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket)

CELIA -- Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes)

G. G. (Sauntering toward the door) -- Well, I'll toddle along.

MRS. G. (Looking at him uncertainly) -- I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and escape the crowds.

G. G. -- But, Mother, I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's the biggest day of the year. Sid and I—

MRS. G. -- George, pray don't get too intimate with those folks.

G. G. -- Oh, it's only Sid—he's a good sort. Well—

MRS. G. (Carelessly) -- And George—I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's a grown girl now, and you know servants presume so.

G. G. (Hurriedly) -- All right, Mother. So long.

(Exit G. G.)

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and is seen moving up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen approaching accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

CELIA -- I tell you I ain't goin'.

JIM -- Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

CELIA (Obdurate) -- I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

JIM -- Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here in more'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

CELIA -- I done changed my mind.

JIM -- Celia, you sho' is pretty.

CELIA -- Oh, go long.

JIM-- Celia, when ah looks at you--oo, oo!

CELIA -- Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

JIM -- But,Celia, you promised.

CELIA -- I said pinggs.

JIM -- But, Celia--

CELIA -- I got work to do--so go long and let me alone.

JIM -- I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't feelin' nobody. (Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square.)

(Celia turns away in disdain but watches him furtively and listlems to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; then she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, looks carefully out the window, then approaching on tip-toe, opens the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

CELIA -- What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight? And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. -- Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

CELIA -- Lordy! but you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him. Don't go, George-- stay here.

G. G. -- I must go, dear, I promised; you go on to the circus tonight and say, I'll come back late--may I?

CELIA -- I reckon so--yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go out. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. -- Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up--go to bed--I'll waken you.

(They kiss, and he goes)

(Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

VOICE -- Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

CELIA -- Who is it?

G. G. -- It's me, Celia, open up.

CELIA (Hesitating) -- Hush, George; for God's sake don't make so much fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men.)

CELIA -- No, no, no, --who else is there?

G. G. -- It's only Sid.

CELIA -- Oh, no, he can't come in here. You mustn't--

G. G. -- Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

CELIA (Hesitating)--But wait--wait 'till I dresses.

(She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

CELIA -- Sh--please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear.

(Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L.--By God! A little beauty, George!

(G. G. frowns)

S. L. -- Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. -- Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. -- Laughing) -- Oh, private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go.

G. G. -- Not by a damned sight, You've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.

CELIA -- But it's so late--

S. L. (Gaily) -- Late for cards--sure! But early for love.

CELIA -- And I've no cards.

S. L. -- Here's a pack; but drink--where's the booze? We can't play without booze, and I'm devilish thirsty already.

G. G. -- We ought-a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a hidden us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, dear, got any of that home-made wine?

CELIA -- Oh, no.

G. G. -- I tell you--you run up to Cellelly's and tell him--

CELIA -- I'm afraid--It's so late--and circus day.

G. G. -- Well, I'll go--

CELIA -- (Quickly)--No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. -- (Glaring at Lyons) -- Oh, well--

S. L. --(Easily) -- Let me go--this time.

(Runs out)

CELIA -- Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se afeard of him.

G. G. -- Nonsense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a mimute. We got in a game and he won a hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long. He's an awfully jolly fellow--he's all right. You see, we want to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and,by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Saintt mine, it's mother's, to pay a bill. I gotta get it back. Won't take long. I wanted to show him that you're my girl. He said you wouldn't notice no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long--

(He seizes Celia and smothers her protests with kisses. She resists at first and then caresses him. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S. L. -- Ha, ha-- don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. G. -- Come, we mustn't play long. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. -- What shall it be?

G. G. -- I say, let's change the game.

S. L. -- To what?

G. G. -- Seven up-- best three out of five.

S. L. -- Good-- and the stakes?

G. G. -- That hundred against my watch.

CELIA -- George! It's your father's--your ma-- (Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table.

(They play, smoking and talking here and there.

S. L. -- High!

G. G. -- Low!

S. L. -- Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G. -- Fifty-two for game.

S. L. -- It's yours. My deal.

G. G. -- King leads.

S. L. -- Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack--one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G. -- Well, what a hand--damn it, take it all.

(Celia, going to the window, tosses the bottle out.)

S. L. -- High, low, game--two for me.

G. G. (Showing signs of intoxication) -- Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

CELIA -- It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. -- Shall we stop here?

G. G. -- No, by God--it was best three out of five. I've got one odd. You've only won two.

S. L. -- All right. But we must drink; shall I--

G. G. -- No, it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

CELIA -- George!

G. G. (Straightening up and looking at Lyons) -- Of course, sir, you're a gentleman.

S. L. -- (Wheeling on him)--Do you question it?

G. G. -- Beg pardon, old man--Oh, get out, Celia.

CELIA -- But Connelly will be asleep. You shouldn't rouse him.

S. L. -- You'll find Brown's back door open.

CELIA -- But--

G. G. -- Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in the half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her, smiling under lowered eyelids. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

CELIA (Whispering) -- Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

CELIA -- What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

CELIA -- Turn me loose--Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose--don't--

(The door opens and Gwathmey hastens in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. G. -- Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

CELIA (In panting whispers) -- Turn -- me -- loose. Stop, I say--

G. G. (Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia Struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you—turn her loose. (The match flickers out.)

CELIA -- (Screams furiously) -- Help!

G. G. (Strikes another match and in the flare stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L. -- Shoot, and be damned. (Draws Celia to him and kisses her.)

(Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

CELIA -- Listen!

G. G. -- What did you hear?

CELIA (Opening the door cautiously) -- Nothing.

G. G. -- Sh'!

CELIA -- What?

G. G. -- I thought I heard somebody.

CELIA (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. G. -- Where is it?

CELIA -- Over here—it's all—sticky.

G. G. -- Ah!

CELIA -- What?

G. G. -- I slipped on the floor. It's all—blood.

CELIA (Moaning) -- Oh, my God! My God!

G. G. -- Hush! For God's sake—shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it—brace up. (They stand in the door.) Now, what shall we do?

CELIA -- Oh, I don't know—I don't know.

G. G. -- Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

CELIA -- I can't think--my heart's done stopped.

G. G. --(Whispering) -- Suppose I say he shot himself.

CELIA -- Oh, but it's--your pistol.

G. G. -- Well, then--let's see--we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train--

CELIA -- People might pass--and the blood would drip and drip--Oh!

G. G. -- Well, how about self-defense--I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and--

CELIA -- He didn't have no pistol--I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. -- Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

CELIA --(Breaks into hysterical sobbing) -- But who'd believe it--who'd believe it?

G. G. -- Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar) God! Somebody heard the shot. They're coming this way. Celia, quick -- hand me the pistol. I'll stay out -- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

CELIA (Slowly) -- I might say that he -- (She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

CELIA -- Oh, no, no, I dassent.

G. G. (Eagerly) -- By God! That's it --that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

CELIA -- But it's your pistol--and I dassent--I dassent.

G. G. -- I have it--I came in and drew my pistol. You seized it and shot him.

CELIA -- Oh, I'se afeared. What would they care. He's a white man and I'm only a--nigger. (Steps and shouts approach.)

G. G. (Retreating) -- I'll defend you; I'll be witness—the word of a Gwathmey will save you—quick.

(Le leaps out of the window, runs into the garden and disappears. Voices rise, and the flutter of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door.

SHERIFF -- Was that shot here?

CELIA (After sa long pause) -- Yes.

SHERIFF -- Did you shoot?

CELIA -- (Slowly) -- Yes.

SHERIFF -- Where's the pistol? Hand it here.—Was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God. -- Girl, did you do this?

CELIA -- Yes.

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT

A woman is accused

(The scene is the hall of the Gwathmey mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, the square and Court House. To the left of the front door are the doors to the parlor and dining room, the latter, slightly ajar. George Gwathmey is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

MRS. G. -- George, why don't you come to breakfast? We've been through an hour and everything is cold. You know your sisters have all the work to do now today.

G. G. -- Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (~~Looks at his watch and~~ moves slowly towards the door.)

MRS. G. -- But, George—

G. G. -- Yes, Mother? (He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

MRS. G. -- Of course, George, we all feel dreadfully over this tragedy, but really, it doesn't seem just decent for you to take it so to heart. After all, it's but a disreputable intrigue between one of those Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. G. -- Of course, Mother, but you see—

MRS. G. -- George, I wouldn't go if I were you. (He reaches for his watch and starts. His mother ~~glances at it~~ turns to him, ~~and he looks~~ at her.)

G. G. -- But Mother, I'm already late and —

MRS. G. -- ~~Jim found it on the kitchen table~~. Dear, you are not needed.

G. G. -- I'm a witness, Mother. As I told you last night, I--I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

MRS. G. -- But you didn't actually see the--the deed, dear?

G. G. -- Why no--that is--I heard--

MRS. G. -- And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. G. (Starting) -- I tell you I must go, Mother. You do not understand. I can't let that--girl--

MRS. G. -- George, I beg you to remember your mother and sisters. There is really nothing for you to do and no sense in your trying to defend a shameless girl. I'm sure we've always done all we could for Celia, and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my only son needlessly to besmirch the Gwathmey name, out of silly sympathy. I already have Judge Holt's assurance of leniency because of her youth and Lyon's reputation. They found two whiskey bottles belonging to Lyons and ~~a lot of~~ money which he was evidently paying her. She will escape the hanging which she richly deserves and is to be sent to the penitentiary--

G. G. -- My God!

MRS. G. -- Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance. Jim stands a moment panting.)

JIM -- They's a-waiting, sir.

MRS. G. -- Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

JIM -- (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.)

JIM -- But he don't need no watch.

MRS. G. -- I need it--to protect the Gwathmey name.

All of 'em—the Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just gwine to—to send her up, and she—Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come because you promised and—Oh, Lord, sir—

MRS. G. -- Jim, that will do. You may go.

JIM -- But you won't let—

MRS. G. -- GO!

JIM -- I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Gwathmey) I found—your watch and what you threw into the garden.

G. G. -- You damned sneaky scoundrel!

MRS. G. -- What did you find? Where is it?

JIM. -- I hid it.

MRS. G. -- Get it, and—and he shall go—with you.

G. G. -- Mother.'

MRS. G. -- Hush -- (with an imploring glance) where is it, Jim?

JIM -- Down yonder. (Pointing to the cellar.)

MRS. G. (Starting; then quickly unlocking the cellar door and holding it open) Quick; get it! (Jim hesitates) or—he will be late.

hmey name.

(Jim rushes down stairs. George Gwathmey leaps forward. Mrs. Gwathmey looks at him and slowly locks the door. They stare at each other silently.)

MRS. G. --George?

G. G. -- He'll escape by the doors.

MRS. G. --(Slowly) They are padlocked; I was afraid—last night.

G. G. -- Or the windows?

MRS. G. -- Barred, since your father died.

G. G. -- Mother—I must go.

MRS. G. -- Why?

G. G. -- She used --my pistol.

MRS. G. -- Your pistol? My God!

G. G. -- Yes, she killed him--

MRS. G. -- With your pistol?

G. G. -- Yes.

MRS. G. -- And you were there--you saw it all?

G. G. -- Yes; we were--gambling--and--

MRS. G. -- Then my only reason for hesitation is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, my son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den. It must never be know. Do you think the Lyons Klan would let her loose on your testimony? Why they'd lynch her and ruin us--ruin us. He's safe (pointing to the cellar) at present. Later I'll find a way to get that watch--if I have to kill him--inself-defense. Thank God! your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G. -- But the pistol?

MRS. G. -- Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? If it is, she took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say whem.

G. G. -- But Mother--she--she--it was self-defense.

MRS. G. -- Suppose it was--fool! Can we for a moment admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak--

(Jim is heard knocking within)

G. G. (Starts) -- Good God, (looks at the door) -- Look! (They rush toward the door.) (Celia with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. She stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling.

wringing her manacled hands.)

CELIA -- (Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am—sir. I—I ran away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I waght to be hung, but it ain't fair—I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You Know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then—you know I never hurt—Oh, yes—yes—him-but you said—you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I ran—I just ran—It was hard to run with my hands tied so—they didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard chains. I never hurt nothing—but him, Mr. George—and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right—Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the judge said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George. Oh think, always, always tied in jail with—with them men—quick, Mr. George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me—Oh, don't hold him, Ma'am—don't, oh—

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister scream of the mob is heard. G. G. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Cbdia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining room door.)

G. G. -- What do you want?

SHERIFF -- Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for—there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you—I'll teach you, you damn black—

MRS. G. -- Sir!

SHERIFF -- Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have this wench. You see, she ran away—bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a-chawing a bit of terbacco and damned---beg pardon, ma'am--off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you---

G. G. -- Wait--

SHERIFF -- The law, sir, the majesty of the law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G. G. -- What? Out--to that mob-- Never! I--

SHERIFF -- Oh, they ain't so wild. She'll be all right. I'll take care of her. Oh, yes, my lady, I'll see to you-- (Seizes Celia and drags her forward.)

CELIA -- But, Mr. George--you'll say something--you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on G. G. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. G. stands dazed looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands eric facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.)

CELIA -- Wait, listen! I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd like him out of it--So I lied because I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied. I hate him. I didn't kill Sid Lyons. He killed him-- it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.

MRS. G. -- Go—quick—the girl's mad— And Sheriff—I shall never forget your—kindness in this trouble.

SHERIFF -- Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts toward the door, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and greay dishevelled hair.)

CELIA'S Voice (dying away) -- I lied—do you hear?—I lied. He did it. It was his pistol.

(The groan of the mob is heard)

JIM (pounding within) -- Let me out! Let me out!

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

Justice is satisfied

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage to theright. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. Out the grated door in front one sees the square and the Gwathmey mansion. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.P

VOICE (without) -- Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you. (The lash of a whip and a scream are heard. Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

SHERIFF -- Say, Bill --

GUARD -- Say yourself, damn it. I'm near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

SHERIFF -- Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl--the pretty one I brought in today?

GAURD -- None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavins. This one's mine.

SHERIFF -- Oh, cut that --who got you your job?

GUARD -- You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o' niggers.

SHERIFF -- You're done up, Bill. What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

GUARD -- Now you're talkin' sense. (They drink and smoke)

SHERIFF -- Well, let's play; where's the cards?

GUARD -- In the drawer somewheres.

SHERIFF -- What shall it be--the old stand-by?

GUARD -- No--we'll change the game;--Seven-up.

SHERIFF -- Good.

GUARD -- That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

GUARD -- Shut up out there--or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence.) What's the stakes?

SHERIFF -- The girl, of course.

GUARD -- Not by a damn sight.

SHERIFF -- And a hundred to the loser.

GUARD. -- I ain't got no money.

SHERIFF -- Oh, your word's good.

GUARD -- Your's ain't. Gimme the whiskey.

SHERIFF -- Well the girl if I win and a hundred if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out five.

(They play, talking now and then)

GUARD -- High!

SHERIFF -- Low!

GUARD -- You lie--here's deuce.

SHERIFF -- fifty-two for game.

GUARD -- It's yours--my deal.

SHERIFF -- King leads.

GUARD -- Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

SHERIFF -- Whose deal?

GUARD -- Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

SHERIFF -- High, low, game. Two games for me.

GUARD -- (Showing signs of intoxication) -- Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

SHERIFF -- Bottle's empty--shall we quit?

GUARD -- No, by God--it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

SHERIFF -- All right--but booze! Wait till I get--(fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

GUARD (suspicously) Is it doped?

SHERIFF (angrily) -- I'm a gentleman!

GUARD -- Well--ain't I?

SHERIFF -- Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

GUARD -- Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

GUARD -- I played that ten!

SHERIFF -- No you didn't--You played the nine.

GUARD -- You're a damned liar--that trick is mine. You think you get me too drunk to see?

SHERIFF -- It's mine but we won't quarrel--take it!

(They play on)

GUARD -- Queen, high! Game! Two games for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

SHERIFF -- Hhh!

GUARD -- Hhh!

SHERIFF -- Hhh! (Rising with a yell) -- Game! She's mine--where'd you put her, Bill? And say! Watch that door. No mobs tonight!

(The sheriff lurches out to the right removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money. He walks to the jail door, unlocks, opens it and peers out. Then he turns in the open door and scowls toward the corridor where the Sheriff has disappeared. Behind him Jim appears running across the square, dishevelled and panting. He approaches the door stealthily and seizing the turnkey's pistol, presses it on the turnkey's back. Bill starts and then his hands go up. They both go slowly down the corridor to the right. A masked and hooded head appears at the open door. A scream is heard in the corridor. An armed and hooded crowd appears and the leader, Sid Lyons, throws off his mask. A shot rings out and then silence. As the curtain slowly descends the Ku Klux with leveled weapons slowly approach the corridor to the right.)

The Time,

1928, Springtime

The Place

a Town in Georgia

The Persons in the Drama,

as they appear.

1....CELIA, a serving maid, curled, pretty, and colored.

2....MRS. CARRINGTON GWATHMEY, a widow of the Newly Rich ~~lady in the land.~~

3....GEORGE GWATHMEY, her son and hope.

4....JIM, the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.

5....SID LYONS, a neighbor's son, white, and from but of high lineage ~~but of lesser breed and newly rich.~~

6....THE SHERIFF of the County.

7....THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

A MOB and GUARDS

41-6-238

pretentious

THE FIRST ACT

A man is killed.

(The scene lies within a little log cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate of ~~pretentious~~ pretentious but ~~decayed gentility~~ out of repair. Beyond a green and nodding garden looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey, ~~of long local lineage~~ widow & local mill owner, presides with daughters and a son. Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes out up the music of "~~Hallelujah~~" is just dying away.

41-6-239

The curtain discovers Celia looking eagerly out the window towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing facing the front window, her back to the audience. To her left is a door; forward on the stage to the right is a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings.)

CELIA -- Hallelujah, Hallelujah! we will shoo the—

(Out of the window a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters.)

CELIA -- Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

MRS. G. -- Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

CELIA -- Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they's mighty near done.

MRS. G. -- Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA -- There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. -- Celia—Oh, ~~—Mother!~~ Ma!

MRS. G. -- Why, George! (George is evidently ~~perturbed~~ at a loss, but Celia's wit brings ~~her to the~~ rescue.)

CELIA -- (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I've got the handkerchiefs done.

MRS. G. (recovering) -- Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full—the top drawer to the left—

G. G. -- Yes, yes; I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and ~~Mother~~ Ma, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the ~~Women~~ D.A.R. ~~Equal Rights~~ delegates—that is, Sid said so and ~~he~~ left ~~the~~ a note at the house.

MRS. G. -- ~~The Impertinence!~~ Hussy! Why, George, you know ~~I never go there. They are quite impossible. Equal Rights!~~ It's just a public vaudeville. And why couldn't old Mrs Lyons call herself if she wanted me! I've called on her, D.A.R.-ha) The Idea! ~~What Bright as much right & sun as most of them are~~ we coming to? ~~I have no desire to be a man.~~ O I knew you wouldn't go

G. G. -- ~~Yes, I thought so~~; but I saw you come in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

MRS. G. -- ~~They are quite unnecessary~~ Or wasn't necessary; very well, Celia, take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) Oh, Celia, you forgot Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket)

CELIA -- Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes)

Paint
G G Sure I might have known better than to expect anything Mrs G— George! How can you! I just like your father. Well I'm not sorry, and if these climbers are smaller what we've been

G. G. (Sauntering toward the door) -- Well, I'll toddle along.

MRS. G. (Looking at him uncertainly) -- I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and ~~escape~~ get away from the crowds.

G. G. -- ~~But, Mother~~, I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's the biggest day of the year. Sid and I—

MRS. G. -- George, ~~pray~~ don't ~~get too~~ intimate with those folks, you know. Remember

G. G. -- Oh, it's only Sid— he's a good sort. Well—

MRS. G. (Carelessly) -- And George—I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's a grown girl now, and you know ~~servants presume so.~~ how terrible talk. those Lyons' men can do things that —

G. G. (Hurriedly) -- Oh All right, ~~Mother~~ Ma! So long.

(Exit G. G.)

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and is seen moving up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen approaching accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

CELIA -- I tell you I ain't goin'.

JIM -- Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

CELIA (Obdurate) -- I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

JIM -- Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here in more'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

CELIA -- I done changed my mind.

JIM -- Celia, you sho' is pretty.

CELIA -- Oh, go long.

Can't have the Lyons mansion? O Mr! but really 1922-9-14

JIM-- Celia, when ah looks at you—oo, oo!

CELIA -- Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

JIM -- But, Celia, you promised.

CELIA -- I said piraps.

JIM -- But, Celia—

CELIA -- I got work to do—so go long and let me alone.

JIM -- I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't foolin' nobody. (Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square.)

(Celia turns away in disdain but watches him furtively and listlens to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; then she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, looks carefully out the window, then approaching on tip-toe, opens the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

CELIA -- What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight? And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. -- Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

CELIA -- Lordy! but you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him. Don't go, George— stay here.

G. G. -- I must go, dear, I promised; you go on to the circus tonight and say, I'll come back late—may I?

41-9-212

CELIA -- I reckon so—yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go out. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. -- Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up—go to bed—I'll waken you.

(They kiss, and he goes)

(Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

41-6-243

VOICE -- Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

CELIA -- Who is it?

G. G. -- It's me, Celia, open up.

CELIA (Hesitating) -- Hush, George; for God's sake don't make ~~so much~~ all that fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men.)

CELIA -- No, no, no, —who else is there?

G. G. -- It's only Sid.

CELIA -- Oh, no, he can't come in here. You mustn't—

G. G. -- Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

CELIA (Hesitating)--But wait—wait 'till I dresses.

(She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

CELIA -- Sh—please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear.

(Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L.--By God! A little beauty, George!

(G. G. frowns)

S. L. -- Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. -- Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. --(Laughing) -- ~~Oh,~~ Private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go. Of course it is usual — among gentlemen —

G. G. -- ~~Not by a damned sight, You've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.~~

CELIA -- But it's so late—

S. L. (Gaily) -- Late for cards—sure! But early for love.

CELIA -- And I ~~[illegible]~~ cards.

S. L. -- Here's the pack; but ~~[illegible]~~ where's the booze? We can't play without booze, and I'm devilish thirsty already.

G. G. -- We ought-a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a hidden us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, dear, got any of that home-made wine?

CELIA -- Oh, no.

G. G. -- I tell you—you run up to Collelly's and tell him—

CELIA -- I'm afraid—It's so late—and circus day.

G. G. -- Well, I'll go—

CELIA -- (Quickly)--No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. -- (Glaring at Lyons) -- Oh, well—

S. L. --(Easily) -- Let me go—this time.

(Runs out)

CELIA -- Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se afeard of him— them Lyons men — and Sile ~~just a gambler~~

G. G. -- Nonsense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a minute. We got in a game and he won a hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long. He's an awfully jolly fellow—he's all right. You see, we want to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and, by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Taint mine, it's mother's, ~~to pay a bill.~~ I gotta ~~get it back~~. Won't take long. ~~I wanted to show him that you're my girl. He said~~ you wouldn't notice no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long—

(He seizes Celia and smothers her protests with kisses. She resists at first and then caresses him. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S. L. -- Ha, ha— don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

41-6-245

Celia – But why did you flirt with him? you knows he's just a gambler. & Everyone in his family has been run out of town

G.G. – O he's not so bad & besides he's so damned Reserved I wanted to show him something. I just wanted to let him know that you're my girl & and I couldn't get you. Said

G. G. -- Come, we mustn't play long. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. -- What shall it be?

G. G. -- I say, let's change the game.

S. L. -- To what?

G. G. -- Seven up— best three out of five.

S. L. -- Good— and the stakes?

G. G. -- That hundred against my watch.

CELIA -- George! It's your father's—your ma— (Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table.)

(They play, smoking and talking here and there.

S. L. -- High!

G. G. -- Low!

S. L. -- Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G. -- Fifty-two for game.

S. L. -- It's yours. My deal.

G. G. -- King leads.

S. L. -- Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack—one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G. -- Well, what a hand--damn it, take it all.

(Celia, going to the window, tosses the bottle out.)

S. L. -- High, low, game—two for me.

G. G. (Showing signs of intoxication) -- Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

CELIA -- It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. -- Shall we stop here?

G. G. -- No, by God—it was best three out of five. I've got one odd. You've only won two.

41-6-246

S. L. -- All right. But we must drink; shall I—

G. G. -- No, it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

CELIA -- George!

G. G. (Straightening up and looking at Lyons) -- Of course, ~~sir~~ Sid, you're a gentleman.

S. L. -- (Wheeling on him)--~~Do you question it~~ Sir?

G. G. -- Beg pardon, old man—Oh, get out, Celia.

CELIA -- But Connelly will be asleep. You shouldn't rouse him.

S. L. -- You'll find Brown's back door open.

CELIA -- But—

G. G. -- Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in the half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her, smiling under lowered eyelids. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

CELIA (Whispering) -- Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silance intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

CELIA -- What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

CELIA -- Turn me loose—Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose—don't—

(The door opens and Gwathmey hastens in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. G. -- Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

CELIA (In panting whispers) -- Turn — me — loose. Stop, I say—

41-6-247

G. G. (Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you—turn her loose. (The match flickers out.)

CELIA -- (Screams furiously) -- Help!

G. G. (Strikes another match and in the flare stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L. -- Shoot, and be damned. (Draws Celia to him and kisses her.)

(Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence emsues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

11-6-48

CELIA -- Listen!

G. G. -- What did you hear?

CELIA (Opening the door cautiously) -- Nothing.

G. G. -- Sh'!

CELIA -- What?

G. G. -- I thought I heard somebody.

CELIA (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. G. -- Where is it?

CELIA -- Over here—it's all—sticky.

G. G. -- Ah!

CELIA -- What?

G. G. -- I slipped on the floor. It's all—blood.

CELIA (Moaning) -- Oh, my God! My God!

G. G. -- Hush! For God's sake—shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it—brace up. (They stand in the door.) Now, what shall we do?

CELIA -- Oh, I don't know—I don't know.

G. G. -- Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

CELIA -- I can't think—my heart's done stopped.

G. G. --(Whispering) -- Suppose I say he shot himself.

CELIA -- Oh, but it's—your pistol.

G. G. -- Well, then—let's see—we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train—

CELIA -- People might pass—and the blood would drip and drip—Oh!

G. G. -- Well, how about self-defense—I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and—

CELIA -- He didn't have no pistol—I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. -- Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

CELIA --(Breaks into hysterical sobbing) -- But who'd believe it—who'd believe you'd tell a thing like that!

G. G. -- Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar) God! Somebody heard the shot. They're coming this way. Celia, quick -- hand me the pistol. I'll stay out -- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

CELIA (Slowly) -- I might say that he — (She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

CELIA -- Oh, no, no, I dassent.

G. G. (Eagerly) -- By God! That's it —that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

CELIA -- But it's your pistol—and I dassent—I dassent.

G. G. -- I have it—I came in and drew my pistol. You seized it and shot him.

CELIA -- Oh, I'se afeared. What would they care. He's a white man and I'm only a—nigger. (Steps and shouts are heard approach.)

41-6-249

G. G. (Retreating) -- I'll defend you; I'll be witness—the word of a ~~Gwathmey~~ white man will save you—quick.

~~(The leaps out of the window, runs into the garden and disappears.~~

(She throws the pistol after him. Voices rise, and the ~~flutter~~ flare of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door.

SHERIFF -- Was that shot here?

CELIA (After a long pause) -- Yes.

SHERIFF -- Did you shoot?

CELIA -- (Slowly) -- Yes.

SHERIFF -- Where's the pistol? (She points out the window) ~~Hand it here.~~ —Was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God. — Girl, did you do this?

CELIA -- Yes.

41-6-250

CURTAIN

THE SECOND ACT

A woman is accused

(The scene is the hall of the Gwathmey mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, the square and Court House. To the left of the front door are the doors to the parlor and dining room, the latter, slightly ajar. George Gwathmey is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

41-6-251

MRS. G. -- George, why don't you come in to breakfast? We've been through an hour and everything is cold. You know your sisters have ~~all~~ the work to do ~~today~~. Now - we can't afford a house full of darkies & feed.

G. G. -- Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (~~looks at his watch and~~ Moves slowly towards the door.)

MRS. G. -- But, George—

G. G. -- Yes, ~~Mother~~ Ma? (He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

MRS. G. -- Of course, George, we all feel ~~dreadfully~~ awful over this ~~tragedy~~ mess, but really, it ~~doesn't~~ don't seem just decent for you to take ~~it~~ on so ~~to about~~. After all, it's ~~but~~ only a ~~disreputable intrigue~~ low affair between one of those Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. G. -- Of course, ~~Mother~~ Ma, but you see—

MRS. G. -- George, I wouldn't go if I ~~were~~ was you. ~~(He reaches for his watch and starts.~~ (His mother ~~hands it to~~ stares at him ~~and he stares~~ and he at her.)

G. G. -- ~~But~~ ~~Mother~~ Ma, I'm already late and —

MRS. G. — [illegible]. Dear, you ~~are not~~ ain't needed.

G. G. -- I'm a witness, ~~Mother~~ Ma. As I told you last night, I—I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

MRS. G. -- But you didn't actually see the—the deed, dear?

G. G. -- Why no—that is—I heard—

MRS. G. -- And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. G. (Starting) -- I tell you I must go, ~~Mother~~ Ma. You do not understand. I can't let that—girl—

MRS. G. -- George, ~~I beg you to~~ for God's sake gurl! remember your mother and sisters. There ~~is really nothing for~~ ain't a thing you can do and no sense in your trying. ~~to defend a shameless girl.~~ I'm sure the Lord knows we've always done ~~all~~ what we could for Celia, and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my ~~only~~ own son needlessly to besmirch ~~the Gwathmey name~~ our family name, out of silly sympathy. I already have Judge Holt's assurance of leniency because ~~of her youth~~ became she so young and Lyons had an a reputation. They found two whiskey bottles belonging to Lyons and [illegible] money which he was evidently paying her. She ~~will escape the hanging which she richly deserves and is to~~ would deserving as she ought & for killing a white man — she'll just be sent to the penitentiary for life and —

G. G. -- My God!

MRS. G. -- Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance. Jim stands a moment panting.)

JIM -- They's a-waiting, sir.

MRS. G. -- Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

JIM -- (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.)

252-9-14

Had a talk with

Celia's father told him he must get out of town & never come back. Lyons family had tried once before to run him out. Of course he would not be a white man but he promised to be easy on Celia

All of 'em—the Judge, the jury, C the Judge he was just gwine te—to just begged 'em to wait a minute.
promised and—Oh, Lord, sir—

MRS. G. -- Jim, that will do.

JIM -- But you won't let—

MRS. G. -- GO!

JIM -- I won't go 'till he goe
he won't tell. He was in the cabi Gwathmey) I found—your watch! and—

G. G. -- You damned, sneaky, sc

MRS. G. -- What did you find?

JIM. -- I hid them,

MRS. G. -- Get them, and—and he

G. G. -- Mother! Ma!

MRS. G. -- Hush — (with an in JIM -- Down yonder. (Pointing

MRS. G. (Starting; then quickl holding it open) Quick; get them!
(Jim rushes down stairs. George looks at him quickly locks the silently.)

MRS. G. (whispers) --George?

G. G. (whispers) -- He'll escape by the d

MRS. G. --(Slowly) They are p

G. G. -- Or the windows? Your

MRS. G. -- Barred, since your

G. G. -- Ma I must go.

(Hesitantly)

41-6-253

Celia. The testimony's all in and to send her up, and she—Oh, sir, she
. She said you'd come because you done

. You may go.

goes. He's promised. He knows what oin. I saw him, and (stepping towards ~~- what you threw into the garden~~ scoundrel!

~~d? Where is it?~~

he shall go—with you.

imploring glance) where ~~do it~~, Jim?
ng to the cellar.)
kly unlocking the cellar door and ~~(Jim hesitates) or—he will be late.~~ ~~Gwathmey leaps forward~~. Mrs. Gwathmey e door. They stare at each other e doors.

e padlocked; I was afraid—last night.
father died.
ur father died.

Mrs G — What is it? What are you talking about? Tell me!

GG ~~[illegible]~~ — of mine

J. I'll give him 5 hours — soon as he testifies for Celia

GG you damned —

Mrs G. George! Be quiet. It's all right Jim. You've always been a good boy. Give the things to me & George shall go — right?

(Jim hesitates & fumbles in his pocket)

Mrs. G. Heard? Somebody coming. Here Jim quick stick in here. ~~[illegible]~~ We'll talk later, George hurry! go! immediately

(opening the cellar door) (George closes & ~~locks~~ bars walks slowly & the door. Jim slides quickly into the cellar

41-0-254

MRS. G. -- Why?

G. G. -- She used ~~--~~my pistol.

MRS. G. -- Your pistol? My God!

G. G. -- Yes, she killed him—

MRS. G. -- With your pistol?

G. G. -- Yes.

MRS. G. -- And you were there—you saw it all?

G. G. -- Yes; we were—gambling—and—

MRS. G. -- Then ~~my only~~ the only reason for hesitation is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, ~~my~~ son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den! It must never be known. Do you think the Lyons Klan would ~~let her~~ see her get loose on your testimony? Why they'd lynch her and ruin us—ruin us. He's safe (pointing to the cellar) at present. Later I'll find a way to get that watch—if I have to kill him—in self-defense. Thank God! your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G. -- But the pistol?

MRS. G. -- Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? If ~~they get it~~, she took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say when.

G. G. -- But ~~Mother~~ Ma—she—she—it was self-defense!

MRS. G. -- Suppose it was—fool! Can ~~we for a moment~~ a white man admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak—

(Jim is heard knocking within)

G. G. (Starts) -- Good God, (looks at the door) -- Look! (They rush toward the door.) (Celia with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. She stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling, wringing her manacled hands.)

CELIA -- (Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am—sir. I—I ran away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I ought to be hung, but it ain't fair—I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then—you know I never hurt—Oh, yes—yes—him—but you said—you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I ran—I just ran—It was hard to run with my hands tied so—They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard chains. I never hurt nothing—but him, Mr. George—and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right—Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the Judge, he said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George. Oh think, always, always tied in jail with—with them men—quick, Mr. George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me—Oh, don't hold him, Ma'am—don't, oh—

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister scream of the mob is heard. G. G. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Celia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining room door.)

G. G. -- What do you want?

SHERIFF -- Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for—there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you—I'll teach you, you damn black—

MRS. G. -- Sir!

SHERIFF -- Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have this wench. You see, she ran away—bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a-cutting a bit of terbacco and dammed——beg pardon, ma'am—off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you——

41-6-255

G. G. -- Wait—

SHERIFF -- The law, sir, the majesty of the law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G. G. -- What? Out—to that mob— Never! I—

SHERIFF -- Oh, they ain't so wild. I know 'em all. She'll be all right. I'll take care of her. Oh, yes, my lady, I'll see to you— (Seizes Celia and drags her forward.)

CELIA -- But, Mr. George—you'll say something—you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on G. G. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. G. stands dazed looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.)

41-6-256

CELIA -- Wait, listen! I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd lie him out of it—so I lied because he said he loved me and I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied. I hate him. I didn't kill Sid Lyons. He killed him—it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol!

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.)

MRS. G. -- Go—quick—the girl's mad— And Sheriff—I shall never forget your—kindness in this trouble.

SHERIFF -- Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts toward the door, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and gray dishevelled hair.)

CELIA'S Voice (dying away) -- I lied—do you hear?—I lied. He did it. It was his pistol— get that pistol

(The groan of the mob is heard)

JIM (pounding within) -- Let me out! Let me out!

41-6-257

CURTAIN

THE THIRD ACT

Justice is satisfied

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage to theright. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. Out the grated door in front one sees the square and the Gwathmey mansion. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.)

41-6-258

VOICE (without) -- Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you. (The lash of a whip and a scream are heard. Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

SHERIFF -- Say, Bill —

GUARD -- Say yourself, ~~damn~~ god it! I'm ~~near~~ damn dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

SHERIFF -- Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl—the pretty one I brought in ~~today?~~ this evening?

GAURD -- None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavins. This one's mine.

SHERIFF -- Oh, cut that—who got you your job?

GUARD -- You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o' niggers.

SHERIFF -- You're done up, Bill. What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

GUARD -- Now you're talkin' sense. (They drink and smoke)

SHERIFF -- Well, let's play; where's the cards?

GUARD -- In the drawer somewheres.

SHERIFF -- What shall it be—the old stand-by?

GUARD -- No—we'll change the game;—Seven-up.

SHERIFF -- Good.

GUARD -- That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

41-6-259

GUARD -- Shut up out there—or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence.) What's the stakes?

SHERIFF -- The girl, of course.

GUARD -- Not by a damn sight.

SHERIFF -- And a hundred to the loser.

GUARD. -- I ain't got no money.

SHERIFF -- Oh, your word's good.

GUARD -- Your's ain't. Gimme the whiskey.

SHERIFF -- Well, the girl if I win and a hundred if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out five.

(They play, talking now and then)

GUARD -- High!

SHERIFF -- Low!

GUARD -- You lie—here's deuce.

SHERIFF -- fifty-two for game.

GUARD -- It's yours—my deal.

SHERIFF -- King leads.

GUARD -- Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

SHERIFF -- Whose deal?

GUARD -- Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

SHERIFF -- High, low, game. Two games for me.

GUARD -- (Showing signs of intoxication) -- Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

41-6-260

SHERIFF -- Bottle's empty—shall we quit?

GUARD -- No, by God—it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

SHERIFF -- All right—but booze! Wait till I get—(fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

GUARD (suspicously) Is it doped?

SHERIFF (angrily) -- I'm a gentleman!

GUARD -- Well—ain't I?

SHERIFF -- Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

GUARD -- Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

GUARD -- I played that ten!

SHERIFF -- No, you didn't—You played the nine!

GUARD -- You're a damned liar—that trick is mine. You think you got me too drunk to see?

SHERIFF -- It's mine but we won't quarrel—take it!

(They play on)

GUARD -- Queen, high! Game! Two games for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

SHERIFF -- Hhh!

GUARD -- Hhh!

SHERIFF -- Hhh! (Rising with a yell) -- Game! She's mine—where'd you put her, Bill? And say! Watch that door. No mobs tonight!

(The sheriff lurches out to the right removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money. He walks to the jail door, unlocks, opens it and peers out. A scream is heard. Then he turns in the open door and scowls toward the corridor where the Sheriff has disappeared. Then grins ~~and takes another drink~~. Behind him ~~appears running across the square dishevelled and pant~~ing. ~~He approaches the door stealthily and seizing the turnkey's~~ pistol, ~~presses it in the turnkey's back, Bill starts and then~~ his hands go up. ~~They both go slowly down the corridor to the right.~~ A masked and hooded head appears ~~at the open door.~~ A scream is heard in the corridor. ~~An~~ armed and hooded crowd appears ~~and~~ the leader, ~~Sid Lyons, throws off~~ his mask. ~~A shot rings~~ out and then silence. As the curtain slowly descends the Ku Klux with leveled weapons slowly ~~approach~~ file into the corridor. ~~to the right.~~)

Before the guard can turn he feels a pistol at his back. Slowly his hand goes up and he walks forward & the footlights & slowly as he faces the audience, Jim's face grows grey & slowly he puts both hands aloft & staggers backward Jim as above crowding back on him, tinsel & his back. He turns the ground around, sees the pistol & throws it on the floor, propels him out the door & locks it Behind door, Jim comes running & wildly waving a pistol & a watch. Behind Jim silently glides the Kw Klux Klan. Jim trips the pistol in the grounds. Hood. Silently his hands go up & he crosses toward the footlights. Jim recovers, looks left, then right & glares after the silent. The ground "Kw" hooded Kw Klux Klan appear at the fire escape, they batter it down & advance & file the Klan leads a yell he mounts Led by the grand they quash in any hand down and the corridor & the left. The Klan files in. Three shots ring out & light smoke drifts out of the right corridor. The leader of the Klan drags this head & shoulders revealed George Washington white & round. The other klansmen raise Klan guns & fire right & left. The curtain falls.

R. Dan moves & struggle is heard on the right. Jim rushes wildly to left. Jim

(1) 65.

SEVEN-UP

A Play in Three Acts

41-7-17

(2) 6b

The Time,

1930, Springtime

The Place

A Town in Georgia

The Persons in the Drama,

as they appear.

41-7-175

1....CELIA, a serving maid, curled, pretty, and colored.

2....MRS. CARRINGTON GWATHMEY, a widow of the newly rich, but poor again

3....GEORGE GWATHMEY, her son and hope.

4....JIM, the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.

5....SID LYONS, a neighbor's son, white and poor but of high lineage

6....THE SHERIFF of the County.

7....THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

~~A MOB and GUARDS~~
Convicts and a mob.

THE FIRST ACT

A man is killed.

(The scene lies within a little [redacted] cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate, pretentious but out of repair. Beyond a green and nodding garden, looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey, widow of a local mill owner, presides with daughters and a son. Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes out the music ~~of "Hallelujah"~~ is just dying away.

41-7-176

The curtain discovers Celia looking eagerly out the window towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing facing the front window, her back to the audience. To her left is a door; forward on the stage to the right is a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings.)

CELIA -- Hallelujah, Hallelujah ! we will shoo the--

(Out of the window a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters.)

CELIA --Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

MRS. G. -- Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

CELIA -- Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they's mighty near done.

MRS. G. --Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA -- There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. --Celia--Oh, --Ma!

MRS. G. --Why, George! (George is evidently at a loss, but Celia's wit brings rescue.)

CELIA -- (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I've got the handkerchiefs done.

MRS. G. (recovering) --Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full--the top drawer to the left--

G.G. --Yes? ~~yes;~~ why— I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and Ma, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the D. A. R. delegates--that is, Sid said so and left a note at the house.

MRS. G. --The hussy! Why, George, you know it's just a public reception. And why couldn't old Mrs. Lyons call herself if she wanted me! I've called on her. D. A. R.--the idea! I've got as much right to join as most of them.

G. G. --Sure! Pa said we'd been over-seers and ~~servants~~ squatters on many a Georgia plantations--

MRS. G.--George! How can you! Just like your father. Well, I'm not going. Most of these climbers are no better than we are no matter what we've been.

G. G. --O, I knew you wouldn't go; but I saw you come down in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

MRS. G. --It wasn't necessary; very well, Celia, take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) Oh, Celia, you forgot Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket)

41-7-14

CELIA -- Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes)

G. G. -- (Sauntering toward the door) --Well, I'll toddle along.

MRS.G. --(Looking at him uncertainly) I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and get away from the crowds.

41-7-178

G. G. --And pass the Lyons mansion? O Ma! but really I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's the biggest day of the year. Sid and I --

MRS G.--George, don't be so common and don't let those Lyons folks patronize you.

G. G.--Oh, it's only Sid---he's a good sort. Well--

MRS. G. --(Carelessly) --And George--I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's a grown girl now, and you know how ~~people talk~~ ladies are. Those Lyons men can do things that---

G.G. (Hurriedly) --Oh, all right Ma! So long.

(Exit G. G.)

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and is seen moving up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen approaching accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

41-7-179

CELIA -- I tell you I ain't goin'.

JIM -- Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

CELIA (Obdurate) --I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

JIM --Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here in more'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

CELIA -- I done changed my mind.

JIM -- Celia, you sho' is pretty.

CELIA -- Oh, go long.

JIM -- Celia, when ah looks at you--oo,oo!

CELIA -- Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

JIM -- But, Celia, you promised.

CELIA -- I said p'raps.

JIM --But, Celia--

CELIA -- I got work to do--so go long and let me alone.

JIM -- I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't foolin' nobody. (Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square.)

(Celia turns away in disdain but watches him furtively and listens to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, looks carefully out the window, then approaching on tip-toe, opens the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

CELIA -- What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight? And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. --Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

41-7-180

CELIA -- Lordy! But you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him. Don't go, George--stay here.

G. G. -- I must go, dear, I promised; you go on to the circus to-night and say, I'll come back late--may I?

CELIA -- I reckon so--yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go but. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. --Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up--go to bed--I'll waken you.

(~~They kiss, and~~ she shrinks away from him) and he goes)

(Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low and raises the curtain. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

VOICE -- Celia! Celia!

41-7-181

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

CELIA --Who is it?

G. G. --It's me, Celia, open up.

CELIA --(Hesitating)--Hush, George; for God's sake don't make all that fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men.)

CELIA -- No, no, no,--who else is there?

G. G. --It's only Sid.

CELIA -- Oh, no, he can't come in here. You mustn't --

G. G. --Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

CELIA (Hesitating)--but wait--wait 'till I dresses.

(She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, draws the curtains close turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

CELIA --Sh--please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear.

(Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L. By God! A little beauty, George!

(G. G. frowns)

S. L. Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. --Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. --(Laughing) -- Private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go. ~~Of course it is usual among gentlemen~~

G. G.--Not by a damned sight, You've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.

CELIA --But it's so late--

S. L. --(Gaily) --Late for cards--sure! But early for love.

CELIA -- And I ain't got no cards.

S. L. --Here's the pack we've played with; but where's the booze? We can't play without booze; ~~and~~ I'm devilish thirsty already.

G. G. -- I suppose we ~~ought~~ might-a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a put us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, honey, got any of that home-made wine?

CELIA -- Oh, no.

G. G. -- I tell you--you run up to Connelly's and tell him--

CELIA -- I'm afraid--It's so late--and circus day.

G. G. --Well, I'll go--

CELIA --(quickly) --No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. --(Glaring at Lyons)--Oh, well--

S. L. --(Easily) -- Let me go--this time.

(~~Runs~~ Goes out)

41-7-14
281-182

41-7-183

CELIA -- Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se afeared of him--them Lyons men--and Sid's--

G. G. -- Nonsense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a minute. We got in a game and he won a hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long. He's an awfully jolly fellow--he's all right. You see, we went to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and, by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Twa'nt mine, it's mother's--I collected some rents for her shacks. Ma is tight now since the stock crash almost cleaned us out. We won't ~~take~~ delay long. Don't be silly

CELIA --But why did you play with him? You knows he's just a gambler. Ef 'twuzn't for his family he'd be run out of town.

G.G. --O he's not so bad, and besides he's so damned superior I wanted to show him something. I just wanted to let him know that you're my girl. He said I couldn't get you, said you wouldn't notice if you wouldn't notice him no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long--

(He seizes Celia, ~~and smothers her protests with kisses~~. She resists ~~at first and then caresses him.~~ The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S.L. --Ha,ha--don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. G. -- Come, we ~~mustn't play long~~ haven't much time. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. --What shall it be?

G. G. --I say, let's change the game.

S. L. --To what?

G. G. --Seven up--best three out of five.

S. L. --Good, then we'll quit! And the stakes?

G. G. --That hundred against my watch.

CELIA --George! It's your father's--your ma--(Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table. Lyons smiles.)

(They play, smoking and talking ~~here~~ and drinkin ~~there~~.

S. L.--High!

G. G.--Low!

S. L.--Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G.--Fifty-two for game.

S. L.--It's yours. My deal.

G. G.--King leads.

S. L.--Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack--one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G.--Well, what a hand--damn it, take it all.

He ~~drops the flask~~ (He drains the flask)

~~(Celia, going to the window, tosses the bottle out.)~~

S. L.--High, low, game--two for me.

G. G.--(Showing signs of intoxication) --Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

41-7-184

CELIA -- It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. -- Shall we stop here?

G. G. --No, by God--it was best three out of five. I've got one odd. You've only won two.

S. L. --All right. But we must drink; shall I--

G. G. --No, it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

CELIA --George!

G. G. --(Straightening up and looking at Lyons) -- Of course, Sid, you're a gentleman.

S. L. --(Wheeling on him) Sir?

G. G. Beg pardon, old man--Oh, get out, Celia.

CELIA --But Connelly will be ~~asleep~~ a-bed. You shouldn't ought to rouse him.

S. L. --You'll find Brown's back door open.

CELIA --But--

G. G. --Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in the half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her, smiling, ~~under lowered eyelids.~~ Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

CELIA (Whispering) --Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Celia raises the curtain Jim is seen passing slowly. He ~~looks up the flock~~ pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

CELIA --What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

CELIA --Turn me loose--Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose--don't--

(The door Suddenly opens and Gwathmey ~~hastens~~ steps in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

41-7-185

G. G. --Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

CELIA (In panting whispers) --Turn--me--loose. Stop, I say--

G. G. --(Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you--turn her loose.

(The match flickers out.)

CELIA--(Screams furiously) -- Help!

G. G.--(Strikes another match and in the flare stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L.--Shoot, and be damned. (~~Draws~~ throws Celia on the bed ~~to him~~ ~~and kisses her~~).

(Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

CELIA -- Listen!

G. G. --What did you hear?

CELIA --(Opening the door cautiously) -- Nothing.

G. G. --Sh'!

CELIA --What?

G. G. --I thought I heard somebody.

CELIA (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do? G.G. is he dead Celia yes

G. G. --Where is it?

CELIA --Over here--it's all--sticky.

G. G. --Ah!

CELIA --What?

G. G. -- I slipped on the floor, It's all---blood.

CELIA (Moaning) --Oh, my God! My God!

9817-14

G. G.--Hush! For God's sake--shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it--brace up. (They stand in the door) Now, what shall we do?

CELIA -- Oh, I don't know-- I don't know.

G. G. --Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

CELIA -- I can't think--my heart's done stopped.

G. G. --(Whispering) --Suppose I say he shot himself.

CELIA --Oh, but it's ---your pistol.

G. G. --Well, then--let's see --we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train--

CELIA--People would sure see us ~~might pass~~--and the blood would drip and drip--Oh!

G. G.--Well, how about self-defense--I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and--

CELIA --He didn't have no pistol--I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. -- Hell and damnation! Then I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

CELIA --(Breaks into hysterical sobbing) --But who'd believe it--who'd believe you'd tell a thing--like that!

G. G. --Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar) God! Somebody heard the shot. Somebody spied on us They're coming this way. Celia, quick--~~hand~~ give me the pistol. I'll stay out--(She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

CELIA (slowly)--I might say that he--(She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

41-7-187

CELIA --Oh, no, no, I dassent.

G. G. --(Eagerly) --By God! That's it--that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

CELIA --But it's your pistol---and I dassent--I dassent.

G.G. --I have it--I came in and drew my pistol, ~~You seized it and~~ shot him.

CELIA --Oh, I'se afeared. What would they care! He's a white man and I'm only a --nigger. (Steps and shouts are heard)

G. G. (Retreating) --I'll defend you; I'll be witness--the word of a white man will save you--quick.

(He leaps out of the window, runs into the garden and disappears.)

~~Celia throws the pistol after him.~~

Voices rise, and the flare of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door.

SHERIFF -- ~~Was that shot here?~~

CELIA (After a long pause) --Yes.

SHERIFF--Did you shoot?

CELIA --(Slowly)--Yes

SHERIFF --~~Where's the pistol?~~ ~~(She points out the window)~~ Was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God.--Girl, did you do this?

CELIA-- Yes.

CURTAIN

41-7-189

THE SECOND ACT

A woman is accused.

(The scene is the hall of the Gwathmey mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, the square and Court House. To the left of the front door are the doors to the parlor and dining room, the latter, slightly ajar. George Gwathmey is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

MRS. G. George, why don't you come in to breakfast? We've been through an hour and most everything is cold. You know I and your sisters have most of the work to do now--we can't afford a house full of darkies to feed.

G. G.--Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (Moves slowly towards the door.)

MRS G.--But, George--

G. G. Yes, Ma?(He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

MRS. G.--Of course, George, we all feel awful over this mess, but really, it don't seem just decent for you to take on so. After all, it's only a low affair between one of those Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. G.--Of course, Ma, but you see---

MRS. G.--George, I wouldn't go if I was you. (He reaches for his watch and starts. His mother stares at him and he at her.)

G. G. --But Ma, I'm already late and---

MRS G.--Dear, you ain't needed.

G. G.--I'm a witness, Ma. As I told you last night, I--I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

MRS. G.--But you didn't actually see the--the ~~deed~~ murder, dear?

G. G. --Why no--that is--I heard-- and somebody must have seen us and got the sheriff.

MRS G.--And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. G.--(Starting) --I tell you I must go, Ma. You do not understand. I can't let that--girl--

MRS. G.--Girl! George, for God's sake remember your mother and sisters! What will folks say! you defending that black slut like she was a white woman. They'll twit us with being nothing but white trash and ~~not~~ born ~~superior~~ too low to look down on niggers ~~like the Lyonses and their gang~~. There ain't a thing you can do and no sense in your trying. The Lord knows we've always done what we could for Celia--you just can't keep colored girls straight--and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my own son to smirch our family name, out of silly sympathy. I already had a talk with Judge Holt. As luck would have it, he presides today. You know he was a close pal of your father and he's got no love for the Lyons family neither. He tried once to marry ~~a~~ one daughter. Of course he must act like a white man, but he promised to be easy on Celia because she's so young and Lyons had such a reputation. They found two whiskey bottles in her cabin both belonging to Lyons and money which he was evidently paying her. She won't swing as she ought to for killing a white man--she'll just be sent to the penitentiary for life and--

G. G.--My God!

Mrs. G. --Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance. Jim stands a moment panting.)

JIM---They's a-waiting, sir.

MRS. G.--Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

JIM--(Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.) All of 'em--The Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just gwine to--to send her up, and she--Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come because you done promised and--Oh, Lord, sir--

MRS. G.--Jim, that will do. You may go.

JIM--But you won't let--

MRS.G. --Go!

JIM--I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Gwathmey) I found--your watch, and--what Celia threw into the garden.

191-17

G. G.--You damned, sneaking scoundrel!

MRS. G.--What is it? What are you talking about? Tell me!

G. G. --He's got something of mine.

JIM --I'll give 'em to him--soon as he testifies for Celia.

G. G.--You damned---

MRS. G.--George! be quiet. It's all right Jim. You've always been a good boy. Give ~~the things~~ it to me and George shall go--right off----

(Jim hesitates and fumbles in his pocket)

MRS. G. Hark? Somebody's coming. Here Jim,(opening the cellar door) Quick step in here. We'll talk later. George, hurry! Go! Immediately.

(George Gwathmey opens the front door. Mrs. Gwathmey quickly locks the cellar door- slams the front door loudly ~~in his face~~ and then quickly draws ~~him~~ her son aside. They stare at each other silently.)

MRS. G.(Whispering) --George?

G. G.--He'll escape by the doors.

MRS. G.--(Slowly) They are padlocked;; I was afraid--last night.

G. G.--Or the windows?

MRS. G--Barred, since your father died.

G.G.--(Hesitantly) Ma, I must go.

MRS. G--Why?

G. G.--She used --my pistol.

MRS. G.--Your pistol? My God!

G. G.--Yes, she killed him--

MRS. G.--With your pistol?

41-2-14 261-192

G. G.--Yes; and Jim's got my watch

MRS. G.--So you were there--you saw it all?

G. G.-- Yes, we were--gambling--I lost some of your rent money--and--

MRS. G.--Then the only reason in the world for hesitating is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den! It must never be known. Do you think the Lyons Klan would see her let loose on your testimony? Why they'd lynch her and ruin us--ruin us. He's safe at present(pointing to the cellar). Later I'll find a way to get that watch--if I have to kill him--in defense of my home. Thank God! Your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G.- But the pistol?

MRS. G.--Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? Besides, ~~they haven't got it yet. If they get it~~, She took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say when.

G. G.--But Ma--she--she--it was self-defense!

MRS. G.--Suppose it was--fool! Can a white man admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak--

(Jim is heard knocking within.)

G.G. (Starts)--Good God, (looks at the door)--Look! (They rush toward the door.) (Celia with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. She stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling, wringing her manacled hands.)

11-7-19

CELIA--(Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am--sir. I--I run away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I ought to be hung, but it ain't fair--I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then--you know I never hurt--Oh, yes--yes--him--but you said--you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I run--I just run--It is hard to run with your hands tied so--They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard chains. I never hurt nothing--but him, Mr. George--and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right--Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the Judge, he said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George. Oh think, always, always tied in jail with-with them men--quick, Mr. George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me--Oh, don't hold him Ma'am--don't, oh--

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister scream of the mob is heard. G. G. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Celia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining-room door.)

G. G.--What do you want?

SHERIFF--Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for--there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you--I'll teach you, you damn black--

MRS. G.--Sir!

SHERIFF--Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have this wench. You see, she ran away--bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a-cutting a bit of terbacco and damned--beg pardon, ma'am--off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you--

41-7-193

G. G.--Wait--

SHERIFF--The law, sir, the majesty of the Law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G.G.--What? Out--to that mob--Never! I--

SHERIFF--Oh, they ain't so wild. I know'em all. She'll be all right. I'll take care of her. Oh, yes, my lady, I'll see to you--
(Seizes Celia and drags her forward.)

CELIA--But, Mr. George--you'll say something--you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on G. G. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. G. stands dazed looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and qickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.)

CELIA--Wait, listen! I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd lie him out of it--so I lied because he said he loved me and I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied. I hate him, the pale coward. I didn't kill Sid Lyons, I never killed nothing. He killed him--it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol!

41-2-195

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.)

MRS. G.--Go, quick--the girl's mad--And Sheriff--I shall never forget your--kindness in this trouble.

SHERIFF--Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts ~~toward~~ to follow the door, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and gray disheveled hair.)

CELIA'S Voice (dying away) --I lied--do you hear?--I lied. He did it. It was his pistol!~~--get that pistol~~

(The groan of the mob is heard)

JIM (pounding within)----Let me out! Let me out! Hears his watch!

CURTAIN

41-2-196

41-7-197

THE THIRD ACT

Justice is satisfied.

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage to the right. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. Out the grated door in front one sees the square and the Gwathmay mansion. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.)

VOICE (without) --Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you. (The lash of a whip and a scream are heard. Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

SHERIFF--Say, Bill--

GUARD--Say yourself, God damn it! I'm damn near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

SHERIFF--Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl--the pretty one I brought in this evening?

GUARD--None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavins. This one's mine.

SHERIFF--Oh, cut that--who got you your job?

GUARD--You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick of niggers.

SHERIFF--You're done up, Bill What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

GUARD--Now you're talkin' sense. (They drink and smoke)

SHERIFF--Well, let's play; where's the cards?

GUARD-- In the drawer somewheres.

SHERIFF--What shall it be--the old stand-by?

GUARD-- No-we'll change the game;--Seven-up.

SHERIFF--Good.

GUARD--That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

GUARD--Shut up out there--or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence.) What's the stakes?

SHERIFF--The girl, of course.

GUARD--Not by a damn sight.

SHERIFF--And a hundred to the loser.

GUARD--I ain't got no money.

SHERIFF--Oh, your word's good.

GUARD--Your's ain't. Gimme the whiskey.

SHERIFF--Well, the girl if I win and a hundred if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out five.

(They play, talking now and then)

GUARD--High!

SHERIFF--Low!

41-7-198

GUARD--You lie--here's deuce.

SHERIFF--fifty-two for game.

GUARD--It's yours---my deal.

SHERIFF--King leads.

GUARD--Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

SHERIFF--Whose deal?

GUARD--Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

SHERIFF--High, low, game. Two games for me.

GUARD--(Showing signs of intoxication) --Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

SHERIFF--Bottle's empty--shall we quit?

GUARD--No, by God--it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

SHERIFF--All right--but booze! Wait till I get--(fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

GUARD (suspiciously) Is it doped?

SHERIFF--(angrily)--I'm a gentleman!

GUARD--Well---ain't I?

SHERIFF--Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

GUARD--Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

661-7-14

GUARD--I played that ten!

SHERIFF--No you didn't --you play the nine.

GUARD --You're a damned liar--that trick is mine. You think you got me too drunk to see?

SHERIFF--It's mine but we won't quarrel--take it!

(They play on)

GUARD--Queen, high! Game! Two games for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

SHERIFF--Huh!

GUARD--Huh!

SHERIFF--Huh! (Rising with a yell)--Game! She's mine--Where'd you put her, Bill? And say! Watch that door. No mobs tonight!

(The sheriff lurches out to the right removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money. He walks to the jail door, unlocks, opens it and peers out. The keys are hanging in the door. A scream is heard. He turns in the open door and scowls toward the corridor where the Sheriff has disappeared. Then he grins as he faces the audience. Then his face grows grey, and slowly he puts both hands aloft and steps falteringly forward. Jim is seen crouching back of him, pistol to his back. He turns the guard around, seizes his pistol and throws it on the floor, propells him out the door and locks it. Jim hesitates, looks left.

41-7-200

41-7-201

A low moan and struggle is heard on the right. Jim rushes wildly toward it. The hooded Ku Klux Klan appear at the jail door. They batter it down. Led by the guard they rush in and pause. Three shots ring out and light smoke drifts out of the right corridor. The leader of the Klan drags off his hood and reveals George Gwathmey, white and scared. The other klansmen raise their guns and fire right and left. The curtain falls.

SEVEN-UP: A TALE

Section One

It was a little Southern town, with that characteristic combination of charm and tawdriness. On Lee Street, below the sprawling shining square, was the home of Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey. Her husband, Bill Carrington was dead. He had been a shrewd "cracker" from the hills, and had made quite a fortune from leasing Negro convicts. He married Imogene Gwathmey, whose uncle's father, before the Civil War, had owned a small plantation and a few slaves. Imogene consequently considered herself as belonging to the old Southern aristocracy. None disputed this, when she married money, even though it was encumbered by a "poor white". Mrs. Carrington-Gwathmey hyphenated her family name, kept Bill socially in the background and became an official of the local Daughters of the Confederacy.

Bill drank himself to death in 1915, to the relief of his family, which now consisted of a widow, a son of sixteen and two daughters, twelve and fourteen. Mrs. Gwathmey - the "Carrington" began to subside - began to handle the family finances with the help of lawyer Holt and they flourished in the post-war boom. The mansion was refurnished, the girls sent to a fashionable finishing school and George - named after the great uncle - to a military academy.

Then came the disaster of the panic and depression. The children came home from school. The lawyer who had been elected judge was trying to find work for George. The mansion sagged and the servants were now reduced to an old woman of allwork; a casual chore boy, Jim; and Celia. The family income consisted almost solely of rentals from a dozen Negro cabins whose denizens, being unemployed, paid but little and that intermittently.

Perhaps the greatest thorn in Mrs. Gwathmey's flesh had long been the Lyons family. They were well-known locally, of ~~poor white~~ planter origin, intermarried with Northern CARPETBAGGERS; BUT THEY HAD INVESTED IN COTTON MILLS AND HAD MONEY EVEN AFTER THE DEPRESSION; AND THEY PUT ON AIRS. THE MOTHER BROUGHT BACK THE NEWEST FASHIONS FROM NEW YORK; THE FATHER WAS RETIRED AND THE THREE SONS, INSOLENTLY HANDSOME, WORKED, LOAFED, DRANK, PLAYED GOLF AND RELENTLESSLY PURSUED WOMEN. MRS. GWATHMEY WAS PARTICULARLY OUTRAGED WHEN MRS. LYONS WAS CHOSEN TO HEAD THE State DAUGHTERS OF THE CONFEDERACY, and ~~MRS. LYONS~~ WAS NOW PREPARING TO ENTERTAIN THE STATE MEETING. IT WAS A SOCIAL OUTRAGE. THE GWATHMEYS HAD FAR BETTER RIGHT TO HEAD THE DAUGHTERS THAN A CARPET-BAGGER'S GRANDDAUGHTER.

CELIA WAS COLORED, EIGHTEEN, HEALTHY, VIVID, MADE FOR AFFECTION AND MARRIAGE, BUT HOPELESSLY FRUSTRATED BY HER CIRCUMSTANCES. HER FACE WAS NOT PRETTY BUT BRIGHT AND APPEALING, AND HER FORM WAS ALMOST PERFECT. MEN EYED HER BREASTS AND ~~THEY~~ TURNED TO LOOK AT HER LEGS; AND SHE KNEW IT. UNDER ORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES, SHE WOULD HAVE LOVED AND MARRIED JIM THE CHORE-BOY, AND RAISED A FAMILY. BUT JIM HAD NEITHER A REAL JOB NOR AN EDUCATION. HE WAS A GOOD-NATURED BOY OF TWENTY. HE HAD NEVER KNOWN PARENTS NOR A REGULAR HOME. HIS GRAND-PARENTS HAD BROUGHT HIM UP AND WHEN THEY DIED, HE HAD GONE TO WORK FOR THE GWATHMEYS, LODGING IN AN OUTHOUSE AND EATING IN THE KITCHEN OR ANY WHERE IT WAS CONVENIENT. WHEN THE GWATHMEYS WERE PROSPEROUS HE RECEIVED SOMETHING LIKE WAGES, WHICH ENABLED HIM TO HAVE A DOLLAR OR SO IN HIS POCKET, AND TO SUPPLEMENT HIS WARDROBE WITH STORE CLOTHES BOUGHT ON INSTALLMENTS. HIS RECREATIONS INCLUDED SOME HUNTING AND FISHING AND LOAFING ABOUT THE POOL ROOM, OWNED BY A WHITE MAN, BUT RUN OSTENSIBLY BY A NEGRO. HERE LIQUOR COULD BE HAD AND WOMEN ARRANGED FOR.

BUT JIM DID NOT DRINK MUCH, DISLIKING THE TASTE OF THE CRUDE SPIRITS AND NOT RESPONDING ESPECIALLY TO THEIR EFFECTS. AS TO WOMEN HE WAS ALSO RATHER GUILELESS. HE HAD ALWAYS ASSUMED THAT SOMETIME HE WOULD MARRY CELIA, AND EVEN IN HIS FEW CHANCE SEX EXCURSIONS, HE FELT RATHER ASHAMED AND DISLOYAL AND ALWAYS VOWED NEVER TO STRAY AGAIN, --AN EASY MATTER AS THE WANTONS HAD LITTLE ATTRACTION FOR HIM, PHYSICAL OR SPIRITUAL. HIS CHIEF PROBLEM SINCE the crash of the Gwathmeys' fortune, was earning money. He was not lazy -- in fact he liked work and went at a task quickly and thoroughly. But there had never been in his life any connection between work and wage -- between conscientious accomplishment and reward. He knew boys who got more money stealing and gambling, than he ever got by hard work. This did not lure him to crime -- he had good sense -- but it did puzzle him.

He knew and heard of colored folk who earned good livings; but how did they get their start? Of course, he knew that an education would help. But the local school was poor, crowded and ran but six months. He could go but irregularly at that and must now if he attended, be in class with little children who laughed at him. He heard of Negro boarding schools and colleges far away, but they cost fabulous sums of money and were for smart boys. He was not smart. He loved Celia and wanted, intended some day to marry her. But how could he support her and their children? He was always looking for jobs; but none came; or those that did, paid almost nothing for endless work. He was deeply puzzled and Celia gradually ceased to help him dream ~~did not help him dream~~ or make plan ~~any more~~ as she used to. Jim could not help but sense her growing entanglement with young Gwathmey and he was worried. He knew how these things ended. He saved every cent to buy her little presents or take her to the Movies once a week. But she showed less and less interest, until he was certain she was clandestinely meeting George. He was torn between a desire to bash George's face in and to plead with Celia. But it was dangerous to hit a white man. It meant jail, beating or death -- perhaps all three. What could he do? ~~He lived on the cast-off clothes and left over food of the Gwathmeys and chance earnings.~~ He could scarce support himself, much less a wife. And so while Celia liked him and had known him since child-hood, she could not think of marrying him.

Then too there was George Gwathmey. She had known him too since childhood, and played with him and Jim all over the Gwathmey acres. George was weak and homely, but he was white. He belonged to a caste which she was not supposed to aspire; and yet he was always tagging after her. When later, he began to make love to her, she was at first repelled, as though the thing was in some way unnatural; and it might have remained at that, had it not been for the sisters. They early acquired a sense of "race", and began to snub the nimble, impertinent little colored girl, and to try to keep their brother away from her; in this they were soon seconded by Mrs. Gwathmey.

The meetings of Celia and George gradually became more clandestine and more dangerous, because to the urges of adolescence added the romance of secrecy; and on Celia's part the thrill of circumventing the silly sisters and the white world.

When Celia's mother dropped dead, Celia inherited the cottage and washing; at first Mrs. Gwathmey thought of supplanting her; but who would do the laundry so neatly and subsist on so little actual pay? Secretly George of course augmented this when he could. Moreover, although, she tried to take notice, Mrs Gwathmey saw nothing more of the once feared association of George and Celia. The girls were still suspicious, but their social station gave them few and fewer opportunities to spy.

George Gwathmey desperately desired to be a gentleman with plenty of money to spend on horses, drink and women. This was not because he was bad or debauched, but he envied the splendid Lyons boys and he did not want the drudgery of work. He felt early the urges of sex and would liked to have gotten married to some one of the rich and pretty white girls he saw. But he was not attractive, he had no money and no prospects. Celia at first was a resource. He liked her and he stood higher in her regard, than in that of any other woman. Moreover she was physically deeply alluring; he sometimes doubted if any other woman, of any race and color, could possibly give him that feeling of worth and mastery that he had in the company of Celia. Moreover his increasing desire and her shy, yet evidently less and less determined repulse of his advances, let him insistently on. After all she was only colored; she could never hope for anything better than the affection and protection of a white man like him. He must of course ward off any chance of children. Here his friendship with young Sid Lyons was of prime help. Sid and his physician friends knew all the ways. But this exchange of confidences had one uppleasant result: he had in sheer boastfullness to mention Celia by name and Sid Lyons, master of philandering in all classes and races, took to noticing Celia's legs and light carriage; he was a bit peeved when she apparently never saw him. He bided his time.

This was the background of the week of our story. Celia, the serving maid, ~~was~~ pretty, curled and brown, ~~and~~ lived in the tiny cottage in the Gwathmey yard. Beyond a green and nodding garden, looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey lives. Out the window at the right, one may see the main village street, and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square, the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is heard before the curtain begins to rise; as it goes out, the music is just dying away.

Celia is looking eagerly out the window, towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia, with a sigh, turns to her ironing, facing the front window. To her left is a door; to the right, a bed, and opposite, a bureau. As Celia irons, Celia sings ~~the St. Louis Blues.~~

Out of the window, a lady is seen approaching from the Big House along the garden path. Just why Mrs. Gwathmey chose this day and time for a visit to the cottage it was hard to say. Perhaps the hints of her young daughters at last began to penetrate and spur her to watchfulness. After all, the lot of the Gwathmey girls was a bit unfortunate. They were too high-bred to have a career and too poor to be in society. They had little more to do than house work as elegantly disguised as possible, and ill-natured gossip. They too looked with envy and longing on the terrible Lyons boys and the boys in turn leered at them. But they were not pretty enough to seduce, even if that were possible under the eagle eye of their mother. For although Mrs. Gwathmey might be lenient and careless about her son, she was and had to be by her code, a cerebus with her daughters. Marriage for them was impossible, because of poverty and waning social prestige. Celibacy was nevertheless imperative. What else could the poor girls do, but suspect and gossip about the whole world?

Mrs. Carrington Gwathmey enters Celia's cottage.

Celia - Good evening, Mrs. Gwathmey.

Mrs. G. - Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces to wash and iron.

Celia - Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Gwathmey, they's mighty near done.

Mrs. G. - Well, let the rest go, and run along.

Celia - There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick almost furtive knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Gwathmey rushes in.)

G. G. - Celia--Oh,--Ma!

Mrs. G. - Why, George!

(George is ~~an anemic nervous youth and is~~ evidently surprised and embarrassed to find his mother at the little cottage, ~~Here~~ without doubt he has been a frequent visitor. He grows red and stammers, but Celia's wit brings rescue. She speaks hurriedly.)

Celia - Yes, ~~Sir~~, I'se got the handkerchiefs done.

(Mrs. Gwathmey is also perturbed. She doesn't at all like the idea of her son bursting into Celia's quarters so unceremoniously. It occurs to her that this is not the first visit and she is surprised at ~~her short~~ excuse about handkerchiefs.)

Mrs. G. - Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full -- the top drawer to the left--

G. G. - Yes? Why-- I must have overlooked them in my hurry; and Ma, by the way, Mrs. Lyons invites you to tea to meet the ~~S. C.~~ delegates--that is, Sid said so and left a note at the house.

Mrs. G. - The hussy! ~~Why, George, you know~~ it's just a public reception. ~~She wants a~~ ~~And why couldn't~~ ~~I've talked on her.~~ ~~the idea!~~ I've got as much ~~right to~~ as most of them.

G. G. - Sure! Pa said we'd been over-seers and squatters on ~~many~~ Georgia plantations for ~~——~~

Mrs. G. - ~~George! How can you! don't like your father!~~ Tha hussy! It's only a hubbie reception. Well, I'm not going. I'll have no carpet-bagger's daughter lording it over me. ~~Most of these climbers are no better than we are, no matter what we've been.~~

G. G. - --O, I knew you wouldn't go; but I saw you come down in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

Mrs. G. - --It wasn't necessary; very well, Celia, take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) Oh, Celia, you forgot Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket.)

Celia - Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes)

G. G. - (Sauntering toward the door) Well, I'll toddle along.

Mrs. G. - (Looking at him uncertainly) I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and get away from the crowds.

G. G. - And pass the Lyons mansion? O Ma! but really I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's the biggest day of the year. Sid and I---

Mrs. G. - George, don't be so common and don't let those Lyons folks patronize you.

G. G. - Oh, it's only Sid---- he's a good sort. Well --

Mrs. G. - (Carelessly) And George -- I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's grown now, and you know how darkies are. Those Lyons men can do things that----

(George answered hurriedly, "Oh, all right, Ma. So long!" And walks quickly away.)

The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and ~~is seen moving~~ up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia is seen ~~approaching~~ returning accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Entering the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

Celia - I tell you I ain't goin'.

Jim - Oh, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, hones' I got two dollars. (Shows the bills triumphantly)

Celia - (Obdurate) I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

Jim - Oh, git out; they ain't been no circus here in more'n a year and yisteddy you-was wild to go.

Celia - I done changed my mind.

Jim - Celia, you sho' is pretty.

Celia - Oh, go long!

Jim - Celia, when ah looks at you---oo-,oo!

Celia - Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows of and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

Jim - But, Celia, you promised.

Celia - I said, p'raps.

Jim - But, Celia---

Celia - I got work to do--so go long and let me alone.

Jim - I don't believe it. All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't foolin' nobody.

(Jim moves slowly from the window and walks toward the square. Celia turns away in disdain, but watches him furtively and listens to his dying foot-steps; then she peers out; she walks about uncertainly as if waiting; finally she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. George Gwathmey steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

Celia - What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight. And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. G. - Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

Celia - Lordy! But you's so careless. You's done made your ma suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus waitin' for you! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him. Don't go, George--stay here.

G. G. - I must go, dear; I promised; you go on to the circus to-night and say, I'll come back late--may I?

Celia - I reckon so--yes, anything you wants, dear, only I won't go out. Jim'll see me. It'll be so long waiting.

G. G. - Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up--go to bed--I'll waken you.

(She shrinks away from him and he goes out. Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. A while, she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after viewing herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low and raising the curtain. Jim peers in the window, then disappears. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens.)

Voice - Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door)

Celia - Who is it?

G. G. - It's me, Celia, open up.

Celia - (Hesitating) Hush, George; for God's sake don't make all that fuss. (She opens the door slightly and discloses two men)

Celia - No, no, no, - Who else is there?

G. G. - It's only Sid.

Celia - Oh, no, he can't come in here. You mustn't --

G. G. - Don't be afraid. It's all right. We had a game on when Connelly closed; we just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

Celia - (Hesitating) -but--Wait--wait 'till I dresses. (She closes the door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, draws the curtains close, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

Celia - Sh--please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear. (Enter George Gwathmey and Sid Lyons. Gwathmey is flushed and bright-eyed; Lyons, cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

S. L. - By God! A little beauty, George!

[redacted] - Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Gwathmey steps quickly in front of her.)

G. G. - Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Gwathmey and Lyons eye each other steadily; Lyons is the first to give away.)

S. L. - (Laughing) -- Private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go.

G. G. - Not by a damned sight, you've skinned me out of a hundred bones and we've got to have it out.

Celia - But it's so late--

S. L. - (Gaily) Late for cards—sure! But early for love.

Celia - And I ain't got no cards.

S. L. - Here's the pack we've played with; but where's the booze? We can't play without booze; I'm devilish thirsty again.

G. G. - I suppose we might-a staid at Connelly's place even if he had to close. He'd-a put us in back and he's got plenty of good whiskey. Celia, honey, got any of that home-made wine?

Celia - Oh, no.

G. G. - I tell you--you run up to Connelly's and tell him--

Celia - I'a afraid-- It's so late--and circus day.

G. G. - Well, I'll go--

Celia - (Quickly) No. (Glancing at Lyons)

G. G. - (Glaring at Lyons) Oh, well--

S. L. - (Easily) Let me go--this time.

(He goes out.)

Celia - Oh, George, you done been drinking again; and why did you bring that man here, I'se afeard of him-- Them Lyons men--and Sid's--

G. G. - Nonsense, sweet. I tell you he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I just wanted to show him. We'll go in just a minute. ~~He got in a game and he won a hundred. I must get it back. Won't take long.~~ He's an awfully jolly fellow--he's all right. You see, we went to the circus and then to Connelly's and had a drink or so. Then we got into a game and, by gosh, he'd won a hundred before I knew it. I gotta get it back. 'Twa'nt mine, it's mother's -- I collected some rents for her shacks. Ma is tight now since the stock crash almost cleaned us out. We won't stay long. Don't be silly.

Celia - But why did you play with him? You knows he's just a gambler. Ef 'twuzn't for his family he'd be run out of town.

G. G. - O he's not so bad, and besides he's so damned superior I wanted to show him something. I just wanted to let him know that you're my girl. He said I couldn't get you; if you wouldn't notice him, you wouldn't notice no white man. I told him I knew a damned sight better. Then I said we'd stop by here 'till I got that hundred back. 'Twon't take long--

(He seizes Celia. She resists. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

S. L. - Ha, ha-- don't mind me! (Gwathmey and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; Celia places herself near Gwathmey's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. G. - Come, we haven't much time. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

S. L. - What shall it be?

G. G. - I say, let's change the game.

S. L. - To what?

G. G. - Seven up--best three out of five.

S. L. - Good, then we'll quit! And the stakes?

G. G. - That hundred against my watch.

Celia - George! It's your father's -- your ma-- (Gwathmey motions her aside impatiently. The money and watch are laid on the table. Lyons smiles.)

(They play, smoking and talking and drinking.)

S. L. - High!

G. G. - Low!

S. L. - Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. G. - Fifty-two for game.

S. L. - It's yours. My deal.

G. G. - King leads.

S. L. - Got his Jack, by God! High, low, Jack--one game apiece. Whose deal?

G. G. - Well, what a hand -- damn it, take it all.
(He drains the flask)

S. L. - High, low, game -- two for me.

G. G. - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Celia, more booze.

Celia - It's all gone, and it's awful late.

S. L. - Shall we stop here?

G. G. - No, by God--it was best three out of five. I've got one. You've only won two.

S. L. - All right, But we must drink; shall I--

G. G. - No, it's my turn. (Lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

Celia - George!

G. G. - (Straightening up and looking at Lyons) Of course, Sid, you're a gentleman.

S. L. - (Wheeling on him) Sir? (Then smiling) with niggers as well as whites!

G. G. - Beg pardon, old man-- Oh, get out, Celia!

Celia - But Connelly will be a-bed. You shouldn't ought to rouse him.

S. L. - You'll find Brown's back door open.

Celia - But---

G. G. - Oh, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in the half-closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her smiling. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.)

Celia - (Whispering) --Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Celia raises the curtain. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

Celia - What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles)

Celia - Turn me loose--Oh! Oh! Please turn me loose--don't--

(The door suddenly opens and Gwathmey steps in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. G. - Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

Celia - (In panting whispers) Turn--me--loose! Stop, I say--

G. G. - (Steps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you--turn her loose.

(The match flickers out.)

Celia - (Screams furiously) Help!

G. G. - (Strikes another match and in the flare, stands with drawn pistol.) Stop, or I shoot.

S. L. - Shoot, and be damned! (Throws Celia on the bed.)

(Gwathmey shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

Celia - Listen!

G. G. - What did you hear?

Celia - (Opening the door cautiously) Nothing.

G. G. - Sh'!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I thought I heard somebody.

Celia - (Moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. G. - Is he dead, Celia?

Celia - Yes!

G. G. - Where is it?

Celia - Over here--it's all sticky.

G. G. - Ah!

Celia - What?

G. G. - I slipped on the floor. It's all--blood.

Celia - (Moaning) Oh, my God! My God!

G. G. - Hush! For God's sake--shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it--brace up. (They stand in the door) Now, what shall we do?

Celia - Oh, I don't know--I don't know.

G. G. - Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all in a whirl.

Celia - I can't think--my heart's done stopped.

G. G. - (Whispering) Suppose I say he shot himself.

Celia - Oh, but it's -- your pistol.

G. G. - Well, then--let's see--we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train--

Celia - People would sure see us, and the blood would drip and drip--Oh!

G. G. - Well, how about self-defense--I killed him in self-defense. Yes, that's it, and--

Celia - He didn't have no pistol--I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. G. - Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

Celia - (Breaks into hysterical sobbing) --But who'd believe it--who'd believe you'd tell a thing--like that!

G. G. - Hark! (Running and shouting is heard afar.) God! Somebody heard the shot. Somebody spied on us. They're coming this way. Celia, quick, give me the pistol. I'll stay out-- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles.)

Celia - (Slowly) I might say that he-- (She glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness.)

Celia - Oh, no, no, I dassent.

G. G. - (Eagerly) By God! That's it--that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

Celia - But it's your pistol--and I dassent--I dassent.

G. G. - I have it--I came in and drew my pistol. No, that won't do-- you had my pistol; you were afraid of Sid; you borrowed it -- or stole it, I came for it and you shot him.

Celia - That don't make sense. Oh, I'se afeared, and what would they care! He's a white man and I'm only a nigger.

(Steps and shouts are heard)

G. G. - (Retreating) I'll defend you; I'll be witness--the word of a white man will save you--quick.

(He leaps out of the window and disappears .)

Celia-- Here, take your watch. (Throws it after him)

(Voices come nearer, and the flare of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door)

Sheriff-- What's going on here? Where was that shooting?

Celia-- Here.

Sheriff-- Was anybody hurt?

(He raises the lantern)

Stand back! Murder, by God.-- Girl, did you do this?

Celia (Pausing) Yes

Sheriff-- What you got there? Gimme that pistol and come along.

Section Two

Mrs. Gwathmey was driven near to distraction. She seemed to feel the world falling about her ears. First there had been her disreputable husband, but he at least had had the grace to die. Prosperity followed. Then came the crash of 1929 and the loss of her wealth. Then there was the bitter struggle to educate her children, ~~and~~ to keep up some vestige of appearances and not surrender her very home to the mortgagees. Now to cap all came the entanglement of her only son in a wretched brawl which involved a Negro wench. She saw all the power of the despised Lyons' family ranged against her, to avenge the death of their good-for-nothing son. There was but one way of escape and she was ready to pay any price to keep her son from being involved and to put the blame where she knew it must belong, upon the black girl. She had heard about the murder late at night and sat up in the parlor in agony and apprehension the whole night waiting for George to return. She ~~had~~ did not hear him come in ~~but~~ and toward morning fell asleep on the couch. At sunrise she awoke with a start and rushed to his room. He was there fast asleep. She bathed and dressed and coming down stairs again, helped the girls and the old black woman get breakfast ready. She and her daughters ate in silence and then she drove them off on various chores to the fartherest reaches of the home. She talked long and feverishly over the telephone, watching the stairs the while.

It was ten o'clock. She knew George would be down to breakfast soon. She was keeping the breakfast warm and always watching the staircase. The broad front door was closed. Beyond it was a wide path and then up the street one could see the square and the court house. In the back of the hall was the dining room with the door slightly ajar and opposite the dining room under the stairs was a cellar door and a window. Mrs. Gwathmey stood taut. She heard George coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reached the landing, his mother emerged casually from the dining room.

Mrs. G. George, why don't you come in to breakfast? We've been through an hour and most everything is cold. You know I and your sisters have most of the work to do now -- we can't afford a house full of darkies to feed.

G. G. Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (Moves toward the door.)

Mrs.G. But, George --

G. G. Yes, Ma?

(He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly.)

Mrs. G. Of course, George, we all feel awful over this mess, but really, it don't seem just decent for you to take on so. After all, it's only a low affair between one of those Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. G. Of course, Ma, but you see --

Mrs. G. George, I wouldn't go out if I was you.

(He reaches for his watch and starts. His mother stares at him and he at her.)

G. G. But Ma, I'm already late and --

Mrs. G. - Dear, you ain't needed.

G. G. - I'm a witness, Ma. [redacted] I--I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

Mrs. G. - But you didn't actually see the--the murder, dear?

G. G. - Why no--that is--I heard--and somebody must have seen it and got the sheriff.

Mrs. G. - And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed, as she had confessed.

G. G. - (Starting) I tell you I must go, Ma. You do not understand. I can't let that--girl--

Mrs. G. - Girl! George, for God's sake remember your mother and sisters. What will folks say! You defending that black slut like she was a white woman! They'll twit us with being nothing but poor white trash, born too low to look down on niggers. There ain't a thing you can do and no sense in your trying. The Lord knows we've always done what we could for Celia—you just can't keep colored girls straight—and I'm willing now to do anything in reason, except allow my own son to smirch our family name, out of silly sentiment. I already had a talk with Judge Holt. As luck would have it, he presides today. You know he was a close pal of your father, and our legal adviser; and he's got no love for the Lyons family neither. One of them courted his daughter and wouldn't marry her. Of course, he must act like a white man, but he promised to be easy on Celia because she's young and Lyons had such a reputation. They found whiskey bottles in her cabin and money which he was evidently paying her. She won't swing as she ought to for killing a white man--she'll just be sent to the penitentiary for life and--

G. G. - My God!

Mrs. G. - Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the path and porch and Jim throws wide the door. ~~He is a~~ ~~stern cultured boy with dark hair and clear grey eyes.~~ He is breathing heavily and evidently has run at top speed. Through the open door, one can see ~~the street and square and~~ the court house in the distance. Jim leans panting for a moment in the open doorway and then gasps.)

Jim - They's a-waiting, sir.

Mrs. G. - Jim, how dare you enter my front door? Who is waiting?

Jim - (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Gwathmey.) All of 'em--the Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just gwine to—to send her up, and she—Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come, because you done promised and—Oh, Lord, sir—

Mrs. G. - Jim, that will do. You may go.

Jim - But you won't let--

Mrs. G. - Go!

Jim - I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Gwathmey and whispering) I 'phoned the sheriff and I found—your watch, what Celia threw after you. It's got your father's name in it.

G. G. - You damned, sneaking scoundrel!

Mrs. G. - What is it? What are you talking about? Tell me!

G. G. - He's got something of mine.

Jim - I'll give ~~him~~ it to him--soon as he testifies for Celia.

G. G. - You damned--

Mrs. G. - George! Be quiet. It's all right, Jim. You've always been a good boy. Give it to me and George shall go--right off--

(Jim hesitates and fumbles in his pocket)

Mrs. G. - Hark? Somebody's coming. Here, Jim, (opening the cellar door) quick, step in here. We'll talk later. George, hurry! Go! Immediately.

(George Gwathmey opens the front door. Mrs. Gwathmey quickly locks the cellar door (holds her son back and slams the front door loudly. ~~and~~ Then ~~quickly~~ quietly she draws her son aside. They stare at each other silently.)

Mrs. G. - (Whispering) George?

G. G. - He'll escape by the ~~doors~~ out.

Mrs. G. - (Slowly) ~~They are~~ It's padlocked. I was afraid--last night.

G. G. - Or the windows?

Mrs. G. - Barred, since your father died.

G. G. - (Hesitantly) Ma, I must go.

Mrs. G. - Why?

G. G. - She used---my pistol.

Mrs. G. - Your pistol? My God!

G. G. - Yes, she killed him---

Mrs. G. - With your pistol?

G. G. - Yes; and Jim's got--my watch.

Mrs. G. - So you were there---you saw it all?

G. G. - Yes, we were--gambling--I lost some of your rent money--and--

Mrs. G. - Then the only reason in the world for hesitating is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den! It must never be known. Do you think the Lyons clan would see her let loose on your testimony? Why, they'd lynch her and ruin us--ruin us! He's safe at present (pointing to the cellar). Later I'll find a way to get that watch---if I have to kill him---in defense of my honor. Thank God! Your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. G. - But the pistol?

Mrs. G. - Who says it's yours? Who knows it's yours? She took it from you. She stole it. We needn't say when.

G. G. - But Ma--she--she--it was self-defense!

Mrs. G. - Suppose it was--fool! Can a white man admit it? What would the darkies say? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak---

(Jim is heard pounding frantically on the cellar door and then George Gwathmey looking out the front door, starts and says convulsively, "Good God, look!" The mother rushes to the door and opens it; Up the long walk from the street with manacled hands and flying garments, Celia is running wildly. She stumbles into the house, bangs the door and for a moment stands trembling and gasping against it, working frantically her manacled wrists.)

Celia - (Looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am--sir. I-- I run away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said I ought to be hung, but it ain't fair--I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good. You know, Mr. George, you know how hard I tried and then--you know I never hurt---Oh, yes---yes---him---but you said---you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I run--I just run--

It is hard to run with your hands tied--so-- They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard ~~chains.~~ irons. I never hurt nothing--but him, Mr. George--and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right-- Hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the Judge, he said I'd have to go to jail forever, Mr. George. Oh, think, always, always tied in jail with--with them men--quick, Mr.
George, they're almost here. You won't let 'em hurt me--
Oh, don't hold him, Ma'am-- Don't, oh--

(Outside one hears the ~~trembling~~ thunder of feet and the sinister babble of a mob of men. There is a ~~thundering~~ sharp knock on the door and George Gwathmey, breaking from his mother's detaining hand, rushing forward, opens it while Celia retreating cowers at the foot of the stairs. ~~and~~ The mother stands straight by the dining room door.)

G. G. - What do you want?

Sheriff - Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for--there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you-- I'll teach you, you damn black--

Mrs. G. - Sir!

Sheriff - Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have this wench. You see, she ran away--bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a-cutting a bit of terbacco and damned—beg pardon, ma'am—off she flew. She gave ~~me~~ us a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you--

G. G. - Wait--

Sheriff - The law, sir, the majesty of the Law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(George Gwathmey stiffens and looks belligerent. "What! send the girl out to that mob? I will never do it." But the sheriff, concilliating, "Oh, they ain't so wild as they look. I know them all. She will be all right, I'll take care of her." He enters and seizes hold of Celia and drags her forward. "Oh yes, my lady, I'll see to you!" Celia, hanging back, pleads, "But Mr. George, you will say something won't you? You will speak." The sheriff pauses and gives them all a puzzled glance. Mrs. Gwathmey with her eyes fastened on George moves slowly toward the cellar door, knocks and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" George stands dazed, looking at Celia, then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect, facing the sheriff, menacingly. He recoils against the door.)

Celia - Wait, listen! I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (Pointing at George Gwathmey.) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Gwathmey killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free, if I'd lie him out of it-- so I lied because he said he loved me and I thought I loved him. Do you hear? I lied! I hate him, the pale, sniveling coward. I didn't kill Sid Lyons, I never killed nothing. He killed him--it was his pistol--do you hear? His pistol!

(The sheriff starts and hesitates and the growl of the increasing mob can be heard without. Mrs. Gwathmey intervenes. "Sheriff, go quickly, the girl's stark mad and you know I shall never forget your kindness in this trouble." The sheriff grabs Celia. "Out with you," he growls, and forces his way out. George Gwathmey starts to follow, but his mother closes the door and sinks on her knees with imploring hands and gray disheveled hair. Celia's voice dying gradually away, can be heard mingled with the execrations of the mob.)

Celia I lied -- do you hear? --I lied. He did it. It was his pistol!

(Within, Jim ~~continues~~ begins again to pound on the door.)

Jim Let me out! Let me out! Here's his ~~watch~~ knife!

(Jim hurls his body against the cellar door and his voice rises to a shriek. "Let me out!" "Let me out!" The mother rises quickly from her knees and moves swiftly toward the cellar. She motions to George and points to the dining room door. "The girls," she says, "keep them back! Shut the door!" George softly closes the door and cowers against it. With another lunge Jim bursts through the panels with shoulder and one leg. Then the hinges give way, and door and ~~the~~ boy fall together to the floor. In an instant, the woman is upon him. She grasps his shoulders and pushes his head to the floor while her weight on the door holds him helpless. "Hush!" she snarls. But he speaks rapidly, fiercely, wincing with the hurt of his fall.)

Jim "Don't for Christ's sake let 'em kill her! Don't send her to worse'n hell, that black Pen. I love her. Don't you understand? I love her better'n myself. I never had nobody but her to love. I know she don't love me. I knows it - but I don't care. She loves him, but I'll do anything to save her. I'll die for her. I'll even die for him. He loves her too, much as he knows how. Let me go. Let me -"

(Gradually her fingers were slipping up toward his head. She feels the hard hair in his neck. She smells the acrid odor of warm sweat and dirt. Fear shakes her body like an ague and then stiffens to fierce determination as she realizes that he cannot move; that he is at her mercy. Slowly she feels for the great pulsing artery in his neck. She squeezes and squeezes it, holds it hard till he gasps, strangles and is still; and then with horror filming her eyes, she faints atop his dead body.

Section Three

Out in the country beyond the town, in a region of gulleys and delapidated drab buildings, one hears the sound of clanking chains and sees the last three or four convicts of a long line filing into one of the buildings. Within is a narrow damp corridor, from the door of which ~~one can see~~ a mile or so away may be seen the Gwathmey mansion, the square and the court house. In the center of the corridor is a rickety table with a dingy lamp. As the convicts file through and out into the rooms where they sleep and eat, one hears a harsh voice yelling after them, "Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you." It is followed by the lashing of a whip and a scream. Later the guard enters angry and growling with whip in hand. He wears a dirty undershirt, neither coat nor collar, and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. He had lowered the bottle when the sheriff drives up in his Ford car, yells out a greeting which is received with a grunt, and enters the corridor. "Hot, ain't it," ~~He~~ says the sheriff as he comes in with a handbag, places it in a corner and drops into a chair. The guard says nothing and the sheriff glances at him doubtfully.

Sheriff - Say, Bill--

Guard - Say yourself, God damn it! I'm damn near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few dozen more of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

Sheriff - Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl--the pretty one I brought in this evening?

Guard - None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent-looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavin's. This one's mine.

Sheriff - Oh cut that--who got you your job?

Guard - You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o' niggers.

Sheriff - You're done up, Bill. What do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

Guard - Now you're talkin' sense.

(The sheriff goes to his bag, and takes out a bottle of whiskey. They drink and smoke and talk on indifferent subjects, the guard usually grunting his answers. Finally the sheriff says, "Well, let's play. Where are the cards?")

Guard - In the drawer somewheres.

Sheriff - What shall it be--the old stand-by?

Guard - No--we'll change the game; --seven-up.

Sheriff - Good.

Guard - That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

Guard - Shut up, out there--or I'll lash hell out of you. (Starts to his feet. Dead silence) What's the stakes?

Sheriff - The girl, of course.

Guard - Not by a damn sight.

Sheriff - And a ~~hundred~~ twenty-five dollars to the loser.

Guard - I ain't got no money.

Sheriff - Oh, your word's good.

Guard - Your's aint. Gimme the whiskey.

Sheriff - Well, the girl, if I win and ~~hundred~~ twenty five if you lose and here's the cash. Deal! Best three out of five.

(They play, talking now and then)

Guard - High!

Sheriff - Low!

Guard - You lie--here's the deuce.

Sheriff - Fifty-two for game.

Guard - It's yours--my deal.

Sheriff - King leads.

Guard - Got his Jack, My God! High, low, Jack and the game. One game apiece.

Sheriff - Whose deal?

Guard - Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

Sheriff - High, low, game. Two games for me.

Guard - (Showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

Sheriff - Bottle's empty--shall we quit?

Guard - No, by God-- it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

Sheriff - All right--but booze! Wait till I get-- (fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

Guard - (Suspiciously) Is it doped?

Sheriff - (Angrily) I'm a gentleman!

Guard - Well---ain't I?

Sheriff - Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward)

Guard - Let's see that trick?

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently. They look at each other fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket but the guard has his pistol out first. The sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

Guard - I played that ten!

Sheriff - No, you didn't--you played the nine.

Guard - You're a damned liar--that trick is mine. You think you got me too drunk to see?

Sheriff - It's mine but we won't quarrel--take it!

(They play on)

Guard - Queen, high! Game! Two games for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

Sheriff - Huh!

Guard - Huh!

Sheriff - Huh! (Rising with a yell) Game! She's mine-- Where'd you put her, Bill?

(The sheriff lurches out to the right, removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and slowly counts and pockets the money.)

SEVEN-UP.

------ by W.E.B. DuBois.

The Persons in the Drama.

1--- JIM, the colored chore boy, dark brown of face, with close-crimped hair.

2--- MRS. CARRINGTON JOHNSON, a lady in the land.

3--- GEORGE JOHNSON, her son and hope.

4--- SID LYONS, a neighbor's son, white, but of lesser breed and newly rich.

5--- THE SHERIFF of the county.

6--- THE CHIEF GUARD of the jail.

7--- CELIA, a serving maid, curled and pretty, but colored.

THE FIRST ACT. A man is killed.

(The scene lies within a little log cabin, single-roomed, clean, cheaply furnished, yet with some taste. One can see through the tiny window in front that the cottage is the servant's quarter on a village estate of pretentious but decayed gentility. Beyond a green and nodding garden looms the pillared Big House where Mrs. Carrington Johnson, of long local lineage, presides with daughter and a son. Out the window at the right ,one may see the main village street and, dimly, the square with its guardian courthouse. Through the square the last of a circus procession is passing and the fanfare of its clamorous band is just dying away.

The curtain discovers Celia looking out the window towards the square. When the last thrill of music has quieted, Celia turns to her ironing facing the front window, her back to the audience. To her left is a door; forward on the stage to the right is a bed, and opposite, a bureau; as Celia irons, Celia sings.)

CELIA -- La la la la la, la la la, la la la.

(Out of the window a lady approaches from the Big House along the garden path; Mrs. Carrington Johnson enters.)

CELIA -- Good evening, Mrs. Johnson.

MRS. J. -- Good evening, Celia, I clear forgot about the circus when I gave you those extra pieces.

CELIA -- Oh, I don't mind, Mrs. Johnson, they're mighty near done.

MRS. J. -- Well, let the rest go, and run along.

CELIA -- There, that's the last; now, I'll put them in the basket and take them up to the house.

(A quick knock sounds at the door; Celia starts, hesitates and opens; George Johnson rushes in.)

G. J. -- Celia -- Oh, Mother!

MRS. J. -- Why, George((George is evidently perturbed, but Celia's wit brings her to the rescue.)

CELIA -- (Hurriedly) Yes, Sir, I've got the handkerchiefs done.

MRS. J. (recovering) -- Handkerchiefs? Why, your drawer is full - the top drawer to the left -

G. J. -- Yes, yes; and Mother, Mrs. Lyons wants you to tea - that is, Sid said he left the note at the house.

MRS. J. -- The impertinence! Why, George, you know I never go there. They are quite impossible. What are we coming to?

G. J. -- Yes, I know; I saw you come in here, and I thought I'd deliver the message; of course, I made excuses.

MRS. J. -- They are quite unnecessary; very well, Celia,take the clothes up since they're finished, and then be off to the circus. (Celia starts out with the basket poised on her head) Oh, Celia, you forgot Mr. George's handkerchiefs, didn't you? Although, I can't understand how you missed all the others, George. (Celia sets down the basket)

CELIA -- Oh, yes, ma'am; here, sir. Good evening. (Exit Celia with the basket of clothes.

G. J. -- (sauntering toward the door) Well, I must be going.

MRS. J. -- (looking at him uncertainly) I thought perhaps you'd like to drive me to the cemetery this evening and escape the crowds.

G. J. -- But, Mother, I wouldn't miss the circus for anything. It's better than a play. Sid and I -

MRS. J. -- George, pray don't get too intimate with those folks.

G. J. -- Oh, it's only Sid - he's a good sort. Well -,

MRS. J. -- (carelessly) And George - I don't think I'd be quite so familiar with Celia, if I were you. She's a grown girl, now, and you know servants presume so.

G. J. -- (Hurriedly) All right, Mother. So long.

(Exit G. J.)

(The mother lingers a bit and looks about thoughtfully; then she goes out slowly and moves up the garden path to the Big House. Presently Celia appears accompanied by Jim. She is walking ahead rapidly and tossing her answers carelessly back. Reaching the door, she shuts Jim out and talks to him through the window.)

CELIA -- I tell you I ain't goin',

JIM -- O, come on, Celia, like a sweet, good girl; listen, honest, I got two dollars. (shows the bills triumphly)

CELIA -- (obdurate) I ain't goin'; I'se tired of circuses.

JIM -- O, git out; they ain't been no circus here in more'n a year and yisteddy you was wild to go.

CELIA -- I done changed my mind.

JIM -- Celia, you sho' is pretty.

CELIA -- O, go long.

JIM -- Celia, when ah looks at you - oo, oo!

CELIA -- Jim, you'se the biggest fool I knows and I tell you I ain't goin' to no circus.

JIM -- But, Celia, you promised.

CELIA -- I said p'raps.

JIM -- But, Celia --

CELIA -- I got work to do - so go long and let me alone.

JIM -- I don't believe it; All right for you. You'll be sorry; after all you ain't foolin' nobody. (Exit Jim slowly)

(Celia turns away in disdain but listens to his dying footsteps; then she begins to change her dress. The twilight deepens. A cautious knocking is heard at the door. Celia listens, peers out, then approaching on tip toe, opens the door). (George Johnson steps in quickly and closes the door. Celia rushes to him.)

CELIA -- What's the matter, George? Tell me! What made you come in broad daylight? And your mother here! I was scared stiff!

G. J. -- Pshaw, it's all right, sweetheart. I just dropped in a minute to tell you I had a date with Sid and couldn't get back until late.

CELIA -- Lordy! but you're so careless. You've done made your mother suspicion us, and I had to miss the circus! And I don't like Sid Lyons. I'se afeared of him. Don't go, George - stay here.

G. J. -- I must go, dear, I promised; but say, I'll come back late - may I?

CELIA -- I reckon so -- yes, anything for you, dear, only it'll be so long waiting.

G. J. -- Awful sorry, but you see, I promised. Don't wait up - go to bed - I'll waken you.

(They kiss, and he goes)

(Celia closes the door and sits disconsolate. ~~arising,~~ awhile she watches the night fall. Then lighting the lamp and drawing the curtain, she sews a bit. Finally she arises, and after views herself in the glass, slowly undresses and goes to bed, leaving the lamp turned low. After an interval, rollicking laughter and singing is heard. Celia sits up quickly and listens. There comes a knocking at the door.)

VOICE -- Celia! Celia!

(Celia, frightened, dresses partially in petticoat and shawl and runs to the door).

CELIA -- Who is it?

G. J. -- It's me, Celia, open up.

C. -- (hesitating) But hush, George, I heard somebody else.

(She opens the door slightly and sees two men.)

C. -- No, no, no, - who else is there?

G. J. -- It's only Sid.

C. -- Oh, no, he can't come in. You mustn't --

G. J. -- Don't be afraid. It's all right. We got a game on and just come by to finish it. We won't stay long. Let us in like a good girl.

C. -- (hesitating) But wait -- wait 'till I dress.

(She closes door and dresses now rapidly, now hesitatingly. They begin to laugh and sing again outside; with a scared look she tidies the bed and room, turns up the lamp and opens the door.)

C. -- Sh - please don't be so noisy; somebody's sure to hear.

(Enter George Johnson and Sid Lyons. Johnson is flushed and bright-eyed. Lyons is cool and swaggering. He stares boldly at Celia.)

L. -- By George! a little beauty, Johnson!

(G. J. frowns)

L. -- Here, little one, a kiss for luck.

(Celia shrinks back. Johnson steps quickly in front of her.)

G. J. -- Here, none of that, Sid; she isn't that kind.

(Johnson and Lyons eye each other steadily. Lyons is the first to give away.)

L. -- (laughing) O, private preserves, eh? Beg pardon. Well, suppose I go.

G. J. -- Not by a damned sight. You've skinned me out of a hundred, and we've got to have it out.

C. -- But it's so late.

L. -- (gaily) Late for loitering - early for love.

C. -- And I've no cards.

L. -- Here's our pack; but drink - where's the drink? We can't play without booze, and I'm devilish thirsty already.

G. J. (eagerly) -- Celia, got anything here to drink?

C. -- Oh, no.

G. J. -- Run up to Browns and get a quart of rye.

C. -- I'm afraid - it's so late - and circus day.

G. J. -- Well, I'll go --

C. -- (quickly) No. (glancing at Lyons)

G. J. -- (glaring at Lyons) Oh, well -

L. (easily) -- Let me go - this time.

(Runs out)

C. -- Oh, George, you've been drinking and why did you bring that man here? I'se afeard of him.

G. J. -- Nonsense, sweet, he wouldn't believe you'd let me in and I wanted to show him. We'll go in a minute. We got in a game and he won a hundred. I must get it back. He's an awfully jolly fellow - he's all right.

(He seizes Celia and smothers her protests with kisses. She resists at first and then caresses him. The door opens suddenly and Lyons enters with a flask.)

L.-- Ha, ha -- don't let me interrupt. (Johnson and Celia both look up shamefacedly. The men move to the table and sit down; ~~and~~ Celia ~~moves~~ places herself near Johnson's chair, now and then stepping to the window and peering out.)

G. J. -- Come, we mustn't play long. It won't take me long to go broke or break even.

L. -- What shall it be?

G. J. -- I say, let's change the game.

L. -- To what?

G. J. -- Seven up -- best three out of five.

L. -- Good - and the stakes?

G. J. -- A hundred against my watch.

L. -- Done! Celia, pour the drinks.

(They play, smoking and talking ~~now~~ here and ~~then~~ there.)

L. -- High!

G. J. -- Low!

L. -- Pardon me, here's deuce.

G. J. -- Fifty-two for game.

L. -- It's yours. My deal.

G. J. -- King leads.

L. -- Get his Jack, by God. High low Jack - one game apiece.

L. -- Whose deal?

G. J. -- Well, what a hand - Damn it, take it all.

L. -- High low game - two for me.

G. J. -- (showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Celia - more booze.

C. -- It's all gone, and it's awful late.

L. -- Shall we stop here?

G. J. -- No, by God - it was best three out of five. You've only won two.

L. -- All right. But we must drink; shall I -

G. J. -- No, it's my turn. (lurches to his feet. Celia also starts up.)

C. -- George!

G. J. -- (straightening up and looking at L.) Of course, sir, you're a gentleman.

L. -- (Wheeling on him) Do you question it?

G. J. -- Beg pardon, old man -- Oh, get out, Celia.

C.-- But the saloons are closed.

G. J. -- I'LL knock 'em up.

C. -- But -

G. J. -- O, don't be a fool! (Lurches out. Celia stands in the half closed door. Lyons dallies with the cards and watches her narrowly under lowered eyelids. Footsteps are heard along the road. Celia closes the door quickly and hastens to the window.

C. -- (whispering) Put out the light.

(Lyons puts the light out. Jim is seen passing slowly. He pauses, looks at the cabin and then goes on. Darkness and silence intervene and then the sound of stealthy moving in the cabin.)

C. -- What's that? (Lyons seizes her. She gives a low scream and struggles.)

C. -- Let me alone - Oh! Oh! ~~Let~~ turn me loose, I say.

(The door opens and Johnson hastens in. He stands uncertain in the gloom.)

G. J. -- Celia? What's wrong? Sid?

C. -- (in panting whispers) ~~Let~~ turn - me - loose. Stop, I say --

G. J. -- (Leaps forward and strikes a match. He sees Celia struggling with Lyons at the edge of the bed.) Damn you - turn her loose. (The match flickers out.)

C. -- (screams furiously) -- Help!

G. J. -- (strikes another match and in the flare stands with drawn pistol). Stop, or I shoot.

LYONS -- Shoot, and be damned. (Draws Celia to him and kisses her)

(Johnson shoots. Lyons falls heavily. The match goes out. A long silence ensues; then a furtive moving to and fro.)

C. -- Listen!

G. J. -- What did you hear?

C. -- (Opening the door cautiously) Nothing.

G. J. -- Sh'.

C. -- What?

G. J. -- I thought I heard somebody.

C. -- (moaning) Oh, my God, what will we do?

G. J. -- Where is it?

C. -- Over there -- it's all sticky.

G. J. -- Ah!

C. -- What?

G. J. -- I slipped on the floor. It's all - blood.

C. -- (moaning) O, my God! My God!

G. J. -- Hush! - for God's sake -- shut up. Come here to the air, drink this; that's it - brace up. (They stand in the door) Now, what shall we do?

C. -- Oh, I don't know -- I don't know.

G. J. -- Hush! You must help me think it out. My head's all a whirl.

C. -- I can't think -- my heart's done stopped.

G. J.-- (whispering) Suppose I say he shot himself.

C. -- O, but it's your pistol.

G. J. -- Well, then - let's see - we might tote him to the railroad track and let the train --

C. -- But the blood would drip and drip -- Oh!

G. J. -- Well, how about self defense -- I killed him in self defense. Yes, that's it, and -

C.-- He didn't have no pistol -- I felt to see; and they'd know yours.

G. J. -- Hell and damnation! Then, I'll tell the truth. I killed him defending you. That's it. I'll tell the truth.

C. -- (breaks into hysterical sobbing) But who'd believe it -- who'd believe it?

G. J. -- Hark! (running and shouting is heard afar) God! They heard the shot. They're coming this way. Celia, quick -- hand me the pistol. I'll stay out -- (She stands with the pistol in her hand and he suddenly hesitates. She, too, starts and trembles)

C. -- (slowly) I might say that I -- (she glances back at the body, terrified. He steps forward with fascinated eagerness).

C. -- Oh, no, no, I dare not.

G. J. -- (eagerly) Heavens! That's it -- that's just it. I was coming by. I heard a struggle and scream. I rushed in. He was attacking you. Just as I came in, you shot.

C. -- But it's your pistol - and I don't dare - I don't dare.

G. J. -- Throw it away -- here! (He throws it into the garden) Now, say that you threw it away -- over yon way (pointing to the road).

C. -- Oh, I'se afeared. What would they care. He's a white man and I'm only a -- nigger. (Steps and shouts come nearer)

G. J. -- (retreating) I'll defend you; I'll be witness -- the word of a Johnson will save you - quick.

(He steps out of the cabin, runs into the garden and disappears. Voices rise, and the flutter of lanterns. The sheriff appears in the door)

SHERIFF -- Was that shot here?

C.-- (after a long pause) - Yes.

SHER. -- Did you shoot?

C. -- (slowly) Yes.

SHER. --Where's the pistol -- was anyone hurt? Stand back! (He raises his lantern.) Murder, by God. -- Girl, did you do this?

C. -- Yes!

CURTAIN.

ACT TWO.

A Woman is Punished.)

(The scene is the hall of the Johnson mansion. In front and somewhat to the left is the broad front door, closed. Down toward it, and away from the audience, the great staircase leads. Under the stairs lurk a small cellar door and a window. Out of the window may be seen a garden and beyond it, Celia's cottage. To the left of the front door is the door to the dining room, slightly ajar. George Johnson is coming down the stairs cautiously, hat in hand. As he reaches the landing his mother emerges from the dining room.)

MRS. J. -- George, why don't you come to breakfast? We've been through an hour and everything is cold. Your sisters have all the work to do now.

G. J. -- Thanks, Mother, I don't think I care for breakfast. (Looks at his watch and moves slowly towards the door.)

MRS. J. -- But, George ---

G. J. -- Yes, Mother? (He pauses, nervous and hollow-eyed. His mother regards him narrowly)

MRS. J. -- Of course, George, we all feel dreadfully over this tragedy, but really, it doesn't seem just decent for you to take it so to heart. After all, it's but a disreputable intrigue between one of those Lyons men and a colored girl.

G. J. -- Of course, Mother, but you see --

MRS. J. -- George, I wouldn't go if I were you.

G. J. -- But, Mother, I'm already late and --

MRS. J. -- Dear, you are not needed.

G. J. -- I'm a witness, Mother. As I told you last night, I - I saw him go there. (He glances out of the window and shudders.)

MRS. J. -- But you didn't actually see the - the deed, dear?

G. J. -- Why, no - that is - I heard -

MRS. J. -- And I told Judge Holt this morning that much over the 'phone; he said you would not be needed as she had confessed.

G. J. -- (starting) I tell you I must go, Mother. You do not understand. I can't let that - that girl -

MRS. J. -- George, I beg you to remember your mother and sisters. There is really nothing for you to do and no sense in your trying to defend a shameless girl. I'm sure we've always done all we could for Celia, and I'm willing now to do anything in reason except allow my only son needlessly to besmirch the Johnson name, out of silly sympathy. I already have Judge Holt's assurance of leniency because of her youth and Lyon's reputation. She will escape the hanging which she deserves and is to be sent to the penetentiary -

G. J. -- My God!

MRS. J. -- Hark!

(Rapid footsteps are heard on the porch, and Jim throws wide the door. The street appears and the square and court house in the distance. Jim stands a moment panting.)

JIM -- They's a-waiting, sir.

MRS. J. -- Jim, how dare you enter my house thus? Who is waiting?

JIM -- (Without flinching and looking steadily at George Johnson) All of 'em - the Judge, the jury, Celia. The testimony's all in and the Judge he was just going to - to send her up, and she - Oh, sir, she just begged 'em to wait a minute. She said you'd come because you'd promised and - O, Lord, sir -

MRS. J. -- Jim, that will do. You may go.

JIM -- But you won't let -

MRS. J. -- GO!

JIM -- I won't go 'till he goes. He's promised. He knows what he won't tell. He was in the cabin. I saw him, and (stepping towards Johnson) I found what you threw into the garden.

G.J. — You damned sneaking scoundrel —

Mrs J. ~~G. J.~~ -- What did you find? Where is it?

JIM -- I hid it.

MRS. J. -- Get it, and - and he shall go - with you.

G. J. -- Mother!

MRS. J. -- Hush -- (with an imploring glance) where is it, Jim?

JIM -- Down yonder. (pointing to the cellar.)

MRS. J. -- (starting; then quickly unlocking the cellar door and holding it open) Quick; get it! (Jim hesitates) or - he will be late.

(Jim rushes down stairs. George Johnson leaps forward. Mrs. J. looks at him and slowly locks the door. They stare at each other silently.)

MRS. J. -- George?

G. J. -- He'll escape by the trap doors.

MRS. J. -- (slowly) They are padlocked; I was afraid -- last night.

G. J. -- Or the windows.

MRS. J. -- Barred, since your father died.

G. J. -- Mother, - I must go.

MRS. J. -- Why?

G. J. -- Jim has found my pistol.

MRS. J. -- Your pistol?

G. J. -- Yes, she killed him -

MRS. J. -- With your pistol?

G. J. -- Yes.

MRS. J. -- And you were there -- you saw it all?

G. J. -- Yes; we were -- gambling, - and ---

MRS. J. -- Then my only reason for hesitation is gone. She is guilty and you saw the murder. Let her go to jail. It will be an awful lesson for you, my son. Merciful heavens! My son gambling in a wench's den. It must never be known. He's safe. (pointing to the cellar) at present. Later I'll find a way to get the pistol. Thank God! your testimony is unnecessary and more than useless since she has confessed.

G. J. -- But the provocation, Mother - she - she - it was self defense.

MRS. J. -- Suppose it was - fool! Can we for a moment admit it? What would the darkies believe? What would the whites think? George, you must keep silence. Why, if you dared speak -

(Jim is heard knocking within)

G. J. -- (starts) Good God - looks out the door) Look! (They rush toward the door). (A brown girl with manacled hands and flying garments is running wildly up the walk. Celia, the brown girl, stumbles into the house and bangs the door to. For a moment she gasps and stands trembling, wringing her manacled hands.)

C. -- (looking from one to the other) I begs pardon, ma'am - sir. I - I ran away. They wouldn't wait, sir, they wouldn't wait for you and I knowed you was coming. The Judge, he said, I ought to be killed, but it ain't fair - I never hurt nothing. I tried to be good - You know, Mr. George, you know I never hurt - O, yes - yes - him - but you said - you promised and I knowed you'd come, so I ran - I just ran - It was hard to run with my hands tied so - They didn't ought to tie my hands with such hard iron. I never hurt nothing - but him, Mr. George - and now you'll come, I know, Mr. George, you'll come and it'll be all right - hark! They'se coming after me now. You won't let them take me, sir; the judge said I'd have to jail forever.- Mr. George, - O, think, always, always tied in jail - quick, Mr. George, they're here. You won't let them hurt me - O, don't hold him, ma'am - don't, oh -

(The sheriff thunders on the door. The sinister wail of the mob is heard. G. J. breaks from his mother's detaining hand and rushes to the door. Celia cowers in the center of the stage toward the front. The mother stands by the dining room door.)

G. J. -- What do you want, sir?

SHER.-- Beg pardon, sir, but I am looking for - there's that damn wench now. I'll pay you, lady, when I gits my hands on you - I'll teach you, you damn black -

MRS. J. -- Sir!

SHER. -- Beg pardon, ma'am, didn't see you, ma'am. But I must have this wench. You see, she ran away - bolted right out of court, just after she was sentenced to the pen. I was a-cutting a bit of terbacco and damned - beg pardon, ma'am -- off she flew. She gave me a hell of a run, too. Come here now, you -

G. J. - Wait -

SHER. -- The law, sir, the majesty of the law! Here's my badge, and them boys out there is ugly.

(The growl of the mob is heard)

G. J. -- What? out - to that mob -- Never! I -

SHER. -- Oh, they ain't so wild. She'll be all right. I'll take care of her O, yes, my lady, I'll see to you -- (seizes C. and drags her forward)

C. -- But, Mr. George - you'll say something - you'll speak?

(A pause. The sheriff gives a puzzled glance at each. Mrs. Johnson with her eyes fastened on G. J. moves slowly toward the cellar door and absently inserts the key. A shuffling is heard within; then a knock and a muffled voice: "Here it is! Here it is!" G. J. stands dazed looking at C., then at the sheriff, lastly at his mother. At the voice he starts and quickly turns his back on Celia. Celia's hands drop. A moment she sways and then stands erect facing the sheriff. He recoils against the door.

C. -- Wait, listen! I didn't kill Sid Lyons. I never touched him. (pointing at George Johnson) He killed Sid Lyons. Do you hear? George Johnson killed him with his own pistol. He promised to get me free if I'd lie him out of it - So I lied - Do you hear? - I lied. - I didn't kill him. - He killed him.

(The mother totters forward. The sheriff stares. The wail of the mob rises again.

MRS. J. -- Go - quick - the girl's mad.

SHER. -- Out with you.

(The sheriff forces his way out. George Johnson starts toward the door, but his mother closes it and sinks on her knees beside him with imploring hands and grey dishevelled hair.)

CELIA'S Voice (dying away) -- I lied - do you hear? - I lied.

(The groan of the mob is heard)

JIM -- (pounding within) Let me out! Let me out!

CURTAIN

EPILOGUE.

(There comes a sound of clanking chains, and as the curtain rises, the last two or three convicts of a long line are seen filing off the stage. The curtain discloses a narrow damp corridor. In the center is a rickety table with a dingy lamp.)

VOICE (without) -- Move, damn you, or I'll strip the black hide off you. (The lash of a whip and a scream is heard. Enter the guard angry and scowling, with whip in hand and pistol protruding from his hip pocket. He wears neither coat nor collar and one sleeve is rolled to his shoulder. He throws the whip to the floor and lounges in the chair. Then he drinks greedily from a flask. The sheriff hurries in, with a hand bag which he places in the corner.)

SHER. -- Say, Bill -

GUARD. -- Say yourself, damn it. I'm near dead whippin' niggers. By God, I'll kill a few of the lazy skunks before I'm much older. Have a drink?

SHER. -- Thanks. Say, where'd you put that last girl - the pretty one I brought today?

GAURD -- None o' your damn business. You've had the pick of every decent looking wench sent here this year and I get your leavin's. This one's mine.

SHER. -- O, cut that - who got you your job.

GUARD. - You're damn welcome to it. I'm sick o' niggers.

SHER. -- You're done up, Bill. Say, what do you say to another quart of whiskey, a good cigar and a game?

GUARD -- Pass 'em over. (Drinks and smokes)

SHER. -- Where's the cards?

GUARD -- In the drawer somewheres.

SHER. -- What shall it be - the old stand-by?

GUARD -- No - we'll change the game - Seven-up.

SHER. -- Good.

GUARD -- That's damned good whiskey.

(Murmurs from within)

GUARD -- Shut up out there - or I'll lash hell out of you. (starts to his feet. Dead silence.) What's the stakes.

SHER. -- The girl, of course.

GUARD -- Not by a damn sight.

SHER. -- And a hundred to the loser.

GUARD -- I ain't got no money.

SHER. -- O, your word's good.

GUARD -- Your's ain't. - Gimme the whiskey.

SHER. -- Here's my hundred -- deal! Best three out of five.

(They play, talking now and then)

GUARD -- High!

SHER. -- Low!

GUARD -- You lie - here's duece.

SHER. -- Fifty-two for game.

GUARD -- It's yours - my deal.

SHER. -- King leads.

GUARD -- Got his Jack, by God! High low Jack and the game. One game apiece.

SHER. -- Whose deal?

GUARD -- Hell! What a hand. Damn it! Take it all.

SHER. -- High, low, game. One for me.

GUARD -- (showing signs of intoxication) Next game's mine. Pass the booze.

SHER. -- Bottle's empty.— shall we quit?

GUARD. ~~-- O, let's quit.~~

~~SHER.~~ -- No, by God - it was best three out of five. You've only got two.

~~GUARD~~ -- All right - but booze! Wait till I get -

SHER. -- (fumbling in his bag) Here's another quart.

GUARD (suspiciously) Is it doped?

SHER. -- (angrily) I'm a gentleman!

GUARD -- Well - ain't I?

SHER. -- Sure! Play!

(The guard drinks sullenly and plays more carefully. Suddenly he leans forward.)

GUARD -- Let's see this trick.

(The sheriff scowls and slowly starts to turn the cards when the guard throws out his chin belligerently and jerks out his pistol. They look at each other silently and fixedly. The sheriff's hand steals toward his hip-pocket. Then the sheriff laughs grimly and exhibits the trick.)

GUARD -- Who played that seven?

SHER. -- I did. You played the six.

(They play on.)

SHER. -- Queen, high! Two for me.

(The sheriff drinks but the guard waves the whiskey aside. They both lean forward and snap the cards down as they play. Toward the last they emit fierce explosions of breath.)

SHER. - Hhh!

GUARD -- Hhh!

SHER. -- Hhh! (Rising with a yell) Game! She's mine - where'd you put her, Bill?

(The sheriff lurches out removing his coat as he goes. Bill lights his pipe, drains the bottle and pockets the money. As the curtain falls one hears the clanking of chains.)